- e THEIR method of proceeding in cases of this nature is as follows. When any complaint or appeal is presented to them, they cause the plaintiff to be detained, till the defendant, who is immediately summoned to appear before them and their council, hath heard his accusation, and made his defence. If it be made by an inferior against a governor or minister of state, or other grandees, he is no less obliged to appear; and with this difference, that on his approach to the court, he causes the horn or trumpet to be blown, to give notice of his coming; upon which some of the king's officers come to receive him into their custody; who having dismissed his retinue, conduct him to the hall of justice. In such cases the accuser must be provided with sufficient evidence, or else he is condemned to death, and executed out of hand: but if the accusation be fully proved, the defendant is condemned to make restitution suitable to the wrong done, and moreover to be fined, and suffer corporal punishment; which, if the offender be a person of rank or merit, is commonly a bastonade, more or less severe, as well as a fine, according to the nature of the offence, or the dignity and merit of the offender; and this bastonade is then inflicted by the king himself.

*Punishment,
how inflicted.*

THE sentence is no sooner pronounced, than the offender is led out of the hall into another chamber, where he is obliged to acknowledge his fault, and the justice as well as lenity of his punishment, in the humblest terms and posture; after which, he is stripped of his clothes, and laid flat on his face on the ground. The king then takes his staff of justice in his hand, and gives him as many strokes as he thinks fit; and having received his best thanks for his kind correction, bids him get up and put on his clothes again; which having done, and kissed his majesty's feet, he accompanies him, with the rest of the attendants, into the hall, with a serene countenance, and without betraying the least grief or discontent: there the king graciously dismisses him before the whole court, with a fresh charge to be careful to administer justice to his subjects; then causes him to be accompanied with the usual honours and perfumes to the gates of the city; and the whole matter is hushed as if nothing had happened; the people without being wholly ignorant of what hath been transacting within. The fine and charges of the suit are levied out of the offender's estate; or, if a favourite, out of the king's coffers.

THE Portuguese boast much of the good understanding there hath ever been between the kings of Melinda and those of Portugal, ever since the subjects of the latter were admitted into their dominions; and more particularly of the vast respect which the former of those monarchs pays to the latter; as a singular instance of which, we are told, that the head factor of the king of Portugal in this kingdom having some occasion to visit that of Melinda, the latter ordered all the nobles of his court to meet him; and that before he arrived at the royal palace with his retinue, a number of women met him also with their incensers, and perfumed him all the way thither. We should have been much better pleased to have met with something more worthy our reader's knowledge concerning those African princes, either relating to their extract or antiquity, whether hereditary or elective, their laws, power, riches, army, fleet, history, wars, and the like, concerning which they are altogether silent; and which, by the way, is no great mark of that good understanding and affection between those two crowns and their subjects, as is said above to reign between them.

into Melinda.*

HOWEVER, since this is all that we can find in them concerning this kingdom, we shall proceed to the only point of history relating to it, viz. the Portuguese obtaining their first entrance into it, under the conduct of their famed admiral Vasco de Gama, and what hath passed since their settlement in these parts; wherein we shall give the best account of both that we can from their writers, but more particularly from their celebrated bishop Ossorio's history of their conquests, which (whatever pains that good prelate's charity for his own countrymen, and the honour of his nation, may have induced him to take through the course of it to palliate their illicit invasions and dreadful ravages, both on this and the other African coasts, and elsewhere, some of which have already been taken notice of in the preceding chapters) is nevertheless justly esteemed the most exact, impartial, and authentic in all other respects. And here referring our readers to what hath been said in a former volume, concerning the original designs, as well as the success of the discovery of the African coasts, in order to find out a way into the East Indies by sea, and to what will be farther related in the history of Portugal, we shall beg leave to look back for the course of this expedition a little higher, in order to apprise our readers by what steps Gama and his fleet were brought to this coast and kingdom, after he had doubled the Cape of Good Hope.

Reception from the governor,*

THE first considerable coast that fell under his observation, was that of the island and kingdom of Mozambico, of which we shall speak more fully in a subsequent section. The bad condition his men and fleet were then in made him extremely desirous to cast anchor there, for some days at least, to give them some rest and refreshments. Having therefore informed himself about the island and its inhabitants, particularly about the governor, who commanded it under the king of Kilda, or Kiloa, as well as amply rewarded his informants, he sent them out of hand to him with his best compliments, accompanied with some valuable presents; with which he was so highly pleased, that he made him the most acceptable return he could wish, and came soon after in a sumptuous dress, attended by a grand retinue, to pay him a visit on board his ship.

ZACOCIA, that was the noble governor's name, was a zealous Mohammedan, and highly delighted at the gallant entertainment which Gama had prepared for him; and amongst other questions, asked him, whether he or his men were Moors or Turks? what arms they a used? and what books he had which treated of Mohammedism? not doubting, but he was of that religion. To these Gama answered in general, that he came from the west; that their arms were the same as he saw on his men; but that they had moreover some warlike machines, with which they could destroy whole armies, and batter the strongest fortresses to the ground. As for the books of their religion, he told him, he would shew them to him with the greatest pleasure, after he and his men had had a few days respite and refreshment. He added, that as he was now bound the East-Indies, he should be highly obliged to him if he could supply him with some expert navigators to conduct him thither; and he accordingly brought to him on the next day two pilots to steer him into Calicut.

b HITHERTO both sides were well satisfied with each other, and might have continued so much longer, had not Gama inadvertently given Zacocia to understand that he and his men were Christians, and by that untimely discovery, exasperated that zealous Moslem into quite a contrary behaviour; so that from that very moment he began to treat him and his men with the utmost spite and contempt, and to lay schemes to destroy him and his ships. One of the pilots, whom the governor had brought with him, perceiving the sudden change, got away, and was heard of no more; whilst some of the Portuguese, endeavouring to go on shore to get some wood and water, narrowly escaped being massacred by the people. Gama, not daring to stay longer there, set sail for Quiloa, but was driven by contrary winds to another island, where he fortunately took up an Arabian and his son going to Mecca; and finding him to be expert in navigation, resolved to get what instructions and assistance he could from him, for completing of his course.<sup>w</sup>

c HE then made a fresh attempt to reach Quiloa; but was, whether through the ignorance, or more probably, treachery, of the Mozambic pilot, steered for Mombaso, which he made him believe was inhabited with Christians, and would give him and his sick men all necessary assistance. We shall have occasion to speak more fully of that city and kingdom in the sequel; at present, we shall only say, that Gama, whether persuaded or necessitated to it, complied with his advice; but had hardly cast anchor, when he spied a galley, with about a hundred armed men, rowing towards his own ship, and expressing a strong desire to come on board of it, but which he absolutely forbid. Observing however four of them, who appeared to be above the common rank, he permitted them to come on board, on condition they left their arms behind. To this they not only consented, but highly commended that admiral for insisting on it; and withal told him, that their king, being agreeably informed of the arrival of the Portuguese, was desirous of entering into a friendly alliance with them; and accordingly sent deputies to treat about it in his name, on the following day. These, at their interview with him, forgot not one topic they thought would induce Gama to come to an anchorage at their harbour, that his majesty might the more conveniently, as was pretended, treat with them, about settling such a commerce with them, as would prove more advantageous to them than any they could hope for from India, without being attended with the like tediousness and hazard. Several other civilities passed between the king and admiral equally inviting; and such ample promises from the former to the latter, as began to excite the suspicions of our jealous Portuguese, that all was mere dissimulation, and a hellish plot against them. What confirmed his fear was, the danger which his ship ran, in approaching the harbour, of being driven a-ground by the violence of the waves; which obliged him to furl her sails, and to drop her anchor, and to order his other ships to do the same: at sight of which, his two Mozambic pilots jumped into the sea and swam away, being conscious of their treachery in steering them to this port. Gama called aloud to the men in the boats to bring them back, but in vain; for the king, having been apprised of what had passed at Mozambico, had laid his scheme to decoy them thither, in order to destroy them and their ships.<sup>x</sup> Finding therefore his plot defeated, he sent some boats out in the night to cut their cables; but these were likewise prevented from their design by the vigilance of the admiral; so that he was enabled to get clear of that bay in about two days after, and to steer his course to the port of Melinda, where he met with a much kinder reception from the king, as we shall see presently; and at the same time a fair opportunity of being revenged on that of Mombaso, by the timely assistance he gave that of Melinda against him. And here we must observe, that those two kingdoms were often at war with each other; that of Melinda bred the best and stoutest soldiers; that of Quiloa, to which Mombaso was then subject, had the largest dominions, and probably a more numerous army, or had gained some advantages over the other. And hence we may probably account for the kind welcome which the old Melindan monarch gave at this juncture to the Portuguese admiral, which he might not at another; that nation being by this time become odious and dreadful all over these coasts, not only on account of their religion, but much more of their superiority, conquests, and depredations. a

HOWEVER that be, Gama having so happily escaped the snares of the Mombasan governor, and gained the coast of Melinda, cast anchor at some distance from that capital, not only on account of the shelves and tempestuousness of that coast, but out of mistrust of meeting with the same treacherous treatment here. Having communicated his fear to the Meccan Arab whom he had taken on board, the man, in gratitude, offered to go on shore, and found the king's inclinations, and was accordingly landed on an island opposite to the city, from which he went thither in a boat, and was immediately after introduced to the king. • The account he gave that monarch of the Portuguese, and of their motives for being so desirous of entering into a friendly alliance with him, were so advantageous, and so well b relished by the good old monarch, who, it seems, was of an affable disposition, and, as we hinted above, might then stand in need of their help, that he dispatched a person to welcome them in his name, and to present them with sheep, fruit, and other refreshments. The admiral, on his side, having made him such returns as convinced him of his politeness and generosity, advanced nearer to the shore, whence he invited the Indian Christians to come on board; who seemed so transported with what they saw, and the reception he gave them, that they gratified him in their turn with several useful instructions, and made their report at their return greatly to their advantage; insomuch, that the old king was very desirous of paying the admiral a visit in person; but his age and infirmities not permitting it, he sent his son thither, on whom he had devolved the supreme authority, attended with a splendid c

THIS prince came magnificently dressed, and the galley in which he was rowed resounded with the music of variety of warlike instruments, as drums, trumpets, &c. Gama, on the other hand, came to meet him in a long-boat; which the prince had no sooner reached, than he jumped into it, and embraced the welcome stranger, and afterwards conversed with him with as much freedom and familiarity as if they had been intimate friends. His behaviour was polite, and his conversation full of good sense. He greatly admired his new guest, and attentively observed every part of his ship, and expressed a singular regard for his nation. Gama, at the same time, made him a present of his Saracen prisoners, which were accepted by him as a mark of high regard. The prince then invited him to court, and to pay a visit d to the king, offering to leave his two sons as pledges for his return. But Gama, whether out of mistrust of some hidden treachery, or fear of exceeding his orders, declined the invitation in the civilest manner, and only consented to let two of his men go on shore, at his earnest request. On the next day Gama came nearer the city in his long-boat, to take a fuller view of it, and its pleasant situation; and was again honoured with a visit from the prince, who brought to him an expert pilot, to assist him in the course of his voyage; and, not being able to prevail upon him to land, obtained a solemn promise from him, that, at his return, he would take Melinda in his way, and receive the ambassador on board, which his father was desirous to send to the king his master. He accordingly set sail the 22d of April, and proceeded on his voyage, leaving the Melindan court in great expectation of the proposed alliance with that of Portugal, from which they expected to reap no small advantage, as well from their assistance as commerce. e

How the Portuguese admiral performed his promise, we shall see in the following section. In the mean time it will not be foreign to our design, before we quit this country of Melinda, to say something of the chief islands which lie along the coast of it, and of the kingdoms belonging to it; which are as follow, according to De Lisle.

Isles and king-coast of Melinda.

1. The isle of Pate, with the kingdom of Ambasa.
2. The isle and kingdom of Lamo, mentioned a little higher.
3. The island and kingdom of Mombaso, then the residence of the king of Melinda, and of the Portuguese governor of that coast, which shall be described in the next section. f
4. The island and kingdom of Pemba.
5. The island and kingdom of Zanzibar.
6. The isle and kingdom of Quiloa.

Pate described.

1. THE isle and kingdom of Pate take their name from their capital, situate on a small island, at the mouth of a commodious bay, called by the Portuguese Baya Formosa, in about one degree of south latitude. It is a large town, well built and peopled, hath a good convenient port, and drives a great commerce with the neighbouring kingdoms and islands, particularly those of Lamo, Ambasa, Sian, and Chelichia, which surround it at a small distance, and have likewise their names from their respective capitals, none of them considerable enough to require a farther description <sup>z</sup>. The king of Pate is a Mohammedan, and g

- a so are most of his subjects, tributary however to the Portuguese, who have a fort in it, under their governor of these coasts, who is little better than a tyrant over them, as we may judge by what we lately mentioned concerning the shameful execution of the king of Lamo in his capital. Pate has another town and port, named Moudra, but which was since taken and raised by Thomas de Sousa, the Portuguese admiral, for refusing, or, perhaps, only neglecting, to pay the usual tribute <sup>b</sup>. Tributary to Portugal.
- 2 THE isle and kingdom of Lamo hath been already spoken of in part; and all that needs be added is, that the capital of its name hath a good port, and is well walled and fortified. The king and government being Mohammedans, are often assaulted and at war with the rest of the inhabitants, who are idolaters, though the whole island, as has been already mentioned, is tributary to Portugal, like the rest of this small archipelago <sup>c</sup>. Kingdom and capital of Lamo.
3. THE kingdom of Mombaso will be the subject of the next section.
4. THE isle and kingdom of Pemba is situate over-against the bay of St. Raphael, in the kingdom of Melinda. De Lisle gives it 4 deg. 50 min. latitude, and places it just over-against the city of Mombaso. It is small and inconsiderable, tho' the princes of it assume the title of kings <sup>d</sup>, like those of Mombaso and Melinda, if the Portuguese governor, under whom they live, do not bestow it upon them either through favour, bribery, or for the grandeur of the king their master. We shall see, in the following section, a more pregnant instance of this presumption. Kingdom of Pemba.
- c 5. THE isle and kingdom of Zanzibar is likewise situate over-against the bay of St. Raphael, between those of Pemba and Momfia, about 8 or 9 leagues from the land <sup>e</sup>. It hath been tributary to Portugal ever since their fleet appeared on this coast, the king of it submitting to pay them the annual weight of gold, which Sanutus says amounts to 100 mitigals of gold, and thirty sheep <sup>f</sup>. This island produces plenty of rice, millet, and sugar-cane; it hath whole forests of orange and citron trees, the latter of extraordinary height, and most odoriferous smell; it likewise abounds with rivers of excellent water, and drives a very considerable commerce with the adjacent kingdoms; insomuch that R. Vasco, during his short cruise of two months near its coasts, took no less than fourteen vessels from those islanders, richly laden with variety of merchandize, and mounting some pieces of cannon. There is between this island and the Terra firma a chanel, or rather streight, so narrow, that no ship d can pass it without being seen by both sides <sup>g</sup>. Kingdom of Zanzibar. Tributary to Portugal. Produce and commerce.
6. THE other islands of Quirimba, Amfia, Anisa, &c. have little else worth notice except that they breed great quantities of large and small cattle, besides abounding with grain and fruits like those already mentioned; all which, except what is consumed among them, is conveyed to the inhabitants of Terra firma, within the African coast, and a great advantage is reaped from the commerce. That of Quirimba abounds with a coarser kind of manna, of greyish-red, and difficult to dissolve, though, in other respects, equally purgative with the best <sup>h</sup>. Other islands. Vast herds of cattle. A coarse sort of manna.
- e THE inhabitants are weakly, slender, and meagre, though great feeders; their dress is much the same with that of the Melindans, both males and females; and the latter are equally fond of adorning themselves with gold and silver chains, bracelets, and other gaudy trifles, which, with the cotton stuffs, wherewith they cover their bodies from the waist downwards, they have from Mombaso, Melinda, and other parts of that coast, in exchange for their rice, sugar, fruits, and cattle. The men in general give themselves up to agriculture and commerce, for which they are better formed than for war. Their trading vessels are slightly made, and the timber fastened together by ropes, made of flags, instead of nails, and their sails are made of mats. Those only of Zanzibar are more strongly and better built, and have some cannon, as they commonly carry the richest merchandizes of that coast; whereas the greatest part of the rest are only laden with rice, fruits, and cattle <sup>i</sup>. Rice; fruits; trading vessels.

- f WE join here these two islands together, because they were under the government of one monarch, when the Portuguese first sailed to these coasts; and though they have been severed, yet the manner of their being so, and other circumstances relating to the catastrophe, are so linked and interwoven, as we shall see in their subsequent history, that they could not be easily divided, without continual repetitions; an inconvenience which Islands and kingdom of Mombaso.

ought by all means to be avoided in a work like this. We have already observed, in the last section, that that of Mombaso is contiguous to that of Melinda, and only severed from it by the Zebbeon Quilmanci, a river we have described in its proper place<sup>a</sup>, on the north sides. Its extent towards the south is not so unanimously fixed by geographers, some stretching its coasts no farther than the mouth of the river of its name, where the island and city, which gave that name to the rest, are situate<sup>b</sup>; whilst others have extended it as far as the Cape del Gada, in the 10th degree of south latitude, according to De Lisle; but in this latter sense he includes likewise that of Quiloa with it, as being once both subject to the same monarch, as lately hinted<sup>c</sup>.

As to the island of Mombaso, it is situate under the 4th degr. 5 min. of south latitude, in a convenient bay, made by the river above-mentioned, and is reckoned about twelve miles in circuit. The soil is exceedingly fruitful, and produces rice, millet, and other grain, variety of fruit-trees, and other vegetables and esculents; here are also bred vast quantities of cattle, and variety of poultry; and the island abounds with excellent springs of fresh water. The climate is temperate, and the air healthy, whatever the Portuguese might pretend to the contrary, when obliged to abandon the city. The inhabitants live long, and at their ease, in the capital especially, where they enjoy great plenty, with taste and elegance. Their bread, which is either of rice or millet, is made into flat cakes, and mixed with sugar, herbs, and other ingredients, to give it a more agreeable taste. Their drink is a kind of beer, either made of rice, honey, or some sort of fruits, which are here excellent, particularly their oranges, some of which are very large, and of exquisite taste and flavour, even to the very rind, which might be eaten with pleasure. Those liquors they chiefly keep in vessels of different sorts and sizes, neatly made of bullocks horns, as being less apt to break or burst; and of the same materials are their drinking cups and other household utensils made; that commodity being there in great plenty, as are also the artists, who work it with great skill and neatness. Their cattle are also well fed and tasted, their pasture being in great plenty, and well watered; and some of their sheep have those large tails, frequently mentioned to weigh between twenty and thirty pounds; so that there is plenty of every necessary of life, as well as of people, whether natives or strangers, who resort thither for commerce, by all whom it is as profusely consumed†.

THE city was once a peninsula, but hath been since turned into an island, by cutting a canal through the isthmus, in such a manner, that one nook of it covers the city, so that it is not seen till one enters the port<sup>d</sup>. The houses are built after the Italian manner, of stone cemented with mortar, and embellished with curious paintings and other ornaments; the streets strait, though narrow; and the houses contiguous, and terraced on the tops, so that one may walk upon them from one end to the other, without interruption; of which we take notice, because it was from thence that the inhabitants mostly annoyed the Portuguese, when they made their hostile entry into the place, as we shall see in the sequel. The city is defended by a stout citadel, into which the Portuguese afterwards retired, when they could hold the town no longer: they were afterwards driven out of this last retreat, an 1631, by an Arabian ckeyk, who made it afterwards the place of his residence, and where the inhabitants of Mombaso, as well as other trading merchants, applied to him for the liberty of commerce<sup>e</sup>.

BEFORE the town is formed by the sea a most commodious bay, which opens in the form of a cockle-shell, into which the trading vessels have all the depth and room to sail and tack about that they can wish, the chanel being wide enough for the largest of them to enter with all their sails displayed. Within this inclosure, on the farther side, is a dyke, or causeway, built of stone, which runs across the chanel, over which one may pass from one side to the other, at low water. Besides the chanel, which surrounds the town, there are several other navigable ones, which run into the land; that which the city chiefly makes use of hath scarcely the breadth of a bow-shot in some places, and the entrance into the bay is defended by a stout bulwark, which the inhabitants raised soon after the arrival of Vasco de Gama into the bay, an 1497, and was likely to have been destroyed with his fleet, through his over-confidence in venturing into it, at the invitation of the governor, as hath been already observed in the last section<sup>f</sup>. So that, upon the whole, this port carries on as great a commerce with the islands and kingdoms adjacent, as any upon this coast.

HERE is a great variety of inhabitants, some black, some white, olive, swarthy, &c. but most of them dress after the Arabian manner, and the richer sort very sumptuously, chiefly with the richest stuffs and silk, whilst gold and silver tissue, and such costly cloaths, is that of the women. The furniture of their houses is no less elegant, consisting in rich

- a carpets, paintings, hangings, and variety of utensils and ornaments, all which are imported from Cambaya, Persia, and other countries. The people are said to be all more affable and civil to strangers than any on this coast, though consisting of so many nations, complexions, and religions, as Mohammedans, Idolaters, and Christians. They were formerly all Pagans, addicted to the grossest superstitions of the Bedowin sect. The Portuguese made a small number of converts upon their settling in this kingdom. The far greater part afterwards either returned to their old paganism, or turned Mohammedans, after the example of one of their monarchs, who, in the year 1631, had espoused a Christian, as he had been brought up in that religion; but then falling out with the Portuguese governor, on account of some injustice or oppression, drove him out of the citadel, massacred all that fell into his hands, and turned Mohammedan, in order to be protected by the Turks <sup>Various inhabitants. Religions.</sup>

- b But of all the various nations which have settled themselves in the inland part of this kingdom, and made the most terrible figure in its wars, that of the Imbis, as they are called, is one of the most fierce, barbarous, and impious, of any upon these coasts, if not of any upon the whole globe. The reader will see in the margin (B) the best account we can find concerning their extract and spreading themselves into divers parts of Africa, in prodigious colonies. They have been so powerful formerly in this kingdom, that their monarchs could raise and lead an army of 80,000 men into the field. When these are upon the point of engaging the enemy, their custom is to cause whole herds of cattle to march at the head of their ranks. These are followed by a number of men who carry fire before them; a dreadful emblem this, signifying no less, than that all who are made prisoners must expect to be roasted and devoured by those canibals. After these fire-bearers come the king's life-guard, armed cap-à-piè, and he in the center; after whom follows the body of the army. Dreadful is the fate of those who fall into his merciless hands, and the country through which he passes, where every man, woman, and beast, are alike doomed to the most shocking and inhuman death and destruction, and every place to plunder, fire, and sword. <sup>Imbis, a barbarous people, described. Way of fighting. Cruelty to their captives.</sup>

- c THESE hellish monarchs are, by their diabolical subjects, worshipped as gods, and assume the title of emperors of the whole terrestrial, as the Portuguese kings do over the aqueous globe; and that all the inhabitants of the earth ought to submit to their yoke, and obey their commands. They carry their impiety still farther, even against the Deity itself; and whenever annoyed either by rain or sunshine, arrogantly bend their bow against heaven, and, in revenge, let fly their impotent arrows and curses against the sun and skies <sup>Impious monarchs.</sup>. And such is the terror they spread where-ever they come, that the affrighted inhabitants chuse to abandon their native dwelling, and throw themselves under the protection of either the Turks or Portuguese, rather than run the risk of encountering such a host of incarnate furies. The former of these have indeed been ever zealous either to convert them to Mohammedism, or to exirpate such as refuse it; but as that vermin is naturally of an unsettled and wandering nature, all they could do was only to drive them farther into the inland country, where themselves have not yet been able to penetrate, and where they still occupy vast regions unmolested, and practise the most detestable and bloody customs, even amongst themselves, as well as cruel ravages and butcheries in their excursions; of both which we shall have occasion to give some dreadful instances in the sequel. And thus much shall <sup>The Turks their greatest enemies. They are dispersed over Afric.</sup>

(B) This monstrous generation is supposed to be the cursed spawn of some of those barbarous canibals that are settled in the neighbourhood of the Cape of Good Hope, being, like them, tall and well-set, fierce and warlike, living altogether upon rapine and plunder, and feeding on the flesh of their captives, and even of their own kindred, dispatching those that are sick, in order to fit them for the shambles. Their drink is chiefly human blood, and their drinking-vessels are made of mens skulls. Their weapons are poisoned arrows, and long poles burned at each end (4).

This kingdom is not the only one into which they have dispersed their infernal colonies; they have formerly over-run not only a great part of the eastern coast of Africa, but have penetrated even as far as Arabia, and committed the most horrid ravages, butcheries, and devastations, in some parts of it. And tho' they were either happily destroyed or driven out, yet we shall find them swarming in many other parts of Africa, tho' under other names; as the Gallas, and Agas, which infect the empire of Abissinia, the Jaggi, or Jaggos, in the kingdom of Metamba, and other parts of Afric, under that compound one of Jambagottas. But under whatever names we chance to meet with them in the sequel, they retain their accursed customs, and are justly looked upon as a most dreadful scourge from heaven, and by none more than by the Abissinians, where they have settled themselves in several frontier provinces, and from thence make the most horrid incursions into others, as we shall show in the sequel of this history.

The isle and kingdom of Quiloa.

Its extent.

Inhabitants.
Language.

Elegant living and dress.

Manner of mourning.

THIS island is situate, according to most geographers, near or upon the mouth of b the river Cuava, or Cuabo, and Quisimajugo, under 8 degr. 20 min. of south latitude<sup>1</sup> (C), and was first discovered by the Portuguese, an. 1498. It has its name from its capital, a large opulent city, of which we shall say more in the sequel. The kingdom, which likewise bears its name, lieth on the continent over-against it, and extends itself about 200 miles along the coast, from north to south (D); but how far towards the west, or inland, is not known. It is divided from the island by a narrow chanel, and the soil of both so near the same for goodness and fertility, that they are thought to have been formerly contiguous. The king and his subjects are Mohammedans, and the latter partly black and partly tawny. They all speak the Arabic and several other languages, which they learn from the nations they traffick with. Their dress is that of the Arabian Turks, and c much the same with that of Mombaso, lately described; neither do they come behind-hand with them either in the finery and richness of it, or in the elegance of living, as they enjoy the same plenty of all necessaries here as well as there<sup>k</sup>; the women especially affect to go fine and gay, and with variety of ornaments about their necks, arms, wrists, and ankles; one fort in particular, viz. bracelets, made of ivory, curiously wrought, which, upon the death of a parent, husband, or near relation, they break in pieces, in token of sorrow;
whilst the men express theirs by shaving their hair, and abstinence from food<sup>l</sup>.

WE cannot give any certain dimensions of this island, but have a much better account of its metropolis, which is large, rich, and well built. The houses are of stone and mortar, handsome, and after the Spanish manner. They are several stories high, and have each a d pleasant garden behind, well watered and cultivated, here being plenty of springs of fresh water; though that which they are forced to draw in some parts of the island is not near so pleasant or wholesome, which is owing to the lowness of the land about it. The houses are finely furnished within, and terraced on the top with a hard kind of clay; and the streets so narrow, like those we spoke of in the last article, or, indeed, of most cities on this coast, that one may easily go from one side to the other on the top. On one side of the town is the citadel, where resides the Mohammedan prince. It is adorned with stately towers, and surrounded with a flat-bottom ditch, and other fortifications. It hath two gates, one towards the port, whence one may see the ships sailing in and out; and the other looking

(C) This to us seems a great mistake of Father Fitau, and those who have followed him (5); the mouth of the Cuabo, according to the latest discoveries, lying under the 17th and not the 8th degr. of south latitude, unless we will suppose two rivers of the same name.
D'Anville places the mouth of one, to which he gives the name of King, near the town of Quiloa, which bids fair to be that on which the island lies, and answers well enough to the 8th degree of latitude above-mentioned (6).

(D) We are told, however, (7) that the king of Quiloa was master of a great number of islands, very fruitful and well-peopled; insomuch that his dominions along this coast are said to have extended near 300 leagues in length, when the Portuguese appeared first in these parts; who had not been long acquainted with them before they stripped him of a considerable number of them. For at that time, we are told, that he reigned over the kingdoms of Sofala, Cuama, Angos, and Mozambico (8); though long since reduced to that only one of Quiloa, which is reckoned 400 miles from that of Mozambico.

Linschot moreover tells us that, in his time, the Qui-loan king was tributary to the emperor of Monemugi, and that his whole kingdom was confined to that one island: if so, his case is still much worse, having been probably deprived by that potent prince of his inland dominions, as he hath been of all his other islands on the coast; and, with this double aggravation to his misfortunes, his being become tributary to the one, and deprived by the other of a considerable branch of his former commerce with the kingdom of Sofala, which those invaders have engrossed to themselves; so that at present there are but few vessels that go from the one to the other, and the traffick dwindled to little or nothing, in comparison of what it was when the Quiloean monarchs used to send their fleets thither, and brought thence vast quantities of gold, amber, and other valuable commodities, amounting to an immense

a THE country about Quiloa, though low, is yet very pleasant, and fertile in rice and millet, fruits and good pasturage; so that they breed abundance of cattle, besides poultry of all sorts, both wild and tame. They have fish likewise in great plenty, and very good<sup>m</sup>. The climate is likewise affirmed by most travellers to be very temperate and healthy; Sanutus being the only author we know of who hath ventured to assert the contrary in all these respects; though this was probably done to excuse the Portuguese abandoning it<sup>n</sup>.

WE read of another Quiloa on the continent, which some authors will have to be the same with the Repta of Ptolemy, because distinguished by the name of the old city<sup>o</sup>. It was built about 100 years ago, by the celebrated Hali, the son of Hoshein, Soltan of Shiraz, or Persia, who afterwards made it his residence. It is parted from that on the island by the river Guabo, and a narrow arm of the sea, on the south of which it stands. That prince, being come into those parts, pitched upon that spot to build and fortify it, that it might be a kind of bulwark against the insults of the Cassers: but whatever it might be in his and his successor's time, it is since gone to decay, and is now but an inconsiderable place, and of no great commerce abroad; whereas this in the island, being chiefly inhabited by rich merchants, who traffick with the neighbouring kingdoms, and adjacent islands, for gold, ambergrise, pearls, musk, and other rich commodities, renders it one of the most opulent, as well as agreeable cities on the coast<sup>p</sup>. Their trading vessels are built much after the same manner as those of Mombaso; only with this peculiarity, we are told<sup>q</sup>, that they are laid over, inside and outside, with a thick varnish, made of frankincense instead of pitch.

c IT is time now to come to the historical part of these two kingdoms; and, that we may proceed in such order as to avoid all needless repetitions, and yet omit nothing worth our reader's notice, we shall begin with the foundation of the old city and kingdom of Quiloa, by the Persian prince above-mentioned; that being the oldest transaction of moment we find concerning them. Hoshein, who reigned in Shiraz, as we hinted above, left seven sons behind him at his death; one of whom, named Ali, or Hali, being born of an Abissinian slave, and finding himself despised by the rest of his brethren, resolved to leave that kingdom, and to go seek his fortune elsewhere. As he was a prince of great prudence as well as courage, he quickly made choice of the coast of Zanguebar for the first trial, it being known to be a rich one, on account of its vast commerce, as well as of the gold mines on the continent.

d He accordingly embarked at Hormuz, with his small company of friends and other adventurers, in two vessels, and arrived soon after at Magadoxa, and thence proceeded to Brava, both which have been already described in this chapter<sup>r</sup>; but finding them already inhabited, he was obliged to proceed farther, and in quest of some settlement where he might be sole master. He came at length to the bay of Quiloa; and having examined the advantageous situation of that peninsula, and consulted in what manner he might best secure himself and his small colony against the attempts of the Cassers, he easily obtained leave of them, by means of some presents, to settle and fortify himself in it against the insults of the Arabs, who were masters of Songo, Changa, and other islands in that neighbourhood. It was not long before he had made his new settlement so strong, and the harbour so convenient, as to be able to attempt the reduction of Monfia, and some other adjacent islands, by the assistance of his martial son; after which he assumed the title of king of Quiloa, and gave that name to this little state.

f HIS first successor Hali, surnamed Bumalo, reigned 40 years; and, for want of children, left the kingdom to his nephew, named Hali Busoloquefe, who reigned only four years and a half, and was succeeded by his son David. This last had not reigned above four years before he was driven out of his kingdom by the king of Changa, and retired to Monfia, which was one of the founder's first conquests, where he died. The king of Changa, now master of Quiloa, sent one of his nephews, named Hali Boubucoquer, to be governor of it. He was two years after expelled by the inhabitants, who set up in his room Hoshein Solyman, who was nephew to David the late dispossessed king, and reigned sixteen years. He was succeeded by another of David's nephews, named Hali Bendawd, who, after a long reign of sixty years, left the kingdom to his grandson of the same name. This last had not reigned above six years before his subjects dethroned him for his tyranny, and set up his brother Hoshein Ben David on the throne, who reigned twenty-four years. He was succeeded by Soleyman, a prince of the same family, who, after a two years reign, was beheaded by order of his subjects, who raised one of his sons, named David, to the throne. David reigned forty years, and was succeeded by his son Soleyman Hoshein, a warlike prince, who subdued the greatest part of the coast of Zanguebar, and seized on the gold mines of Sofala, and of the islands of Monfia, Pemba, and Zanzibar. It was this prince who first raised the city of Quiloa to its greatest splendor and opulence, and fortified it with a stout citadel, built of square stone, flanked it with towers, and surrounded it with a ditch. He built also some a handsome palaces, and other stately fabricks in the city, where most of the buildings were before of timber only: all which were completed within the space of eighteen years, which was that of his reign. His son and successor reigned only two years, and left the kingdom to his brother Talud, who enjoyed it but one year, and left it to a third brother, named Hasben, who reigned 25 years, and was succeeded by a fourth brother, named Bonji Soleyman, who, during the ten years of his reign, proved the most successful of all his brethren, and was most prosperous in all his enterprizes.

AFTER his death the crown fell to his nephew Hali David, who, after four years reign, left it to another prince, who held it fourteen years, and left it to his grandson Hasben. This prince proved likewise very successful during the eighteen years of his reign, and was more- b over an excellent prince. His son Soleyman reigned fourteen years, and was treacherously murdered as he was coming out of the mosk. By his death the crown devolved on his eldest son Hasben, who being then at Mecca, his brother David took the reins of government, and held them till his return, which was not till two years after, when he resigned them to him again. Hasben reigned 24 years, and left no issue, and, after his death, David resumed the government, and enjoyed it the same number of years, and was succeeded by his son Soleyman, who was dethroned by his uncle Hasban, 20 days after his coming to the crown. Hasban died six years and a half after, and left it to his nephew Taluf, brother to the deposed Soleyman.

TALUF reigned only one year, and after him another Soleyman reigned two years and four months, and was dethroned by an uncle of his name. This last reigned twenty-four years c four months and twenty days, and was succeeded by his son Hasban, who reigned likewise twenty-four years, and left the throne to one of his bothers, named Mahamad, who, after nine years was succeeded by his son Soleyman, who reigned twenty-two years, and after him his uncle Ishmael Ben-Hasban fourteen years. His successor, who was prime minister, and raised to the throne by the people, had not reigned above a year before they deposed him, and chose one of the royal blood, named Mahmud, but then reduced to extreme poverty, and whose reign proved as short-lived, they having raised the old minister Hasban to it, who reigned ten years, and after him his son Zayd ten more.

ZAYD was no sooner dead than the prime minister seized on the throne, and held it one year. Upon his mounting it, he had substituted in his place of prime minister, one of his d brothers named Mahmud, who had three brave sons, against whom he conceived such jealousy, that he removed them as far as he could from his capital, under pretence of promoting them to some government; one of whom, named Jusef, was lord of Sofala. Anaga, who came to erect a fortress there, was slain; and the people chose Abd'alla, the brother of the late king Zayd, for their king. He reigned about a year and a half, and another brother of his about as long; after whose death the prime minister attempted to raise Hasban, the son of the late prime minister of the same name, to the throne, but was opposed by the people, who chose in his room a prince of the royal family, named Chombo, but who was on the next year deposed, and Hasban again raised to the throne. Five years after he was again e deposed in favour of Brabam, or Ibraim, the son of the late sultan Mahmud. Ibraim had not held the reins above two years before he was deposed in favour of his nephew Alfudail, whose reign proving but short, Emir Brabam, the prime minister, declined making a fresh election of a king, but laid claim to the throne, as being the son of the late Soleyman, and first cousin to Alfudail. However, though Brabam was then master of the metropolis, the people never vouchsafed to give him the royal title, but only that of governor. And what helped to keep him up against them, were the contests which arose between the Quiloans and the f Portuguese admirals. However we find that the Alfudail above-mentioned had left a son behind, whom he had by an Abissinian slave, who reigned afterwards in Quiloo, at the time when the kingdom was become tributary to that of Portugal, as we shall see in the sequel of this history. We hope, in the mean time, our readers will not be displeased to have seen such a long series of monarchs preserved, and transmitted to us, through so many centuries; though little more can be found in it than their lineal descent from their first founder, and the length of their reigns, as they have been conveyed to us by the African historian, often quoted in this part of the work (E).

IT

* MARMOL, lib. ix. c. 38.

(E) It is plain however, by the short sketch which that author hath communicated to us, that those Arabs had a very regular method of preserving their records; and that the list above-mentioned is only an epitome of what was more fully deposited in them. We shall find in the sequel of this history, that, at the time of Almeid the Portuguese admiral's reducing the city of Quiloo under tribute, there was a person in it eminent in power and learning, named Mahmud Ancon, on whom that commander would have bestowed the royal dignity, but who generously declined it, in favour of one of the princes of the royal blood, whom he recommended to him, to which Almeid readily consented. And it is not improbable that it was upon this surprising occasion that

THE reader may remember that their admiral Vasco de Gama left the king of Melinda, in pursuance of his order, with a special promise of taking that capital in his way, at his return for Europe. He proved as good as his word; and, among other valuable presents, sent by that prince to the king of Portugal, Gama took with him his ambassador to that court, who was to conclude a treaty of alliance and friendship between them<sup>1</sup>. He returned again on the following year, well satisfied with his reception and success at that court, and in the Portuguese fleet, bound for India, commanded by Don Petro Alvarez de Cabral, consisting of 13 ships and 1500 men. His orders were, among other things, to try, by all possible means, to obtain of the Samorin of Calicut<sup>2</sup>, a permission to build a fortress near the city, by which the Portuguese might be secure from the insults of their enemies in the carrying on of their commerce; and, in case of refusal, to declare him an enemy, and treat him as such; and this we mention by-the-bye, to shew what methods they took to allure or frighten every prince or state into an alliance with the king of Portugal; and after what horrid and destructive manner they revenged the pretended affront of their refusal, not only on them, but on all their unhappy and innocent subjects, and all this under the specious cloak of religion, of which we shall quickly give some pregnant instances. However, what at present most chiefly concerns our subject, is, that Cabral was further ordered to take Melinda in his way, and to assure the king, in his master's name, that his embassy was very acceptable to him, and that he would omit nothing that was in his power to deserve the esteem and friendship of so worthy a prince.

WE shall not enter into a detail of his adventures and disasters, which will be best seen in the history of Portugal, but relate only what passed on this coast between him and the several kingdoms he stopped at, after his doubling the Cape of Good Hope.

THE first place he touched at was the port of Mosambico, where he was to deliver some presents and a letter to the king from his master. But, in his way, meeting with two rich ships, lying at anchor near the coast, whose masters no sooner espied him than they made all the sail they could to escape him, he quickly came up to them, and took them; yet finding afterwards that they belonged to a prince related to the king of Melinda, he thought himself obliged to restore them, with all the gold and other valuables they had brought from Sofala.

HAVING performed his commission at Mosambico, and provided himself with a pilot for Quiloa, he went on coasting at a small distance from the shore, and observing the several fertile islands which lay in his way, and were either subject or tributary to that kingdom, extending in length about 200 miles<sup>3</sup>. Having at length reached the port of Quiloa, he sent a message to the king, named Ibrahim, or, as others write it, Braham, or Abraham, acquainting him that he brought letters from the king of Portugal, by which he would easily perceive how desirous that great monarch was to enter into an alliance with him. He added, that he himself would have been proud of bringing them to his majesty, were it not inconsistent with his office, and the orders he had received not to leave the fleet on any pretence, begging of him, at the same time, to appoint some place upon the water, where he might have the honour of conferring with him about it.

IBRAIM received the message with great marks of gratitude, and returned the following answer to the admiral: That he would cheerfully embrace an opportunity of entering into an alliance of friendship with a prince for whom he had conceived the greatest esteem; and that seeing he could not have the pleasure of seeing Cabral on shore, he would give him the desired meeting on the water, by the very next day. He appeared accordingly, on the morrow, with his vessels, adorned in the richest manner, and attended with a splendid retinue, clad in purple, embroidered with silver and gold, and armed with swords and daggers, the handles of which were set with diamonds; the water resounding with the music of their flutes and trumpets; whilst the Portuguese, on their part, saluted them with their cannon, and other demonstrations of joy; and Cabral, as well as the rest of the officers, who accompanied him in his long-boat, were cloathed in the most elegant manner. As soon as they were come up with the king's barge, Cabral, having saluted him in the most respectful manner, presented him with the letters from king Emanuel, written in Arabic, and gave him the other particulars of his embassy from him, all which were received with that the noble Ancon presented him with this extract of the Quiloean history, and regular succession of monarchs during the space of four hundred years, if not the very archives from which it was taken. Accordingly Marmol adds, that Ancon assured him that the people were so displeased with Ibrahim (as being only the son of a slave) that they would not admit of any king being set over them, unless he was descended from the royal family (10).

marks of the highest satisfaction and complacency; and it was agreed that Cabral should, <sup>a</sup> on the following day, send a proper person to land, to give the finishing hand to the proposed treaty of alliance. All this however was quashed before the time was come, by the intervention of the Arabian merchants of that city, who gave the king such an odious and dreadful character of the Portuguese, and their religion, with their conquests, piracies, tyrannies, restlessness, and cruelties, where-ever they got footing, that he was at once deterred not only from pursuing the negotiation, but from ever admitting them to trade in his dominions. And, as he doubted not their giving him some signal marks of their resentment on this occasion, he ordered the garrison of the city to be reinforced, and all other hostile preparations that are usually made in sea-port towns, when an enemy is in the harbour. Cabral was soon apprised of all this, by the brother of the king of Melinda, then at Quiloa; and, <sup>b</sup> to avoid all further hostilities and dangers, set sail immediately for that kingdom, where he was received with great demonstrations of joy by the king, who took care to send him an immediate supply of provisions and refreshments, sufficient for his whole fleet.

THE first thing which Cabral did, after his arrival, was to send the Melindan ambassador, whom he had brought back from Portugal, on shore, with the presents which Emanuel sent to his majesty. The good old king was so highly pleased, that on that day he appeared on horseback, richly dressed, and went to the sea-side, where Cabral and his officers met and saluted him in the usual form. Cabral, though earnestly pressed to make a longer stay, civilly declined it; and, having delivered two persons into his care, who were sent by Emanuel to penetrate into Abissinia, took his leave, and pursued his course for India, in which we <sup>c</sup> shall follow him no further than by observing, that he fell foul on all the Arabian ships that came in his way, in revenge of the disappointment and affront which those of Quiloa had occasioned to him. However, the Portuguese resentment did not display itself till the arrival of their new admiral upon this coast, four years after.

THIS was the famed Don Francesco Almaed, or Almeid, who was besides invested with the character of viceroy of India; and after much slow sailing and difficulty in doubling the Cape, steered his course directly for the island of Quiloa, where he arrived about the latter end of July. The first thing which he did, upon his approaching the port, was to send a formal message to the king with his compliments, and notice of his arrival, which that prince, however, whether out of hatred to his nation, or fear of his resentment, or, as the <sup>d</sup> Portuguese historian words it, conscious of his wickedness), instead of answering, left the city in the silence of the night*.

THE citizens, finding themselves deserted by their pusillanimous king, had immediate recourse to the brave Mahmud Ancon, mentioned in the last note; and begged that he would lead them against the common enemy, promising to obey him, and fight in defence of their lives and liberties; whilst Almeid, having waited some time for the king, or for some answer to his message, and beginning to suspect some hostile design, resolved to attack the city in form, and staid no longer than till the tide was at its height, which then commonly comes up to the walls of it, and then landed five hundred brisk fellows, whom he divided into two battalions; the one of 200 men, the command of which he gave to his son Lawrence, and headed the other himself; at the sight of whom, Ancon and his citizens <sup>e</sup> fled also out of the town, so that the Portuguese entered it without opposition. This failed not to alarm that suspicious general, who now dreading some treacherous design, ordered his men to halt, and his son with his battalion to proceed slowly, and with great circumspection, and on no account to suffer them to break their ranks. His precautions, however, proved needless, seeing the few that were left in the town were either such as had neither courage nor strength to oppose him; so that he ordered it to be plundered out of hand, and the spoil to be deposited in a large house, where he distributed it amongst his men, reserving for himself one single arrow.

HIS next care was to set them about building a fort in a proper place, near the shore, <sup>f</sup> to repel the enemy in case of need; and, whilst that work was carrying on, sent a message to fetch Mahmud Ancon and the other citizens to him, who, upon their arrival, threw themselves on their knees, and implored his mercy; but he quickly raised Ancon up, telling him and them, that they had no cause to fear any thing from him, but rather to be thankful to be delivered from the usurpation of a cruel and perfidious coward, and be restored to their liberty under the auspicious reign, and by the singular clemency, of king Emanuel, a most powerful, and no less benevolent, prince. He then proceeded to recapitulate the many injuries and cruelties they had suffered under their dastardly tyrant, and the blessings they might promise themselves under the protection of the king his master; as a proof of which, he told them, he would raise Mahmud Ancon to the royal dignity, whose affection, <sup>g</sup> fidelity, and conduct, they had so long and often experienced. Thus did the artful admiral a cajole the now subdued and heartless Quiloans, out of one slavery into a worse; and, to conclude the scene with the greater shew of splendor, saluted him king of Quiloa, in the name of Emanuel his master, and placed a crown of gold upon his head; imposing, at the same time, an annual tribute upon him, which he obliged him, by a solemn oath, to pay; and to behave, in all other respects, as a most faithful vassal to the crown of Portugal (F).

THE admiral, having succeeded so far, beheld, with no small pleasure, the remainder of the people, who had abandoned the city, flock back again at the news of their old chief being now become their king; as well as the first marks of their loyalty to their new lord the king of Portugal, which he had exacted from them, which were to assist his men in the completing of the fort which he had begun, and, to stir them up to the greater dispatch, ordered his tent to be set up at the foot of it. He caused likewise some 8 or 10 of the adjacent houses to be demolished, to make an esplanade between the city and fort, and on the sea-side caused some outworks to be made, and a large ditch to be dug round, to guard the place on that side, as well as on the land side. The fort, thus finished, was called Fort St. James, the patron of Spain, on account of their having entered the city on the eve of his festival. The last thing he did was to appoint a governor, and to leave a good garrison in it, together with a couple of vessels to guard the coast; eight days after which he steered his course towards Mombasa.

An esplanade made between the fort and city.

THUS far our two authors agree as to the promotion and coronation of Mahmud Ancon: but whilst the one leaves him in the quiet and chearful possession of his new kingdom, till he was treacherously murdered by an ungrateful prince, a friend of the deposed Braham, whom he had obliged in the most singular manner, and afterwards to have been succeeded in the regal dignity by his own son<sup>y</sup>; the other<sup>z</sup> tells us, that that brave and noble prince, far from being satisfied with his exaltation to that dignity, took an opportunity, before Almeid's departure, to divest himself of it, in favour of a surviving son of the late king Alfudail, his particular friend, by an act of the most unprecedented gratitude and loyalty to the royal family; and prevailed upon the admiral to send for the young prince, and to settle the crown upon him, which was readily complied with, to the great admiration of all the Portuguese, who could not but highly applaud such a generous deed in an Arabian and Mohammedan, which, they were conscious, none of them could imitate.

Mahamed treacherously murdered. A different account of it from Ossorio. A singular instance of his loyalty.

d THE reader will see, in a few words, the substance of the two accounts, as they are differently related by our two authors, in the margin (G); whilst we resume the thread of our history.

(F) It will not be amiss to add here, from Marmol, some other ceremonies attending this mock kind of coronation, to shew our English readers a specimen of the Portuguese address on these and the like occasions. It was performed on a stage reared for the purpose, to which he made the new king ride in great pomp, mounted on a stately horse, richly attired, and attended with the acclamations both of the Quiloans and Portuguese. To his other royal ornaments he added a scarlet surcoat, lined with white satin, and with gold buttons and button-holes, and a royal mantle of the same.

All the chief men of the city were ordered to be present at his installation; and the nature of the ceremony easily drew thither the rest of the people. Silence being commanded, a herald declared aloud the occasion of their meeting in Portuguese, which was interpreted to them in Arabic. The purport of which was, that Braham, or Ibrahim, having, for his treasonable misdemeanors, forfeited his crown, the lieutenant-general of the king of Portugal, and his officers there present, having, by right of conquest, gained the possession of it, did bestow it, in the name of the king their master, upon Mahmud Ancon, both as a reward of his merit and fidelity, together with the title of king; on condition that he shall pay the same tribute that Braham did to the crown of Portugal.

The ceremony being ended, he was made to cavalcade it through the city in the same pompous manner, having a standard borne before him, with the arms of Portugal, followed by all their trumpets, and other musical instruments, the citizens marching behind, and crying long live king Mahmud.

(G) According to Marmol's account, the Portuguese were become so powerful and insolent upon that coast, that they made a prodigious number of rich captures, under pretence of their carrying contraband goods, making prisoners of the owners and sailors at their pleasure. Among others they took one coming from the island of Angocha, in which was the son of the king of Tirendicanda, then an inhabitant of Quiloa, whom the governor of the new fort caused to be seized and imprisoned, under pretence that his father was at war with the Portuguese, and a relation of the deposed Braham. This, continues our author, induced the new king, who had not yet made any alliance with other princes, and was desirous of being in friendship with his neighbours, to take this opportunity of laying an obligation on that prince, by redeeming his son, at the price of 3000 pieces of gold, and equipping him suitably to his rank, and sending him back to his father; who no sooner heard of it, than he dispatched a messenger to him to thank him for his generosity, and to invite him to an interview, to consult about their mutual interest; adding, that he would then readily reimburse him what he had laid out for his son.

The governor tried in vain to dissuade Mahmud from the interview; alledging that the king, being an enemy to the Portuguese, and a relation of Braham, he could expect no good result from it. Mahmud was deaf to his advice, and ventured himself with him in a vessel attended by a small retinue; and such as should carry the face of confidence and friendship, rather than fear or distrust. But his ill-timed credulity cost him his life, being stabbed with a dagger, as he was asleep, by the perfidious prince, who palliated the horrid deed with saying, that he owed more to his own kindred than to him for the service he had received from him. His death occasioned great contests in Quiloa, which were however quelled in part by the election of his son in his room. Thus far Marmol's account.

That of the bishop is as follows. When Mahmud came to pay his compliments to Almeid, after he had obtained of him the release of the Arabian prisoners, he proceeded with a fresh request to this purpose: "There having history. Whether it was Alfudail's son, whom our author doth not name, or Mahamed, a who was left in possession of the Quiloan throne (though the latter seems to us the most probable, because he was actually slain, some time after, by Tirecundus, a friend of Braham, though not so soon after his elevation), it is certain that the face of affairs altered quickly after Alineid's departure, and the good understanding that seemed to reign between the Arabs and Portuguese, was soon turned into distrust and resentment; king Emanuel giving the first occasion, by depriving the Quiloans, as well as the other kingdoms on that coast, of one of the most advantageous branches of their commerce; viz. that with Sofala, of which he was now become master, and was resolved to engross wholly to himself; for this proved the source of such frequent depredations, or rather piracies, under the specious pretence of searching for, or punishing those of the natives who carried, contraband goods, as if the king of Portugal had been really what the chief of the Imbis called him, the absolute sovereign of the sea<sup>a</sup>. The commerce, both on that coast and adjacent islands, was almost wholly interrupted, and the natives quite impoverished; whilst the Portuguese gained immense riches by their tyrannic depredations.

At length such heavy and repeated complaints came from all these parts to the viceroy of Goa, that he saw it absolutely necessary to send one of his officers named Vaal thither, to put the most speedy end he could to these disorders, by forbidding all those dreadful piracies and depredations, and going through all the trading ports, and inviting the natives to resume their wonted commerce, with promises that it should be free for the future from all molestation, and this in the viceroy's name, and that of the king of Portugal. This, in some measure, revived the spirits of the natives, and in particular of the Quiloans, many of whom had before abandoned that city, and gone to settle at Mombaso, Melinda, Zanguebar, and other parts, and returned again at this news, though a still greater number staid away.

ALL this while the city of Quilooa was strangely divided, Braham having still a strong party in it, who preferred him, as being of the royal blood, though by a slave, to Mahmud or his son, who were of mean extraction; but the governor and his Portuguese, and as many of the Arabs as they had drawn into their interest, stuck so close to the new-made king, that Braham finding he could gain nothing against him by open force, resolved to destroy him by treachery; and, to that end, hired a resolute fellow to assassinate him. Here again our authors differ afresh; one telling us that he missed his blow, and only gave him a wound in the arm, which did not however prove dangerous, though the assassin was seized and put to death<sup>b</sup>. Whereas the other affirms, that he actually murdered him; and that his son, named Hagi Hossein, whom Almeid's governor had raised to that dignity, was chosen in his room, as we observed in the last note from him. But, adds the same author, this, instead of quelling, greatly increased the discontent, because he immediately insisted upon waging war against Braham, as the murderer of his father; though in other respects he did several public acts to gain their favour; so that on a sudden the city was broke out in open revolt, upon hearing that he had engaged Mano Mansa, a powerful neighbouring prince, to attack Braham by land, whilst he, unexpectedly, fell upon him by sea.

THIS revolt did not, however, divert him from his design; on the contrary, he and his ally succeeded so well in it, that Braham was forced to flee, whilst they ravaged the whole country, and carried away prisoners all that had engaged on his side. Hagi Hossein at length was now grown so haughty and insolent, as to ill treat the kings of Melinda, Zanguebar, and other Arabian princes; which so highly provoked them, that a war soon ensued, in which the Quiloans lost many of their citizens, and suffered so much in other respects, from those princes, as well as from the Cassers, on his account, that his very name was become odious, and that it was not mentioned without some execration. At length both the citizens and Arabian chiefs agreed to send a deputation to the viceroy of Goa, to beg that, in order to put an end to those destructive feuds, he would restore the deposed Braham to the crown, or bestow it on his nephew Nicanto, for whom they had already declared, and made some attempts to raise to the throne. The viceroy accordingly sent orders to the governor of Quilooa to rein-

This loyal request was highly admired by the Portuguese, especially by the admiral, who sent out of hand for Alfudail's son, and invested him with regal dignity, as the heir apparent to the crown (12).

- a state the former; but the governor, not daring to trust him so far, caused the latter to be crowned, and Hofsein to be deposed; who, not brooking his disgrace, retired to Mombaso, where he died soon after.

THE new king behaved, during the two first years of his reign, like a wise and good prince; but growing afterwards more debauched and tyrannic, became as odious to his subjects as he had been admired by them. And, to complete his misfortune, his friend the governor's time being expired, a new one arrived, who proved less favourable to him; whilst, on the other hand, Brabam, enraged to see him preferred before him, declared war against him. The Christians suffered greatly in this contest, and many of them were slain in fighting against him. At length Brabam got the better, and made his entry into Quiloa, at the head of his Caffers, who were commanded by his brother Mingo. The new governor and his nephew were soon after made prisoners, and Nicanto defeated at the head of forty Christians, which were all that were then able to take up arms, and performed wonders in that encounter, to shew his fidelity to the Portuguese. In the mean time there arrived an order to the governor for demolishing the fortress (wherein the reasons for building it were disapproved), and he and his garrison were to remove to the island of Zocotora, lately taken by Tristan de Cunha. The governor had, it seems, before this time, deposed Nicanto, and sent his nephew to Brabam to invite him to resume the real dignity. Nicanto had accordingly retired to the isle of Quirimbo, where he died miserably soon after, and Brabam came and took possession of the Quilooan crown; and having by his late deposition and disgrace become more prudent, governed the island peaceably and happily, and taught his children to do the same after him; that is, as our author words it, by a close adherence to the service and interest of the king of Portugal, and an expeditious dispatch of his affairs. Thus was the isle and kingdom happily freed, if not from a state of subjection and tribute, yet at least from the tyranny and oppression of a Portuguese governor and garrison, which were a constant nuisance to the natives both at land and sea.

It is time now to follow the Portuguese admiral to Mombaso, the next kingdom on which he made a new and more successful attempt than his predecessors had done. We have already observed that the capital of it is situated on a peninsula, made since into an island by cutting of a chanel on the land side<sup>a</sup>. It lies between Melinda on the north, and Quiloa on the south, and pretty near at the same distance from both. As soon as the admiral came near it, he ordered his captain to sound the depth of the shore all the way; for though he had two expert Arabian pilots, who assured him that there was a sufficient depth of water for him to come closely to it, yet would he not so far confide in them as to venture nearer till he had it confirmed by him, that he might make his approaches accordingly.

It was on the 30th of August when he anchored in view of the city with eleven large ships. The city had neither walls nor any other fortifications, saving two old towers towards the water-side, built of stone, and surrounded with a ditch, and an old bulwark of earth, on which the inhabitants had planted a battery of seven or eight cannon, which they had taken out of a Portuguese ship which had been wrecked near it. With these they immediately began to annoy the above-mentioned captain Gonzalo Pavia, as he was sounding the bay, who returned their fire with interest from his larger guns; a shot from which happening to light on their magazine of powder, set it on fire; which so terrified the garrison, that they abandoned the bulwark, and fled into the city. By the next morning Almeid was come up close to the place with his whole fleet, which he divided into two squadrons, in order to attack it in two different parts, leaving his son Lawrence with one of them before the city, whilst he with the other went and posted himself behind a nook of land, whence he sent two armed barks to sail round the island, and posted two of his ships at proper places, to hinder the inhabitants from retiring into the continent, as those of Quiloa had done. The two barks being come back, brought with them a Moor, whom they had taken, and who acquainted him that the king had hired 1500 Caffers, besides his own garrison, to defend the city, and that he had expressly forbid them all to go out of the city under pain of death.

At this news Almeid thought proper, before he began any hostilities, to dispatch one of his officers to the king with a message of peace, and offers of friendship from the great and potent Emanuel, with large promises of his favour and protection, and a copious display of the many advantages that would accrue to him and his kingdom by becoming his ally and tributary; adding, that it could be no dishonour to the king of Mombaso to acknowledge such a mighty monarch for his sovereign, seeing so many other considerable princes, both in Africa and India, had voluntarily subjected themselves to his authority. He concluded, however, after the usual manner of his nation on such occasions, with telling him, that if he refused his generous offers, he should be obliged to compel him to it, and force him to live happy under the dominion of one of the best of princes. The messenger drew near ac-

with disdain. accordingly, attended with one of the Arabian pilots which they had brought from Quiloa,<sup>a</sup> and desired to be admitted to the king, and deliver the admiral's peaceful message to him; but the inhabitants bid him at his peril attempt to land, and threatened to tear him in pieces, if he did not immediately retire; bidding him, in scorn, to go back to his ships, and let his master know, that he had not now to do with the women of Quiloa, but with men of courage and valour, as he should find them to his cost, if he attempted to enter the port with his fleet. Almeid, provoked at this answer, was going to reply to it with the fire of his artillery; but, upon cooler thoughts, was willing to be first informed of the strength of the place by better hands; and, on that very night, ordered a couple of his captains to go on shore, and seize on some of the inhabitants, from whom, by fair or foul means, he<sup>b</sup> might get intelligence of the king's strength and design. They accordingly landed with great silence; and brought back with them, soon after, a person who proved to be one of the king's domestics and friends, and acquainted him, that the king his master, upon hearing of the taking of Quiloa, had, besides his own army, taken into his service 4000 mercenaries; and expected 2000 more. That he had, moreover, a large magazine of arms, and was provided with all other necessaries for a brave defence, and was able to repel a much greater army from his city and fortifications.

the town, confirmed by fresh intelligence. The siege of it resolved on. ALMEID, nothing discouraged at this report, resolved to attack the place on the very next day, which was the 15th of August, and the feast of the Virgin Mary's assumption; and ordered his son, with some of his officers, to land with all expedition, to set fire to that part of the town which stood nearest the shore, and destroy the barricades, with which they<sup>c</sup> had stopped up the entrance of the fleet on that side; but with orders, if they met with too strong an opposition, to retire as fast and as well as they could. His commands were executed with such speed and success, that many houses were all on blaze, before the townsmen could make any opposition, the admiral having ordered a constant fire of his artillery to be made, to cover their descent. They at length collected their forces to that side, and attacked the besiegers with great bravery. A fierce onset soon ensued, in which 70 of the garrison were killed upon the spot, and but two on the Portuguese side. All this while the fire spread with such fury and devastation, that the inhabitants were doubly distressed, being necessitated to fight the enemy, and extinguish the flames, which threatened the destruction of the whole city. And such was the violence of the heat, that the Portuguese, no longer<sup>d</sup> able to bear it, were forced to retire to their ships.

Almeid lands,
the palace. On the next morning, before the break of day, the fire still giving sufficient light to enter the town, the admiral, as had been agreed, easily gained the height of the sea-coast, attended with his men, and made towards the royal palace, without meeting with any opposition; but suspecting there might be some ambush, forbore beginning the attack till it was broad day-light; when finding the streets clear and defenceless, he ventured through them in his way to the palace; whilst his son Lawrence headed his men against another quarter of the town, as there was no wall about it to obstruct their entrance. These, however, met with no small opposition when they came into the streets and lanes, which they found so narrow and crowded by the inhabitants, that it was with the utmost difficulty and danger<sup>e</sup> that they could force their passage through volleys of stones and darts, which were thrown at them from the windows and tops of the houses, and obstructed their pursuit of those who annoyed them in front, after they had forced them to give way. This at length enraged them to such a degree, that they set about bursting open the doors, and forcing their way, up the stairs, to the top; where, with incredible fury, they quickly cleared the row of those annoyers, by throwing some down headlong, killing others, and putting the rest to flight, the houses being all contiguous, and the roofs a continued flat from end to end, as we have elsewhere observed*. But even then the inhabitants soon found out a way to spoil that destructive expedient, by demolishing here and there a house, and preventing the enemy's proceeding further; by which stratagem, Lawrence, who commanded the van, and Novio,<sup>f</sup> who headed the rear, were so effectually parted, that they could no longer assist each other, but lay exposed again to the stones and darts which were discharged at them on both sides. This obliged them to have recourse to their first expedient, and force their passage into the roofs of other houses; where, leaping from one to the other, they re-united again, drove all before them, and got rid of all opposition and danger.

Almeid gains
the royal palace. DURING the dreadful contest in this part of the city, Almeid and his men had been as cruelly infested in every street through which they were to pass to gain the palace; the people discharging continual showers of darts and stones from the windows and the tops of the houses. But he had had the precaution to order a file of musqueteers and bowmen to march just before him, and to make a continual discharge of their arms against the windows<sup>g</sup> a and terraces; while he did the like against those Arabs who opposed him in front; by which means they got at length to the palace, without any great loss.

THEY were not a little surpris'd to find the place destitute of guards within and without; but at all hazards began to burst open the gates, and to crowd into it with great eagerness, meeting with only a few Arabs in their way, whom they quickly dispatched, or put to flight; and, without any farther opposition, made themselves masters of it. For whilst they were breaking into it, the pusillanimous king had given them the slip through a back gate, with his wives and family, and as many of his household as could follow him, and was retired into a neighbouring wood of palm-trees, where they lay concealed for a while.

IN the mean time Don Lorenzo, being apprised that the corps of reserve was in danger, b marched with all speed to their relief: and, having repulsed the Arabs, joined his forces with them, and marched directly to the palace, which he found already taken, and guarded by Pedro Bermudio, by Almeid's orders; and from him they learned the particulars of their forcing into the castle, and of the king's flight. This last news was no sooner spread thro' the city, than the inhabitants and garrison, who, till then had behaved with great valour and conduct, in defence of the place, began to slacken their courage, and to think of their own safety, especially after they found the Portuguese had set up their standard and the cross on the walls of the palace, and burned some merchant vessels that lay in the harbour; so that a general panic had already dispersed the greatest part, and the rest lay concealed where they could avoid the enemy's resentment.

WHIST the Portuguese soldiers were refreshing themselves after their great fatigue, a new object appeared at a distance, which drew the attention of Almeid. It was one of the Arabs, c who had followed the king into the wood, and was now come out with a white flag in his hand, which he waved to them, as if desiring a parley. Upon which a man was immediately sent to know what he had to offer; who answered, that the king would engage to become vassal and tributary to Portugal, on condition the city was exempt from being plundered; and that he begged to have an interview with him about it, and some hostage for his security. Almeid seemed willing at first to lend an ear to the proposal, but would not send any other hostage than his gauntlet, and afterwards his helmet. But these not being looked upon as sufficient pledges, and the king not appearing, the soldiers began to mur- d mur at it, some being for plundering the city out of hand, and others for attacking the king in his intrenchments. But Almeid, thinking this last expedient would prove too dan- gerous and difficult, as the wood might serve them for an advantageous fence against him, rejected it, and contented himself with having made himself master of so considerable a place, and immediately gave it up to be plundered, and distributed its several quarters amongst his men. The spoil was inconsiderable, according to some writers, the inhabitants having timely conveyed away their most valuable effects; though others will have it to have been so great that they were obliged to leave a great part of it behind<sup>f</sup>; but all agree that he found a great quantity of arms and engines of war. The number of the slain was, of the Mombasans 1500, and of the Portuguese only five, one of whom, an ancient captain, named Fer-

e dinand Decio, died of a wound in his foot from a poisoned arrow. About 2000 were made prisoners, of whom Almeid kept 200 of the most considerable, and some of the handsomest women, and released the rest. To conclude this catastrophe, the soldiers had no sooner done glutting their avarice, than their general ordered them to set fire to the city at three different quarters, by which above three parts of it were reduced to ashes; tho' the poor remainder of it helped to invite its forlorn citizens to re-people and re-build it by degrees. What became of the unfortunate king we are not told; it is not however improbable that he went and put himself under the protection of his next neighbour the emperor of Monoemugi, to whom he became a vassal and tributary for that part of his kingdom which lies on the continent, whilst the city and island of Mombaso quickly resumed its ancient grandeur, by becom- f ing the residence of the king of Melinda, the old friend and ally, as well as vassal, of Portugal, and of the Portuguese governor of all that coast. As for Almeid, he set sail soon after for Melinda, in order to settle, probably, with that prince, the conditions on which he was to become possessor of Mombaso, under the king his master; but, being prevented by a storm, was obliged to put into a bay about three leagues short of it; whence he sent his compliments and excuse for not being able to wait upon him in person, with the presents sent to him by the court of Portugal. He staid no longer here than till he had received an answer to his message, and a plentiful supply of provisions from that monarch; after which, being joined by some other of his ships, he set sail again, in quest of some rich Arabian ships, which he was apprised, by good intelligence, would pass by that way, in less than a g month, and fall into his hands if he kept a good look-out<sup>g</sup>: but whither we shall follow him no farther.

The kingdom of Mosambico.

Kingdom of Mosambico.

First discover-

SAILING still farther south on the same coast, the next kingdom of any note (A) is a that called Mosambico, from its capital of that name, situate on an island under the 16th degree of south latitude, and is the chief of the three isles which compose this kingdom; the others are called by the Portuguese St. George and St. James, and all three lie on the mouth of the river Magincata or Megincata, between the kingdom of Quiloa, spoken of in the preceding section, and that of Sofala, of which we shall speak in the next<sup>a</sup>.

THE celebrated Vasco de Gama, often mentioned in this chapter, was the first European we know of, who discovered and came to an anchor near it, after his doubling the Cape of Good Hope; and here it was that he informed himself of the inhabitants about the main design of his voyage, the finding out a way into India by sea; and about the people who lived on this coast: and here it was that he was apprised of the vast commerce which was carried on by them from one kingdom and sea-port to another, and, among other particulars, that this island, which they told him was subject to the then king of Quiloa, was one of the most considerable marts on all the eastern coast; that it sent ships into Arabia, and many other parts of the world, and was resorted to by merchants from thence, who imported great variety of the richest commodities in great quantities: they added, that he had passed by a coast called Sofala, which abounded with gold mines, and was likewise a place of great commerce. For all which informations Gama gratified these kind Arabs with an elegant collation, and some small presents.

scribed.

We have had occasion to mention the kind reception which he met with at first from the brave governor Zacocia, who supposed them to be Mohammedans like himself, and the greatest part of the inhabitants, and the repulse he gave him, upon the discovery of his being a Christian†; which shews that the conquest and behaviour of the Portuguese on the western coast had by that time reached this, and had already rendered their name no less odious than dreaded: so that it was with great difficulty that the admiral escaped being destroyed by those zealous Mohammedans. His successors on the coast proved more fortunate in a short time, as may be judged by the conquests they have made on it, and particularly on this island; upon which, having artfully obtained leave from one of those Arabian cheyks to build a fort, which might be a safeguard to them both, they have since made themselves masters of it, ingrossed the whole commerce, and made that port one of the securest harbours to rest and refresh; or, if the winds and weather do not favour, even to winter commodiously in, in their passage to and from the East-Indies. The only misfortune is, that the island lying low, and the town surrounded with marshes, the air is not quite so healthy as could be wished; but in all other respects, it abounds with almost every convenience for life and pleasure, and with most products, as well as manufactures, of that and other parts of the world.

(A) We say of note, because it would carry us beyond our bounds to describe all those that lie on this coast, concerning which we know but few particulars beyond their names and situation, worth our readers notice.

To give one instance for all, we meet with two such kingdoms or states between that of Quiloa, mentioned in the last section, and this of Mosambico; viz. Mongalo and Angos. The former is a small kingdom near the mouth of the Cuama, well peopled, mostly with Arabs, who are Mohammedans, and drive a good commerce with that of Monomotapa, in gold, elephants teeth, gums, &c.

The other is called Angos, from its capital, and by the French and Italians Angoche and Angochia, which signifies anguish; this capital is situate on another branch of the Cuama, about 160 leagues from its other mouth. The kingdom is much smaller than that of Mongalo, which is said to extend far westward into the continent. Both of them are fruitful, producing abundance of rice and millet, and breed great quantities of cattle. The inhabitants of both are mostly Mohammedans, but intermixed with Negroes, who are Idolaters, and are remarkable for the lowness of their stature. They go naked from the middle upwards; the rest they wrap up with pieces of silk and cotton, wear a turban, or go bare-headed, according to their circumstances. They are all given to traffick, and chiefly with the kingdoms of Quiloa, Mombasa, Melinda, and Monomotapa, and in much the same sort of merchandizes.

These are all the particulars we know of these kingdoms, and that only with relation to the sea-coast; but of the inland we know still less, except that the inhabitants are a brutish generation, who go stark naked, and live chiefly on the flesh of elephants and other wild beasts (1).

a It labours however under a scarcity of fresh water, having only one spring to supply it, <sup>In want of</sup> which rises among some palmtrees at a small distance from the town, but which is quickly <sup>water.</sup> exhausted : so that they are obliged to fetch most of it from a place called Cabbacero, on the continent, and to preserve it in large earthen jars. They have likewise very large cisterns to receive all the rain water they can, both for their kitchen and their gardens.

b THE island of Mosambico, though the largest of the three, is nevertheless very small, not being above two bow-shots in breadth, and above six in length, and about two miles from the continent. The bay is about three miles in circuit, so that the points of land on each side advance into the sea. The other two of St. George and St. James, lie on each side of it, facing the continent, in a direct line with it. Over-against that of St. George, and about a mile from it, is the cape called by the Portuguese Cabo Cetra, which is a small peninsula, joined to the continent by a small neck of land, which is covered with the sea at high, but is fordable at low water. There are some smaller islands between that and the head-land, <sup>Several other</sup> inhabited by Mohammedans, the most considerable of which are those of St. Christopher, of <sup>islands near it.</sup> the Holy Ghost, Magliaglia, Comorro, Axzama, and Majotta <sup>b</sup>. The bay, which serves for a haven both for the islands and continent, is convenient and safe, seldom having less than eight or ten fathom depth of water, and that so clear that one may see every bank, rock, and shallow, and may sail into it without a pilot. To make the town of Mosambico, one must sail between those of St. George and St. James, and the continent, leaving the former on the right, and the latter on the left, from south to north; by this rout one comes safely and easily to the fort, and the ships lie sheltered from every wind <sup>c</sup>.

c THE city of Mosambico, according to the Dutch pilot Verheoven's journal, is very handsome, the houses well built, especially the churches and convents, and the fort or castle is about a musket-shot from the town. Much the same description of it is given by captain Paul Caerden, last quoted, who adds, that the convent of the Dominicans is likewise an hospital for the sick; and great need there is for such a place, considering the inhabitants of the island, and the number of ships which winter there in bad seasons, besides those which pass to and from the East-Indies. The fort is likewise one of the strongest and best contrived the Portuguese have on this coast. It is of a square form, and each corner is flanked by a bulwark, with some pieces of artillery, which are a sufficient fence both to the town and <sup>The city de-</sup> haven. It is surrounded with a threefold rampart, and a large ditch, and hath withstood <sup>scribed.</sup> all the attempts of the Dutch against it <sup>d</sup>.

e UPON the whole, this port of Mosambico is, as it were, the key of the East-Indies to the Portuguese, which, if once lost, or wrested from them by any European trading nation, they <sup>The importance</sup> would hardly be able to carry on that extensive commerce, it being almost impossible to <sup>of it to the</sup> continue their voyage without such a place for making fresh provision of water, and other necessities, for refreshing their men, or even to winter in, as they often do, though against their will, when the weather will not permit them to proceed. To all this we may add, that it is also of great importance to them, as it is now become a means to keep so many kingdoms in awe, both along the coast and the adjacent islands, who are either their allies, or tributary to them; and secures to them the free, if not the sole, commerce with those of Sofala and Monomotapa, whence they export such quantities of gold and other rich commodities. We need not therefore wonder at the Dutch having made so many strenuous, though hitherto fruitless, attempts to wrest it out of their hands, particularly ann. 1606, when Paul Van Caerden their admiral laid siege to it, with 40 stout ships; but, after thirty-two days, finding all his efforts frustrated, was glad to raise it again, and continue his voyage to the Indies †.

f THE soil of the island, like that of the shore, is nothing else but a white barren sand; <sup>Soil and pro-</sup> yet have the richer sort found means to procure an artificial one in several parts of the island, <sup>duce.</sup> on which grow very fine citrons, oranges, ananas, figs, and such-like fruits, notwithstanding their great scarcity of water: but the far greater part of their other fruits, pulse, roots, and other esculents, are brought thither from the continent.

It is far otherwise at land, where the ground is fat and fertile in rice, millet, variety of roots, pulse, fruits, and plants. Among others of this last kind, they have one called by the Portuguese Pao D'Antak, antak wood, which spreads itself along the ground not unlike the aristolochum longum, and bears a grain like our pease, but somewhat longer and more soft, of a green colour. But the chief virtue lies in the root, which, as they say, is a sovereign remedy against the distemper of that name, which is occasioned by a too great familiarity of the Europeans with the Negro women of that country; that being the only remedy <sup>Antak distem-
dy.</sup>

they know against it<sup>c</sup>. They make likewise several pleasant liquors from their fruits; but the most common among them is made of millet, and called Huyembo, or Puembo<sup>f</sup>.

Wild beasts,

THEY likewise breed vast quantities of cattle, large and small, particularly sheep with large tails, often mentioned in this and other volumes. They swarm with wild beasts of various kinds, as stags and wild boars, but especially elephants, which are so fierce and destructive, that the inhabitants are obliged to kindle large fires round their sown fields, to prevent their being devoured by them. Neither dare they stir far from their homes, without lighted torches or firebrands in their hands, to frighten them away; and even with these they have much ado to save themselves from being destroyed, especially by those of the female kind which have young ones. The woods are likewise filled with wild fowl of all sorts, and particularly with a kind of wild poultry, not unlike our common sort, b excepting that they are as large as our turkies, spotted with white and grey, though with smaller heads in proportion, and short combs, but thicker, and of a more vivid red than ours. Their flesh is black, but delicious above all other fowl, as their hogs, which are here in great abundance, are above all other flesh; insomuch that the physicians not only permit but prescribe them to their patients, when they forbid them all other kinds. As to the fowl above-mentioned, it is not only delicious but healthy; and some of them eat them quite raw without reluctance or inconveniency. The only defect it hath is its blackness, which is such, that when boiled it turns the broth of the same disgusting hue, not unlike ink; but it makes ample amends for it in its exquisite taste and flavour, as well as by the wholesome nourishment which it yields<sup>e</sup>.

made use of to
commerce.

THE country hath likewise rich mines of gold, which is washed down by their rivers in great quantities, and makes a chief part of its commerce. Ivory, ebony, slaves, and cattle, are likewise exchanged for European goods, such as little bells, knives, scissars, and razors. These last are so valued among them, that they will give fifteen cows for one of them<sup>a</sup>. They have also some mines of silver and other metals, but the inhabitants make no traffick of them: and indeed are so mistrustful of strangers, that they care not to have any dealings with them, but confine themselves wholly to the coasters, to whom they convey their merchandizes in little boats made of a single piece of timber. This is their usual way of conveying them along these coasts; but if the nature or quantity of their cargo requires a more capacious vessel, they commonly make them of planks, joined together with ropes d made of the bark of palm-trees, without the assistance of nails or wooden pegs, which they either know not or neglect the use of; and, upon their return, they can untie the boards, and set them out to dry, against the next occasion.

disposition of
ants.

THE Portuguese however, of whom they stand in awe, are the only Europeans who are admitted into some of their sea-ports, whence they export, besides the commodities already mentioned, silver, copper, wax, rice, and other provisions: but to all other Europeans they refuse all kind of access on any pretence.

The inhabit-
treacherous.

THE truth is, the further one advances into the continent, the more fierce and brutish one finds them. They all go naked, men and women, and only cover their middle before and behind with a piece of cotton cloth, or with a broad leaf. So unnatural are they to e one another, that the fathers will sell their children for slaves, for a shirt, a knife, some glass beads, or such other trinkets, and feast on the flesh of those whom they take prisoners in war. They are treacherous, thievish, and malicious, but stout and fit for labour, and seem designed by nature for slavery, which is a condition less dreadful to them than it is to the inhabitants of the opposite or western coast, as those of Kongo, Angola, Loango, &c. which will be taken notice of in a subsequent part. And as this continent is divided into a variety of lordships or petty kingdoms (B), who have each a particular language or dialect, and are frequently at war one with another, it is no wonder that such a commerce for slaves is carried on between them and the coasters. For these petty tyrants make a considerable gain of the prisoners they make, whether they condemn them to be sold for slaves, f or for meat for the shambles, according as they will fetch the greatest price.

(B) We know little or nothing of their policy or government; whether these lordships are hereditary or elective, nor whether they have any laws beyond the will of their petty kings; it being next to impossible to penetrate into these inland parts; and the natives, who come to the coasts to traffick, being exceedingly brutish, mistrustful, and incommunicative. However, we may safely suppose that they make at the best but an inconsiderable figure, if we may judge of them by that which a son of one of them made at Mosambico, who being brought thither by mere curiosity, and, as he said himself, to know why his father and brother were Negroes, and he white, came attended only with some slaves, and was glad to take up with the mean entertainment which his new host Mons. Mouquet could afford to give him, during his stay in his little cabin.

THOUGH

- a THOUGH they affect to go naked, yet they are not without their fondness for various kinds of finery, such as collars, bracelets on their arms and legs, whether of gold, silver, ivory, coloured glass, or other materials, according to their rank. They likewise affect to have very protuberant lips; and, to render them the more so, will fix pieces of flat gold, amber, or bone, one above the upper, and the other under the nether lip, which is esteemed as rich an ornament to their black faces, as their fine white teeth. They have also a way of painting their bodies with a kind of red earth, especially upon some grand meetings or festivities, which gives them a very grim appearance, though they esteem it as a mark of their courage and fierceness. Their weapons are the bow and arrow, the hatchet and the dagger, together with any other kind they can procure by the way of traffick. Linschoten, who did not penetrate into the inland country, affirms them to be partly idolaters, and partly Mohammedans; but what Pyrard says of them is the most probable; viz. That they have no religion at all, but only, like the rest of the Cassers, observe some superstitious customs, not worthy to bear that name; and it is on the coasts alone, that many of them, by conversing with the Arabs, have been induced to become Mohammedans. We do not read of any manufactures or trades among them, except that of making their canoes, which we have already described, and that of weaving a kind of mats, which they do with some neatness, and of various sorts, and sell them afterwards to the coasts, whence they are exported to several parts of India.

- IF, therefore, we rightly weigh all the advantages of this island and its continent, its port, bay, and excellent situation, as at a middle distance, and a kind of place of refreshment for the East-India ships from Goa to Lisbon, or from Lisbon to Goa, we need not wonder that the Portuguese should so readily pitch upon it for that purpose, after their contest with Ibrahim the king of Quiloa, lately mentioned, had obliged them to abandon it; much less at their preferring this to any other they had upon the coast, and forbidding all their India ships to land, refit, or refresh at any other port but this of Mosambico. For, considering the vast length of the voyage between Lisbon and Goa, the great inconveniencies and dangers the vessels are exposed to from the inclemency of the various climates, and intolerable heats they go through, the boisterous seas they cross, the hardships and diseases which men are liable to, whether through want or badness of provisions, not to mention a great variety of other accidents and disasters, which happen frequently to the men, the ships, or cargoes, during a voyage of seven or eight months, all which make it next to impossible to perform it at one stretch, especially as they are so large and heavy laden, as to take so many fathoms of water, it was, in a great measure, absolutely necessary to make sure of some convenient harbour, as near as they could, in the half-way between those two capitals; but much more still after their doubling the Cape of Good Hope in their going out, and sailing by the dangerous coast of Natal, for them to put into, and find a supply for all their wants, and a remedy for all their disasters. And so well doth this of Mosambico answer all those ends, that the kings of Portugal have spared no cost to fortify and garrison it against all attempts, and to provide it with a noble hospital for the sick, and a well-stored magazine, with all necessaries for the shipping, though the charge of keeping them up often exceeds the revenues arising from it. The next section will shew still some farther advantages which these places yield to them.

S E C T. IV.

- f SAILING still farther southward, along the eastern coast of Africa, one comes from that of Zanguebar to that of Sofala, or Sefalo, or, as others write it, Zephala, and Sofala de-Cephala, that famous and opulent kingdom, which, for its rich golden mines, hath been supposed by several learned men to be the Ophir whence king Solomon drew yearly such prodigious quantities of that precious metal<sup>a</sup>.

- IT is, properly speaking, a continued coast, extending itself from the river Cuama on the north, to that of Magnico, since called Rio de Spirito Santo, on the south; that is, from the 17th to the 25th degree of south latitude; and having the Cape Corientes (not in the middle, between these two rivers, as some geographers have placed it<sup>b</sup>, but) about two degrees south of the latter, according to the latest observations<sup>c</sup>. It is bounded on the east by the Indian sea, and on the west by the empire of Monomotapa; and hath its name from its capital, which D'Herbelot calls Sofalat Al Dbeheb, which, in the Arabic, signifies a low or hollow place, where is gold, or, more properly, a golden mine*. We must, however, observe here, with respect to the limits of this kingdom, that a late geographer, upon the authority of some new observations, hath, in his map of Eastern Ethiopia†, reduced it into a much narrower compass, and, in all likelihood, great alteration may have been made to them since the Portuguese and Dutch writers, of which we have had no particular account; for which reason we shall think ourselves obliged to subjoin them in the margin, according as they are fixed in the said map, for the satisfaction of our curious English readers (A).

A. D. 1500. As to the metropolis of Sofala above-mentioned, it was, at the first arrival of the Portuguese, but an inconsiderable town, neither large nor walled, but fenced only with a thorny hedge, but hath been since fortified, and, in every respect else, very much improved by them, and called Cuama, as well as the fort, which they built for its defence; but that name hath been since obliterated, and both pilots and geographers have retained its old one of Sofala.<sup>b</sup>

Situation of the capital. IT is conveniently situated on a small island at the mouth of the Cuama above-mentioned; and besides it there are two other towns on the coast, one called Haulema, and the other Dardema, and the villages of Savona, Bocha, and Gasta, and some others, all of them mean, and worthy of no farther notice<sup>d</sup>.

Gnaia the Portuguese admiral builds a fort upon the island. FRANCESCO GNAIA, or, as others call him, Anaga, the Portuguese admiral of the East-India fleet, was the first who came to anchor at Sofala, with four of his smallest vessels, the other two being so large that they could not enter the port, and obtained of the king, whom Marmol calls Jusef, a Mohammedan, and then blind with old age, the liberty of building a fortress near it, which, he said, would be of great service to his majesty, as well as to himself. This favour, however, appears to have been granted to him at the recommenda-c tion of one Zacote, an Arabian, wholly in the interest of the Portuguese, and in great credit and authority with the old prince, and helped both to forward that work, sent them intelligence of every thing that passed at court, and informed them of every particular relating to the nature of the country, and the manners of the inhabitants. This fortress, of whatever service it may have been to the good old king and his successors, hath proved of the greatest importance to the Portuguese, as it is a safe harbour for their ships sailing to and from India, as well as to secure their commerce with the Caffers of the inland; which is very considerable, as it consists in gold, ambergrise, slaves, and elephants teeth, which they exchange for silk, stuffs, cotton, glass beads of various makes and colours, and other such trinkets. Both the fortress and the island, as tributary to the king of Portugal, are under the direction and government of Mosambico, spoken of in the foregoing section<sup>d</sup>.

River Cuama, al. Zenbere. THE river Cuama, on the mouth of which the city and fortress of Sofala are situate, had its name given to it by the Portuguese from that of the fort, which they likewise called Cuama at the first, or rather, as they pronounced it, Cowama (B); but is by the Arabs and Negroes called Zembere and Empondo. Its head-spring hath not hitherto been discovered by the Europeans, but it surrounds in some measure the kingdom of Monomotapa, dividing it on the west from that of Abutua, on the north from those of Chicour, Sacomba, and Mauruca. It receives in its course, among others of lesser note, the Mangania, Mazeno, and Suabo, and, dividing itself into two branches, discharges itself into the Indian sea, at four mouths, from north to south, distinguished by as many names; viz. Kilimano, Linda, Cuama, and Luava; or, according to others, the Penbamez, Lunagoa, Arruyga, Manjovo, Guadire, and Rueriva.<sup>e</sup>

The Magnico; THE other river was called formerly Magnico, and by the Portuguese Rio del Lagos: but has since the name of Rio del Santo Spirito given it by Laurence Marshes. Its source is not better known than that of the Cuama, but is supposed by some geographers to be the same with it; viz. the lake Goyama; and that, after a short course, it divides itself into the two streams or branches above-mentioned; the southern one of which was therefore called Rio

(A) According to the above-mentioned map, Sofala is bounded on the north by the kingdom of Monomotapa; on the east by the Indian sea; on the south by the kingdom of Sabia; and that of Manico on the west; so this last, in which are the richest mines, as was formerly part of Sofala, hath now changed its master, and become probably tributary to it, as that once was to the great one of Monomotapa, and is divided from it on that side by the river Wadanculo, which runs from west to east, and falls into the Indian sea. There is another which runs across the kingdom from west to east, and takes its name from it, and falls into the sea near the city of Sofala. Between those two rivers run four or five others, one of which is called Te-be.

The king hath his residence on the western part of the kingdom, on the banks of the Sofala. Besides the fortress of that name, the Portuguese have built another about the middle on the same coast, named Inbaguea.

The same map adds two islands on this coast, one called Bango, on the mouth of the Te-be, and the other on that of the Sephala. This is all that is most remarkably new in it, with respect to this kingdom.

(B) The name of Cuama, Cowama, or, as others write it, Quama, was given to the river from a fort built on the mouth of it by the Turks; after which the Portuguese called it Rio de los Lagos, on supposition that this and the Magnico sprung both from one lake, and soon after divided themselves into two streams or arms (1).

(1) Fid. Jo. de Barros, lib. x. c. 1. Davity, Dapper, De Lisle, D'Anville, & al.

- a de los Lagos, or the river of the lakes, but still retains its old name of Magnico. Nothing can be affirmed concerning these two rivers descending from the same lake, and being branches of one and the same river. However, this we are sure of, that the Cuama is by much the larger and deeper of the two, being increased by the three large rivers above-mentioned, and by several others not much inferior to them, is navigable above 150 leagues, and hath many large islands, besides those formed by its several mouths<sup>f</sup>. It likewise washes down great quantities of gold, which the Negroes gather, when the rivers are low, <sup>gold found in</sup> by diving into such nooks as they know, by long practice, to have the greatest plenty in <sup>it</sup>. them, and bringing the mud out of them, which, being properly levigated, discover the metal in large or small grains, as it happens; and more a great deal might be found of it, <sup>gold found in</sup>
- b were they not such idle wretches that nothing can make them work but extremity of hunger and want<sup>g</sup>.

THE three principal capes on the coast of Sofala, are called Corientes, St. Catherine, and The chief St. Sebastian. The former of them, situate under the 23d degree of south latitude, is noted <sup>as pos.</sup> for the many rocks, sands, and shelves, which lie between it and the isle of St. Lawrence, or Madagascar, and which cause frequent shipwrecks along that chanel. The rest of the land from the said cape to the mouth of the Cuama is called Matuca, and hath some gold mines, not far from the town of Sofala, and in the precinct called Manico.

- c THE inland part of the kingdom doth not extend itself far westward, being squeezed on that side by that of Monomotapa. Marmol computes it to be in compass 750 leagues<sup>h</sup>. The temperature, soil, and produce of it are much the same with that of Zanguebar; excepting <sup>Soil and pro-</sup> that as it is by so much farther from the line, its heat is nothing so excessive, and the land <sup>duce.</sup> is more fertile in rice, millet, and pasturage. But the most abounding part in this last lies between the Cape Corientes and the river de Santo Spirito, where the greatest quantities of cattle are bred, especially of the larger kind, the inhabitants having scarcely any other fuel but <sup>Scarcity of</sup> cows dung, the country being much exposed to the southerly winds, which are equally <sup>fuel.</sup> piercing on that, as our northern ones are on this side of the line. And here it is also that <sup>Vast number of</sup> the elephants herd in large droves, and are killed in such prodigious quantities (their flesh <sup>elephants killed</sup> being the chief food of the common people) that, according to their report, they seldom <sup>starly.</sup> destroy less than between four and five thousand one year with another; which is in a great
- d measure confirmed by the vast quantity of ivory which is thence exported by the Europeans<sup>i</sup>.

- THE other part of the country on the contrary, that is, from the cape above-mentioned, quite up to the Cuama, and especially all along that river, abounds with mountains, covered with large woods; the vallies are watered with variety of springs and small rivulets, are very fertile and agreeable, and is that quarter in which the king and court spend the greatest part of the year. Among other delightful advantages of this part, it enjoys, we are told, such an odoriferous verdure, that, the coasts being low on that side, the fragancy which exhales therefrom is frequently perceived by mariners at a great distance, before the land itself appears. The soil of the province of Matuca is rich and fertile; but from the cape of Corientes to the river of Santo Spirito, it is rough and barren, and less inhabited, except by
- e elephants, lions, and other wild creatures<sup>k</sup>.

- THE natives of Sofala are for the most part black, with short curled hair, there being but very few tawny or brown amongst them. Their shape is taller and more genteel than that of the Negroes of Mosambico, Quiloa, &c. and those who live near the cape of Corientes are esteemed the most courteous of any of the Caffers that inhabit the coast from thence to that of Good Hope. Their common dress is the same with those of Mosambico, a piece of <sup>Dress of the</sup> silk or cotton, wrapped round their middle, and covering them down to the knees, all the <sup>inhabitants.</sup> rest of the body being naked, except the head, the better sort wearing a kind of turban <sup>Ornaments,</sup> upon it; and all of them adorn their neck, arms, wrists, legs, and ankles, with rings of gold, silver, amber, or coloured beads, according to their condition. These stuffs and
- f trinkets are mostly brought to them from Bombay by the Portuguese; and those of the better sort affect to wear swords with handles of ivory. All the coasters speak the Arabic language, tongue, which is their natural language; for, as we have before observed, they are not the original natives, but the descendants of the Arabs, who left their native country, and settled themselves more or less upon the western coasts. But as these of Sofala, as well as most of the rest, carry on a commerce with the Caffers, they likewise understand their language as well as the Portuguese, since these last have settled among them<sup>l</sup>.

- THEY cultivate plenty of rice and millet, which serve them for bread; and eat the flesh <sup>diet,</sup> of elephants, large and small cattle, besides fish, of which both the sea and rivers yield a great plenty and variety. They have likewise their beer made of rice and millet, and some <sup>and drink.</sup>
- g other liquors made of honey, palm, and other fruits: the honey is here in such plenty, that a great part of it lies neglected; no more being gathered by the indolent people than serves a that purpose, or for extracting so much wax out of it as will procure them painted cotton or silk, and other cloths in exchange. For tho' they make great quantities of white cloths, they have not yet the art of dying them, and are obliged to send them, or at least their thread, to be died in Cambay or other places, of such colours as are most in vogue amongst them<sup>m</sup>. They are often forced to buy the printed cloths, and undo the thread of them, in order to mix it in with their striped stuffs, when they cannot procure it from abroad. Their chief commerce here is with the inhabitants of Mosambico, Quiloa, Mombaso, and Melinda, who come hither in their sambucs or small barges, which are freighted with variety of the above-mentioned cloths of all colours, and they exchange them for gold, ivory, wax, or ambergrise; which the Sofalans usually go and exchange with the Monomotapans for gold, b not by weight, but in such quantities as shall satisfy the seller; so that the profit of the exchange amounts commonly to above 90 or 95 per cent. And this is the reason, that when the Sofalans perceive any of these vessels at sea, they signify their joy, and bid them welcome by lighting fires on the shore.

The great profit arising from their commerce for gold.

They invite the Arabs to trade with them.

Rich gold mines.

BUT besides the gold which they draw from Monomotapa, the kingdom of Sofala hath some very considerable mines of that valuable metal, and which, by the report of the Portuguese inhabitants, yield to the value of above two millions of metigals yearly (each metigal valued at about 14 French livres); and that the merchantmen from Zidem, Mecca, and other parts, export, in time of peace, about the same quantity from the same mines. We are farther told, that the governor of Mosambico's salary, whose place lasts only three c years, amounted to 300,000 crowns, exclusive of the pay of his troops, and the yearly tribute he is obliged to send to the king of Portugal, which Davity calls a third part of its product. As for the soldiery, they are paid in gold dust, each according to his rank. And the same author farther assures us, that this gold, which is paid them just as it is gathered, is so pure, and of so fine a yellow, that ours, compared to it, appears little better than copper. Hence it is, that Mouquet hath, after other learned men, ventured to affirm, that it was from these mines that Solomon had his, which is so highly commended by the sacred historian; and that this kingdom of Sofala is the Ophir celebrated by them<sup>n</sup>; this being allowed to be the purest and finest in all Africa (C).

Sofala supposed to be the ancient Ophir.

Forces.

AT the first arrival of the Portuguese into these parts, the people used no other warlike d weapons than the scymitar, the javelin, the bow and arrow, to which they sometimes added the dagger and the hatchet. But they have been since taught the use of fire-arms both small and great<sup>o</sup>, and are become very dexterous in the use of them. Their king keeps a great number of forces in pay, but the Portuguese are become so powerful that they keep the whole kingdom in awe; and their chief governor keeps his vessels of observation to prevent what they have now made an illicit trade, particularly that of the exportation of gold without his special licence<sup>p</sup>.

(C) Some of the patrons of this hypothesis, will even affirm it to be the finest in the world. But that is said gratis; it being well known that that of Japan not only equals but greatly exceeds it. We shall however go no farther out of our way after that trite controversy (5), but refer our reader to what we have said upon it (6). What falls under our present subject is, that there are still remaining, in the neighbourhood of the mines of Sofala, some ancient squat towers and ruins of stately edifices, of large square stones, one of them with inscriptions over the gate, in a character or hieroglyphic, which no one hath been able hitherto to decypher. From whence the partisans of this hypothesis conjecture, that those edifices were palaces or castles built by that opulent king of Israel. But is not the unintelligibleness of those characters rather a strong argument against such a supposition? We never hear of Solomon's having been in those parts, nor of his having built any fortresses, or made any conquests either here or any-where but in the neighbourhood of Judea; and if he had caused any inscriptions to be set up upon any of his edifices, is it possible they should have become unintelligible or undecypherable? May we not therefore suppose from this last circumstance, that they were hieroglyphics, and most likely set up by some of the Gymnosophists of the isle of Meroe, or by some of the learned priests of Egypt, some of whose monarchs carried their conquests as far as these remote parts of Ethiopia, for the sake of those valuable mines, but might probably afterwards abandon them, on account of their great distance from their native dominions (7).

The Portuguese, on the contrary, tell us, that the towers and fortresses above-mentioned resemble others which are still extant in some provinces of the empire of Abissinia; whence they conclude they may probably have been the work of some Abissinian monarch, who was then master of the gold mines. This region or province the Abissines call Acachuma, and pretend it was the residence of the queen of Sheba. Ptolemy calls it Achuma, and says it was well known in his time, on account of its rich gold mines; and it is there that he fixes the end or limits of the south parts of the habitable world §. All these put together, afford us a more probable conjecture concerning the origin of those ancient edifices, than that which ascribes it to king Solomon; but we have dwelt long enough on that subject (8).

- <sup>a</sup> THE Mohammedan religion is, according to Pigafet, and the generality of Dutch writers <sup>1</sup>, Religion partly that of the king and court, and of a great part of the people, and accordingly Ossorio styles <sup>2</sup> Mohammedans and partly them Saracens and Mohammedans. But it is more likely, as Jarric observes <sup>3</sup>, that the origi- <sup>ly</sup> Caffers.
 nal natives live wholly without any, good or bad; and the Arabs alone, who settled on this coast, are the only Mohammedans, except some few profelytes they may have made amongst those Negroes, for the sake of commerce, seeing all the merchants who come hither from Quiloa, Mombase, Melinda, &c. are of that religion. The Arabs, who had brought that religion with them, and been settled on that coast above two centuries, might be grown powerful enough, in that time, to have a king of their own probably, at the least tributary to, and under the protection of, the emperor of Monomotapa, and have been able to subdue <sup>b</sup> the inland natives, without forcing their religion upon them: especially, if what Marmol says be true, that though they use no outward act of religion, have neither idols, altars, nor sacrifices, yet they acknowledge one supreme being, whom they call Mozimo, or Guinguimo, but abhor the idolatrous rites and other fortileges of the rest of the African Negroes, and their priests, and punish them with the utmost severity among them; not so much out of a religious principle, as because they think them destructive to society <sup>4</sup>. And may they not have been taught all this, and more, by their Mohammedan masters?

- FOR in the next place they punish two other crimes with the same rigour; viz. theft and adultery; and so severe are they with respect to this last, that they make it death for any man to be found sitting upon a sofa or mat with a married woman, though they allow of polygamy

- IF they have any thing like a religious ceremony, it is in observing some particular days of the moon, as the 1st, 6th, 7th, 11th, 16th, &c. on which they pay a kind of offering to their dead friends, particularly to their parents, whose bones, after the flesh is consumed (D), they preserve in a place appropriated to that use; and, in remembrance of their owing their being to them, set plenty of victuals before them, and make their requests to them, as if still alive, the chief of which is for the preservation of the king's life and prosperity. Their pe-
<sup>d</sup> titions ended, they sit down in their white garments, which is the proper colour on these occasions, and eat up what had been served to the dead, which concludes the ceremony for that time <sup>6</sup>. All this however may imply nothing more than a mere civil respect paid to their parents, ancestors, and other near relations, in the same manner as we have seen it practised in a much politer country, that of the Chinese <sup>7</sup>, and instituted at first for wise and good purposes; seeing nothing can be well thought more effectual to curb the irregular passions of surviving children, than a firm belief that their deceased parents, ancestors, and near relations, are still present with them, and watchful over all their actions, in order to bless or chastise them suitably to their behaviour. As to the petition offered to them for the king's life and prosperity, we are not told directly whether it be intended for the king of <sup>e</sup> Sofala, or for that of Monomotapa, to whom he was formerly, and a great number of others <sup>8</sup> are still, tributary. The latter seems however the most rational, as it is still practised by them, there being hardly any nation that pays a deeper regard to their prince than the subjects of that large empire, as we shall shew in the next section. Hence we may conclude, that the Sofalans had this custom from the Monomotapans, and observed it as long as they continued under his obedience; that is, till the Portuguese came and settled in these parts; and withdrew them from their obedience, in order to render them more serviceable to their own ends.

WE are told accordingly by Pigafet <sup>9</sup>, that one of those Mohammedan kings revolted from their ancient allegiance, and put himself under the protection of the king of Portugal. And but revolted from his allegiance.

(D) The French translator of Marmol, or his reviser, adds here in the margin ou mangé, or eaten; and it must be owned that his author represents some of the Sofalans as a kind of unnatural cannibals, who not only feed upon human flesh, but also drink the blood of some of their cattle, which they bleed for that purpose. We shall have occasion in the sequel to mention some whole kingdoms of still greater monsters of barbarity, and in the heart of Africa, whose greatest dainties are the bodies of their enemies and captives, whom they slay in great numbers; and, after having satiated themselves with their flesh, are emulous who shall drink the greatest quantity of their blood. But we can by no means persuade ourselves that these we are upon, and who, in other respects, appear to be more civilized, should use themselves to such brutish customs, as is there insinuated, of eating the flesh of their parents and relations, especially under a Mohammedan government (9).

we have elsewhere had occasion to mention the singular and hospitable reception which his admiral Gnaia met with at his first landing in this kingdom, from the old blind monarch then upon the throne, and his obtaining leave of him to build a fort near his capital<sup>a</sup>; which (whether he was the same with that mentioned before or not) plainly shews his readiness to take the first opportunity that was offered to him to shake off the Monomotapan yoke. And might not this have been likewise the main motive which the Portuguese commander used to engage him to comply with his request, which he full well foresaw would prove an effectual means, on some pretence or other, of stripping the old dotard of his capital and kingdom, and seizing both for his own master, as it actually did, in the manner we are now going to relate, from one of their own writers<sup>b</sup>?

THE reader may remember the account we have given at the beginning of this section, of the first arrival of Gnaia, or Anaya, at Sofala, and of the kind reception he met with from the good old Mohammedan king Jusef, notwithstanding the strenuous opposition of the Arabs against his landing, the dangers, they told him, he must run, before he could reach the royal palace, and the difficulty he would find to get access to the king. Gnaia, who had been before informed by his friend Zacote, who had already secured him a singular welcome, sailed forward, and accordingly met with all the success he wished for, the king not only granting him free leave to build the desired fortrefs, but, as a farther token of his regard to his nation, delivered up to him about a score of his countrymen, who had been lately shipwrecked on that coast, and of whom he had taken the most hospitable care.

Reception of the Portuguese disapproved by the king's son-in-law.

THE king had a son-in-law named Mengo Muçaf, a brave warlike prince, who made no scruple to lay before him his present apprehensions at his reception and admittance of those strangers into his dominions, and much more so at his permitting them to fortify themselves in them, at the imminent hazard of his own and his subjects safety. The old king contented himself, whatever his views might be, with dissipating his fears, and telling him that time, which brings forth all things, would quickly discover to him his motives for thus encouraging these so much dreaded strangers. You will, continued he, in a little time, perceive them dwindled into nothing, through the heat and inclemency of a climate they are unaccustomed to; and then it will be time enough to drive them out of their fort, if they do not abandon it of their own accord. The kind reception I have given them was merely to remove all suspicion from them of my design. So the prince acquiesced to his reasons, and the work of the fortrefs was carried on with double vigour, the king having ordered his subjects to give it all possible forwardness<sup>c</sup>. But what most alarmed his majesty, and obliged him to alter his measures, was the pathetic remonstrances of his faithful Mohammedan merchants, to awaken him to a sense of his imminent danger from the well-known perfidy of the Portuguese nation.

Forwards the building of the fortrefs. The merchants address against it.

Pathetic speech to him.

The king is alarmed against them.

Resolves to destroy them.

WE have already had occasion to mention more than once the strenuous opposition which the Arabians settled on this eastern coast made against the preposterous encouragement which some of these princes, particularly those of Quiloa and Mombaso, gave to these new comers. They made the same strenuous struggle here against the weakness of their superannuated monarch, and addressing themselves to him in a body, reminded him of the repeated warnings they had given him of the treacherous views of the Portuguese, who, under the mask of friendship, conceal the most wicked designs. "To what end," said they, "do they build a fort in your dominions, but to increase their own power, in order to strip you of yours, together with your kingdom. Have they not, by the like artifices, expelled the king of Quiloa, and robbed many other princes in Afric and India of their dominions? In short, where have they ever got a footing without leaving numberless traces of their villainy and cruelty? If therefore you have any regard for your safety and welfare, destroy them before they are become too powerful for you, lest it should not hereafter be in your power to avert the ruin and destruction which they will bring upon yourself and kingdom<sup>d</sup>."

This speech had the desired effect, and the alarmed monarch began now to see his folly and danger, and to think of the properest means to avoid it. He accordingly gathered a sufficient number of troops, and appointed a day to fall upon the Portuguese, whilst they were employed in building their fort. Unhappily for him, the Arabians had a traitor among them, whom we lately mentioned, under the name of Zacote, or Acote (E), who betrayed all his secrets to them, and failed not on this occasion to send them timely notice of his designs against them; which gave Gnaia an opportunity of getting himself and his men in a

- a condition to give them a warm reception. Accordingly, on the day prefixed, the Sofalans Besieges the fort; attacked the fort with great fury, by throwing volleys of fiery stakes into it, whilst others were assailing the walls with their warlike engines. The besiegers, with Gnaia at their head, made the stoutest defence they could against them; but, being reduced to 35 men, the rest being either sick or invalids, they would have had but a poor chance against 6000, had not, luckily for them, Zacote found means to enter the fort, at the head of 100 men; who immediately fell upon the besiegers with such bravery, that a desperate conflict ensued, which is relieved by Zacote. in which the Portuguese, being thus timely reinforced, began to discharge their darts and artillery with double vigour; which, in a little time, so greatly annoyed and terrified them, that they fled with the utmost precipitation and dread, and left them in quiet possession of The king repulsed. their new fortress. Not so quietly did they treat them in their flight, for they pursued them Pursued to his palace. with speed and fury, not only into the city, but the royal palace, and forced their way into it. They even crowded into the very apartment where the old king had retired, and found him laying on his couch; but their insolence soon roused up his courage and bravery, in- His noble defence. so much that, old and blind as was, he hastily arose, and darted several javelins at them, some of which failed not of doing some execution among them, as they crowded so thick upon him. Several of them were wounded, and amongst them Gnaia in the neck, when on a sudden the Portuguese agent advanced with his drawn scymitar towards the king, and at one blow struck off his head, which filled his attendants with dread and horror. Is murdered.

- HERE Gnaia, fully satisfied with seeing the good old king weltering in his blood, and headless at his feet, whether to recover the Sofalans from the frightful prospect with which such a bloody scene must needs have filled them all, or to avoid their making some desperate attempt to revenge their monarch's death, had recourse to the old trite artifice, of Gnaia's artful speech to the Sofalans. feigned clemency, and immediately forbade his men to offer any farther violence towards a people whom he wanted to gain by acts of friendship and benevolence, rather than affright them with any further proofs of the Portuguese bravery and martial prowess; adding, that as they had by this time sufficiently experienced the one, he was now ready and willing to give them the most convincing proofs of the other, by acts of humanity, and tenderest compassion to their present distress. This plausible speech, whether it wrought most upon their fears or hopes, had the desired effect; and the Sofalans, finding they had to do with a nation that was too strong and artful, not only forbore all further hostilities, but patiently submitted their necks to a yoke which they have never been able to shake off from that day to this<sup>e</sup>.

- ONE of our authors, who hath added many palliatives to this transaction, in favour of Marmol's palliative account of that revolution. the Portuguese, adds, that prince Muças having rallied his scattered troops, again laid siege to the fort, with fresh courage and fury, but met with such stout opposition, that he was obliged to raise it three days after; his tired Arabs, the best troops he had, being by this time become more solicitous about the choice of a new king, than to revenge the death of the old one. The contest lay between the son of the deceased named Soliman, a great friend and patron of Zacote, and Muças his son-in-law, a prince of greater abilities and merit, and who would, in all probability, have been nominated to the succession, had not Zacote, or, as our author styles him, Yacote, by his interest and persuasions, obtained it in favour of Soliman, and prevailed upon Gnaia to confirm him king of Sofala<sup>f</sup>. But the good bishop Ossorio, far from mentioning any such instance of the Portuguese admiral's regard to the son of the late Jusef, or of the perfidious Zacote's ingratitude to that prince, assures us, in express terms, that the former bestowed the crown on the latter by his own authority, and as a reward for his great services to the Portuguese. His account of that remarkable transaction is as follows<sup>g</sup>.

- GNAIA, having succeeded so far, thought it now time to settle this newly subdued Gnaia crowns Zacote king. state; and, as a mark of the Portuguese generosity and gratitude, to reward the perfidious Zacote for his friendship and fidelity to them in the amplest manner. He accordingly caused him to be sent for in great pomp, and, with the usual ceremonies, which we have described in a former note<sup>h</sup>, to be, in his master's name, proclaimed king of Sofala, and enjoined the people to obey him as their sovereign. He next obliged them to take the oath of fidelity and allegiance to the king of Portugal, and to promise to behave, on all occasions, as his most faithful tributary<sup>i</sup>.

- GNAIA had hardly begun to taste the fruits of his success, before he was cut off by a distemper which seized both him and his men, wholly owing to the inhospitableness of this Gnaia's death. new climate. We have already taken notice of the extreme unwholesomeness of the country, occasioned by the vast number of its marshes, which, being in summer dried up by the scorching heat of the sun, infect the air with their pestilential steams. The Portuguese quickly found the sad effects of it, being first seized with an excessive weakness in their bodies, and dimness of sight, which, in a little time, turned into a wasting consumption, and carried off a great number of them, and among the rest the admiral above-mentioned; in whose room Emanuel Ferdinando, the old king's assassin, was chosen by the unanimous consent of all the officers. The news of this was soon sent to Almeid the governor of Goa, then in India, who received about the same time an account of the revolution which lately happened in Quiloa, by the murder of the new-made king Mahmud, by the partisans of Brabam<sup>k</sup>. Almeid thereupon dispatched Novico Vasquez Pereira, with a commission to sail for Sofala, and take the government of the fort upon him; but with orders likewise to touch at Quiloa, and settle the commotions raised there on account of the king's murder, and to punish with the utmost severity all that had been accessory to it.

In the mean time the Portuguese garrison of Sofala was so dreadfully afflicted with the badness of the climate, and the diseases which then raged among them had carried off so many of them, that Ferdinand, who had succeeded Gnaia, could with great difficulty restrain the small remainder from abandoning it, when, in a lucky hour, the Portuguese ships arrived at the port, with a fresh supply of men, arms, and other provisions, and enabled them to hold it till fresh troops and other reinforcements were sent thither from Goa, with the new governor, who soon settled the fortress and garrison in such a condition that they have held it ever since, and obliged the Sofalans to accept of such kings as they shall please to set over them; by which means they have kept that kingdom under tribute, and engrossed that rich and advantageous commerce to themselves, to this time. How long their new-made king, whether prince Soliman, or the perfidious Zacote, enjoyed his dignity, who were his successors, and other interesting particulars relating to that new conquest, we are left wholly in the dark. We are told indeed by a Dutch writer<sup>l</sup>, that the king of Sofala was a Portuguese by birth, at the time of his writing his book. But Jarric will have it that he was only a tributary to Portugal<sup>m</sup>. But most writers agree that the kings of it were formerly tributary to the emperor of Monomotapa till an. 1507, when Gnaia and his successors reduced it under the power of king Emanuel. However it is not improbable that some of those emperors afterwards made themselves masters of the greatest part of the continent, and have confined the Portuguese to the sea-coast, in revenge for their shutting them in, and excluding their subjects from all foreign commerce with the sea-coast; though they have been since forced to refund it with interest, and to yield them, besides some of their best gold mines, a tract of ground of above 160 leagues into their own dominions, both which they have kept ever since the year 1640, as we shall have occasion to shew under the next section.

S E C T. V.

The history of the empire of Monomotapa, or Munemotapa.

MONOMOTAPA is, next to the empire of Abissinia, one of the largest in all Africa. Some call it Benemotapa, and others Benemoaxo; and the name of Benemotapa, we are told, is the common title of its monarchs, as Cæsar was that of the Roman emperors<sup>a</sup>; but according to Texeira it ought to be written Munæ Motapa, because the kings who are seated beyond the Cassers call themselves Mune, instead of Mani. However that be, the Portuguese do more justly style him the emperor of the gold, on account of the many rich mines which are within his dominions. Monomotapa, properly so called, lies contiguous to Sofala, last described on the east, and is, like that, inclosed by the river Cuama on the north, and that of Magnico, or of the Holy Ghost, on the south, extending itself westward between those two rivers as far as their spring-heads: so that whilst Sofala belonged to it, as it formerly did, it might be properly called an island, surrounded on one side with salt, and on the other with fresh water, and between 700 and 800 leagues in circuit. It is situate between the 14th and 25th degrees of south latitude, and between the 41st and 56th of east longitude, or 670 miles from north to south, and 615 from east to west<sup>b</sup> (A). But if we take

(A) According to Messieurs De Lisle and D'Anville, the kingdom of Monomotapa Proper is bounded on the north by the river Zambira, or Cuama; on the east by the Indian sea; on the south by the river of St. Laurence, and on the west partly by the St. Laurence, and partly by the Cuama; so that, according to these limits, Monomotapa contains the kingdoms of, 1. Quitwe. 2. Manica. 3. Sabia. And, 4. Inhabana. To which D'Anville adds that of Sedanda, if it is not the same with the last. The first of which includes the pro-

a take in all the other inferior kingdoms, which are either subject or tributary to it, it will extend itself vastly farther; viz. southward almost as far as the Cape of Good Hope, and on the north-west as far as the confines of the kingdom of Congo; for so far on these two sides the authority of its monarchs is said to extend itself; though on the west, and part of the north-west, it is confined by that of Monocmugi*, of which we shall speak in the sequel.

THE climate of Monomotapa is temperate, notwithstanding the far greater part of it doth lie within the southern tropic; the air is clear and healthy, the soil fertile, and so well watered, as to abound with pasture grounds, on which are bred vast multitudes of cattle, especially of the larger sort, which the inhabitants set a higher value on than on their gold. Their ground produces plenty of rice, millet, and other grain, though no wheat. They have great variety of excellent fruit-trees, and abundance of sugar-cane, which grows here without any culture. Their forests swarm with wild beasts, and various kinds of game. Their rivers, of which they have a great number, as we shall shew in the sequel, abound not only with fish, but with gold likewise, which they sweep away from the mines through which they run; yet, in spite of all this abundance, the country is, for the most part, but thinly inhabited, notwithstanding some authors assert the contrary, particularly Lopez, who says the number of people is infinite, and who probably supposed them such from what he observed on the sea-coasts, particularly on the islands formed by the four mouths of the Cuama, and other considerable ones, and of great length, which one meets with in sailing up that river, as far as the towns of Sena and Tele, that is above 60 leagues distant from its mouth: all which islands are rich and fertile, and full of inhabitants, as well as on both sides of the shore†. But, excepting those lands which are watered by the Cuama and Santo Spirito, and a number of other rivers which flow into them, the rest of the inland parts are mostly sandy, dry, and barren; inasmuch that the few inhabitants that live in them, are forced to go a great way for water to levigate their gold dust, whenever their cisterns fail them for want of rain, as we shall see in the sequel.

THEY have neither horses nor any other beasts of burthen; but vast herds of elephants, mostly wild, of which they destroy several thousands yearly, as may be easily judged by the vast quantity of ivory brought from thence, and sold to the Portuguese. They have a kind of stag they call Alfinge, of extraordinary size and swiftness; and ostriches as large as oxen, whose grease or oil, either outwardly applied, or taken inwardly, is reckoned a sovereign remedy against pains and aches, sprains, and stiffness of the limbs<sup>d</sup>.

THE natives are all black, with woolly air, notwithstanding their distance from the equinoctial line, and the coldness of some of their climates, and the snows which fall in such vast quantities upon their mountains, as in the country of the Belonghi, and the province of Matuca, that if any abide on them, they are sure to be frozen to death: and, what is still more surprising, even those who inhabit the countries beyond the south tropic, as far as the Cape of Good Hope, are all of the same dark hue; whereas the people in the most torrid regions of Libya and America, which have the sun vertical over them, are strangers both to that black tincture of skin and crispness of hair. However, in other respects, they are well-shaped, robust, and healthy, and more sprightly and docile than those of Quiloa, Mombasa, and Melinda. They delight much in war, which they prefer to the dull and low way of living by traffick. As for the lower class, they are commonly brought up to diving; and are so dexterous at it, that their chief business is to fetch sand or mud from the bottom of rivers, ponds, and lakes, and to levigate the gold that is mixed with it more or less, which they afterwards exchange with the Portuguese for cotton and other cloths, and variety of other merchandizes and trinkets, which they carry thither from India and Europe, as they are closely shut up from all commerce with any other coasters<sup>e</sup>.

THEIR chief food is the flesh of oxen and elephants, salted and dried fish, and a great variety of fruits. Among these last there is one called Casaema, not unlike an apple, very

To this he adds, that there are many lordships which have not the title of kingdoms, and that the greatest of all those that have is that of Mongas, which borders on the rivers Cuama or Zambere, whose monarch is said to be absolute in his dominions, though a tributary or homager to the emperor (2).

sweet to the taste, and of a lively violet colour; but so pernicious in its effects, when eaten a in too great a quantity, that it never fails of causing violent dysenteries and bloody fluxes. Their bread is made of rice or millet, baked into thin cakes, and their drink sour milk, and oil of sesaman, or Turkey wheat. The richer sort have some strong sorts of liquors made of honey, millet, and rice, and of some kinds of fruits. They have, among others of this sort, the palm-wine, which is esteemed a royal liquor, and drank much at court. This wine, which is drawn from the palm-tree by incision, is like the hydromel, and preserved here, as in other parts of Ethiopia, in vessels made of horn, curiously wrought; but the former is commonly mixed with manna, ambergrise, musk, and other such high-scented perfumes, of which the courtiers and better sort of people are very fond, not only in their meat and drink, but in their apartments, walks, &c. insomuch that we are told the emperor consumes b daily as much of these sorts of perfumes as is equivalent to two pounds weight of gold. All his flambeaux, which are burned before him, are perfumed in the same manner; and when he goes abroad he is generally carried in a stately sedan or chair, borne by four persons of quality, and under a magnificent canopy, richly embroidered, and bespangled with pearls and precious stones; if the weather happens to be cloudy or misty, four of those lighted torches are carried before him, to clear and perfume the air<sup>f</sup>. The princesses and ladies of the highest rank always dress his victuals, bring and serve it at his table, and they take that office by turns, as do also his musicians; but these last, before they come into his presence, are obliged to be hood-winked, or have a veil before their faces, to prevent their seeing him either eat or drink<sup>g</sup>. All the women in general, whether of quality or meaner c rank, are fond of performing the same duty to their husbands and families.

people.

THE Monomotapans go naked almost as low as the girdle, but from thence downwards are covered with a piece of cloth of various colours, and dress more or less richly according to their rank or circumstances. That of the common people is of dyed cotton; but that of persons of quality is of India silks, or of cotton embroidered with gold, over which they commonly wear a lion's, or some other wild beast's skin, with the tail hanging behind, and trailing on the ground. When they go into the country, they commonly cover their private parts with the rind of a calabassio, to prevent their being annoyed with the stings of venomous insects: in other respects young men and maids go naked, except a bit of cloth with which they cover their middle: but after these are married, and have children, they d cover their breasts and all the rest of their bodies<sup>h</sup>.

wives.
His dress described.

THE men are allowed to marry as many wives as they please, or as they can maintain; but the first is always looked upon as the chief and mistress, and her children as the father's heirs, whilst the rest are only deemed as servants. The king or emperor is said to have above a thousand wives, and all of them the daughters of some of his vassal princes; but the first is the only one who hath the title and honours of a queen. He never alters his dress, but goes attired in the same manner as his ancestors did, neither allows he himself, or any of his wives or family, to wear any cloths that are manufactured out of his dominions, for fear they should have some poison or charm concealed in them. His usual dress is a kind of long vest or cassock, which goes down to his knees; then crossing between his legs, is e again tucked up under his girdle. He wears also a stately brocaded mantle, waving over his shoulders, and buskins on his legs, richly wrought and embroidered with gold, pearls, &c. His neck is adorned with a magnificent karkanet or collar, enriched with diamonds, rubies, emeralds, and other precious stones, and going several times round, one under the other, down below his breast. Of the same rich materials is the hatband which goes round his turban<sup>i</sup>.

he goes abroad.

WHENEVER he goes abroad, which is either in his sedan or palanquin already described, or mounted on an elephant or an Alfingo (B), he is always attended with a vast retinue, besides his own guards, and band of musicians. On these occasions, besides his other regalia, he affects to wear hanging at his side a small spade, with an ivory handle, and an f arrow in each hand. These he calls the ensigns or badges of his royalty. The spade is the emblem of industry, intimating that his subjects ought to apply themselves to the effectual cultivating of their lands, lest the neglect of it once reducing them to indigence, they

(B) The Alfingo, as hath been hinted already, is a kind of stag, but of an extraordinary size, strength, and speed, yet so wild that there are but few, especially monarchs, who dare venture themselves on their backs; tho' some of their subjects will, after they have, with great difficulty and danger, been broken to the bit and saddle: but examples of this are rare; and, as horses are no less so, the Monomotapan emperors chuse the most safe and noble beast to ride on; viz. the elephant (2).

- a should be tempted to pilfer and steal: on which account one of the arrows in his hand points out to them his power and duty to punish such, as well as all other crimes, as by the other he is represented as the protector and defender of his people from all foreign invasions<sup>k</sup>. On occasions of their going abroad in this public manner, whether to war or diversion, or to visit his dominions, his subjects, who pay him the most profound homage and respect, never fail of appearing in crouds to wish him all imaginable success and prosperity; and sacrifice, at proper distances on the road through which he passes, a deer, or some other victim; over which, whilst the beast he rides on goes, their augurs, who always assist on such occasions, observe carefully the motions of the liver, heart, &c. of the dying creature, and from thence proclaim his enterprise or journey successful or otherwise; if the former, they fill the air with shouts and acclamations; and, if the latter, with doleful sounds; and it is seldom that any of those monarchs will proceed farther on their journey or design, whenever these pretended conjurers persist in giving it a sinister aspect.

THEY are however less liable either to revolts from within amongst the great number of their tributary princes, or of invasions from without, as they keep constantly a numerous standing army, even when at peace with all the neighbouring nations, which secures them against the latter; and oblige all the sons of their vassals and tributaries to be educated under their eye, and with their own family, where they are taught their duty and loyalty to them, and are kept as hostages of their parents fidelity. To this double policy they add a third, and no less successful maxim, which is, to send once a year their ambassadors to all the grandees who are vassals to the crown, to give them what is styled among them the new fire. No sooner do these ambassadors arrive at the court of a vassal, than they order them, in the emperor's name, to put out their fire, on pain of being declared rebels and traitors; which being complied with, they come and light it afresh at that which the ambassadors bring with them for that purpose. Should any tributary refuse to conform to this order, war is immediately declared against him, and military execution is put in force against him with the utmost severity<sup>l</sup>.

- AND as they are thus careful to keep all their vassals within their due obedience, so are they no less solicitous to preserve the affections of their subjects by acts of kindness and benignity. They exact no taxes or tribute from them, but some small and inconsiderable free-gift or present, and that chiefly when they apply to them for justice, or some other favour; because that is esteemed a mark of respect from an inferior to a superior, whenever they approach them. The same thing is observed by the merchants, who, at their fairs, or other places of sale, commonly present him with some of their wares, not by compulsion, but of their own accord; and if any neglect that small homage to him, their only punishment is, that they must not dare to appear before him, which is reckoned a great mortification and mark of contempt amongst them. This singular indulgence makes them look upon themselves as a free people, and by far more happy under such a prince than any other African nation under theirs; and such is their affectionate regard for him, that whenever he drinks, sneezes, or coughs, one of the nobles in presence, cries aloud, "Pray for the health and prosperity of the emperor:" upon which not only the place where he is, but as far on all sides as their shouts can be propagated and heard, is filled with acclamations of joy and good wishes for him<sup>m</sup>. If he at any time doth summon them to labour, either at the gold mines, or for any other service, as is sometimes the case, he never fails of sending them cows and other provisions, which makes them come with greater readiness to his work.

HIS ministers and officers, both civil and military, as well as his soldiery, who subsist by his pay, are indeed obliged, instead of taxes, to pay him a kind service of seven days in every month, either in cultivating his grounds, or any other work he thinks fit to employ them in; and the lords and nobles of the kingdom are likewise bound to the same service when required, unless exempted from it by some particular privilege granted to their family or office.

- ALL law-suits and contests may be brought before him by appeal, and the former judgments be either confirmed or annulled by his authority. He hath no gaols or prisons in his dominions, because every trial is summarily determined, either according to the report of the parties, or the evidence of the witnesses, and every crime is punished immediately after conviction. If the complaint or crime be of such a nature, that it cannot be so quickly adjudged, and there be any danger of the person accused making his escape, he is ordered to be tied to a tree, and a guard is set over him till he is either absolved or condemned; if the latter, the sentence is immediately executed in the open field, whether it be corporal or capital punishment; the former is commonly a more or less severe drubbing with a knotted cord, according to the nature of the crime, or the favour of the prince, as it is not reckoned ignominious among them, though inflicted on a nobleman.

Witnesses how purged. If any contrast or doubt happens between the witnesses, one of them is obliged to take a piece of the bark of a certain tree into his mouth, and to chew it into a powder, which is then thrown into some water, and given to the other to drink. If it stays with him he is absolved, if not he is condemned. In the former case however, he that gave the water hath still one way left to clear himself, by drinking some of it, and if it stays with him also, the law-suit is left undetermined, and an end put to it". He exacts no servile prostrations from his subjects, as the eastern monarchs usually do from those who come into his presence, but obliges them all to a sitting posture (C), except the Arabians and Portuguese, together with some few favourites, who are allowed the privilege of standing before him, b which is esteemed one of the greatest marks of his favour; the next to which is that of having the liberty of sitting upon a carpet, at their own homes; and a third they add of having doors to their houses or apartments. All which, but chiefly the last, only belong to the grandeos of the empire, the rest thinking themselves secure enough under the protection of their prince, and is only granted to such grandeos as a mark of honour and distinction. If any other pre-eminence they have, it is more on account of the largeness than the richness of the materials, or elegance of their structures, they being all built of wood, and thatched with leaves or reeds, and are round on the top, like a bell or cupola °.

Capital described. THE metropolis of this empire is called Benematapa, or Banamatapa, and by Le Blanc and others Medrogan P. It is a spacious city, situate about six days journey from an ancient c palace named Simbaces, and about 20 miles west of Sofala. The houses are neat, and more or less high and lofty, according to the rank of the owners. They are mostly white-washed within and without, and adorned with beautiful cloths of cotton, finely wrought or dyed, which

The imperial palace. make the most considerable part of their furniture. But the greatest ornament of the city is the imperial palace, which is a large spacious fabric, though of wood, well flanked with towers, and with four avenues or stately gates, constantly kept by a numerous guard. The Rich furniture. inside consists of a great variety of sumptuous apartments, spacious and lofty halls, adorned with a magnificent kind of cotton tapestry, the manufacture of the country, wherein the beauty and liveliness of the colours greatly raise the value of them above that of the gold with which they are embellished. The floors, cieling, beams, and rafters, are all d either gilt or plated with gold, curiously wrought, as are also the chairs of state, tables, benches, &c. and all beautifully enamelled, or curiously painted, if we may credit some travellers ° and geographers. They use candlesticks and branches of ivory inlaid with gold, and hanging from the cieling by chains of the same metal, or of silver gilt, and every thing else answerable to them. The flambeaux, which are lighted in them, are all perfumed with every costly odour, with the same profusion. The emperor is served at table upon the The king how served. knee, and the dishes tasted, not before he eats of them, but after they are taken away. He is commonly attended at such times by a great number of officers, who keep a most profound silence. The plates, dishes, and bowls, belonging to his table are of a sort of porcelain, curiously wrought around with sprigs of gold, resembling those of coral; but whether manufactured in his dominions, or brought from India, we are not told. e

Brilliant court. THE ladies of the court are said to make a most gallant figure, and to go richly clad, tho' in the manufacture of the country. The same we may suppose of the sons of all the tributary princes, who are here brought up under the king's eye, and must be supposed to make the noblest figure they can. They have colleges and academies appropriated to their education, and at his charge. These, joined to the retinue and equipages, and the great number of officers civil and military, who are obliged to attend on the court, may likewise be reasonably supposed to make no inconsiderable addition to the brilliancy of it, as well as the opulence and splendor of that great metropolis f.

The empress presides over his harvest, in his absence. THE empress, as well as such and as many of his other wives as the emperor invites, are always glad when the time comes to accompany him into the country, to assist at the gathering of his harvest; and if he be hindered by war or otherwise, she takes the whole care of it upon herself, and assigns to the other wives their several tasks under her; viz. to overlook a certain number of those soldiers or other subjects that are employed in that work. These are obliged, as was lately observed, to pay him the service of seven days in thirty, the Persian and other eastern monarchs exacted from those who approached them, to have all their hands muffled up in their sleeves, and to remain prostrate on the ground all the time they continued in their presence.

- a and to bring their own provisions with them, but are nevertheless commonly supplied, over and above, with cows, sheep, and other eatables, by his special bounty, especially whenever he is present*. And as he is always accompanied with a numerous band of musicians, jesters, and buffoons, each under their own captain or master of the revels, the evening, and even the whole night, is entertained either with the music of the one, or the songs, jests, and buffoonries of the other. And this pastime, we are told by some authors, is not only usual in the country, and upon these joyful occasions, but lasts most of the year where-ever the court is, whether in the capital or out of it†. We must, however, observe here, with respect to the female part of it, of what rank soever, that they are, every-where through this empire, treated with the utmost respect and decency; insomuch, that if even a prince of the blood meets a woman of ever so mean a rank in his way, he dares take no other notice of her than to give her the upperhand, and pass by her with a civil bow‡.

- OTHER cities of note, though not considerable enough to deserve a description, are Zimbas, al. Zimbaos, in the neighbourhood of Sofala, and supposed to have some relation with the Agasimba of Ptolemy, as that word signifies properly a palace or castle, of which there are several antient ones, probably to guard the gold mines; so that Agasimba might then properly signify the region or country of castles or palaces. The relation published of this country by the Jesuits, an. 1624, mentions another city in this country named Tele, where that society hath the college of the Holy Ghost for their residence. Sena, inhabited chiefly by Portuguese, one of their chief fairs, as the Cuama is navigable up to it, and to that of Tele last-mentioned, which is another of their colonies§. We might add that of Tumbaro, and some others of less note, but of which they give no particular account.

Other cities. Zimbas.

- BESIDES these and other provinces and kingdoms, tributary to the Monomotapan empire, we are told of a province or district, appropriated by the king for a set of female warriors, in all respects like the ancient Amazons we have spoken of in our ancient history*, and observing the same way of living. These are said to be seated in a separate kingdom, on the confines of those of Damot and Gorago, belonging to the Abissinian empire†. And some add, that the kings of Monomotapa prefer them in their wars to their own standing troops. Many more wonderful things they tell us concerning their way of living, fighting, wounding and killing in their pretended flight, that we should be loth to vouch for, as well as absolutely to deny the real existence of such martial viragoes, against the evidence of so many, other-wise credible authors‡. The reader is at liberty to judge as he pleases.

- WE have already hinted, on another occasion, that the emperor maintains a numerous army constantly on foot, for he hath no cavalry, there being but few horses, if any, in his dominions, at least fit for that purpose. Whenever he goes to war, either against an invading enemy, or revolted vassal, those heroines always make one part of it, as well as of his guard. They are armed and clothed like the men; their weapons are the bow and arrows, the javelin, scymitar, cutlace, and dagger, and some of them use also the hatchet, very keen and light, all which they handle with great dexterity, being trained up to it from their tender years, and frequently exercised in them. Where-ever the emperor incamps, they rear for him a large wooden house, in which a fire must be constantly kept burning, lest some conjuring spell against him should be concealed under the ashes*. He takes such of his wives with him as he likes best; and, besides his Amazonian life-guard, is always escorted by 200 large mastiffs, as the more trusty animal of the two, and in less danger of being bribed. In what order and manner his army marches, incamps, attacks, and fights, we are not told; only that neither he nor any of his soldiery are permitted to wash hands or face, till they have gained a complete victory: after which the spoil is divided between him, his officers, and common soldiers†.

- THE principal officers of his court, are the Ningamisba, or governor of the kingdom (a kind of grand vizier, or prime minister), the Mokomasba, or captain-general, the Ambuya, or lord high-steward, to whom, among other privileges, belongs that of naming a new empress when the old one dies, but she must be either one of the sisters or near relations of the emperor. The Inbantore, or captain of the band of musicians, who has a great number of them under him, and is himself a great lord. The Nurakao, or captain of the vanguard. The Bukurumo, which signifies the king's right hand. The Mogando, or chief augur or conjurer. The Nelambe, or keeper of the king's pharmacy, ointments, and other utensils and ingredients used by the augur. The Nehono, or chief porter of the palace. All these are styled lords, as well as the two chief cooks belonging to his majesty, who are commonly his relations; and the under cooks, who are also men of quality. None of these must be above twenty years of age, for till then they are supposed to have been free from carnal commerce with women; and if any have not, they are severely punished. As soon as they have attained the age of twenty; they are preferred to greater employments; those within doors are governed by a captain, as are likewise those without, much of the same nature as were formerly the Alcalde de los Donzelos <sup>y</sup>.

Chief wives,

AMONG the many wives belonging to the king, there are nine who are immediately next to the empress, and enjoy some considerable employment at court. The first of them is styled Mazarira, or mother of the Portuguese, who solicits their affairs with his majesty, and is gratified with large presents for it by those servants of hers who commonly accompany his envoys to them. The next is the Inabanda, who performs the same office in favour of the Moors. The third is the Nabaiza, who lives in the same apartment with him. The other six have likewise their respective titles, employments, and apartments, and all of them their several revenues arising from the respective kingdoms allotted to them, and sufficient to enable them to live in great state, and to keep a separate court; and as soon as one of them dies, another out of the next rank is named to succeed to her title, place, and income. All these have likewise a great number of women to attend them, as the king often goes to or sends for them; if he sees any of these that please him, he makes no scruple of taking them to his bed <sup>z</sup>.

THE prince, as well as the subjects of this vast empire, are generally heathen; though neither polytheists, idolaters, nor given to such bloody and detestable superstitions as the greatest part of the Caffers are, which are here held in abhorrence, and severely punished where-ever any such thing is found. They acknowledge a Supreme Being, Creator and Governor of the universe, and accordingly stile him Mazira and Attuno, terms equivalent to those two attributes. They pay moreover, we are told <sup>a</sup>, a singular veneration to a certain virgin whom they call Al Firoo, and have temples and nunneries erected in honour of her, and confine their daughters in them, much in the same manner as their neighbours the Abissinians, Greeks, and Romans do, to perpetual celibacy; but whether this notion of the worship of that virgin be derived from any of them, or hath some other origin, we will not venture to affirm; only thus much we may observe from some of their other superstitious rites, such as praying to and for the dead, preserving and paying a kind of religious regard to the bones and relics of their deceased parents, children, and other near or dear friends and relations, keeping stated anniversaries to their memory, and some others of a lower rank; and more might we still find, were we more fully acquainted with them; they all favour so much of the Abissinian superstition, that it is not unlikely they may have been formerly made profelytes to that church, whilst the country was subject or tributary to its emperors, but have since fallen away from the one, after their shaking off the yoke of the other. However that be, Pigafet taxes them with being given not only to a great variety of superstitions, but to such magical arts and practices, as quite eclipse the lustre of their belief in one Supreme Being <sup>b</sup>; though that belief is no small preparative disposition to their being made converts to Christianity.

Christianity

ACCORDINGLY we are told, that, in the year 1560, F. Gonzales Silveyra, a Portuguese Jesuit, had the good success to baptize the then emperor and his mother; the former of them by the name of Sebastian, in honour of the king of Portugal, and the latter by the name of Mary, in honour of the blessed virgin. Their example was followed by above 300 noblemen belonging to his court, and quickly after by a great number of the greatest lords of the empire. But if we may believe our author, who was of the same fraternity <sup>c</sup>, a year was scarcely expired, before that young and inconstant prince was so far exasperated both against his new religion and its preacher, by some of his favourites, who were Mohammedans, and represented the Portuguese Father not only as a dangerous spy, but as a great magician, and capable by his enchantments to overturn his whole empire, and to destroy the lives of his subjects, as to cause him to be murdered by eight of his domestics, whilst the good father was taking his rest, and to order his body to be thrown into the next river. He likewise caused some fifty of his neophytes, whom he had baptized but the day before, to undergo the same fate; but repenting afterwards of his rashness and too easy credulity, he caused those Mohammedans to be publicly executed for their calumnies; of which the Jesuits of Kochin were no sooner apprised, than they sent two of their society to him, who, by representing to him the infinite benefit which they did to the world by their preaching and conversions, so far ingratiated themselves into his favour, that he gave them at once full liberty of propagating their religion, and to his subjects the full permission of embracing it.

- a THEY had now a fair prospect of converting the whole empire, but which was not long after obscured again by the indiscretion of Sebastian king of Portugal; who, instead of sending thither a fresh supply of preachers, to accelerate the good work, equipped a new fleet, the command of which he gave to Don Francisco Baretto, with orders to enter Monomotapa in a hostile manner, and to revenge the death of the late Father Silveyra on the young emperor; and this, we are told, was done rather at the earnest solicitations of that Jesuit's illustrious family, as well as of a great number of grandees, than out of any inclination that prince had to fall out with the Monomotapan emperor. This proved, however, a very unsuccessful expedition both to the admiral, who is said to have been taken off in that war, not by the arms, but by the treachery, of the Arabs, who caused his water and provisions to be poisoned; and to the greatest part of his men, who died either in the same manner, or by the ill temperature of the climate. This is all the account we have given us of that fatal expedition; which, our authors however add, did not hinder the Portuguese settled there from continuing their commerce with the subjects of that empire with the same freedom, assiduity, and advantage, that they had done before<sup>d</sup>. Our author adds, in a few words, that the Jesuits were soon after succeeded in that mission by some Dominicans, who undertook the conversion of those heathens (D), without telling with what success, which probably was but small, since these have said so little of it: and a celebrated traveller, who was there about the year 1570, tells us, that the then emperor, who had by that time reigned 47 years, and was in all respects a prince of great penetration, valour, conduct, and justice, and almost adored by his subjects for his excellent qualities, still professed the old Monomotapan religion<sup>e</sup>. However that be, the next paragraph will plainly shew, that the Portuguese proved more successful in their secular affairs, in enlarging their conquests, and in the increase of their wealth and strength; by which means the Jesuits got fresh footing and credit in that empire. It is as follows<sup>f</sup>.

- IN the year 1604, the Monomotapan emperor having invited the Portuguese to come and take possession of the mines which he had yielded to them, the Fathers Francesco Gonzalez and Paulo Aleixo, both Jesuits, were appointed to accompany the army which was destined for that empire; from which vast advantages were expected to be reaped by both sides, the emperor confiding solely in the Portuguese for the reduction of his revolted vassals, and permitting them to build fortresses where-ever they thought fit, and even near his court, in order to their being nearer at hand to assist him against all emergencies.

- FROM these few historical fragments which we have been able to gather from the Portuguese writers, and from what we have occasionally observed in the last note, the reader will easily perceive the reason why we are so much in the dark, concerning the antiquity, foundation, and regular succession of this opulent and extensive monarchy: though, from a remarkable revolution which the French traveller last quoted hath transmitted to us, and in which the emperor then reigning was the chief actor, it appears to have been intailed by their laws in the male line, and might, if better known to us, have furnished us in all likelihood with a noble series of monarchs, of many illustrious reigns, and other remarkable particulars, worthy a curious reader's notice, especially if they bore any proportion to that signal one we are going to relate. We shall give it as near as possible in the author's own words, though stripped for brevity's sake of the many pompous eulogies and superfluous appendages with which the subjects of so greatly admired a prince, or perhaps the vanity of the author, may have thought proper to embellish it.

(D) We must leave it the reader to make his own remarks on these short detached pieces of history, where our authors, who are of the same fraternity, and equally concerned for the credit of their order, have thought proper either to conceal or palliate such transactions and concurring circumstances, as, if fairly told, would be likely to impair, if not ruin it. They need but confront them with what hath been related in former volumes of their boasted conversions and unchristian behaviour, which have ended in a general persecution and total extirpation of them and their religion, in the empires of China and Japan, in the kingdoms of Tong-king, Kochin China, Siam, &c. and more recently in the history of Abissinia, as well as what we shall have occasion to take notice of in those of Kongo, Angola, and other parts of Africa, to be enabled to form a more than probable conjecture about their motives for thus curtailing the Portuguese transactions in this of Monomo-

tapa. We may likewise conclude, from their being succeeded in that mission by the Dominicans, that they were by that time, on some account or other, become either obnoxious to the emperor and his subjects, or that their proceedings here, as well as every-where else, were displeasing to the congregation de propaganda fide at Rome, which, for many good reasons, always kept a watchful eye over them, and seldom if ever failed of sending other missionaries, either of the Dominicans or some other order, to be a check over them; witness the heavy charge and grievous complaints which were exhibited against them from China, Japan, and other parts, and their being frequently recalled from their missions, and other orders sent in their stead, by that illustrious body, notwithstanding the many friends they have in it, and their vast interest both in the conclave and the Roman court.

about the succession.

THE emperor Al Fumigar-bachi, who reigned about sixty years before our author's arrival a thither, being surprised with sudden death, in the 47th year of his age, without having time to appoint a successor from among the 64 sons he had by his several wives, a long and bloody contest arose between the most considerable of them, to which their respective mothers contributed all their efforts, interest, and riches, in order to bribe the most potent lords in behalf of their favourite sons. The struggle was so great, and the partizans so zealous, that each of the competitors strove to destroy the rest of his rivals, not only by all hostile means, but by publicly setting the greatest prices upon their heads. At length, after many fierce engagements and much blood-shed, the candidates were reduced to four; viz. Abgara, Adala, Cercut, and Gulman, who having escaped the many snares laid for them by their other brethren, agreed to unite their interest and strength against them, and slew as many of them as fell into their hands, whilst the rest either fled into different provinces and strong-holds for safety, or continued the war against the four with incredible fury and obstinacy, insomuch that the two former of the four princes lost their lives in it. The two survivors proving more successful against the rest, and impatient to reconcile the nobles to them, and restore peace to the empire, agreed to reign jointly and by turns, and that each should hold the reins of government six months in the year, after the manner of the two Theban princes Eteocles and Polynices, mentioned in our ancient history, and almost exactly with the same tragical end<sup>2</sup>; for they had reigned peaceably some time, when Cercut unfortunately marrying an ambitious princess named Gildada, was easily persuaded by her, on some pretence, to send for his brother to court, and to put him privately to death. He reigned singly after this fratricide about thirteen years, when an uncle of his, named Nabi, put both him and his wife and children to death, to the general joy of all the people, to whom his reign was become odious on that account, and himself reigned in his stead.

THIS revolution soon brought on a dreadful war between him and Gildada's father, then a powerful prince (E), in which vast numbers were slain on both sides. In the mean time, one of the princes of the blood, who had escaped the horrid slaughter which his other brothers made against each other for the empire, had retired far enough into a distant kingdom, where he had bought a small territory, which he cultivated himself, and on which he lived as a private man. Here he had also married a wife, by whom he had a son whom he named Al-fondi, who at the age of seven or eight years began to give signal prognostics of a rare elevated genius, and grew more and more beloved and admired as his years increased, by all who knew him. He began by times to display an undaunted courage in hunting of lions, tygers, and other wild creatures; and hearing at length of the cruel war that raged in Monomotapa, between his then unknown great uncle and the king of Dasila, resolved to set out as soon as possible for that kingdom; and having provided himself with some arms and a horse, he began his journey thither, attended only with a small number of brave youths like himself, whom he had engaged to accompany him.

HE had not been long there, before he signalized himself by such brave exploits, as drew the eyes of all upon him; but more particularly, and by a kind of natural sympathy, those of his great uncle, who, though then wholly ignorant of the proximity of blood between him and the brave stranger, conceived such and affection for, and confidence in him, that he intrusted him with the command of a small corps of his troops to attack the enemy in some important post. On this occasion Al-fondi displayed so much conduct and bravery, and gained so signal a victory over the Dasilans, that their king left no means untried to bring him over to his interest, though all to no effect. The consequence was, that in the space of six months he gained so many battles, and performed such surprising exploits, that he rid the empire of that troublesome enemy; and, in recompence for his signal services and inviolable fidelity, his uncle gave him his daughter in marriage, without his having the least surmise of his true extract and near relation to him.

(E) Our author, whether through forgetfulness or misapprehension, styles that prince king of Dasila; a kingdom no-where to be found but in some geographers (12), who place it within the territories of the Babrnagasb in the empire of Abissinia, on the confines of the coast of Habash or Abcz. But those geographers were misled by some fabulous and erroneous maps: and had there been really a kingdom of that name on that coast, it must have been too inconsiderable and too remote from Monomotapa to have maintained such a bloody war against it. It is therefore probable, either that he mistook the name of the king for that of the kingdom, for want of rightly understanding his informer, or that his memory misled him in this, as in another kingdom which he calls Le Royaume d'Éli, the kingdom of Éli, and his English translator, by another mistake, the kingdom of Deli, but which is as unknown to modern geographers as that of Dasila. However, as it is no strange thing that a traveller should make some mistakes, in such a variety of strange names; so neither is it improbable that there may be a great number of kingdoms in the inland of Africa, which are still unknown to the best geographers even by name.

a THE first thing Al-fondi did after his advancement, was to send for his father, who still His father arrives at court. lived in his obscure farm, and upon his arrival at court, disclosed the whole mystery, and declared himself the son of the late emperor Alfumigarbachi, to the joyful surprize of his uncle and of the whole court and army. The uncle gladly resigned the crown to him as his undoubted due, and he at the same time, with the universal consent of all, transferred his to his worthy son Al-fondi, and his wife, who were accordingly crowned with the utmost solemnity and universal acclamations of the people, who gladly acknowledged him as their lawful Al-fondi is crowned. sovereign, and honoured him as the restorer of the peace of the empire, and of the imperial crown to its ancient chanel, after so many long and bloody wars and contests about the succession <sup>a</sup>.

b THIS remarkable revolution happened in the year 1523: and that noble prince was still on the throne, an. 1570, when our author visited his dominions; who tells us, that he was still the love and admiration of all his subjects, and relates some signal instances of his justice, equity, and other royal virtues, for which we shall refer the curious reader to his own book <sup>1</sup>.

BEFORE we dismiss this chapter, it will not be amiss to give some account of the rich The gold mines of Manica. golden mines with which this empire abounds, and which we have but just occasionally mentioned in the course of its history. The most considerable of them are in the kingdom of Manica, under the 23d degr. of south latitude, and 31st of east longitude, near unto which is situate the capital of the same name, called by some Magnica. They extend

c themselves through a large spacious champaign, wild, sandy, and barren, about nine miles in circuit, and surrounded with high mountains. The province is called Matuca, and the inhabitants who dig the mines Botooge. Their rule for discovering the places where the gold lies, is by the dryness and barrenness of the ground; as if nature so far exhausted herself in the production of that precious metal, that it could yield nothing else, where it yielded that. The country moreover is so inhospitable in winter, tho' so near the south tropic, that whatever creatures abide there during that season, are frozen to death by the vast Extreme cold of the region. quantities of snow that fall, and the excessive cold that reigns throughout it <sup>2</sup>. But in summer the air is so serene and clear, that some Europeans pretend to have seen the new moon on the day of its conjunction.

d THESE rich mines lie about 150 miles west of the mart, or place where the commerce Difficulty in gathering the gold. for it is carried on; the misfortune is, that the Cassers who work at them, and are naturally lazy, find great difficulty in gathering the metal, which here is in dust, for want of water to separate it from the earth; so that they are obliged to carry it as mixed as they dig it out to other distant places, where they keep large cisterns and reservoirs for that purpose. One conveniency they have, however, that they need not dig deeper for the ore than above six or seven spans; all the rest underneath being solid rock.

NEXT to those of Manica, or indeed preferable by far to them, if what we are told of Mines of Massapa. them by a Portuguese traveller be true, are those which he calls the mines of Massapa <sup>1</sup>, and others of Afur; from the affinity of which name he concludes them to be probably the ancient Ophir. In these, he tells us, have been found two lumps of gold, the one worth 1,200 ducats, and the other 400,000. He adds, that it is not only found among the stones, but grows up within the barks of several trees quite up to the top where the branches spread. But setting aside this wonderful one, there are others in this empire not much inferior to those of Manica; particularly those of Batua, a kingdom bordering on the barren Mines of Batua. wilds lately mentioned, and extending itself from The Mountains of the Moon to the river Magnico, and whose prince is a vassal of the emperor.

THESE are reckoned the antientest mines in the whole empire, on account of some old castles in their neighbourhood, supposed to have been built as a safeguard to them, and carry the greatest marks of antiquity. Those of Boro and Kiticuy, the one about 100 and Boro, &c. the other 200 leagues from Sofala, and more particularly still those of the province of Toroa, in which are those buildings or castles of which we have spoken in the last section <sup>m</sup>, and which some learned have attributed to king Solomon. The reader may see the principal one of these ancient structures described in the margin (F); by which he may judge of the rest, there

(F) It stands in the middle of a large spacious plain, round about which are scattered the mines above mentioned, and therefore is reasonably supposed to have been designed as a guard to them, especially as the structure rather resembles a strong fortress than a Zam-ba or a palace; the name which the inhabitants give both to this and to all the others of the same construction.

Its walls are not high, but of the thickness of 25 spans; the stones are laid regularly one upon another, without either cement, or any other material to fasten them together. On the front, just over the great gate, is a larger stone than the rest, and upon it an inscription in characters, or more probably hieroglyphics, which no man hath hitherto been able to decypher.

there being many more such edifices in this empire, and all of them of much the same fabrication. They are computed about 170 leagues, or 510 miles west from Sofala<sup>n</sup>. But there are several other considerable places where they have their fairs and markets, between the mines and the sea coast, particularly in those towns which lie on the Zebeze or Cuama, and other rivers, which, as was hinted above, are navigable up to that of Tele, one hundred and twenty leagues from Sofala, and where the Portuguese have built fortresses to keep the natives in awe, who come to those markets to exchange their gold for European, Indian, and other commodities. The first of these towns is called Luano, or Luancho, and is about four days journey from the sea; the second is Buento, still farther in the inland; the third Massapa, still farther up; the fourth Sena, and the last Tele above-mentioned.

THE commodities which the Portuguese give the natives for theirs are chiefly cloths, of various kinds and value, glass beads of various sizes and colours, and other still more worthless trinkets, for which, besides the gold above-mentioned, they give them ivory, furs of sundry wild and tame beasts, and other such valuable commodities, which makes that commerce very advantageous to them, especially as they are in some measure their own carvers, and oblige the natives to submit to their own terms. They have moreover in those markets an officer of their own, who is appointed by the governor of Mosambico, and decides all contests and differences that arise about their traffick; that of Massapa in particular, who is nominated with the consent of the emperor, seems to be the chief of them, and, we are told, is forbid to go into the country without his leave, under pain of death. They have likewise, in most of these towns, churches and monasteries of the dominican order<sup>o</sup>. By the means of these several forts on the inland, as well as that more considerable one which they have on the mouth of the Cuama (all which, they tell us, the emperor allowed them to build in gratitude for the service they had done to him in assisting him to reduce some revolted vassals to their obedience, as well as to enable them, on all such exigencies, to be near at hand to assist him) they have made themselves masters of a tract of land on both sides of that river of above 160 leagues, and of some of the most considerable mines in the empire, and ingrossed the whole commerce of it, both of the inland and of the coasts, ever since the year 1640.

The history of the kingdom of Monoemugi.

Kingdom of Monoemugi.
Its extent,
boundaries,
&c. uncertain, and variously

BEFORE we resume our course round this African coast, it will not be improper to give our reader an account of the vast and potent kingdom, or, as some authors style it, empire, of Monoemugi, or Munni Emugi, or, as it is otherwise called, Nimeamaye, which extends itself along the eastern coast lately mentioned of Sofala, Mongala, Mosambico, Quiloa, and Mombasa, as far almost as that of Melinda on the east, on the north as far as that of Abissinia, from which it is said to be divided by the Nile, and the dominions of the grand Macocco, on the west it is said to reach quite to the frontiers of Kongo and Angolo, and on the south to those of Monomotapa lately described<sup>a</sup>. We must own, however, that these limits are nothing less than certain for the most part; and that we know little of the kingdom itself, but what is chiefly founded on the report of their neighbours, with whom its monarchs are frequently at war, or from the Negroes who carry on a commerce with it, rather than from the testimony of any European travellers into it; and hence proceeds that diversity of accounts we meet with among geographers concerning its extent, limits, division, &c. which the reader may see in the margin (A); from all which he will be the more easily convinced

Round this fortress, and at some distance from it, are seen several other such structures, all built on some eminence or rising ground, and amongst them a tower above twelve fathoms or seventy-two feet high. The wild natives, being unable to conceive how such structures could be reared, imagine them to be the work of demons. Those Moors who have seen them and the Portuguese castles in these parts, affirm that these are in no way comparable to them; neither is there any fabric, ancient or modern, to be seen in all these vast tracts that bears any resemblance to them, or indeed any thing else, but the low cottages, mostly made of earth, or at best of wood covered with clay, in which the poor inhabitants dwell (13).

(A) This kingdom, according to Sanfon, is divided into three great provinces, which he calls Monomotapa, Cafraria, and Kongo (14). Luitz divides it into five; viz. the empires, as he styles them, of Monoemugi,

- a vinced of what a late and more accurate geographer says of it, that the inland kingdom is in all those respects little known to us <sup>b</sup>. Neither need we wonder at it, considering the great precaution, which, as we have often had occasion to mention in this and the foregoing chapters, the Africans every-where take, to prevent any Europeans penetrating into the inland parts. However, what all our writers most agree in is, that he is a powerful and rich prince, and hath subdued most of the petty kingdoms round about him to his obedience; tho' not so absolutely, but that some of them, especially on the north and south side of him, frequently revolt, and put themselves under the protection of the Abissinian or Benemotapan emperors. He is said to have many rich gold, silver, and copper mines in his dominions, by means of which he carries on a kind of commerce with these <sup>Commerce.</sup>
- b two empires, as well as with some of the eastern coasters, with whom he is forced to exchange that precious metal for Indian and European commodities, for want of having some port of his own on either the eastern or western sea. This obliges him to cultivate a constant peace with the maritime kingdoms of Quiloa, Mombaso, and Melinda, whose merchants furnish him with variety of silks, cotton cloths, and other such merchandizes, together with cutlery work, and other sorts of trinkets: and amongst the rest, those little round balls or beads from Cambaja, made of a transparent red bitumen, with which they affect to adorn their necks, arms, and legs, and which they likewise use instead of money. Elephants being here also very numerous, vast quantities of ivory are exported by them into those kingdoms; from all which that emperor reaps a considerable yearly profit, and his subjects a no less conveniency, those Indian stuffs being their only apparel, and that only from their middle downwards; and those beads and trinkets their only ornaments, for which they gladly exchange their gold dust, which is of no value to them on any other account. He likewise lives in friendship with the grand Macocco, another prince on the north of him; on account of the Negro merchants who trade with the Portuguese, at the great markets of Fongeno, Pombo, and Ocango, and must traverse through his dominions in going and coming, and drive a considerable traffick likewise with him and his subjects.

- WHAT kind of people the natives of Monoemugi are in other respects, what their religion is, if they have any (for we do not find that Mohammedism hath reached them), what their laws, customs, and other particulars, we are wholly in the dark. The Arabs, who inhabit the coasts of Zanguebar, and are all Mohammedans, call them by the name of Caffres, or Cassers, that is, infidels, or men of no religion. We learn moreover that the frontiers of this empire, as well as some of the other provinces of it, are inhabited by the barbarous nations of Giachas, Giagas, or Agags, lately described, whom we take to be of the same extract, if not the same nation, with those whom the Abissinians call Gallas and Agaus, of whom we have elsewhere spoken <sup>c</sup>, and are a wild, fierce, and warlike people, of a whiter complexion, taller, and more stout by far than the African natives, and who live altogether upon plunder, and have spread themselves over most parts, and even some of the most potent kingdoms, of Africa, where, though they are called by different names, they plainly appear to have been originally the same people. They have no fixed habitations, but, like the wild Arabs, elsewhere described <sup>d</sup>, wander about in tents or portable houses, and spread dread and destruction where-ever they come. They have a way of marking their faces and bodies with iron instruments, and turn their upper eye-lids upwards to appear more terrible; and indeed one can hardly imagine any appearance more frightful, especially when joined to the idea of their other and still more barbarous customs, of butchering all that oppose them in their incursions, feasting on the flesh of all that unhappily fall into their hands; and, like the horrid Imbii, elsewhere described <sup>e</sup>, proclaiming death, fire, and destruction, where-ever they come.
- d <sup>Cassers whence so called.</sup>

- THESE savages, who scarcely knew the use of any weapons except their darts, the emperor of Monoemugi hath found means to fasten to his interest; and it is chiefly those whom he makes use of in his wars against the emperors of Abissinia and Monomotapa, and against the kingdoms of Kongo and Angola, in all which they committed such dreadful ravages and

Monomotapa, and Cafraria, and the kingdoms of Kongo and Biafara; the two first of which are wholly inland, and the other three maritime, and watered by the Ethiopic ocean (15), by the enlargement of whose dominions he doth of course remove its limits still farther northward and southward. But we have already seen that Monomotapa is no part of, but a boundary to this empire; and shall shew in the sequel that those of Kongo and Angola are no more subject to it than that; unless we will suppose, what is far from improbable, that being contiguous to and frequently at war with both, he hath conquered some provinces from them, and assumes a title over the whole, without having either tribute, or perhaps regard, paid to him from either.

butcheries, that the poor inhabitants have no other way avoid them, than by abandoning a their country at the first news of their approach, and carrying off all they conveniently can with them in their flight. And it was probably in some such expedition as this, that, we are told, they forced the king of Kongo to abandon his dominions, and to retire into a little island on the Zayr, where they kept him so closely blockaded, that he died soon after of the dropsy, and the people that were with him were famished to death<sup>f</sup>. We are likewise told that this powerful emperor employs these bloody cannibals against a commonwealth of female warriors, otherwise called Amazons, situate on some of his southern frontiers, from whence they used to make frequent inroads into his dominions; but are since kept in awe by them, not so much out of fear of their superior valour and strength, as of their inhumanity, and the dread of being roasted alive by, and made a banquet of to, that accursed foe. And b hence it is, that, when-ever they are attacked by them, the fight is commonly very bloody on both sides, there not being any of those martial females that will trust to their heels when routed, tho' extremely swift of foot; but will fight to the last gasp, and chuse to die sword in hand, rather than yield themselves prisoners to them.

WE shall not here inquire how far we may credit the various accounts we read concerning these female heroines, both in that and other parts of the world, but refer our readers to what we have said concerning them in our ancient history<sup>e</sup>. But as to this infernal generation in human shape, we shall have such frequent occasion to mention instances of their horrid customs in other parts of Africa, besides what we have already said of them in a preceding chapter, as will put that matter out of all question. And shall only observe c here, that those emperors, who can encourage and make such frequent use of their assistance against their neighbours, whose chief and laudable aim is to suppress and extirpate them, cannot come very short of their savage and inhuman nature. Yet in spite of all their help, and his strength and opulence, it is plain he hath not hitherto been able to extend his conquests so far as to gain one maritime port on either coast; though from what we have observed above, he hath made more than one attempt, on the western side, on Kongo and Angola to that intent.

WE do not hear of any considerable towns in this empire, but only of small ones, which are situate along the river Cuama, which is said by Luyts to run through part of it, and to keep up the commerce with the maritime kingdom of Sofala, or rather, according to our d more modern maps, the Cuabo, which runs from this kingdom to that of Quiloa; and these are rather a sort of villages, where fairs are kept at settled times of the year, and resorted to by the people on each side for the sake of traffick. We meet with an account of some large lakes in it: but these have been since found to be fabulous. The Portuguese, however, who traffick with those Negroes we lately spoke of, have been assured by them, that there is a large one, out of which spring several great rivers, and which was filled with a vast multitude of islands, inhabited by Negroes. They farther told them, that on the eastern side of it, from the land, one frequently heard the sound of bells, and perceived some stately structures like the Christian churches; and that some people of a dark swarthy complexion came and trafficked with those islanders. Those negroes being asked how far they reckoned e that lake from their own country? answered, that it took them full 60 days travelling still directly eastward<sup>h</sup>. We are further told, that the country which lies between that lake and the small territory of Ocango, or, as Mr. D'Anville writes it, O-Cango (B), is pleasant and fertile, and watered with great plenty of springs. It abounds with variety of fowl and four-footed creatures, and with palm-trees, from which the inhabitants draw both wine and oil; and honey is there in such plenty, that the Negroes cannot consume one third part of it, and suffer the rest to be lost; the misfortune is, that the air and climate are so unhealthy, that no missionaries or other Europeans dare venture so far into the inland, especially as the f Giachas, who inhabit these parts, and are reckoned the most fierce and cruel of all cannibals, infest all the roads, and massacre all that come in their way<sup>i</sup>.

THE greatest part of the kingdom is very mountainous; and among other long and lofty ridges of them, is said to run that famed one called by the antients The Mountain of the

(B) Mr. D'Anville, who, in his map of Africa, hath given us a sketch of that lake as we suppose from its situation (for Dapper, who mentions the particulars above-noted, takes no notice of that name), calls it Moravan, and represents it as extending itself above five degrees from south to north, but exceeding narrow, from end to end, in proportion; and at the south end of it places a city of the same name, on what authority we know not.

As for the small canton of O-Cango, it is situated on the frontiers of Kongo, and about thirteen degrees north-west above-mentioned. All that whole tract however is no less unknown to us than that of Monocmugi; no missionaries or Europeans having ventured farther eastward (excepting Father Cavazzi, of whom we shall speak in the sequel) than the duchy of Sundi, that is, the third province in the kingdom of Kongo; or if any have, no account hath been published of it that we can hear of.

We shall refer our readers to what hath been said in confutation of that notion<sup>l</sup>, and ascertaining its true source to be as far on this side the equator, as those mountains are beyond it. Here we must conclude our account of this large and opulent empire, for want of further intelligence. For though some authors have inserted in their descriptions many other particulars concerning its cities, towns, rivers, lakes, traffick, &c. yet they differ so widely from each other, that no dependance can be had on any of them; and the best that can be said of those relations is, that they have been taken on the credit of those Negroes who traffick thither, and who might have no other view than to amuse the inquisitive, and too justly suspected, Europeans with fabulous reports, the more effectually to conceal every thing that might b invite them to penetrate farther into those parts. All, therefore, we shall add with relation to this unknown empire is, that Mr. De Lisle, in his Atlas, divides it into the five following kingdoms or provinces; viz. 1. The Maracates. 2. The Mossaguères. 3. The kingdom of the Bengas. 4. Of Masty. And 5. Of Maravi. The last of which Mr. D'Anville places on the southermost verge of the lake of that name, which is all we can find concerning them.

THE farther we move southwards towards the Cape of Good Hope, the farther we may be said to travel in the dark; though all our maps unite to embellish both coast and inland with such prospects, and pompous names of empires, kingdoms, and countries, crouded close to each other, as might induce an unwary reader to imagine those countries to be as

c fully known as those of Europe; and were he to compare the vast shew they make in those maps, with the little he finds in the relations and accounts of the African writers, he might be apt to conclude from the former, that the far greater and most considerable part of the latter, like those of the ancients, have been unhappily lost or destroyed. And this we think ourselves bound to apprise our readers of, lest they should be induced to ascribe our leaping over such a vast tract of land, overlooking so many seemingly considerable kingdoms and states, to our neglect, rather than to what it is really owing, the want of proper intelligence, and so lose their time in a fruitless search after them, amongst that variety of authors that have written of this part of the world. The truth is, the Arabs, as well as the natives who inhabit the whole eastern coast, are too jealous of, not to say incensed against, all

d Europeans, to give them any intelligence of the inland parts; much less to let any of their missionaries penetrate into them, as they have more luckily done in the western. So that all the knowledge we have been able to gain of them, is chiefly founded on the precarious report of those trading coasters, and extends little farther than the names and situation of those kingdoms, which make so fine an appearance in our maps; and might probably be represented by them in such a light as might rather deter than encourage strangers from attempting any farther discoveries about them; though perhaps no better, if not inferior, than that poor beggarly one of Dancali, of which we gave an account in a former chapter<sup>m</sup>.

e BUT whatever they are must be left to time to discover, as well as what extends itself farther towards the south, which is no less unknown to us, and commonly goes by the common name of Cafraria, or land of the Caffers, quite to that of the Hottentots, of which we shall speak in the next chapter. One thing we know however of that great tract of ground, that it is mostly barren and uncultivated, inhabited by wild barbarous nations, or rather tribes, distinguished among themselves by various names; though by all appearance all of the same wild and savage extract; and all, on that account, comprehended by the Arabs under the common name of Caffers, or men of no religion or knowledge of a Deity; tho' whether really such we will not affirm, seeing they give the same opprobrious term to all that disbelieve the Mohammedan creed. However that be, the poverty and barrenness of their country rightly accounts for the small acquaintance the Europeans have with either.

The history of Cafraria, or the land of the Caffers, or Kaffers, and various nations so called.

Caffers and Cafraria, whence so called.

Northern

WE have already observed, that the name of Caffers, or Kaffers, is a kind of nick-<sup>a</sup> name, given in contempt by the Arabian Mohammedans to all the Africans in general, who are either idolaters, or even of a contrary religion; that word signifying without law, or lawless, and is often applied to Christians as well as to Infidels. But geographers confine it to those wild nations only who live in the most southern part of Africa, and comprehend the whole country under the general name of Cafraria, though they are not agreed about assigning its boundaries on the north side<sup>a</sup>; and no wonder, considering the little commerce the Europeans have with them. So that the generality of them make them begin at Cape Negro, on the western, and the mouth of the river Cuama on the eastern coast, and to extend quite to that of Good Hope on the south, including therein the whole nation of the Hottentots, who inhabit the most southern part, tho' these last plainly appear, in all respects, to be a different race from all the other Africans, as we shall shew in the next chapter*. But if by Caffers and Cafraria we must understand all the heathen and idolatrous nations who inhabit this south side of Africa, it is certain those northern limits will extend themselves much farther on that side, at least on the inland, and will include not only the kingdoms of Monomotapa and Monoemugi, already described, together with those of Anfiko, Fungono, Metamba, and others we shall speak of in the sequel, but the countries of the Gallas, Jagoes, on the south side of Abissinia, the Monsoles, and other nations of the same kind, which extend themselves between that empire and the kingdom of Kongo, Loango, Angola, &c. as far northward as the Mountains of the Moon, and how much further, is beyond our power to decide, with any tolerable probability, from the disagreement of our geographers and their maps. We may even add, that they sometimes contradict themselves, as one may see by the difference there is between the map which Mr. De Lisle gave us of this country, in conjunction with that of the kingdom of Kongo, and that which he published of the whole continent of Africa, the one in 1708, and the other in 1722<sup>b</sup>. The truth is, there is really no country properly so called; and the Portuguese having mistaken the Arabic word Caffer for the name of a country, instead of a reproachful epithet, have led the rest into the same error; for which reason we shall forbear saying any thing more of it under the former notion, but only add, with respect to the latter, that all the vast tract of inland from the Hottentots to the equinoxal line, and beyond, may justly be called by that odious name of Cafraria, or Infidel land, seeing the whole race of its inhabitants are not only all idolaters, but addicted to the vilest and most inhuman superstitions and witchcrafts, perhaps of any nation in the world, and such as the very Hottentots are utter strangers to; but on which we shall not here enlarge, because we shall have occasion to mention them in the sequel, in our route along the western coasts, so far at least as our missionaries have dared to penetrate amongst them. The misfortune is, that the ferocity and cruelty of those savages, joined to the excessive heat and unhealthiness of these climes, hath proved a constant discouragement to those good fathers from risking the loss of their lives and labours amongst them. So that there have been but very few who penetrated far into the inland; and of these one part died so soon, either through the heat of the climate, badness of the food, and the terrible fatigues they were exposed to, or were deterred by their ill success from staying any time among them; and at their return home gave such a dreadful account of this mission, that few, if any, have been sent thither since, except to such maritime places where the Portuguese or other Europeans are settled†: and hence it is that we know so little of that vast inland tract, notwithstanding what Dapper, La Croix, and others, have written concerning it from hearsay reports; authorities to which, we think, no credit can safely be given, except only what more immediately relates to the Hottentots, with whom they have plainly, though absurdly enough, confounded them. Instead therefore of troubling our readers with a long detail of nations, of whom we know little else but their names, even if these may be relied on, we shall now readily close up this chapter, in order to open our way in the next to those more remote natives of Africa, as well as those kingdoms and nations who inhabit its western coast, with whom we are much better acquainted.

C H A P. VIII.

*The history of the various nations of the Hottentots, with their coasts ;
together with the Dutch settlements on or about them.*

S E C T. I.

- a THE Hottentot coast, which surrounds the empire of Monomotapa in the form of a Situation and extent. horse-shoe on the east, south, and west, extends, according to Magin, from the west of Cabo Negro as far as the Cape of Good Hope, and from thence northward to the river Magnica, or Rio de S. Spirito, including Mattatan, a distinct kingdom. According to Sanutus, this coast, beginning at the Mountains of the Moon, under the tropic of Capricorn, in 28 deg. and a half of south latitude, extends north beyond the ape to the coast of Zanguebar, having the Indian sea on the east, the Ethiopic on the west, the southern ocean on the south, and on the north the kingdoms of Mattatan, Monomotapa, and the coast of Zanguebar, or rather the Mountains of the Moon, which divide it from the rest of the continent <sup>a</sup>.
- b THE natives, whose original name has been mistaken, and believed by Tachart, Marklin, Original Dapper, Arnold, and others, a nickname only, call and distinguish themselves by the name name of Hottentot; who, though generally confounded by Europeans with, and denominated Caffers, from Cafri, an Arabic name, as we have shewn in the close of the last chapter, are a distinct people, of different colour and manner of life, who know not, nor have any traditional account, of any national appellation antecedent to the arrival of Europeans, who have remained where they are ever since the deluge, or originally descended from the ancient Troglodytes, the posterity of Abraham by his wife Cethura. Their language is a composition of the strangest and most disagreeable sounds, deemed by many the disgrace of speech, without human sound or articulation, resembling rather the noise of irritated turkies, the
- c chattering of magpies, and whooting of owls, justly considered the monster of languages, attainable only by youth, and children born in the country, and never to be acquired by strangers, the sound depending on extraordinary vibrations, inflexions, and clashing of the tongue against the palate. On this account the Hottentots, who are hardly intelligible when they speak other languages (though there are instances of some who have expressed themselves roundly) are esteemed a nation of stammerers <sup>b</sup> (A).
- THE coast is extremely mountainous, abounding in capes, bays, and roads. Thirty Coast. leagues to the east of the Cape of Good Hope, situated in 24 degr. 21 min. of south latitude, is another cape more south, beyond deg. 25, called by the Portuguese, who first doubled it, Cabo das Agulhas, or Cape of Needles, the needle of the compass appearing to them, when
- d opposite this eminence, to turn from north direct south; tho' later mariners have remarked, that it still inclines five or six degrees to the north-west. Near this cape is a flat shore, with plenty of fish, which begins in the west near a fresh water river, and extending 15 leagues in the main sea, ends in the east near Fish Bay. Cabo Falso, so called by the Portuguese, who, returning from India, mistook it for the Cape of Good Hope, is between these two capes, eight or nine leagues eastward beyond the Cape of Good Hope; the Portuguese, who believed there were no more capes, called this, which they afterwards discovered in the same course, Cabo Falso. Along the coasts, on both sides of the Cape of Good Hope, are many fine bays, where ships may ride in the greatest safety. Twenty-seven leagues to the north-west is Saldanha Bay, so named from a Portuguese captain shipwrecked on that coast. The largest and
- e most commodious is Table, or Vasel, Bay, on the south, and near the mountain of that name, six leagues in circumference, with four fathom water close to the beach, and sheltered from all but north-west winds, which blow strait up. Opposite to this bay is Robu Eilan, or the Island of Rabbits, in 34 degr. 40 min. of south latitude, to the east of Cabo das Agulhas, and 67 leagues from the Cape of Good Hope. Peter Both, in 1661, discovered a bay which he named Uleest, sheltered only from north winds, in which is a small island, and on the west a rivulet of fresh water, extremely convenient for European mariners. Twenty-five or thirty leagues farther east Both discovered Masbell Bay, afterwards named by the Portu-

guefe Seno Formoso. Next to this is Seno do Lago, from its resemblance of a lake. There <sup>a</sup> are several roads in the extent of this bay, and an island called Ilha dos Caos. Cabo do S. Francisco, and Cabo das Serras, are marked upon charts between these two bays. The island Contento, and Cabo do Arecito, are near Cabo das Serras; and something more north-east is St. Christopher's River, called San Christovano by the Portuguese, and by the Hottentots Nagoa. The country beyond this river was called by the Portuguese, who discovered it on the festival of our Lord's nativity, Terra do Natal. Between the Cape of Good Hope and Cape das Agulhas, are the Sweet, Salt, and Jaquilina rivers, which run into the sea; the Sweet-water river flows from the bottom of the Table mountain, tho' the spring is asserted to rise on the west of lake Gale, between the Mountains of the Moon, and to run into the sea <sup>b</sup> near Cape Falso. Pigafet mistook this for the river Camissa, which runs from that lake, and whose mouth is more eastward, and nearer Terra do Natal. The company of the ship Mauritius, wrecked on this coast in 1662, began a fort opposite this river, in order to defend and secure a watering place, but the work was never completed. The mouth of the Salt-water river, so called from the extreme white salt made therein by the sun, in hot and drougthy seasons, is on the east. This receives the fresh water of three rivers, about nine or ten leagues up the country, and of a rivulet which springs up in the sands about half a league from the shore. The mouth of the river Jaquelina is also on the east, and half a league distant from the Table Gulph <sup>c</sup>.

<sup>c</sup> Hottentot nations. THERE are no considerable kingdoms throughout this large extent of country, the whole being inhabited by different nations of tribes of Hottentots, governed by different Honquers, or chiefs, who have no fixed residence, living, like the Arabs, in huts or portable houses, and removing their Kraals, or villages, whenever the pasture becomes too bare for the subsistence of their cattle, and upon the natural or violent death of an inhabitant. The known nations, according to our author (who esteems the several details of the Hottentot nations, given by Dapper, Anderton, Tachart, and others, for the most part made up of invention and hearsay) are the Gunjeman, Kochaquan, Suffaquan, Odiquan, Chirigriquan, Greater and Lesser Namaquan, Attaquan, Koopman, Hessaquan, Sonquan, Dunquan, Damaquan, Gauros or Gouriquan, Houteniquan, Chamtover, and Heikom <sup>d</sup>.

<sup>d</sup> Gunjeman. THE Gunjeman nation, who sold their territory, still live promiscuously among the Dutch, holding a small part only of their ancient possession. This nation, called also Goringbaiquas, pretend to the property of the Cape, of which they are said to be natives. They consisted of about 95 families, and sent into the field 3 or 400 men capable of bearing arms <sup>e</sup>.

- a had long and bloody wars, join upon the least injury or affront given by the Chirigriquan, in pursuit of satisfaction and revenge.

THE Chirigriquan is the next nation; a numerous people, remarkably strong in body, Chirigriquan. and famed amongst the Hottentots for their dexterity in throwing the Hassagaye. The Elephant River, so named from the great number of elephants frequenting its banks, runs cross this country, whose soil is superior to the Suffaquan and Odiquan. There are many hills, whose tops, like most others in Hottentot countries, are covered with meadows and a large thick wood, divided by several roads, yet extremely dangerous to pass, on account of lions, tigers, leopards, and wolves. This nation, with which a regular commerce has been established, were extremely furious against Europeans, having greatly suffered by b the Dutch freebooters, who robbed them in the most barbarous manner of their lives and cattle.

THE two Namaquan nations, of the same name, yet different in form of government Namaquan. and manner of life, of the best sense amongst the Hottentots, and able to take the field with 20,000 men, are greatly respected for their strength, valour, and discretion, and the women are extremely gay and artful. The Lesser lies on the coast; the Greater is the next nation eastward. Both territories are mountainous, stony, and sandy, the soil of the vallies indifferent, with little wood, and but one spring. The Elephant River, which runs through the two countries, principally supplies the inhabitants with water. There are numbers of wild beasts, and a particular sort of deer in these countries, spotted white and yellow, never seen c single, but herding in hundreds, and sometimes in thousands together. The flesh is generally fat and delicate, but of a different taste from European venison. The Namaquans, who, like the Chirigriquans, were extremely exasperated against Europeans, by the cruelty and rapine of Dutch freebooters, who, without quitting the field, had maintained a battle for three days, and, despairing of victory by force, had, by stratagem, vanquished and defeated a Dutch party, who, finding their proposals of peace rejected, had resolved upon giving the most distinguished proofs of their courage, appointed and sent a deputation to Mr. Van Assenbourg, who arrived at the Cape in 1708, to assure that governor of their readiness to enter into and observe exactly a treaty of alliance. The deputies wore a small plate of polished iron, in the shape of a half-moon, on their foreheads; and having waited on the governor, and dis-d charged their commission with surprising ability and discretion, to the great honour of their respective nations; and, having been liberally entertained for some days at the company's expence, returned extremely satisfied, and complimented the governor at their audience of leave, that they promised themselves from his personal virtues all peace and security; and that they should not fail of making the same impressions on their countrymen, which they had themselves received of his integrity, disinterestedness, and generosity.

THESE Hottentots travel 150 and 200 leagues from the Cape. Riebeck, governor of the Dutch settlement in 1661, sent 13 Dutchmen in an equipage drawn by four oxen, in order to establish a correspondence, and to discover gold or other curiosities among the Namaquans†. The ambassadors having travelled 150 leagues, at length discovered the Nama-
e quan Kraals, and were received with great courtesy and civility. They were first entertained for four hours by a band of one hundred musicians with a concert of Namaquan composition, conducted afterwards to the palace, and introduced to king Acambia, whose three daughters were of gigantic stature, and regaled by his majesty with milk and mutton. The ambassadors having presented the king and people with bits of copper, grains of coral, some brandy and tobacco, and instructed the Namaquans in the use of that weed, with which they were before unacquainted, returned perfectly satisfied with and convinced of the extraordinary stature of the Namaquans, and the beauty of the ladies, whose persons and apparel were besmeared with grease, tho' adorned, like the Songuas, with umbrellas of ostrich feathers. On November 14 of the same year, 13 more set out from the fort on a more accurate dis-f covery of this nation, 12 only returned on February 13, in the following year, who gave an account that one of the company had been killed by an elephant: that having travelled 150 leagues, without a lucky or amusing adventure, they had discovered one Chirigriquan hut near the place, where the Namaquans had before resided, who, they learnt, had departed, and gone to a distant country, nor would they be heard of in less than a year<sup>h</sup>.

THE Attaquans are a brave, sprightly, contented nation, who are seldom at war, living Attaquan. in tranquility, in small bodies, at a considerable distance from each other, the soil of their country being indifferent, and ill provided with water. These Hottentots make fires at the tops of the highest mountains when under apprehension of an enemy. Upon these signals the most able to bear arms repair to a fixed place of rendezvous, and a numerous army is g immediately assembled.

THE Koopman nation, so named from one of their captains, lies southward of the Gunje- Koopman. man. The Palamit, a rapid river, receiving on both sides several rivulets, and a considerable stream, called the Black River, has its source in Drakenstein mountains, and runs, winding itself, through the vallies of this territory, into the sea. There is a hot-bath, and several salt-pits in this country, where Europeans are continually taking in many large and rich tracts of land, unemployed by the Koopmans. This territory is extremely fertile, abounds in wood, and is well watered.

Hessaquan.

THE Hessaquan, the richest of the Hottentot nations, whose Kraals are the most numerous and best peopled, border likewise on the Gunjeman nation. These Hottentots trade considerably with Europeans; many enter into, and make fortunes in, their service, employing their wages in the purchase of cattle. This territory, whose pastures are covered with great and small cattle, is esteemed the most fertile, the Hessaquans, the most luxurious and effeminate Hottentot nation, and less inclined to war, are brave upon occasions, but never pursue enemies beyond their frontiers.

Sonquan.

THE Sonquan nation inhabit a mountainous, rocky, and poor country, to the east of, and bordering on, the Koopman. The enterprising and lively Sonquans, who are dexterous in the management of arms and in chase, take up in general the military profession, serving as mercenaries the Hottentot nations. The Sonquans, 3 or 4000 in number, are great hunters, men and women; their diet is venison, and roots instead of bread; their dress buffalo skins, and the women adorn their heads with umbrellas of ostrich feathers. The Sonquans, who are no admirers of honey, are famed at the Cape for engaging bees, barter great quantities of honey with Europeans, who mix it with water for refreshing draughts.

Dunquan.

THE Dunquans are next to the Sonquan nation; whose territory is less mountainous, and extremely fruitful, abounding throughout with cattle and game, and well watered by several rivulets running through into the Palamit river.

Damaquans.

THE Damaquans, great hunters and admirers of the flesh of wild beasts, are the next and adjoining nation, possessing a more level tract of land, equally fruitful and plentiful in cattle and game, and producing water melons and wild hemp. There are several salt-pits; but great scarcity of wood; and a sort of moss, offensive when set on fire, is made use of for fuel. The river Palamit, which turns and winds throughout this country, without any bridges, is extremely inconvenient to travellers; who are obliged to pass it in small canoes, or on floats of timber.

Gouriquan.

THE Gauros, or Gouriquan, who lie next to the Damaquan, are a numerous people, living in great ease and plenty in a small territory, swarming with more wild beasts than any country about the Cape. The soil is extremely rich and fruitful, well watered, and abounding with wood. The inhabitants, whose courage and dexterity are frequently exercised, distinguish themselves by their apparel, which is made of the skins of wild animals.

Houteniquan.

THE Houteniquan, whose territory, full of woods, intermixed with meadows, produces a wonderful variety of herbs and beautiful flowers of exceeding fragrancy, lie on the coast to the north-east of the Gauros.

THE Gouriquas and Houteniquas are very probably the Chrigriquan and Hosaan Hottentots, who were shepherds and hunters, inhabitants of the lands round the vallies of Sal-danba Bay.

Chamtovers.

THE Chamtovers, who border on the Houteniquas, possess a flat tract of land, extremely fertile, and abounding in pastures, with small woods, of the most lofty trees in the Hottentot territories. There is game and all kinds of wild beasts; and several large streams, enriched with various sorts of river and sea fish, divide and water the country.

Heikoms.

THE Heikoms, who lie north-eastward, and border on the Chamtovers, are exposed and subject to great inconveniencies and shifts, from the want of water: yet the vallies of this exceeding mountainous country are fertile, and cattle of every kind thrive on the brackish water, and reeds on the banks of the rivers. All kinds of game and wild animals abound in this territory.

THERE are several nations, hitherto scarce known, that extend themselves along the coast, from the Gauros as far as Terra do Natal; and the Chorogaugaus possess a large tract of country northward, bordering on the Attaguas, with many others between this nation and Angola<sup>1</sup>.

Births and character of the Hottentots.

THE Hottentots, who are brought into the world by the assistance of a decoction of milk and tobacco, to forward their births, and immediately rubbed with fresh cowdung, afterwards washed with the juice of Hottentot figs, and when dried by the sun, besmeared with melted butter or fat, then named by the mother or father Horse, Lion, Sheep, Ass, &c. according to their esteem for the beast, and taught to smook as soon as weaned, are of good stature, well made, both sexes erect, from five to six feet high, the women excepted, who are short, with small and tender feet, subject to few distempers, and generally of long life. Their colour is of a nut or dingy olive: their heads are large, with piercing eyes,

- a and noses flattened by art, with thick lips, and teeth as white as ivory: their wool, like Negroes, is short, and black as jet, and their feet large and broad. The Hottentots, insensible of the noble fruits reaped from industry by Europeans, remain the most lazy people in the universe: neither sex pair the nails of fingers or toes: they esteem thinking as labour, and, abhorring both as capital plagues, pass three parts in four of their lives with amazing stupidity in shameful idleness. They are, notwithstanding, occasionally, surprizingly active; they surpass in swiftness the fleetest horse, and are famed for dexterity in discharging arrows, throwing stones, Hassagayes, and Rackum sticks; and, though unacquainted with agriculture, and the qualities of tobacco, before the arrival of Europeans, excel, and are often consulted by most resident in the country, in the management of lands, and choice of tobacco.
- b Their mutual affection, liberality, and benevolence, extend to each other in the most friendly manner; and naturally compassionating distress, are extremely hospitable to strangers of every nation. They are of good sense, and integrity, in the expeditious execution of justice, and in chastity excel all or most nations in the world; yet practise, in the midst of these eminent virtues, the most barbarous and unnatural cruelties, upon the bare authority of Hottentot customs, the foundation and sole reason of all their institutions<sup>k</sup>.

ON the birth of twin girls, or of a boy and girl, if the parents are rich, and the mother complains of the want of milk, or the same plea, or poverty, is set up by the indi- Barbarous cus- gent, the worse-featured of the girls, who always suffer in other births, is allowed by the whole Kraal, assembled purposely to determine, to be buried alive, or exposed, stretched c on the back, or tied to the bough of a tree, to birds or beasts of prey.

If the eldest, and, in default of sons, the next male relation, who inherits all Hottentot estates, which are never divided, nor descend to women, who are debarred even of legacies but with consent of the heir, determines to get rid of his father, mother, or relation, who are regarded as superannuated when incapable of any useful domestic performance, the Kraal is convoked, and informed of the condition and request of the heir; consent is never refused, and a day is immediately appointed for the removal of the superannuated man or woman, whether captain, the wealthiest, or obscurest amongst them, and the person is compelled to surrender his whole estate to the claimant, whether son or male relation, who entertains the Kraal that bids farewell, and attends the superannuated person, who is conveyed upon a carriage ox, placed, left, and abandoned by all, without any other comfort or assistance, in the middle of a lone hut, but that of a small provision within reach, to die of age or hunger, or to be devoured by wild beasts, without remorse or scruple of affection, duty, or respect. And the most impious practice of Hottentot youth, made men, of reproaching, insulting, and beating their mothers with impunity, is an indulgence equally barbarous and cruel in the father, as unnatural and vicious in the sons, and must render the Hottentot race the most brutish and abominable of the human species.

THE Krosse, or skin of a sheep or wild beast, prepared with cow-dung and sheep's fat, Dress. and afterwards greased with butter or fat, fresh or stinking, according to the rank or wealth of the Hottentot, hangs, like a mantle over the shoulders, high or low, and open or closed e before, according to the seasons or customs of the tribe. The men, who have no covering but a composition of fat, foot, and dirt, in the most raging heats, wear cat or lamb-skin caps in cold and wet seasons. The face and fore part of the neck are always bare; and, the verenda excepted, which are covered with a Kull Krosse, or piece of wild beast skin, they go naked from the hips downwards. Leather stockings, and sandals cut out of the raw hides of elephants or oxen, are used occasionally, in driving their herds to pasture, or in passing sands or rocks. A greasy pouch hangs about their necks, with a knife, pipe, tobacco, Dacha, and a small piece of wood called Sufa, burnt at both ends against witchcraft. Three ivory rings adorn the left arm, to which, on journies, is fastened a bag of provisions. The Kirri and Rackum sticks are in the right hand, and another is carried in the left with a bushy f tail of a wild cat, fox, or other animal fastened to it for a handkerchief. The Honquers and captains, who were formerly distinguished only by fair skins of tigers or wild cats, appear at present at the head of the army, in councils, and on every solemn occasion, with brass crowns, and brass-headed canes. These ornaments were presented by the Dutch to the chiefs and captains of the nations in their alliance, and are now annexed to, descend with, and are esteemed an unalienable property and distinctive badge of, their dignity. The women, whose hair, like the men's, is short, woolly, and black, constantly wear caps made of the skins of wild animals, pointing spirally up from the crowns of their heads, and two Krosses, the lesser undermost; which being shaped and worn like those of the men, open, the fore part of the body appears naked down to the Pudenda; a wonderful broad and callous g excrescence growing above and flapping over the Pudenda, seems designed by nature to conceal those parts, which are always covered with a Kut Krosse, made of sheep-skin, stripped of the wool, and three times larger than the Kull Kroffe worn by the men; the posteriors are hid by a small Kroffe, fastened round the waist, which reaches below the hams, and their legs are encircled, from the knee to the ankle, with slips of leather, resembling one smooth continued swathe.

BOTH sexes are fond of ornaments; the men distinguish themselves by bladders of wild beasts, blown up and tied to the hair, which is powdered with buchu; and bits of brass plates, looking-glasses, and buttons, are intermixed; the rich add pieces of mother of pearl, which the Hottentots shape and polish in the most curious manner. Brass and glass beads are ornaments the most esteemed, and worn by both sexes in necklaces, bracelets, and girdles; the beads for the waist are stained with various colours. The ladies, whose wool is concealed by their caps, plaister their foreheads with grease and buchu, and make a red spot over each eye and cheek, upon the nose and chin. The bodies of both sexes, who hold the fat of fish in the utmost abhorrence, are besmeared from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot with fat, butter, and soot intermixed; and the rich display their luxury in the quantity of grease, their distinctive mark of quality and wealth.

THESE people, restrained by traditionary laws from the flesh of hogs, hares, rabbits, and fish without scales, eat in the most ravenous manner, when their humour or appetite calls, in the open air when fair, and within doors in windy or rainy weather. Hares and rabbits are allowed to the women, but the pure blood of beasts, and flesh of moles, are permitted only to men, who eat separate, the wedding-day excepted, when the bridegroom is indulged in eating with the women. Their food is the flesh and entrails of cattle, and other wild beasts, with fruits and roots of various kinds. These are gathered by the women, whose choice is directed by the hedgehog and Bavian ape. The Hottentots eat no sort of fruit or roots but those which these animals feed upon; and between the Anderfsmakens, or solemnities, no flesh but of cattle that die naturally, and of wild beasts or venison. The flesh and entrails are boiled in blood, and sometimes in milk, which, according to our author, would be extremely agreeable, but for the filthiness of the cooks. Lice are commonly eaten, and old shoes, made of raw hides of oxen or deer; the hair is singed off, when they are steeped in water, and broiled on the fire. No salt or spice is made use of in dressing Hottentot dishes, yet they devour with great avidity the salted and high-seasoned victuals of Europeans. The usual and ordinary drink is cows milk and water; ewes milk is permitted only to women: but both sexes, who are inexpressibly foolish and extravagant when drunk, are immoderate lovers of wine, brandy, and arrack; and their passion for tobacco, dacha, or wild hemp, and buspach, or a mixture of dacha and tobacco, and the root kanna, is without bounds.

Government.

THE chiefs, or Konquers, of each nation, who are hereditary, engage before instalment, which is performed in a solemn manner, to preserve the ancient form of government, the prerogatives and privileges of the Kraals and people. The command of the army, and conduct of negotiations of peace, are their province, who preside also in their councils, which are composed of the nobility, or captains of each Kraal, and collect the votes, the majority of which make the resolutions of these assemblies held at the residence of the chief. The captains of every Kraal equally engage not to alter the laws and customs of the Kraals. Their office is to preserve the peace, administer justice, and, in time of war, to command, under the chief, the troops of their several Kraals. All civil and criminal causes are heard and determined by them, state criminals excepted, who are tried by the chief, or Konquer, and the captains of every Kraal, assembled juridically<sup>1</sup>.

Hottentot Kraals, or villages.

THE Hottentot Kraals, or villages, consist of low huts like ovens, whose area is oval, about 14 feet diameter, ranged in a circle, built with sticks, and covered with mats made of flags and bulrushes, interwoven by the women, in the closest manner, when dried by the sun. The huts appertaining to the rich have two coverings; the uppermost is of skins, not penetrable by excessive heat or violent rain. None receive light but by the entrance, an arch about three feet high, and two broad, with a skin fastened to it to take up or let down, according to the serenity or inclemency of the weather. The generality of Kraals contain from three to four, and some five hundred inhabitants; the families consist of ten or twelve persons, young and old, who lie in separate holes dug round the huts; in the middle of each is a hole about a foot deep, for the fire-place. The furniture of these smoaky huts, not subject to fire, are a few pots for cooking and drinking, a few earthen vessels for milk and butter, with Kroffes, bows and arrows, Hassagayes, Kirri and Rackum sticks.

THERE is but one narrow entrance into a Kraal, whose area is green, and is the lodgment for calves and small cattle: the great are ranged round the Kraal on the outside, with their heads close to the huts, and tied two and two by the neck, to prevent straying: no watch is appointed to guard them from wild beasts, the cattle giving notice of the approaching enemy by a general lowing: an empty hut is preserved in every Kraal for calves and lambs a too weak to follow their dams, which are drove to pasture between six and seven in the morning, and back to the Kraal between five and six in the evening.

THE Hottentots, whose hearts are set upon their cattle, their only wealth, and sole objects of their care, who are extremely affected by the flourishing or declining condition of the herds; alternately drive and tend them to pasture, in proportion to the herds and number of men in the Kraal, where a single sheep belonging to the poorest Hottentot is guarded with equal care as those of the richest in the Kraal. The Backeleyers, a sort of fighting oxen, chosen by the most skilful Hottentot for that purpose, tamed and trained like elephants in Asiatic nations, for war, are of great use in the conduct of the herds, who bring and preserve stragglers within compass. These warriors know every inhabitant of the Kraal, and furiously run at and attack the Buschies, or robbers of cattle. The bulls and rams run with the cows and ewes the whole year: these the Hottentots geld when increased beyond the proportion of the herds, the bulls at one year, and the rams at half a year old. The bulls are thrown upon their backs, and their horns fixed in the ground, their legs are extended to the full stretch, by ropes fastened to stakes drove into the ground; the testicles are tied up in the bag as tight and close as possible, to stop all communication with the vessels above: the animal is then let loose in this condition, and the testicles rot off in time. The rams testicles are tied up in the same manner, but bruised to mash before set at liberty. Manner of gelding bulls and rams.

IN every Kraal is a physician, an officer called Suri, cowdoctor, and midwife, all elective, and without salary; a small present and entertainment, occasionally accepted, being their only perquisites. The health of the inhabitants is the province of the physician, whose practice is attended with surprising success, and who keeps his prescriptions and remedies inviolably secret. The Suri directs the religious, performs the marriage and funeral ceremonies, and is the operator in the custom of depriving the males of one testicle. The cow-doctor, who studies the disorders incident to, inspects and watches the health of the cattle. The midwife, chosen by the women, out of the most able in the Kraal, holds her office for life. Physicians.

THE operation on the male children, peculiar to Hottentot nations, who confessedly surpass in agility all others in the universe, induced Saar, Vogel, Tachart, Boeving, and most writers, to believe their surprising swiftness owing only to the excision of the testicle, and the original cause of the practice. Our author, notwithstanding the accounts of some Hottentots, who confirm this opinion, affirms the practice religious, asserting, the intelligent Hottentots, who keep with great secrecy the origin of their customs and ceremonies, to be quite frank when questioned on this point, and declare the observation a law, of the breach of which they have no memory, that has prevailed throughout all generations, That no man should have carnal knowledge of a woman before he is deprived of the left testicle: that, to secure the observance, the operation is performed on the children, when eight or nine years of age: that should a marriage be consummated previous to the excision, the man and woman would be exposed to the mercy of the chief, and the woman probably tore to pieces by her sex, who have a prevailing opinion, that a man with two testicles constantly begets twins. In treaties, therefore, of marriage, the friends of the contracting party, to avoid an immodest examination, certify and aver the operation <sup>m</sup>. Peculiar custom.

THE candidate for this state discovers his intention to his father, if living, and, in case of his death, to the next in authority of his kindred, whose approbation is absolutely necessary, who repairs with the youth to the father of the woman, and demands, in his name, the daughter in marriage: the mother is instantly consulted by the husband, who returns an immediate answer, seldom negative, unless the damsel is already contracted: in this case both depart directly. If the issue is favourable, and the youth is already made a man, according to the Hottentot ceremonial, two or three of the fattest oxen, in proportion to the figure of the family, are drove to the residence of the lady. The relations of both parties attend the nuptials, those of the bride receiving the relations of the bridegroom with the utmost civility; the oxen are killed; the whole company besmear their bodies with the fat and buchu, and the women, to appear more brilliant, daub their foreheads, cheeks, and chins, with red chalk. The nuptial ceremony approaching, the men and women squat themselves on the ground, in different circles, at a small distance from each other; the bridegroom squats himself in the center of the circle formed by the men. The Suri, or master of religious ceremonies, who is always the Suri of the bride's Kraal, enters the circle, and advancing to, pisses on, the bridegroom, who receives with great eagerness, and rubs the urine into the furrows of the fat with which he is covered, till the Suri returns from the woman's circle, where he performs the same ceremony over the bride, who receives the stream with equal respect. The ceremony ends with the stock of urine, and the following wishes, which are pronounced aloud by the Suri; May you live long and happily together; I wish you much joy; may you have a son before the end of the year; may this son prove a man of courage, and a good huntsman; may this son be a comfort to you in your old age. An entertain- Manner of courtship, and nuptial ceremony.

ment of feasting and dancing concludes this and every Hottentot solemnity; but it is remarkable that these people, the greatest lovers and admirers of music, should admit none in their marriage festivals. Polygamy is allowed; and marriages, upon satisfactory cause shewn to the Kraal, may be dissolved amongst Hottentots; a man who is divorced from his wife may marry again, but a woman divorced from her husband cannot; nor can first or second cousins intermarry; relations in these degrees of consanguinity, convicted of marriage or fornication, are cudgelled to death, without any regard to wealth or power; and adultery is also punished with death†.

Education of
youth.

THE Hottentot youths, who converse only with the women (not being permitted to speak to men, till summoned into their society, and made men) are instructed in the laws and customs of the ancient Hottentots by these female repositories of their opinions and traditions. On these solemnities the inhabitants assemble in the middle of the Kraal, where the men squat in a circle on the ground. The oldest Hottentot who proposes the youth's introduction into the assembly, receiving an unanimous assent, advances to the candidate, who sits squatted near by, but within five or six inches of the ground, and informs him of his admittance; that his thoughts, words, and actions, from that time, are to be manly; and that all conversation with his mother, which would banish and render him unworthy of the society of man, must subside for the future. The elder then pisses on the youth, who rubs the urine into the fat and foot with which his body is besmeared, while he pronounces aloud, Good fortune attend thee; live to old age; increase and multiply; may thy beard grow soon.

war.

HOTTENTOTS, like other nations, sensible of injuries, and keen in resentment, seek for redress in war, upon invasions of right, and national affronts. Every Hottentot, fired with revenge, flies to arms, and the place of rendezvous, whence deputies are dispatched, previous to acts of hostility, to remonstrate the injury, and demand satisfaction. Upon refusal or delay of justice, the armed nation marches in search of the enemy: the attack begins with the most frightful noise; showers of arrows are instantly discharged, the Hottentots continuing the battle in alternate sallies and retreats to the main body; when the Hassagayes are spent, throwing Rackum sticks and stones, for want of arrows, and warding off those of the enemy with the Kirri sticks, till the fortune of the day declares victory, which depends greatly on the judgment and conduct of the chief, in the direction of the time and place for driving on the Backeleyers. These animals stamp, kick, and gore with incredible fury and activity where-ever they break in and penetrate, and, if well followed by the men, speedily rout the enemy.

A BATTLE generally decides the war; a Hottentot army once routed never rallies. The conquerors triumph and pursue the flying enemy with astonishing roarings, shoutings, and exclamations. All prisoners are killed, and both armies bury their dead, which are never insulted or plundered.

DESERTERS and spies are immediately put to death. On treaties of peace, part are delivered up by the contending nations, and the rest pass the remainder of life in contempt and want.

THE Chamtover and Heikom nations are governed, during the battle, by a pipe like a flagelet, played upon by the chief. These people retreat and renew fighting as the pipe ceases or continues playing; and pursue in the same manner, or desist pursuing, the flying enemy.

THE Namaquan, Suffaquan, and Odiquan nations, fight with the utmost bravery, till acquainted that their loss is superior to that of the enemy, when they leave the field.

SEVERAL nations continue fighting while the general lives, whose custom is to conquer or die.

THE Damaquan and Gouriquan nations fight while their generals are in sight; and their armies always fly when the generals disappear or are slain.

THE Hottentots, who are esteemed the most religious observers of national faith, who fight with equal ardour and resolution to support, and never desert, the cause of their allies, keep up and perform mock battles in time of peace, in order to train the youth, and preserve the old in the practice of arms<sup>n</sup>.

hunting.

GENERAL hunts amongst Hottentots, fond of the flesh of wild beasts, and particularly that of tigers, take place in a scarcity of cattle, or when the neighbourhood is infested with those animals. The arms of chase and war are the same, and the whole Kraal is engaged in the pursuit, relieving each other with incredible speed and resolution, and exhibiting surprising activity and address in their attacks and engagements with lions, tigers, leopards, &c. They surround, if possible, those animals, by dividing into different parties, each avoiding the efforts and leapings of the beasts, raised to fury when galled by showers of arrows.

haves.

A HOTTENTOT who has encountered singly, and killed a lion, tiger, leopard, elephant, rhinoceros, &c. is esteemed and distinguished as an hero. Upon his return to the Kraal, he repairs to, and squats down in, his own hut, where an ancient Hottentot, deputed by the

- a Kraal, visits and compliments him in their name, at the same time giving notice of their expecting his coming to receive the honours due to his exploit. The hero rises upon the message being delivered, and attends the deputy to the middle of the Kraal, where he squats down on a mat, spread for the solemnity in the center of the men, who squat round him in a circle. The deputy then advances, who pronounces certain words, and pisses upon him from head to foot. The deputy afterwards lights a pipe of tobacco, and having smoked two or three whiffs, delivers it to be smoked out in turns by the assembly, and the ashes are scattered by the deputy on the hero, who instantly rises, the whole circle rising with him, and receives the personal compliments and thanks of the Kraal for the signal service rendered to his country. The ceremony finished, the hero returns to his hut, where he is three days
- b sumptuously entertained, at the expence of the Kraal, with the nicest rarities, and called out to no public action; nor is his wife admitted till the evening of the third day, when the hero receives the lady with the greatest marks of fondness and affection; a fat sheep is killed, and the neighbours are entertained, who congratulate the lady upon her being restored to the arms, and become a partner of her husband's glory. Every Hottentot enjoys the liberty of hunting, and pursuing his game throughout the Hottentot countries.

HOTTENTOTS fish in the sea and rivers, and many are fishermen by profession, who supply the Cape with rock-fish, or fish without scales, from which they are restrained by law. Manner of fishing. They are esteemed extremely dexterous by Europeans in casting and drawing nets, angle well, and take fish with the spear, or pointed rod, and by groping or tickling. Their fish-

c hooks are European; the spear is used in rivers and creeks, where they wade, higher than the middle frequently, and treading upon the fish, pierce and bring them up with the spear. In shallow water they take fish with their hands, and grope in creeks and basins formed by nature on the tops of the rocks near the shore, upon the fall of tides. The Hottentots, who fish from the rocks with lines made of guts or beasts sinews, baited with muscles, whistle upon the discovery of a valuable fish, and shout if the whistling is drowned by the roar of the sea, which allures and brings great shoals of fish round the baits.

The Hottentots swim from the shore to the rocks and back again, loaded with fish. Their Excellent manner of swimming is extremely surprising; they swim erect, with their necks out of swimmers. water, and balance themselves with their arms, extended upwards, and rise and fall with d the waves in raging seas, without apprehension, in great cheerfulness and security, and seem, when swimming, to walk upon firm ground.

THEIR butchers, who observe near the same method in killing great and small cattle, Butchers. proceed anatomically in the dissection and separation of the parts of slain animals. The flesh, bones, membranes, muscles, veins, arteries, &c. are parted and entire, in a surprising shortness of time; yet the deaths of the animals are lingering and shocking to Europeans. The sheep is stretched with the back on the ground, two persons hold the hind and fore feet which are tied extended, and a third, having ripped up the belly, tears with one hand the guts from the carcase, and stirring the blood with the other, to prevent congealing, avoids, with great exactness, the breaking of the blood-vessels about the heart<sup>p</sup>.

e THE horns of great cattle, thrown likewise on their backs, are fixed in the ground, and the legs, stretched to the full length, are fastened to stakes. The physicians, who are surgeons also, are generally present, and attentive to the motion of the heart. Every part but the excrement is made use of; and the bones, which are curiously extracted from the flesh, might be quickly reared into perfect skeletons.

THE reeking sheep skins are rubbed with fat only, if dressed for a stranger, and with fresh cow dung and fat alternately, still black and stinking, for a native. The hides are tanned by rubbing wood ashes into the hair, which they sprinkle afterwards with water, and lay, rolled up, two days in the sea.

f THE skimmers or taylor's instruments for sewing, are a bone of a bird, for an awl, split Skinner and taylor. sinews or veins of the back-bones of cattle, dried in the sun, for thread, and a knife for shaping the krosses, and cutting the hides into strops. These strops are of great use in Hottentot œconomy.

THE ivory-workers make ornamental rings for the arms: a knife is the only tool; and Ivory workers. the rings, when finished, are as round, smooth, and bright, as the most expert European can produce.

THE mat-makers are mostly women, and weave with their fingers only. Neither light, Mat-makers. wind, or rain, penetrates their work. The mats are used for covering huts, and are made of flags, reeds, and bulrushes, dried in the sun.

HOTTENTOT ropes, made of the same materials, are equally strong, neat, and durable, Rope-makers. as the best European made of hemp. The flags, reeds, &c. are twisted separately into small strings, and tied afterwards to the length of four yards; these lengths are twisted one round

another, to the thickness of an inch and a quarter. Though the rope-makers have no tools a but their hands, frequent experiments have been made on the strength of these four yard ropes in length, and inch and quarter thick, which no pair of oxen could ever break.

Potters.

ALL Hottentots are potters, and make their earthen vessels of the mould of ant hills, first cleared of sand and gravel, and kneaded well afterwards with bruised and incorporated ant-eggs. They beat upon a flat stone, fashion and smooth with their hands the mould or clay in the form of a Roman urn, and leave it two days in the sun; then place it in the oven or hole in the ground, of the depth of the pot, and thrice larger in circumference, with a quick fire round and over it, that burns out of itself. A cement runs from the ant-eggs in the burning, which spreads through the whole, and binds the matter to a surprising firmness, giving it a jet black colour, which never changes. b Smiths.

THE smiths, who are ingenious and work hard, melt iron from the ore, in holes dug upon rising ground, in proportion to the intended quantity. The hole is heated properly before the ore is put in, when a large fire is made and kept up till the iron melts, and runs through a narrow chanel into another hole, or receiver, dug upon the descent, at the distance of a foot and a half.

THE cold iron is broke into pieces with stones, and heated again in other fires, when wanted for use, the smiths have no hammer but a roundish stone, with which they beat and shape the iron into weapons, upon the hardest flat stone, and upon this grind and polish in the neatest manner. Their work is valuable for beauty and service.

THE copper ore is melted in the same manner; and the shaping and polishing of copper c trinkets is equally beautiful and surprising.

VOCAL and instrumental music are in great esteem among Hottentots; the musical instruments are the grand and lesser Gom-gom, the Potdrum, and pipe. The lesser Gom-gom is a bow made of iron or olive-wood, strung with twisted sheeps guts or sinews, with the barrel of a split quill fixed at one end, through which the string runs: the quill is put to the mouth of the performer, whose various modulations of breath direct the different notes of the Gom-gom. The grand Gom-gom is made by running the string through two holes near the brim of a cocoa-nut, prepared and sawed in the manner of a hanging-cup, with the mouth upwards. The performer on this instrument varies the sound, by moving the shell nearer or farther from the quill, kept close to his mouth. There is a softness, with charms for d a delicate ear, according to our author, in a concert of three or four Gom-goms, played by skilful performers; who likewise believes the grand Gom-gom worthy of the study of the most judicious European musician. The pipe is an instrument played upon by the chiefs in time of battle. The Potdrum, resembling a Roman urn, is covered on the top with a smooth dressed sheep skin, tightly braced on with sinews and sheeps guts, like a kettle-drum. This instrument is peculiar to the ladies, who, with their fingers, play but one tune upon it of a few notes<sup>1</sup>.

THE vocal music consists of the monosyllable Ho, sung by both sexes, on religious ceremonies, in concert with the Gom-goms.

Manner of dancing.

ON the making of Sam-sam, or peace, and other public rejoicings, the inhabitants of a e Kraal dance in turns; and when all have danced, the ceremony breaks up. The men and women dance in couples together, two couples at a time; they begin face to face, at the distance of ten paces from each other, sometimes meeting, and at others back to back, and never take hold of each other's hands. Every dance takes up an hour: both sexes are surprisingly active, cutting clean and high capers. During the dance the women keep their heads in their bosoms in a manner, and their eyes fixed on the ground<sup>1</sup>.

THE Hottentots have no money, nor idea of the utility or value of coin, some few excepted, who are neighbours to, and by conversation with, the Dutch, have some notion of the small pieces; but which, as soon as possessed of, they part with for other commodities. Cattle are the riches, and the chief and capital produce of the country; and barter is the established f method of traffick.

Trade.

THESE people, who trade among themselves for cattle, armour, and other goods, which they have purchased by traffick or labour from Europeans, get considerable returns of cattle by European commodities, which they barter with Europeans, receiving in exchange for cattle, elephants teeth, ostrich eggs, skins of wild beasts, horses and asses, wine, brandy, tobacco and pipes, dacha, beads, fish-hooks, small looking-glasses, knives, iron, bits of polished glass, brass and copper, brass ear-rings, and sometimes Kanna root. The Europeans, who are more expert in finding, make a great advantage of this root, extremely scarce, and highly valued; ornamental and rich manufactures for apparel, and useful furniture, are in no esteem, and of no value amongst Hottentots. g

THEY trade in the most friendly and upright manner; the proportion observed by the way of price, in exchanging cattle for European effects, rises and falls amongst them, as in

- a other countries, according to the scarcity or plenty, greater or lesser demand, of commodities. Their dearest rate is a cheapness almost incredible; one pound of tobacco purchases a fat ox; half a pound a large sheep; and a quarter of a pound a fat lamb.

THE Hottentots, who formerly brought droves of cattle to market at the Cape, being under other regulations, bring none now, but what are presents to the governor; and are believed by the Dutch to have another market for their elephants teeth, and to trade with the people of Terra do Natal, and the Mosambic Portuguese; their own consumption in ivory rings, and the small quantity brought to the Dutch by neighbouring Hottentots only, bearing no proportion to the vast numbers of elephants killed annually.

- b THE Dutch travel with a Hottentot attendant; and the natives, though no instance has been known of an European's being murdered, are obliged, if an European dies amongst them, for the safety of travellers, to give a satisfactory account, that his death was natural<sup>a</sup>.

THE great secrecy with which Hottentots conceal their religious opinions and ceremonies from Europeans, and the many superficial and contradictory accounts, published before the histories of Saar, Tachart, and Kolben, rendered their faith uncertain, who acknowledge and firmly believe that there is a God, Almighty, whom they call Gounja-Gounja, or Gounja Tinquoa, or God of gods, the Governor of the world, endued with unsearchable attributes and perfections, who made heaven and earth, the sun, and every thing in them; who, dwelling far above the moon, causes thunder and rain, and provides food for bodily sustenance, and skins of beasts for apparel<sup>c</sup>.

- c NOTWITHSTANDING this profession and belief of the most intelligent Hottentots, who celebrate every signal event of life with previous offerings and solemnities, there is no festival or institution of worship amongst them, directly regarding the true God.

THE moon, named Gounja, an inferior and visible god, the subject and representative of the High and Invisible, is constantly adored and invoked at the full and change. Milk and flesh are offered to this deity, and the whole night is spent in alternate prostrations, dancing, singing, and loud exclamations of Muffoke Atze, or I salute you, you are welcome; and Choraquâ Kakâ choriounquâ, or grant us fodder enough for our cattle, and milk in abundance.

- d THEY adore likewise, and honour with the highest veneration, a small winged insect; with two horns upon the head, peculiar to Hottentot countries, with a green back and belly, speckled with red and white. Upon the arrival of this winged animal, or benign deity, regarded as the lord of the universe, the whole Kraal is covered with buchu, two fat sheep are killed in thanksgiving, and the inhabitants, believing all past offences purged, and buried in oblivion, resolve, as a new people, on a reformation of life; who believing the immortality of the soul, though strangers to a preparation for death, in a spiritual sense, offer prayers and praises to good persons deceased; leaving, in the removal of Kraals, for the quiet of departed spirits, their huts standing, and their furniture and apparel untouched, in the persuasion of their return to the places where they died, and that they are never troublesome to the Kraal unless their property is stolen or carried off.

- e THE person of either sex, on whom this insect accidentally falls, is ever afterwards distinguished and respected as sacred, and a favourite of this deity: the neighbours glory, and proclaim the honour done to the Kraal; the fattest ox is killed, as a thanksgiving offering; and the favourite, to whom the entrails are presented, is obliged to wear about his neck the caul, twisted like a rope, and powdered with buchu, till it rots off, and to anoint his body with the fat only of that ox till consumed.

- f THESE people, who perpetuate a religious veneration of their sacred and renowned companions, by consecrating woods, mountains, fields, and rivers, to their memory, who stop, and, veiling their heads, contemplate, in these places, the virtues, and implore for themselves and cattle the protection, of departed spirits, worship an evil deity, the father of mischief, called Touquon, an inferior and crabbed captain, in their opinion, mischievously restless in regard to Hottentots, the source of plagues, and author of witchcraft, arbitrary in declaring offences, and, on that account, honoured of Hottentots, who, in continual apprehension of his designs, yet ignorant of having offended, sacrifice a fat ox or sheep, believing him appeased and reconciled, when they have regaled themselves with the flesh, and anointed their bodies with the fat of the sheep or slain ox.

- g ANOTHER custom of sprinkling their bodies with sea or river water, when they intend to pass or enter either, is punctually observed and performed, with great sedateness and composure of mind, by Hottentots, who have adapted, since the arrival of the Dutch, and appropriated the term Andersmaken, or alter for the better, to all religious ceremonies and acts; and the Dutch word Andersmaken is the only answer given by Hottentots to European enquirers into the origin and sense of their institutions; who, wrapped in sullen silence, and deaf to reason on the important point of religion, remain the most obstinate, prejudiced, and infatuated.

tuated people, knowing but little of God, and having less inclination to serve him; who, the most sensible amongst them say, cursed their first parents, who had grievously sinned and offended, and all their posterity, with hardness of heart; who, according to another tradition which prevails, and is carefully preserved throughout the different nations, were sent by God himself, and came into their country through a window; that the man's name was Nób, and the woman's Hingnób, who taught their descendants to do many things, and keep cattle.

RELATIONS and friends surround the dying Hottentots, clapping their hands, crying, screaming, and roaring, in a hideous manner. The corpse of the deceased is immediately wrapped in a Krosse, and, within six hours, buried in a hole, made by a wild beast, in the ground, or in a cleft of a rock. The men and women of the Kraal assemble, and squat in different circles, crying out and repeating, Bo, Bo, Bo, or father, in a mournful strain. When the corpse is brought out through the side of the hut, which is always uncovered in funeral solemnities, the captain of the Kraal, or the relations, name the bearers, who carry the deceased in their arms, and both circles rising, the men and the women, making grimaces, clapping hands, distorting their bodies, and incessantly repeating Bo, Bo, Bo, march in two bodies, and attend the corpse to the grave; which is immediately filled up, after the corpse is laid down, with the mould of ant-hills, stones, and pieces of wood.

THE grave being filled, the company returns to the Kraal, and again squat down; both circles renew, and again cry out Bo, Bo, Bo, Bororo Rhodo Atscha, frequently calling the deceased by his name, and an hour is consumed in alternate startings, grimaces, distorted postures, and clapping of hands. Silence proclaimed, two ancients, friends to the deceased, piss upon the company, who receive the urine with great veneration. The ancients afterwards enter the hut by the door, and, each taking a handful of ashes, return by the passage opened for the corpse, and strew it upon the company, which are held in great esteem. After this ceremony, the circles rise and retire.

IN funerals of persons of rank or esteem in the Kraal, the lamentations continue seven or eight days. The Hottentots piss by way of ceremony, and scatter ashes, to remind the company of their future estate; who, without distinction of age or wealth, must all be reduced to dust and ashes.

THE cauls of sheep, killed at Andersmakens, and powdered with buchu, are worn as mourning, by the heirs and relations of rich Hottentots, till they rot off, however offensive; and the poor mourn their deceased friends by shaving part of their heads, which they cover with buchu.

S E C T. II.

War between the Hottentots and Dutch.

THE Gunjeman or Goringhaiquan nation, who had consented to the introduction, and given the Dutch possession of the Cape, upon their division of the lands for tillage, and erection of buildings for their dwellings and defence, grew jealous of future encroachments; and having called the neighbouring nations to their assistance, made war against the Dutch, who had refused to desist. The Dutch gained many victories during the war, which the Hottentots supported with great resolution; but the terror of their arms having spread through the Hottentot nations, dismayed by the vast effusion of blood, the Gunjemans and confederates sued for peace, and a solemn convention was entered into by both parties, whereby the first bargain was confirmed, and the unoccupied lands of all the confederates were surrendered and assigned to the Dutch, with this salvo to the confederacy, that the whole should be at liberty to settle on what ground, and in what part of the country, they pleased, that should be found unemployed; and most of the Hottentot nations came into an offensive and defensive alliance with the Dutch against all enemies whatever; which, though made by words only, has subsisted ever since, and been religiously observed on both sides; the Dutch governors continuing, as instructed, to cultivate all possible friendship with their allies, and the Hottentot chiefs waiting on the governors with presents for the renewal of peace.

Doman and Garabinga.

A FURIOUS war broke out in 1659, between the proprietors of the Cape, or Goringhaiquan nation, assisted by the Gorachobuan, and the Dutch, who were greatly annoyed and distressed; the Hottentots making their attacks in foggy and rainy weather, on account of their fire-arms. A Hottentot, named Doman by the Dutch, who had lived four or five years at Batavia, and some time at the Cape, where he dressed in the European manner, having returned to his countrymen, perfectly instructed in European customs, appeared with a companion, whose name was Garabinga, or flat nose, the most animating, resolute, and courageous amongst the Hottentots, the many contrivances and attempts to surprize them,

- a proved vain and ineffectual; Doman escaped being taken, by swimming cross a river, after a smart engagement, which happened between five Hottentots and an equal number of Europeans; but Eycamma being wounded, and his leg broke, was made prisoner. This Hottentot, to whom the utmost civility had been shewn, and the greatest care taken of his wounds, answered the Dutch in great wrath, who had asked the motives of the war, Who desired you, Dutchmen, to grub up our lands, and sow corn in our pastures? By what right do you seize the inheritance of our fathers, our country that has belonged to us time immemorial? You, who were permitted to land only for your refreshment in your necessity, dispose of our property, as sovereigns, and daily prohibit our approach to the lands you think proper: Would you suffer the like treatment in your own country? The Dutch, by advice of Eycamma, who, just before
- b his death, had declared himself a private person, sent four deputies to propose a conference, and to endeavour to bring the chief to the fort; but the chief, whose name was Gogoso, an extremely corpulent man, according to an account published in 1662, and an hundred years old, who had two sons, Osinghaicamma and Otegnoa, refused the proposal, and the war was vigorously carried on near a year, when a most fortunate accident put an end to the slaughter and ravage made by the Hottentots <sup>b</sup>.

to seize the ropes, with which they had been instructed to draw off the cannon : the Hottentots were extended in two lines all the length of the ropes, and full in the range of the shot, when the cannon was suddenly discharged, and made a most terrible slaughter. Those who escaped fled in the wildest confusion ; and the Portuguese, who in this manner took their leave of the Cape, were left to embark at their leisure.

THERE are no accounts of Europeans having frequented the Cape from this time till the Dutch company of merchant-adventurers, then called the Far-trading, and since the East India company, in 1600, touched and began to trade at the Cape for provisions, and erected a fort, whose remains are yet to be seen, to protect themselves, and their purchases ; but, however acquainted with the advantages, they made no other use of the Cape, than providing every captain of a ship bound for India with a square stone, on which the ship's, the captain's, and the names of the principal officers, with the day of their departure from the Cape, were ordered to be cut, and buried in a particular place near the fort, with a tin box underneath, containing letters, to be conveyed to Europe by the first ship that touched at the Cape, in her return from India. In 1650 Van Riebeck, surgeon of a ship, that put into the Cape for the usual purposes, observing the richness of the soil, the great plenty of cattle, disposition of the natives, and importance of the situation and harbour, judged a settlement adviseable, to facilitate, improve, and secure the East India trade.

A fleet sent by the Dutch to make a settlement.

VAN RIEBECK, on his return, laid before the directors what he had digested for the purpose ; who resolved on a settlement, and immediately ordered four ships to be properly equipped for such an expedition. Van Riebeck was appointed admiral and governor in chief on his arrival at the Cape, with full power to establish a settlement in what manner he should judge expedient.

VAN RIEBECK arrived safe at the Cape, and no sooner proposed than concluded a treaty. The natives, charmed with the brass toys, beads, tobacco, and brandy, with which he presented them, stipulated and agreed, that the Dutch should have full liberty to settle in the valley of Table-Hill, upon the delivery of a quantity of those toys and commodities, amounting in value to 50,000 guilders. This was performed without delay, and the Dutch took immediate possession of the Cape, which was surrendered to them with great solemnity. Van Riebeck erected a square fort, containing lodgings, warehouses, and an hospital for the sick, and raised outworks and batteries to secure the settlement from all attacks.

THE company, informed of their success, published placards for the encouragement of settlers : the conditions being advantageous, numbers embarked for the Cape, and the settlement soon made a considerable figure, continually extending new colonies along the coast, as it increased in number by new settlers arriving from Europe ; and there are at present four principal colonies. The first is at the Cape, where are the great forts and capital city, called the Cape ; the second is called the Hellen bogijsb ; the third, the Drakensten ; and the fourth, the Waverijsb. The whole tract of land called Terra do Natal, has been since purchased, for a future increase, by the company, for fifty thousand guilders, to be paid in toys and other commodities. By this addition the province is become of great extent, and the government considerable.

Terra do Natal purchased by the company.

The Cape colony.

THE Dutch soon extended themselves beyond the valley of Table-Hill, purchased great numbers of cattle from the Hottentots, and erected a wooden fort near the Salt river ; a continual guard was appointed to prevent strays or intermixture with the Hottentot herds, and a guard-house was built for entertaining a hundred and ninety horsemen, to be ready to mount in pursuit of run-away cattle, and to oppose any hostile attempt on the part of the Hottentots. The fort became useless, and soon decayed, when the colony extended beyond the Salt river ; part of the guard-house still remains, and is converted into a prison for criminals in the Indian settlements. There were several Indian princes confined therein, who had been banished by the government of Batavia. And our author relates, that these princes were obliged to support themselves by their own labour, during an exile of five years.

GOVERNOR Simon Vander Stel * attempted, for the security of shipping, a canal, four German miles long, to be cut from the Salt river to the bay Falso, and a great progress was made ; but, finding that both monsoons must choak it with sand, the works were discontinued, and the remains are now called The new Salt River.

New castle built by Bax.

THE fortrefs called Good Hope, and the Cape Town, are situated in the Table Valley ; the fort built by Van Riebeck stood a considerable time in the government of Bax, when this governor apprehending, from the great increase of settlers, and improvement in trade, that some European power might attack the settlement ; and, judging a new castle and stronger garrison necessary for the defence, and that the old warehouses were too small for the growing trade, transmitted to the directors in Europe the state of the Cape, who, approving of the representation and proposal for fortifying the Cape, dispatched full powers for erecting a new fort, in such place and model as Bax should judge expedient. Bax, in three years,

a finished a spacious, commodious, and strong fortress; governor Adrian Vander Stel made several additions to it, and it is at present an exceeding strong and stately building, of large compass, and provided with necessary accommodations for a numerous garrison, completely covering the harbour, and of great defence towards the land: the governor and chief officers have magnificent apartments, and the company's warehouses are large, handsome, and commodious.

b CAPE TOWN is large and regularly built, with spacious streets, and contains upwards of Cape Town; two hundred houses, many are stately and magnificent, with large courts before, and gardens behind; most one, and none above two stories high; built with stone, and plentifully supplied with water, by a stream that falls from Table Hill, which turning a mill at the foot of the hill, runs through large pipes into a square, and from thence, between the town and fortress, into the sea. There is a row of houses on the river, with beautiful gardens, vineyards, and corn fields, farmed by the chief burgomasters at 1500 florins a year, payable to the town treasury. Building is greatly encouraged contiguous to the town, and in the country; the company gives gratis, sufficient land for house, court-yard, out-houses, and gardens. All houses that are sold are charged with a ground-rent, proportioned to the rent they would let at; if new, the 10th or 20th penny is paid, and if old, the 40th. Officers are appointed with salaries, to inspect chimneys, in order to prevent fire; neglect of duty is severely punished, and sailors and Hottentots are prohibited smoking in the streets.

c THE present government of Cape Town and this extended settlement, stands upon eight establishments, instituted by Riebeck and succeeding governors: the Grand Council, Court of Justice, Petty Court, Marriage Court, Orphan Chamber, and Ecclesiastical Council, a Common Council, and Board of Militia. Government of the town and colony.

THE Grand Council consists of the governor, who is president, with a double vote, and eight principal officers in the company's service. This college of policy is the company's representative, and the interest of the settlement is their province. They direct trade and navigation, make war and peace with the Hottentots, and correspond with the directors in Holland, and the governors of Batavia and Ceylon. Registers of transactions, with all letters and copies of dispatches, are kept by the secretary. The garrison pays martial salutes to the members of this council at their entering or going out of the fort. Grand Council.

d THE Court of Justice, generally composed of the members of the grand council, hear and determine all civil and criminal causes of moment. Where one party is servant to the company, to avoid partiality, three regent burgomasters, magistrates at the Cape, have seats, and assist the court; these are annually chosen amongst the inhabitants not in the service. Appeals lie in the first instance to the court at Batavia, and from thence to the supreme court in Holland, the last resource. Appellants are obliged to a deposit of one hundred florins, to be lodged where directed by the court, till final judgment is obtained; which is then paid or returned, as the judgment is affirmed or reversed. Court of Justice.

e THE Petty Court, at present dependent on the court of justice, takes cognizance of breaches of the peace, trespasses, and small debts, and is composed of a member of the grand council, who presides, and reports the proceedings to the council, of three burghers, and four immediate servants to the company. A burgher is vice-president, and the clerk of the court one of the servants. The president and members are chosen biennially by the grand council, two or three of the fitting members being always re-chosen, for the instruction of the new-elected in the practice of, and proceedings before, the court. Copies of all proceedings, sentences, and decrees, of this and the court of justice, are transmitted by the grand council to Holland. Petty Court.

f THE Marriage Court inspects the legality, before celebration of marriage contracts, and issues warrants to the pastors, authorising the publication of banns. This court is generally held at the castle. Previous to any examination in this court, the parties are obliged to a personal joint appearance, to ask the consent of the governor; who gives to the man his mandate to the court, directing proper inquiries to be made concerning the parties, and signifying therein his conditional assent, provided the court finds no cause to the contrary. Marriage Court.

SEVEN persons administer the affairs and interests of the Court of Orphans, the vice-president of the grand council presiding in this chamber; three of the company's servants, and three burghers are chosen biennially into this trust. A burgher is generally vice-president; the secretary, who takes the minutes of the proceedings, and registers the transactions, is always in the company's service, with a salary and perquisites. No orphan can marry at the Cape under the age of twenty-five years, without the consent of this chamber. Orphan Court.

g THE Ecclesiastical Council, instituted for the government of the reformed churches at the Cape, is composed of the pastors, elders, and overseers of the poor, in each parish, who finally decree the temporal and spiritual concerns of the three churches; and the offices and ceremonies in the worship of God are altered, diminished, and augmented, by the decrees of this council. The surplus of collections is applied to charitable uses, repairs of the church, and maintenance of schools. The debates and resolutions of this council are registered, and Ecclesiastical Court.

at all times may be perused by any persons. There are occasional church councils held in each parish. These councils consist of a considerable parishioner, the pastor, elders, and overseers of the parish; half of the members are burghers, half servants to the company, and the pastor is always reckoned one of the last.

Court of Common Council.

UPON the great increase of the colony by French refugees, governor Simon Vander Stel established a court of Common Council in each colony, to be chosen biennially by the grand council, out of lists to be prepared and presented by the burghers. This council has no authority at Cape Town, the whole business being transacted by the civil courts above-named. Petitions are indeed presented by them in behalf of, and they collect the taxes laid upon, the burghers, by the grand council. The three regent burghers, who have seats in the council of justice, are magistrates of weight and respect; and the common council is of great authority in the courts of other colonies: the Landroft, or lieutenant of each colony, presides in the assemblies wherein debts, trespasses, and all matters not exceeding 150 florins, are heard and determined: most crimes are punished by the councils in whose jurisdiction they were committed.

Horse and foot militia instituted.

SIMON VANDER STEL, upon the arrival of the refugees, instituted a horse and foot militia; and for their government erected two boards, each with two commissioners and secretary. A member of the grand council presides at the board for and in Cape Town. The other members are the principal military officers of the Cape colony. The Landroft of Stellenbosch is president of this board, and the other members are the principal officers of the united militia of Stellenbosch and Drakenstein colonies. The militia is employed in the pursuit of run-away slaves, or on hostile appearances from the Hottentots, and annually mustered.

Table Hill, its situation and height.

THE three hills which form the Table Valley are called the Table Hill, Lion Hill, and Wind or Devil's Hill. The Table Hill, called by the Portuguese Taboa do Cabo, or the Cape Table, bearing south from the center of the valley, and extending something to south-west, is 1857 feet high: on the top are several springs of water, clear as crystal, and of a delightful taste. The summit, resembling the leaf of a table, appears at a distance level and smooth, but is uneven and craggy. In the middle is a large chasm, or rent, observed to increase in rainy seasons, and believed to have been made by the violent currents from the top, which wash down great quantities of earth. Stately trees grow in this chasm; and the hill, in appearance rough and barren, is extremely fruitful. There are two gardens, called Paradise and Hell, between which a silver mine was discovered; but the ore transported to Holland not yielding sufficient silver to answer the working, the mine was closed and neglected. A white cloud hovers over this hill during the dry season, from September to March, and frequently in other months: from this cloud issue the south-east winds with incredible fury, shattering houses, endangering shipping, and greatly damaging the fruits of the earth. Upon discovering this cloud, the sailors instantly cry out, the table is covered, prepare for the storm, and work with as much activity as if it was begun<sup>d</sup>.

Lion Hill.

THE Lion Hill, contiguous to the sea, extending northward, and bearing west from the center of the valley, is separated from the Table Hill by a small chasm, called Kloof by the Dutch. In this Kloof two centinels are placed, to give notice of shipping making into the harbour; the smallest vessel may be discovered from the top of this steep hill, which is partly ascended by rope ladders, at the distance of twelve leagues. Upon the discovery of a sail the centinel in the head makes a signal to his comrade to set out immediately and inform the officers: if more appear, the flag is dropped, and a gun fired for every sail, which is accordingly reported. The proper officers are always prepared by this method to receive the approaching vessels<sup>e</sup>.

THE republic or prince's flag is always hoisted to Dutch ships on their voyage to India, and two flags with devices to all ships returning to Holland. These flags for returning ships are annually changed by the directors in Holland, and sent to the Cape, with exact copies drawn upon paper for the governor general of Batavia, who distributes them to the commanders of returning ships. These commanders are to conclude, in case the devices at the Cape disagree with their copies, or if no flag should appear, that the Cape is possessed by an enemy, to steer away immediately, and make the best of their way to Holland. The prince's flag is hoisted, and a gun fired, at Robin Eylan, at the mouth of the harbour, for every ship sailing by, or standing in.

Not far from the Kloof is a large tract of fine meadows, and another beyond the hill, at present common pastures for the neighbouring cattle, but capable of great improvement, the soil being extremely rich, and no scarcity of water.

SIMON VANDER STEL erected upon a creek at the foot of this hill a small fort of four guns, to prevent clandestine trade, and for the better security of the harbour against enemies; who under cover of the fogs, which are frequent in the months of June and July,

THE Wind Hill, so named in wills, conveyances, and records, and vulgarly Devil's Hill, Wind Hill. extending, like the Lion Hill, to the sea, is lower and narrower than the Table, or Lion Hill, abounds in excellent pastures, with an extensive view over seats, gardens, and vineyards, as far as the Salt River, Tyger Hills, and adjacent deserts <sup>f</sup>.

- b THERE are several beautiful seats, vineyards, and gardens, on every side of Table Hill, Round Bush and Newland Gardens which surpasses all in number and delicacy of springs. Round Bush and Newland Gardens belong to the company; a magnificent pleasure-house for the governor was erected in the first, at the company's expence; both are well watered, and yield a considerable revenue. Most sorts of European, Persian, and vines from other countries, the Japan apple, with the most esteemed fruits, have been transplanted into these gardens, which the Cape soil and climate brings to the highest perfection. Between these gardens is an estate, called, for its fertility, Bread and wine; and a brewhouse in the neighbourhood, well supplied with water, erected by Jacob Lonwen, who was transported with his family, at the company's expence, to introduce the Deventer method of brewing. The several currents of springs on the Salt River side, uniting at the bottom of the hill, run in a strong stream into that river.

- c NEAR this hill stands a delightful seat erected by Simon Vander Stel, called Constantia, in Constantia built by Simon Vander Stel. honour of his lady's name, commanding the most extensive prospect over this improved country, and Table Bay. In the way to Constantia is a rough stony road, leading over high and craggy mountains to Wood Bay: this wood is never cut down but in times of necessity; wood being scarce and valuable at the Cape. The company had several settlements in this country for raising cattle, which, being too expensive, were all sold; and all their demands have been supplied ever since by four licensed slaughter houses. In this quarter is a large tract of land, three days journey round, which governor Vander Stel had appropriated to himself and family, and erected a magnificent seat and elegant stabling.

- d THE adjacent hills called Tyger Hills, from a coloured appearance, and spotted like the Tyger Hills. skins of those animals, are the most fertile about the Cape; the lands are all cultivated, excepting one small tract, in which is a spring, which, in dry seasons, supplies with water the neighbouring planters, and therefore not granted out by the company. These hills, formerly the haunts of deer, are said to owe their fertility to the droppings of those animals; and it is remarkable that all places frequented by deer surpass all others in fertility. There are twenty-two seats and estates, divided into corn-fields, vineyards, gardens, and meadow grounds, on these hills; the settlers are esteemed but middling, whose stocks consist of no more than 600 sheep and 100 large cattle; to be denominated considerable requires a stock of 1000 sheep, and two or three hundred large cattle; and there are settlers who are possessed of 1000 sheep and 1000 large cattle. The Cape settlement was supplied in the beginning with horses from Persia, whose breed is extremely increased, and the price greatly reduced, three beautiful strong horses being sold at an auction for eighteen Dutch schellings. The farthest of these hills, which are eight leagues in circumference, is four leagues distant from the Cape.

e THE Cow Hill, about six leagues from the Cape, beyond the Tyger Hills, was next cultivated. There is no good water, the soil is poor, and the inhabitants but few. Cow Hill.

THE Blue Mountain, so called from a bluish appearance at a distance, is about eight Blue Mountain. leagues from the Cape, and was next settled. The soil is equally fertile with those of the Tyger Hills, but, through scarcity of water, thinly inhabited. Elephants and deer furnish the settlers with wholesome and delicious provisions, and they gain considerably by their hides and skins.

- f IN the year 1712 this colony, divided from Stellenbosch settlement by a large desert bordering on Cape Town, was extended by the grand council as far as Musshellbank River, a conflux only of rain water, forming a stream by the currents of adjacent mountains, uniting in this chanel, which run into Salt Water River, and thence into the sea. The source of this river, Salt Water River. which receives several rivulets, and waters in its course many gardens and vineyards, and particularly Round Bush Garden, belonging to the company, is on the summit of Table Hill: the water is clear and wholesome, and brackish only by the mixture of the sea-water at high tides, which gives it the name of Salt Water River.

- g THE waters of the Table, Lion, and Wind Hills, and adjacent vallies, have different colours Different colours and tastes of waters. and tastes, are cold and warm, heavy and light. Those whose springs are on the summits of mountains, are white and clear; the brightness increases in the rapid descents over flints and pebbles; and are extremely sweet and wholesome. Those whose descent is less rapid, and run over pebbles and flints more contracted, are of a dark red, the colour of iron stones. The waters of the rivulet flowing from the stone hills, through Buffalo Valley, into the Sand Valley, and from thence into Table Bay, are of this colour. Many are blackish, from the earth and mud through which they run ; such are the waters of a rivulet flowing by Stellenbosch, a and of another running beyond Stellenbosch, out of Mottergate into Stellenbosch River.

MOST river waters preserve the sweetness of the spring throughout their course ; others lose the spring sweetness, whiteness, clearness, and become brackish, and some their liquidity. The remains of these waters are the finest salt. Some are brackish, yet palatable, at their sources, which, by standing, become too brackish for drinking ; the springs of the Tyger hills and vallies are of this kind. The waters that fall rapidly from hills, and run through chanel's never penetrated by the sun-beams, are extremely cold, and retain the coldness though kept in vessels. There are other waters that are warm and sometimes hot, and two warm baths about thirty miles from the Cape.

THE waters about the Cape are esteemed beneficial in every case ; European physicians b recommend them preferably to wine, brandy, and all strong liquors ; and their credit is so high at the court of Denmark, where they are esteemed the brightest, sweetest, and most wholesome in the world, that every Danish royal ship, returning to Europe, is ordered to touch at the Cape for a large cask of spring water for his Danish majesty.

BEYOND the Stone Hills are several springs that water the adjacent country. In one of these hills is a stone quarry, discovered by Vander Stel, little inferior to marble, and made use of for stair-cases and floors.

Stellenbosch colony settled by Simon Vander Stel.

STELLENBOSH colony, so called from Bosch, or Bush, and Stel, the name of the governor, was settled in the time and by the direction of Simon Vander Stel. The Dutch called this colony the Wild Forest, whilst covered with shrubs and bushes. In the principal valley, c named Stellenbosch, stood a beautiful church and council-house, which were destroyed in 1710 by an accidental fire : the village was handsomely rebuilt in four years, but the church and council-house remain in their ruins.

THERE are large barren sandy tracts between the Cape and this colony, whose four divisions are named Stellenbosch, Mottergate, Hottentot Holland, and Bottelarg.

ON the Stellenbosch head or eminence, in the road between the two colonies, were formerly planted a cannon and a flag-staff, to give notice of European or Hottentot approaches ; but the Dutch soon becoming too populous and strong for any hostile attempts, the cannon was carried to the fortrefs. There are two roads from the Cape to Hottentot Holland, over the sandy down into the Tyger Valley ; through the part called Stellenbosch is the most commodious ; d the most pleasant is through the Kloof, and over mountains, commanding fine prospects of the bays and country, with views of Mottergate, Hottentot Holland, and Falso Bay.

Falso Bay.

FALSO BAY is formed by a chain of mountains ; the mountains on the east side are called Hottentot Holland ; one only, on the west side, contiguous to Stone Hill, has obtained the name Norwegen, from its extending six leagues in the sea, and running to a point, like the mountains on the coast of Norway. Those of Hottentot Holland are much higher, and like the Table Hill, covered with a white cloud, during the reign of the south-east winds : the mountain terminating the bay, from its appearance at sea in the manner of a lip hanging over the chin, is denominated Hang-lips. This bay is ten leagues in circumference, and called Falso, from a false report that the bottom was covered with stones, and no safe lodg- e ment for anchors. The bay was inspected, and the bottom tried in 1702, by order of the governor Lewis Van Assenburgh, when the ground was found to be no-where stony. There is a large rock in the middle of the bay, which has been since believed to have been the foundation of that groundless report. No ship can ride with safety in this bay, during the high south-east winds ; many, moored with the strongest cables, having been torn from their anchors, stranded, and dashed to pieces against the rocks. The bay abounds in various kinds of exquisite fish, and there is great store at the mouths of Stellenbosch and Hottentot Holland rivers ; but the greatest quantity is taken at the Fish Huik, under the rock named Hang-lips. The colonies might, with good management, be supplied by this fishery alone.

IN November 1710, a terrible hurricane at south-east, blew the waters in floods up the f country ; several thousand bushels of fish remained on the land, on the retreat of the waters, and the sea frequently overflows the Sea Cow Valley, leaving infinite numbers of fish behind. This valley was formerly the haunts of sea cows, amphibious animals of prodigious size, that made frequent sallies up the country to feed on the grass. None are seen now, being driven to more distant retreats, by the great destruction made amongst them by the first settlers, and other Europeans.

Sea Cow
so called.

IN the center of Hottentot Holland, so called from being the place appointed for raising the company's cattle, stands the Sheep Mountain, always covered with grass, and sheep constantly feeding thereon. The soil throughout this division is extremely rich, yielding abundant returns for what is sown or planted ; and by much the most fertile and pleasant part of Stel- g lenbosch colony. In the infancy of the settlement, a square fort was erected near the sea-side, mounted with four cannon, to protect the settlement on that side from the Hottentots, and to give notice of any appearance of enemies in Bay Falso ; but the cannon have been carried to the fortrefs, nor are there any traces remaining of the fort or ruins.

- a THE division was formerly haunted by lions, tigers, leopards, elephants, the rhinoceros and elk, which have been for the most part killed, or frightened into more remote quarters by fire and ball; no animal now appearing but deer and goats. Three rivers, whose springs are in the adjacent mountains, run thro' this division; the source of the principal river is in the mountains contiguous to Turn-again Hill, so called from a way over it to Drakenstein colony, which, to avoid precipices, appears, by several turnings, to lead back again. This river overflowing, in rainy seasons, the adjacent lands, Adrian Vander Stel erected a large and deep basin, capable of containing the rain-water descending from the mountains; the lands, by this contrivance, were prevented from being overflowed in rainy seasons, and supplied in dry with sufficient water. This, and other rivers without names, whose springs are also in the mountains, having watered many improved estates in their course, discharge themselves into Bay Falso.

MOTTERGATE division lies north of, and is surrounded by, Hottentot Holland and Stellenbosch division and river. The soil is fertile, the houses numerous, and the whole equally improved with other colonies. In rainy seasons the lands are overflowed, and all intercourse cut off amongst the inhabitants, the Stellenbosch River and other rivulets becoming impassable. Bridges would effectually remedy the great inconvenience and losses sustained by these floods; yet the inhabitants, who neither want money nor wood, could never be induced to think even of proper relief. Soil fertile.

- c STELLENBOSCH division, of equal circumference with Hottentot Holland, is fertile and pleasant. The mountains which surround this division are named Stellenbosch, resembling in height and size, and like the Table Mountain, are covered each with a white cloud, during the south-east winds. These winds blow here in a different manner, no contrary winds opposing; the fury ceases from evening to midnight; whereas an hour at noon and midnight, are the only quiet time, during the whole season at the Cape. The cliffs of these mountains are woody; and various kinds of curious and uncommon herbs, whose properties are unknown, and abundance of beautiful flowers, grow on the summits. The vallies abound in corn-lands, vineyards, and gardens: the houses are well and commodiously built: there are several large ones on Stellenbosch River; and the whole division is in a most flourishing condition. This river, rising in Stellenbosch mountains, and become considerable by the streams in Mottergate, runs at length into Bay Falso. The bridge erected by the colony over this river being too narrow and dangerous, a more stately and commodious one was built at the expence of a private gentleman, who obtained leave, and, for the public good, submitted to the restraint imposed by the grand council, that no toll should be paid for passing over, or through roads made on his own estate, for the service and use of the public. This bridge still remains in good condition. Stellenbosch division. A bridge built by a private gentleman.

- BOTTELARY division, the most northern part of Stellenbosch colony, borders on the south on Stellenbosch, on the east and west on Drakenstein, and on the north on Musbell Bank, and exceeds all the Cape colonies in the great quantities of hay; the grass in other parts being consumed by cattle on the grounds. The mountain, formerly the haunt of wild horses, which separates this division from Drakenstein, is called the Horse Mountain; and Jossel Mountain, named from Jost the first inhabitant, is covered with pastures, fertile fields, vineyards, and gardens, even to the summit. Bottelary division.

- f THE company, being defrauded, sold the several nurseries for cattle, which they had intrusted to the care of the neighbouring inhabitants of this division, who are greatly distressed for wood and water, the settlers being frequently obliged to make use of rain water, collected into small lakes and ditches, that in summer becomes brackish. Lands granted by the company are subject to be forfeited, on neglect of planting with trees a certain number of acres; yet this condition has never been observed by the planters, though the company has planted numbers of oaks that have succeeded; and the punishment for cutting the least branch, being whipping by the common executioner.

DRAKENSTEIN settlement, so named in honour of baron Van Rheeде, lord of Drakenstein in European Guelderland, was first begun in 1675, in the government of Simon Vander Stel. Many artificers and others, whose times in the company's service had expired, had planted several tracts of land, when the company, to whose protection the States General had recommended the French protestants who fled into Holland, transported, at their own expence, numbers of families to the Cape, who, upon lands being granted by the governors, settled in Drakenstein, where some inhabitants are of German, but most of refugee extraction. Drakenstein settlement. Inhabited by refugees.

- g DRAKENSTEIN is as extensive as the European Low Countries, bordering on the south on Turn-again Mountain, on the east on a long chain of mountains named Drakenstein, on the north on Saldanha Bay, and on the west on the Horse Mountain, which divides it from Bottelary. This large country has neither village nor council-house: the burgomasters elected in this, repair to Stellenbosch for the dispatch of public business, and act in conjunction with the burgomasters of that colony: the church and water-mill are the only public buildings; and the church, about fourteen German leagues from the Cape, in the center of the colony, is the meanest and most fordid building imaginable, covered with reeds, with walls not exceeding four feet in height, the inside bare walls and reeds, with a most shocking pulpit and desk, only a few plain forms to sit on, and these brought by the poorest people.

THERE are numbers of farms; and some, but few, sumptuous houses: the refugees, beginning the world under great incumbrances, the debts at first contracted remain still undischarged; and though some, whose success has been great, have erected superior buildings, the generality of their descendants remain in cots, requiring no more than room and shelter from the weather.

THE Mountain River, so called from its spring rising in the mountains, receiving several rivulets in its course, is considerable near the church, with large farms on both sides, about half an hour's distance from each other; yet the inhabitants complain of the contiguity for want of sufficient pasturage between the plantations, and grass growing in plenty on both sides of the river. This fertile part, producing every growth of the Cape, is mountainous and stony, and the mountains, like all about the Cape, in the depth of winter, are covered with snow, and often from June to September.

Turn-again Mountain.

FROM Turn-again Mountain to the church is a road on the left, leading to Stellenbosch, truly named by the inhabitants Bange Hunk, or fearful, being narrow, stony and steep, leading on edges of precipices, and pits of water, and infested with lions, tigers, and other wild animals. Many have perished by their horses starting into these precipices and pits, upon the approach of these animals; yet the most elegant seats of the Landroft or Stellenbosch and Drakenstein colonies, and several others of note, are situated in this dangerous road.

Simon's Valley.

SIMON'S Valley, so named in honour of Simon Vander Stel, who granted it to Blesius, the Cap fiscal independant, is laid out in corn-fields, vineyards, and gardens. Upon an ordinance published in 1707, that burghers only should trade in corn, wine, and cattle, Blesius sold this estate to a favourite servant for 24,000 florins, to be paid by yearly payments of 2,000 florins. Near Simon's Valley is a high mountain, named the Babylonian Tower, extremely plentiful in corn and wine.

The market.

A MARKET is held near the church, for the sale of grocery and other small wares necessary for domestic use, bought at the Cape, and sold here at an advanced price. On both sides of the church, and road to Mountain River, lie several well cultivated and improved estates; and from thence to Waggon-makers Valley, and farther on to Pearl Mountain, so called from a large stone on the top, imagined by the common people to resemble a pearl. This mountain is rocky; the stone is proper for mill-stones; and many were hewn out by order of Vander Stel, and used in the mills of the colonies. The Mountain River passes thro' Waggon-makers Valley, so called from an European waggon-maker, the first inhabitant, in a serpentine manner, and runs above an hundred German miles from its source, thro' several Hottentot countries, into St. Hellen's Bay. This river, fordable in summer, when swelled by winter torrents running down the hills, overflows a considerable part of the adjacent country. Numbers of men and horses have been lost in attempting to pass it; and scarce a winter passes without some terrible catastrophe. The inhabitants are deprived of church service, and the benefit of the mill at the foot of Pearl Mountain; yet the intelligent inhabitants, provided long ago with sufficient cash to be laid out for the public good, have never thought of a bridge; the only thing wanting in the colony.

Riebeck's Castle.

NUMBERS of Hottentots, who lately dwelt in this valley, abandoned their Kraals, and retreated farther up the country, upon the appearance of European planters. The plantation and buildings of these new settlers were not brought to perfection in 1731.

RIEBECK'S Castle, so named from Van Riebeck, first governor of the Cape, is an extreme high and steep mountain. The plantations on and near it would be greatly increased but for the scarcity of water; one well only being dug at the expence of Vander Bal, a planter, for the relief of the neighbourhood, who enjoyed in common this advantage, till a Tyger planter obtaining from the government the sole property, the inhabitants are obliged at present, as formerly, to make use of rain water.

IN the beginning of the Cape settlement, barracks were erected here by the company for an hundred men, and as many horses; and a cannon was planted on an eminence near this post, to be fired on any hostile appearance from the Hottentots, as a signal to the next, and from thence continued to the Cape. The Hottentots afterwards desirous of friendship, and concluding a treaty of alliance with the Dutch, this guard was abolished, the cannon carried to the fortrefs, and the barracks and stabling went to decay.

Twenty-four Rivers.

THE Twenty-four Rivers, about a day's journey north of Riebeck's Castle, and thus called from the many streams with which it is watered, belongs to Drakenstein colony. The soil is extremely fertile, producing corn from 25 to more than 30 fold, with great plenty of grass and water throughout. No lands are granted here in propriety; on which account huts only, and not houses of expence, are erected in this part.

a To this colony appertain the Honey Mountains, so called from the great quantity of honey made by the bees in the cliffs. The Hottentots climb extremely high, in great danger, in quest of honey and wax; which they afterwards barter with Europeans, for tobacco, brandy, and glass or brass trinkets. Honey Mountains.

THE European inhabitants of these mountains, who are but few, and tenders of cattle only, like those of the Twenty-four Rivers, are settlers by licence; who, restrained from tilling more ground than what is thought necessary to yield sufficient corn for their support, make no use of that liberty; but, living without bread, eat meat with meat, as beef or mutton with smoked or dried venison; are extremely healthful, and strangers almost to disorders; their drink is water, milk, and honey beer.

b ABOUT a day's journey from the Honey lie the Picquet Mountains, so called from the game of picquet being played the whole day the Europeans first inspected this settlement: the inhabitants are feeders of cattle, who, with the people of Honey Mountain, drive their cattle to the Cape market. The Hottentots and these people live friendly together.

VAN Waveren colony, so called by governor Vander Stel, in compliment to the Van Waveren family of Amsterdam, to which he was related, was begun 1701, is the youngest and most eastern settlement, about 25 or 30 German miles distant from the Cape, and separated from Drakenstein by the Red Sand Mountain; the boundaries are hitherto unsettled. Van Waveren colony.

THE Red Sand Mountain, whose top is a cone, is extremely difficult to pass, being high and steep, and the road across narrow and stony, with thick wood in many places on both sides. Waggoners are generally unloaded and taken to pieces, and, together with the goods, carried over in small parcels by the cattle and waggoners: the black land near this mountain is included in this colony: the soil is extremely fertile, yielding a vast increase of all sorts of grain that hath been hitherto sown, and promises equal fertility with the best lands about the Cape. No lands are granted in property, but are held by licence from the government from six months to six months: on this account the lands are hitherto made use of as pasturage; nor are there any buildings superior to shepherds huts. There are no places for public worship: the inhabitants frequent Drakenstein, and sometimes the Cape churches, to which they are obliged to repair for marriages and christenings, being under the Cape jurisdiction. All civil and criminal causes are determined by the magistrates of Stellenbosch. The country is well watered, and provided with two hot baths: the hot water of one becomes in two hours proper for bathing; yet the healing virtues of these waters are quite neglected for another bath at a small distance. The hot bath behind the Hottentot Holland mountains is most frequented, and most justly recommended. This bath, and a large tract of fertile land, were granted by governor Lewis Van Assembourg to Appel and his heirs, who make a considerable profit. Red Sand Mountain.

IN speaking of the living creatures of the Cape, we shall omit, as much as possible, describing those which are in common with other parts of Africa, and take notice only of such as have something remarkably particular, as different either in their nature or shape, &c. Animals, &c. not common in other parts of Africa.

THE Hottentot countries abound, from the lion to the monkey, in the greatest variety of the animal creation. The lion, the first in dignity, and the most noble beast, is extremely strong, the flesh has no ill taste, and eats like venison. The lion.

THE leopard, or panther, and the tiger, beasts of a like nature, differing in nothing but the size and manner of the spots, are extremely fierce and ravenous; their flesh, which is exceeding white and tender, surpasses in taste the finest veal. Leopard and tiger.

THE Cape elephants are the largest, and, in proportion, the strongest in the world; their teeth weigh from 60 to 120 pounds; their flesh is coarse, and never eaten by Europeans but in great necessity; they make great expedition in travelling, and sleep lying upon the ground. Elephants.

THE skin of a Cape rhinceros, whose sense of smelling is remarkably wonderful, and in constant enmity with the elephant, is almost impenetrable by the sharpest knife: the horn in the snout, with which he rips up the belly of a surprized elephant, is known not to endure poison; the fresh blood is hung up in the guts by Europeans, to dry in the sun, and taken afterwards in wine, coffee, or tea, to open obstructions, and for inward sores. Kolben eat the flesh with great satisfaction. Rhinceros.

BESIDES the different kinds of European and Cape domestics, there are wild dogs, that, like the Kongo Mabian, are mortal enemies of every quadruped species, that range in bodies of thirty, forty, and upwards, encountering lions, &c. and always conquering by numbers. Both Europeans and Hottentots follow and rob these dogs of their prey after the chase. The Europeans salt for their slaves, and the Hottentots eat, what they get. Wild dogs.

g THERE are the common European and tiger wolves, of the size of an ordinary sheep, with broad heads like bull-dogs; their jaws, nose, and eyes, are large, their teeth edged, with frizled hair, short tails, and spotted like a tiger. The lion, tiger, and leopard, that know and pursue by the howl, are great enemies to the tiger wolf. Tiger Wolves.

- Buffalos.* THE Cape buffalos are larger than the European, and hard to be killed without fire-arms; a their flesh is neither tender nor fat, like that of an ox.
- Elks.* THE Cape elks, about 400 pounds weight, are much larger than European or American elks; their flesh tastes like good beef, either boiled or roasted.
- Wild asses.* THE wild ass is spotted and streaked in that beautiful manner as has been described in other places, with white, chestnut, or brown, and surpasses a horse in swiftness, and therefore extremely difficult to be taken.
- Wild horses.* THERE are wild horses in the Cape countries, but none in the European colonies; the settlement having been supplied, in the beginning, with horses from Persia.
- Sea horses.* THE sea-horse, as has been already described in a former chapter, is here in great plenty and request. The flesh, boiled or roasted, being esteemed delicious food, and sold at 12 d. b and 15 d. per pound; the fat, likewise bearing the same price, is used in most sorts of victuals, and sometimes spread upon bread like butter.
- Different kinds of goats.* THERE are tame blue and spotted goats; the blue goats are shaped like the tame European, of the size of a hart, and of a delicate blue colour; the flesh, though seldom fat, is well tasted, and the skins equal in goodness to those of the deer. The flesh of the spotted goats tastes like venison; and that of another beautiful sort of goats, without name, far surpasses the best: there are yet diving and rock goats, whose flesh, tho' lean and tough, is esteemed a dainty at the Cape.
- Stinkbingssem and other wild animals.* THERE are at the Cape, besides the stinkbingssem, a most stinking and offensive animal, like a ferret in make, and of the size of a middling dog, baboons, mountain cats, moles, c Indian mice as large as cats, rattle mice, that sometimes make a rattling noise with their tails; ermins, whose flesh is wholesome, and agreeable to the palate; the fox, hares, harts, rabbits, cats, and European rats, carried by shipping.
- Eagles.* FOUR sorts of eagles are seen in the Hottentot countries: the bird simply called eagle, of the ignoble kind, according to Gesnar and Ludolphus, from their feeding upon fish and dead animals; the duck-eagle, or Aquila Anatoria, whose prey are ducks; the Ossifrage, or bone-breaking eagle, that carry up and let the land tortoises fall from a great height in the air, to break their shells; and the Haliætus, so called by naturalists, or sea eagle.
- Phœnicopterus, or Flamingos.* THE Phœnicopterus, so named by Mr. Ray, called by the Dutch Flamingos, and by the French Flammant, is the most beautiful bird at the Cape, larger, and the neck much longer, d than that of a swan. Both head and neck are as white as snow; the bill extremely broad, the upper mandible crooked, and longer than the nether, which is thicker and hollow, and filled with a large and fat tongue, that eats like marrow; the bill of a dark blue, black at the point, and furnished with short sharp teeth; the lower part of the wing feathers are black, and the upper of a high flame colour, the feet like those of a goose, and the legs half as long as the legs of a stork, of an orange colour; their flesh is wholesome, and well-tasted.
- Wild geese.* BESIDES the tame, there are three sorts of wild geese, the hill, or mountain, the crop, and the water goose, which differ in size and colour. The hill or mountain goose, whose feathers on the head and wings are of a bright shining green, are larger than the European; the crop goose is a large bird; and the water goose, of the same size, is distinguished from e the European tame by a brown streak, intermixed with green, on the back: their flesh is esteemed extremely delicate.
- Knorhans.* THE knorhan, upon discovering a man, gives warning to other birds, by making and continuing a loud noise, to the great disappointment of sportsmen: the flesh has an agreeable taste.
- Sea crows.* THE flesh of a sea crow is delicate food, much esteemed at the Cape, where their feathers, which are exceeding soft, are used in bedding and cushions.
- Pelicans.* THE spoon-bill, or pelican, and the Malagos, are larger than geese: the sea-gulls are numerous, and their eggs, as large as duck eggs, are most delicate food, whose white never hardens by boiling, but remains like a jelly. The penguin, or pinguin, of the f size of a goose, is an extreme fat bird; the flesh, being of a fishy taste, is of no value; but their eggs, which are likewise the most delicious food, are always esteemed and looked upon as fine presents.
- Ravens.* ONE sort of ravens is totally black, another totally grey, and a third sort has the belly feathers white, the feathers on the head black and white, and the rest quite black.
- Ostriches, and other birds.* OSTRICHES are numerous at the Cape; their eggs are reckoned good eating, and one a tolerable meal for three or four persons. These large birds are equally careful in hatching, the male and female alternately sitting on the eggs, and diligent in feeding their young as other birds. There are several sorts of falcons; and the pheasants are the same as the Europeans: owls are of the same size, but of a different colour; the feathers are red and black, g intermixed with grey spots, which make a beautiful appearance. There are tame, and several sorts of wild ducks; the yellow-hammer, lark, the chloris, or greenfinch, of the size of a nightingale, with long and pleasant notes; and a bird, called Edolio by the Europeans, resembling

- a resembling in size, make, and colour, the European cuckow; this bird, which keeps in thick bushes, and on high trees, cries and repeats often, in fine weather, in a low and melancholy tone, edolio, edolio.

THERE is a blue bird, whose flesh is delicious food, described by Raphael Seuler, of the Blue birds. size of a starling, with blue feathers; those on the neck and thighs of a sky blue, but somewhat darker than those of a king's-fisher; the beak and wing feathers of a dark blue, with a pointed bill about four inches long, and the nether mandible of a dark red. Several sorts of birds, tho' of different colours, having the same notes, are called by Europeans black- Black birds. birds: the wagtails, finches, and bats, are the same as European.

- b BESIDES all kinds of European finches, there is a sort peculiar to the Cape, larger than a A bird peculiar to the Cape. chaffinch, whose feathers are of an ash colour in winter, to which succeed a new plumage in summer: the feathers on the head, belly, wings, and tail, are black, on the neck and back of a high scarlet, and the bill, which is short, strait, and pointed, is yellow. The nest of this bird is of peculiar contrivance, made impenetrable by any weather, of small twigs, interwoven with cotton, in the closest and tightest manner, with two apartments, and but one entrance; the upper is the apartment for the male, and the female lodges in the undermost.

THERE are gnat-snappers, and a bird called long-tongue, Canary birds, and the Serinus, Gnat-snappers. so called by Heuslines, extremely destructive to seed plants: they are much shot, and their flesh is greatly esteemed by the Cape Europeans, who relish it more than their notes.

- c THE ægithus, hawfinches, or grosbeaks, the upupa, or hoopoe, the stone-pecker, and Ægithus, and other birds. starling, are numerous about the Cape. There are tame and wild pigeons, called the hill, or mount, the bush, and sea pigeons; with three sorts of swallows, the prey, house, and sea-swallow, named Apus by naturalists.

- THE asp, of an ash colour, and speckled with red and yellow, and several yards long, Different kinds of serpents. and many kinds of serpents, are seen at the Cape: the eye serpent, called the dart and shoot serpent, from darting fiercely at, and shooting from, an enemy, with wonderful speed; the tree serpent, being generally in and about the branches of trees; the blind slow-worm, with black scales, speckled with brown, white, and red; the Dipsas, or thirst serpent, about three quarters of a yard long, with a broad neck and black beak, whose bite inflames the blood, and causes a painful thirst; the hair serpent, called by the Portuguese Cobras do Cabello, about a yard long, and three quarters of an inch thick, whose poison is the most malignant, causing, unless an antidote is instantly applied, immediate death. House serpents, about an ell long, and an inch and half thick, whose bite has no ill consequence; the Ceraftes, or horned serpents, with many others.

MOST Europeans have artificial serpent stones, made by Indian Brachmans, who alone The serpent stone. possess, and remain inflexible in preserving the secret of the composition; these artificial stones, shaped like a bean, the matter in the middle being white, and the rest of a sky-blue colour, have admirable virtues, and are esteemed the most effectual remedy against poison.

- THERE are sea, river, and land insects; the sea flea, of the size, shape, and scaled like a Sea, river, and land insects. young shrimp, is provided with a sting; the sea louse is covered with a hard shell, and having many legs, ending in hooks, are great plagues in stinging and sucking of fish. Among the several sorts of worms that keep continually in the sea, is a worm that might be properly called the sea-horse; the head, mouth, neck, and breast, are shaped exactly like those of a horse; the hind part runs to a point, about six inches long; the body is flat, and with ribs; the back is yellow, and the belly white. There are leaches of a dark red, speckled with black; and water snakes, about six inches long, and as thick as a swan's quill.

- THE land insects are numerous in the Cape countries, where there are various sorts of Ants. ants, some like European; the vallies are covered with their hills: others differ in size, being much larger, whose hills likewise are larger: there is a sort about half an inch long, whose heads are red, with brown backs, and ash-coloured belly and legs; and another with red wings, that frequently fly up the highest hills, extremely nimble and industrious.

BEES abound throughout these countries, and are the same, in every respect, with Euro- Bees. pean: they lay their honey in hollow trees, in cliffs, and on the tops of high rocks; the rock honey has a finer flavour than that of the hives, which are but few, the Hottentots supplying the colonies with that commodity. Amongst the many kinds of flies is one that raises a blister like Spanish flies, which the Cape surgeons, who get great quantities, make Flies. use of.

- THERE are fleas, nits, earth-flies, beetles, lice, bugs, snails, and grasshoppers, of several Fleas, nits, &c. sorts; that in great hosts damage gardens, orchards, and corn-fields. There are as many sorts of butterflies as caterpillars, both with beautiful and lively colours. Scorpions are also numerous, between two and three inches long, of a dark green, speckled with black, Scorpions. resembling the cray-fish in every part but the tail, which is longer and narrower; their sting is exceeding painful and dangerous.

- Moths, wasps, &c.* THERE are moths, wasps, rainworms, woodlice, weazels, toads, spiders, and millepedes, or thousand legs: the spiders differ in size, shape, colour, and in webs; some are poisonous; the Cape Europeans are extremely cautious in regard to the smallest sort, no bigger than a white pea; this little spider is black and active, the bite is poisonous, and causes death, unless antidotes are used immediately; a serpent-stone extracts the poison. The Cape millepedes are red and white, about half as thick, and a finger in length, downy like the caterpillar, with two moving horns on the head; but no eyes have been discovered in this insect, whose bite is as dangerous as that of the scorpion; the serpent-stone is an effectual remedy, and roasted onions.
- Blower.* THE sea and rivers abound in great plenty and variety of fish; the blower, so called from blowing itself up in a globular form, is smooth, without scales, with a dark yellow back, b and white belly, a small mouth, with four broad teeth; is reckoned pernicious, and here avoided.
- Bennet.* THE bennet, about the length and thickness of a man's arm, and from six to eight pounds weight, is dry, but an agreeable food, and easy of digestion.
- Brown-fish.* THE brown-fish, a great devourer of the flying-fish, is 15 or 16 feet long; the body is as thick as an ox, and the back is somewhat raised.
- Cabeliau.* THE flesh of cabeliau, of which there are several sorts, is tender, delicate, and nourishing.
- Dolphins.* THERE are several kinds of dolphins, whose flesh is good, and the tongues and livers are esteemed delicious eating at the Cape.
- Elst.* THE spawn of the elst, a bony fish, and whose flesh is dry, is in high esteem. c
- Flying-fish.* THE different kinds of flying-fish are of the size and shape of a herring, excepting the wings: some have two large wings only, others with two large and two small wings, like those of a bat. These fish, whose flesh exceeds in taste the freshest herrings, are greatly pursued and harrassed by numbers of enemies: they are always in shoals, and fly extremely swift in numbers out of the water.
- Gold-fish.* THE Cape gold-fish, about a pound weight, are a foot and a half long; their meat is exceeding wholesome, of a delicate taste, and a great cleanser of the blood.
- Sharks.* THERE are two sorts of sharks, from 12 to 16 feet long; both sorts are extremely ravenous, and are said to hanker after human flesh more than any other food. The Cape pikes, d
- Pike.* boiled or broiled, are greatly esteemed, and found only in salt water.
- Brasems.* BRASEMS, called Hottentot-fish by Europeans, about a pound in weight, are reckoned wholesome and well tasted.
- Red stone brasems.* THE red-stone brasem, equally wholesome and nourishing, has a most delicate taste.
- Pilot-fish.* THE pilot-fish, so called from being the pilot or guide to the shark, of a dark brown colour, spotted with blue, and a black streak along the ridge of the back, with several others running down to the belly, with gold colour about the eyes, and lower jaw like a saw, is extremely difficult to take. This fish is said to master the shark, and to smell land, and when in scent, to turn about and make off to sea.
- Sea-lions.* A SEA-LION was killed in Table Bay in 1707: this animal was 15 feet long, and the same in circumference; his head was like that of a lion, but without hair or scale upon e any part; the tongue, of 50 pounds weight, was all fat; the skin was of a yellowish colour, with two short fore legs, ending in feet like those of a goose, with two broad thick fins, each of eighteen inches long, in the place of hind legs; the body was taper to the tail, which ended in the shape of a half moon.
- Porpoisses and whales.* THERE are porpoisses, or sea-hogs, and whales; the lesser, called grampus, is frequently seen in the Cape sea; two dead grampusses were drove ashore in stormy weather, in 1707, and 1709; one was 50 feet long, 24 broad, and 12 high; the other was 45 feet in length, and 12 feet in breadth, and in height 18. The tongues of each weighed 600 pounds weight.
- Silver-fish.* THE silver-fish, of the size, make, and taste of a carp, about a pound in weight, keeps f mostly in the sea, but sometimes comes in shoals into the rivers.
- Cramp fish.* THE cramp-fish is a curiosity at the Cape, of the cartilaginous kind, and small, about a quarter of a pound in weight, with small eyes, whose irides are a mixture of black and white; the mouth, though small, is furnished with teeth, and is shaped like a half-moon; above the mouth are two little holes, or nostrils; the back is of an orange colour, and the belly white; the tail like that of a turbot, and the skin is extremely smooth, without scales; the brains are seen when the fish is opened; the gall is large, and the liver white and tender.
- THE Cape fishermen decline touching the cramp-fish; and most authors justly agree, that whoever touches this fish is affected with smart pains, cramped, and convulsed; but the duration is not lasting, the convulsion being at the height in a minute or two, when it gradually abates, and in half an hour goes quite off. g
- Barbels, carps, &c.* THE barbels, carps, eels, gudgeons, lobsters, crabs, and oysters, are in every respect the same as European; and the rock-fish taken in holes of sea rocks, about six inches in length, and two round, are of the most agreeable taste, and much valued.

a THERE are two sorts of water-snails, the porcupine and sea-porcupine; the shells of both Water-snails are variously and beautifully coloured, but lose the colour when the snail dies.

THERE are kegel, or ninepin snails, klip, koufen or nabel snails, pearl snails, screw snails, and shell-fish called sea-funs, and sea-stars; their shells, which are extremely beautiful, are chiefly gathered for presents to strangers, and preserved in many cabinets of curiosities.

THE sea-spout is a strange and surprising production of nature, resembling a sponge or Sea-spout. lump of moss, sticking to sea rocks, unmoved by winds or waves; of a greenish colour, with water or humour continually dropping from a fleshy substance within, not unlike a gizzard; there is no life perceivable in this creature, but, when touched, fine streams of water spout out from two or three small holes, which is repeated as often as touched, till b the stock is exhausted.

THE muscle crabs are like, but smaller than, lobsters, and inhabit another besides the Muscle-crabs. coat-shell, from which they go in and out, never separating themselves quite from the shell, with great ease.

THERE are land, sea, and river, or fresh water, tortoises, four-legged, whose bodies are guarded with the strongest and hardest shells. The sea and river tortoises lay and leave Land, sea, and river tortoises. their eggs, of the size between the pigeon and hen egg, in the sand, to be hatched by the heat of the sun; they are found at St. Jago and Mauritius; 200, and sometimes 300, eggs are laid in one nest, which, with the flesh, are agreeable to the palate. The land tortoises are plentiful at the Cape; their flesh is fine and white as snow, and their eggs are of an exquisite and delightful taste; the land tortoise feeds upon roots, herbs, corn, &c.<sup>s</sup>

c THE vegetables of the natural growth of the Cape countries, whose virtues are topical, Vegetables of the natural growth. and many of no use in medicine, are too numerous to be inserted: in Kolben's account there are 28 sorts of aloës, many of them being planted in the company's garden; their flowers are of different colours, some white, others red, and many curiously speckled, are very delightful to the eye; five sorts of African alaternoides, and eight of African dogs-bane; ten of Aster Africanus, or African starwort; seven sorts of bell-flowers; twenty of African broom; and twenty-one of cranesbill: sixteen of ragwort; eleven of Thymaloe Africana, or African spurge laurel; and six and thirty sorts of Ficoides, or African fig marygolds: the Argyroden-dros Africana, or silver tree, whose fruit is conical like the pine-apple, grows both in vallies and on hills: the Spiraea Africana is called by the Hottentots Buchu, who gather and dry the withered leaves in the sun, then beat them to powder for use: this powder is of a gold colour. There are trees of the size of an oak, called stink-wood by Europeans, from a filthy and nauseous scent while under the tool, and hardly to be endured by workmen, whose smell goes off in some time; and the wood, which is beautifully clouded, makes useful and ornamental pieces of furniture, and enters likewise into the Cape materia medica, being given with success in many cases.

THE exotics are also numerous: fir plants were carried from Europe in 1690, for orna- Exotic vegeta- ment, and to supply the colonies with wood, and are now from 36 to 40 feet high. tables.

e GARDEN sorrel was planted chiefly for the advantage of mariners, being good against the scurvy. There is abundance of garden garlic, common alder, and China rose; the green leaves of the China rose, whisked in water, make a lather which the Cape Europeans prefer to soap for washing the face and hands,

THERE are large tracts of land planted with almond trees, of which there are four sorts, yielding a considerable profit.

THE pine-trees, originally from America, were transplanted from East-India: there are Pine-trees, three sorts, Fajama, Bonjama, and Fajagna: the Fajama apple is the largest and best, from 6 to six to eight inches long, and thick; the outside colour is red and dark yellow, the inside near a perfect yellow; the inside colour of the Bonjama and Fajagna, is white; that of Fajagna tastes like rhenish wine.

f GARDEN parsley, asparagus, red and white beetwort, were carried from Holland, and grow in great plenty. There are abundance of red and white cabbages, of 40 pounds weight and upwards, and cauliflowers, of which great quantities are sent to Ceylon and Batavia.

THERE are four sorts of camphire trees, one transplanted from Borneo island, the others from Sumatra, Sunda, China, and Japan.

GARDEN asparagus, wild and garden hemp, and carduus benedictus, of great medicinal use, grow in the Cape countries.

THE cinnamon-tree grows as high as a Spanish olive-tree. Clove-gilliflowers, horse-chefnuts, common onions, and garden chervil, and artichokes, were carried from Holland; white and grey pease from Germany and Holland; and the filberd-tree from Germany.

g THERE are several sorts of cherry-trees, the trumpet-flower, flower-fence, and common cucumbers in great plenty, surpassing European in goodness.

THE American passion-flower bears a fruit like the golden-ruffetin, and of an agreeable a taste.

GOURDS were brought to the Cape from Europe and the Indies; there are several forts, and great numbers are disposed among the shipping, being extremely serviceable in long voyages.

THE male cyprus-trees were carried from Europe into India.

CORN-BOTTLES were brought to the Cape with the first corn; they are of white, blue, and carnation colours; the flower of one sort, in the company's gardens, is extremely fragrant and beautiful.

THE Cape is supplied yearly with wild Cytisus from Holland; the crops at the Cape never holding the seed against the south-east winds.

THORN-APPLE plants, brought from India, were rooted up and destroyed by the govern-<sup>b</sup>ment; the reason is concealed, as the publication might be attended with bad consequences:

THERE are European and Madagascar beans, the Indian fig-tree, torch-thistle, and common fennel, straw-berry bushes, and Indian wheat; Indian jessamin, and patfcher-tree, whose flowers are yellowish, and of an agreeable smell; the Indian pallet settangan, with a white double flower, like the Rosa Sinensis, and jonquils, whose smell is so greatly esteemed by the European ladies.

SPARRY, gooseberry bushes, white hyacinth, and the juniper-tree, were brought from Europe: there are the Indian white guava, and a shrub transplanted from Madagascar, called by the Cape Europeans Kezschebyring, and Kutchbines by the Japanese, who make a yellow<sup>c</sup> colour of the seed for dyeing.

THE Indian gold-tree, about six feet high, with yellow leaves, speckled with red, is extremely beautiful, and is generally ranged in gardens amongst other trees.

THE Cape Europeans make pickles of the leaves of Indian bay-trees; there are cabbage-lettuces of every European sort, common marjoram, stock-gilliflowers, and the white crown imperial. Great plenty of apples and quince trees; the Mæstietz and Castietz of Batavia, and other Indian parts, make pomado for colouring and curling their hair, of the quince kernels.

THE mastick, pomegranate, citron, sweet and sour limon China and Indian orange trees are plentiful; these trees are extremely large, and called Mosban, or tyger-oranges, by the<sup>d</sup> East-Indians, the first being spotted like the skin of that animal.

ROSEMARY, basil, balm, garden mint, sage, garden turnips, oaks, plum and pear trees, were brought from Europe; parsnips, medlars, common alder, and walnut-trees, were carried from Germany. There are black mulberry, myrtle, peach, pine, and date trees, garden-poppies, netted and musk melons, white daffodils, favine, tulips, violets, tamarisk-trees, and garden-taragon, winter wheat and rye, with grape vine, carried from the Rhine, Persia, and other places: and the garden-navew, by which the inhabitants make considerable profit.

WE have by this time dwelt long enough on the vast plenty and variety of native and exotic productions of this rich and fertile spot, to raise a desire in our readers to know what share of them these new landlords dispense among their dispossessed vassals, in return for their so readily yielding it to them; and whether they are treated with greater generosity, on all these accounts, in this African settlement, than those we have had occasion to mention in some former volumes, in our account of their Asiatic conquests†. To all which we can only answer in general, that no country or climate we know of, hath as yet been able to make any any change for the better in the subjects of that ungrateful republic; and that, with respect to those Hottentots who live under the dominion of the Dutch company here, their condition is the most wretched and miserable, not only of their whole nation, but, we may safely add, of all the Africans. They are, says a judicious author*, reduced to such an abject degree of servitude and indigence, as to be glad, for the sake of a little tobacco, a piece of bread, or a glass of brandy, to submit to the lowest and basest offices; and happy do they<sup>f</sup> think themselves, who live near their towns and settlements, as most at hand to be employed in that servile druggery for so small an encouragement; whilst the rest of their compatriots, who live more at large, and enjoy a greater share of liberty, detest and abhor them for their base subjection and abject meanness. The author above-quoted hath interlarded his account with many other curious and useful remarks, which there is less need for us to dwell upon, as his book is in our own tongue, and in every curious reader's possession.

ON the other hand, if our readers would know what high account the rest of the Hottentot nation make of these new masters, or rather, as they stile them, invaders and interlopers, in the midst of their vast affluence, their luxury, and outward grandeur, they look upon them as a band of poor indigent vagabonds, whom mere necessity had forced out of their<sup>g</sup> native country, to seek their bread, which it could not afford them at home, and for the sake

- a of which they are content, nay glad, to cross the widest seas, wander in the most distant countries, expose themselves to the greatest dangers and fatigues, the most opposite and inhospitable climates, and intrude themselves upon every nation and government that will grant them admittance, upon any specious pretence, though so much afraid and mistrustful of all the rest of mankind, that they cannot think themselves and their effects in any safety, unless both are secured by high walls, and strong bolts and bars. How much freer, happier, and nobler, is our race, who can range at will under the whole cope of heaven, wherever our wants or inclinations lead us, and find every-where a rich supply ready prepared for us by the kind hand of nature, without our care or labour, who want neither storehouses nor magazines to secure our provisions and properties, nor castles and high walls to protect us
- b and our families; but can live and sleep safe and fearless in our low huts or caves, or even under the open canopy of the skies, eat, drink, smok, sing, and dance, race, hunt, and pursue every pleasure of life unrestrained and uncontrouled, whilst even our superfluities, and what would otherwise lie neglected and despised by us, are more than sufficient to attract those mercenary and indigent slaves to come so far to purchase them from us, and bring us, in exchange for them, all that their country, art, or industry, produces, that may contribute to our use, our ornament, or delight †. And if, whilst we here roam at large, enjoying all the blessings and sweets of our happy land in peace and plenty, those Would-be Lords are glad to bring us such variety of additional conveniences and delights, through so many hazards and fatigues, for so small a return as we make to them, who are greater, happier, and more to be envied than we? who are more base, despicable, and more to be pitied than they ‡? Thus they think, and thus they balance the account between them and their masters; which, however strange and rhapsodical it may appear to us, we are assured, from a multitude of authentic witnesses, is the common language, not only of the Hottentots, but of the generality of the Africans, even of those, who, through the tyranny of the government they live under, are doomed to a still worse state of slavery and misery, and without those real advantages and comforts which this Hottentot nation enjoys, to countenance their fond conceit, that they are the happiest and noblest, and the Europeans the most miserable and abject people that the sun shines upon. Some instances of which we shall have occasion to shew in the subsequent chapters.
- d We shall leave it to our readers to make their own remarks on their uncommon notion of happiness, compared with that of their Dutch masters, and which would receive an additional degree, if what Tachard and other writers relate of them were true; viz. that they expect no after-reckonings in another world. But as we have lately shewn, from surer evidence, this to be a mistake, and that they really believe a future life and retribution*, we hope we need not tell our readers, by this time, which of the two nations seems to act most conformably to it, or to reap the greatest gain from the contrary one. Yet we cannot dispense subjoining some singular instances of moral virtue in the one, which as plainly spring from a persuasion of the former, as the contrary vices do from the latter. The Hottentots are trusty and faithful to the highest degree; insomuch, that even the Dutch give them free admission
- e into their houses and warehouses, and trust them with any business or important affair, without fear or danger of being wronged or defrauded. They are of an hospitable and beneficent temper, and ever ready to assist one-another; and so generous in their low state, that if any thing be given to any one of them, whether it be of eatables, apparel, tobacco, or brandy, which they are most fond of, they readily divide it amongst their friends and compatriots, even to the reserving the least share to themselves; and when obliged to any high degree, never cease expressing, upon all occasions, sentiments of suitable gratitude, as long as they live. It must be owned that this character is very different from that which the Dutch writers have given us of them, who have as generally as unjustly confounded them with the savage and inhuman nation of the Caffers lately described §, and probably with no other
- f view than to palliate their ill treatment of, and tyrannizing over, them.

We shall now conclude this chapter, with a short estimate of the charges which the Dutch company is at, for the maintenance of this important settlement, and of the revenues out of which they are raised.

- g THE revenues for defraying the vast expence of this settlement, the most flourishing in Africa, whose interest and safety have engrossed the care and application of the Dutch East-India company, and stood them in a million of florins yearly, for the first twenty years after its establishment, and the present annual expences of which amount to 400,000 florins, arise from the tenth of the produce of lands possessed by Europeans, from ground-rents; from duties on wines and beer, produced at the Cape, or imported; on tobacco and distilled liquors, on mum, of which there is great consumption, by other means, and from the profits of trade.

THE tenths of the produce of lands, and ground-rents, are computed at 14,000 florins a per annum. The duties are farmed at 70,000 florins per annum, and punctually paid by the farmers; and the neat produce of 30,000 florins, laid out annually in merchandize for the Cape, at a profit of 75 per cent. is 225,000 florins.

THOUGH the revenue and profits are not hitherto brought to a par, the company is at present near reimbursed the expence; and has a prospect of enjoying shortly an immense clear revenue from the settlement, the colonies improving and increasing daily, by the taking in of new lands for culture and tillage.

A GREAT number of fine Persian, and horses from other countries, are kept in a range of stables, at Cape Town, capable of containing several hundreds, for the use of the company and parade of the governor; whose train is magnificent, having a master and under master <sup>b</sup> of horse, a body and other coachmen, fadler, &c. in his retinue.

Number of the
vants.

THE company's servants are about 600 in number: all officers in the administration are called qualified, and the soldiers, artificers, and common servants unqualified; great part of these and the petty officers are lodged in the town in different buildings, belonging to the company; the governor and chief officers reside in the castle, as has been related, whose garrison consists of 200 soldiers.

C H A P. IX.

Of the principal kingdoms and nations lying along the western coast of Africa, and of those which are contiguous to them on the inland.

<sup>c</sup> The western coast described. THIS western and extensive coast, which stretches itself in an almost direct line northwards, from Cape Negro, the boundary of the Hottentots, last spoken of, to the Crab river, or, as the Portuguese call it, Rio dos Comarons, that is, from the 16th degree south lat.

to the 4th degree north, in all 20 degrees, or 1600 miles, contains the following principal kingdoms; viz. Benguela, Angola, Kongo, Loango, and Pombo; and in the inland those of Meaman, or Metamba, Macocco, or Anfiko, and Mulak, together with sundry other nations, known only to the Europeans by their names, and the traffick they carry on with the maritime kingdoms, of which we shall also give the best account we meet with in our most authentic geographers, whilst we pass by many others, which less accurate writers and map-makers have interspersed amongst them, both on the coast and inland, of which we find little more than their names, if even these may be worthy of credit. Tho' here it may not <sup>d</sup> be amiss to observe, that some of our later geographers have carried their incredulity too far, and pronounced some kingdoms and countries in it to be imaginary, because they have not found them in the place which the old maps assigned them, or under the exact names which these give them.

That of Mataman not imaginary, but misplaced.

OF this nature we take the kingdom of Mataman, alias Climbe, to be, which is placed by them on the southermost part of this coast, between Benguela and Cape Negro, the first of which names we are told, is that of its monarchs, and the other that of the country; and, as we are farther told, extends itself eastward as far as Monomotapa, where the river Bagamidri divides it from it <sup>a</sup>. Yet hath this kingdom, tho' distinctly spoken of by our countryman Andrew Battel <sup>b</sup>, for its frequent wars with those of Kongo and Angola, and since, by the good capuchin father Gavasi, who resided in those parts twelve whole years, and was thoroughly acquainted with the barbarous manners of its inhabitants, been peremptorily pronounced an imaginary one, by some of our latest geographers <sup>c</sup>; tho' for no other reason, that we can see, but because it is not to be found any-where on this coast, but lies farther both in the inland, and perhaps some hundred miles more northward than the old maps had placed it. We shall, however, find a more proper place, where to treat more fully of it, and of its famed, or rather infamous, queen Zingha, who, by the help of her Zagas, or Giagas, a warlike but inhuman nation, found means to seize on that kingdom, and, during a reign of near twenty years, to prove a most dreadful enemy to the Portuguese of Angola, and to blacken her reign with the most horrid and execrable inhumanities, beyond what any <sup>e</sup> other history affords of that kind. But of this, and other particulars of that kingdom, we shall forbear saying any thing farther, till they come in due course, and begin our description of this coast with the most considerable country, to that of the Hottentots, whence we set out.

- a THIS kingdom was, by the generality of geographers, supposed to extend itself along this coast from Cabo Negro, the Hottentots boundary, to the river of Coanza, or Benguela. Quansa, which divides it on that side from Angola, at about 10 degrees, 5 minutes, south latitude. But Mr. De Lisle hath since corrected that error, and extends it no farther north than the Benguela vekbia, or Old Benguela<sup>d</sup>, in 9 degrees, 54 minutes; it being probable the Portuguese have conquered so much of that coast, since they became masters of Angola, in which he places the country called Sowa fuchi Canbari, and the river Cubegi. It is bounded, according to him, on the east by the Jaga Casangi, or Jagan Chief, who over-ran that tract in the time when our countryman Battel was among them<sup>e</sup>; and probably, from a wandering life, which he and his savages had led till then, plundering, ravaging, and putting all to fire and sword, where-ever he came, was at length invited to fix his abode there. On the south, our author places the province of Obila, between the Hottentots and Benguelas, which tract is mostly inhabited by much such savage nations as the Caffers and Jagas<sup>f</sup>.

THE chief bays, towns, and rivers, on this coast, from the Cape Negro to the river Coanza, are those that follow:

Coast, bays and rivers.

- THE bay of Maisotto, about five leagues south of the Coanza above-mentioned, at the mouth of which are some small rocks and shelves, even with the water; five leagues farther to the south is Capo Ledo, and eight farther that called the Cape of the three Points; thence to Cape falso four; from thence to that of St. Bras eleven; and from that to the Chicken or Heender's Bay, so called by the Dutch, from the vast quantities which are bred there, the coast runs low for the space of ten leagues. The country is fertile, and goes by the name of Viella Benguela, or Old Benguela: it hath a considerable bay, about two leagues in length, half a league broad, and between ten and twelve fathom deep; the bottom a slimy mud.

Old Benguela described.

- ON the south side of the bay is a town, or large village, situated on a high mountain, where one meets with large beeves, sheep, poultry, and other provisions, to be sold in great plenty, together with elephants teeth; all which the inhabitants barter for muskets, and other fire-arms, which are here in great request<sup>g</sup>. And it is this small territory which Mr. De Lisle comprehends under the name of Old Benguela<sup>h</sup>, but the Dutch maps extend quite from cape St. Bras to the Chicken's Bay. Five leagues further southward is the Rio Longo, called also the river Moreno, whose mouth is under the 11th degree of south lat. but is so very shallow, that small boats can hardly sail on it; and yet the natives have found out a way of navigating on it in flat-bottom'd vessels, which they call pangales. The Portuguese, we are told, have likewise often attempted the same expedient, in order to bring their slaves from Massingan to this coast, but have not been able to compass it, by reason of its many sandy banks, and the rapidity of its course<sup>i</sup>.

- ABOUT eight leagues from that river is the town of Makikongo, where the Portuguese have their magazines of cloaths, fire-arms, powder, &c. which they exchange with the inhabitants for beeves, hogs, ivory, and other wares. About 15 leagues farther southward from that town is the mouth of the river Katon bella, formed by two or three arms which re-unite there. It is spacious and convenient, 15 or 16 feet deep, and sheltered from every wind, and fit for the largest vessels to ride in. The water of it is salt, and round the haven are deep ditches, digged to receive it, and harden it into salt. On the north side of the river the sea forms another kind of bay, large and safe for mariners to lie at anchor, on which account the Dutch have given it the name of The good or fair Bay. About two leagues south of it is another river, whose waters are fresh and sweet, but which discharges them into the sea only after a rainy season<sup>k</sup>.

Salt made of its water.

- SAILING still farther southward, one comes to the large bay of Benguela, which is two full leagues long from angle to angle, and about a league in breadth; on the north corner of it stands the town of its name, and a fort built by the Portuguese. Before the town is a large sandy bank, which hinders the vessels from anchoring nearer it than at a full league's distance: the fort is inclosed with palisadoes, and surrounded with houses, all finely sheltered with bananas, orange and lemon trees, pomegranates and bancovas. Behind it is digged a well of fresh water, and at some distance round Benguela are seven other villages depending upon it; viz. Motonda and Peringa, distant about a mile and an half from the fort, and about a mile from each other; Mam Kifomba, a large settlement which can raise 3000 men; Mani-nomma, a Mani-Kifomba, Pikena, and Mani-kilonda; to which one may add the Mondombas and Montondos, two vassal nations to Benguela. The Portuguese were once settled in these towns; but fearing lest the natives should surround and fall upon them, retired to Maffingua; but, in their flight, were closely pursued, and a great number destroyed by them.

of Sombriera.

ON the west side of the bay of Benguela stands a high mountain, flat on the top, and called by the Portuguese Sombriera, and by the Flemings Klop-Mets, from its resemblance to a priest's angular cap. At the bottom of this mountain is another bay of the same name, whose water, though clear, is not fit to drink. All the shore to the southward appears like a spacious sandy plain, at the end of which is a deep and fruitful valley<sup>1</sup>.

THIS is all we meet with most remarkable on the Benguela coast; our geographers have added a list of the provinces which are in the inland, without mentioning any cities, towns, or other things remarkable, in any of them; their names are as follow.

Its inland pro-

Cities, seaports, rivers, and bays.
Baya das
Vaccas.

THE chief ports and bays are those of Benguela viella, Old Benguela, Mankikondo, the fort of Cabuto, St. Philip, or New Benguela, St. Maria Baya falsa, or The false Bay, Baya Tortuga, Angra de Negros, and Great Wiffers Bay, and that stiled by the Portuguese Baya das Vaccas, or Cow's Bay, on account of the great number of those creatures which are bred in its neighbourhood. This last, though not large, is fit to receive ships of burden; and the country abounding with provisions of other kinds, makes it a place of resort for commerce; some mines of several metals, and particularly of silver, are said to be found near the bay<sup>n</sup> (A).

THE chief rivers on this coast are the Rio Longo, Niea, Katon bella, Gubororo, al. river of St. Francis, the Clabenia, and Cutembo o.

MOST parts of this kingdom were once populous and fertile, but suffered so much by the invasion of the Jagas, a cursed wandering savage nation of canibals, of whom we shall give a fuller account in the conclusion of this chapter, as well as by the frequent wars which the Benguelans have been engaged in against the kings of Kongo, and the Portuguese of Angola, that the whole country was nearly ruined by the former, and in part subdued by the latter, in our countryman Battel's time; since which that coast hath been so little frequented by any other Europeans, that we can give but little account of its late or present state.

WHAT its ancient government was, we are not told; but in all likelihood monarchical, since it is stiled a kingdom; but we are told by Odo and Lopez, that, in the time of his being there, in 1589, the greater part was divided into a vast number of petty-lordships, and all subject to the government of Angola †; which is to us a sufficient demonstration of its poverty, that being the common lot of all those people who are doomed to that heavy yoke, as we shall see when we come to the history of that kingdom, and its wretched vassals. The air of the country, the same author tells us, is so very unhealthy, that it infects the very ground, and causes its produce, as well as the water of it, to be most unwholesome to the natives, and almost poisonous to the Europeans; so that they are forced to have all that they eat or drink brought from abroad; and, even with all this precaution, those few that hold out against the badness of the air and climate, look more like shadows, or men dug out of their graves, than human creatures; and their voice is so broken, that they seem, when they speak, as if they held their breath between their teeth. And hence it is that few Europeans care to venture on shore, much less to stay long enough to inform themselves about the state or nature of the country, or of its inhabitants.

Town of New Benguela.

WE are told, however, that there was a Portuguese governor in the new city of Benguela, or fort St. Philip, in the year 1666, when Carli was there; he adds, that there were then about 200 white inhabitants, and a great number of blacks; that the houses are built of

(A) This bay is also called Baya de Torre, from a rock in it like a tower. Battel says, that ships may safely ride into it, the coast being smooth; and is commonly resorted to by vessels homeward bound from India to refresh at. The Portuguese caraccas often pass along this coast in their way to Loango (1).

It is on this bay that the Portuguese have built the fort of St. Philip, there being none to guard it before, nor indeed any settlement. They also gave it the name of New Benguela, to distinguish it from the Old lately mentioned (2).

- a nothing better than mud and straw; these being the materials of which even the church and fort consist<sup>p</sup>. The people who live about this bay, and are called Endal Albondos, are a <sup>Natives described.</sup> brutish and lawless people, living without any government, and by no means to be trusted by those who traffick with them; tho' in other respects so simple and cowardly, that thirty or forty men may boldly go up thro' their country, and bring down whole herds of cattle from thence. They traffick for no other money than a sort of glass beads, an inch long, and of various colours, which they also use as ornaments about their necks, arms, &c. sixteen of <sup>Their money.</sup> which will purchase a good fat cow from them<sup>q</sup>. The men wear skins round their middles, and collars about their necks; they use the bow and arrows, and carry darts fenced with iron; they allow themselves a plurality of women; and, which is still worse, keep some
- b males in women's apparel among their wives. The women wear a copper collar about their necks, said to weigh at least fifteen pounds; they likewise adorn their arms with bells and bracelets, reaching up to their elbows, and cover their middles with a kind of cloth, made of the bark of the infanda tree, neither spun nor woven; their legs are likewise embellished with copper rings, reaching up to the calf.
- THE province to which this quarter belongs is called Dambe, and is noted for a ridge of <sup>Mountains and</sup> sierras, or high mountains, which extend themselves to those of Combambas, where are the <sup>mines all copper.</sup> mines lately mentioned. These stretch themselves along the coast south and west, and abound with fine copper, if the natives had but the industry to work them; but their indolence will not suffer them to use more of it than will serve them for ornaments<sup>r</sup>. Our author,
- c who is the only one who hath travelled thro' most of this country, as appears by the account he gives of himself, and the occasion of his being first brought a prisoner from the West-Indies to Angola, by the Portuguese, from whom he made his escape into this of Benguela, adds, that he saw many large towns in it, the most considerable of which he calls Kashil, and describes as a very large one, and so overgrown with alikondie trees (B), cedars, and palms, <sup>The town of</sup> that the streets are quite darkened with them. In the middle of the town is the image of a <sup>Kashil described.</sup> man, standing on a pedestal twelve feet high, the foot of which is surrounded with a circle <sup>Streets.</sup> of elephants teeth, stuck into the ground; on the top of which are fastened the skulls of such <sup>Its chief idol.</sup> men as have been killed in the wars, or offered to that idol. On such occasions they pour palm wine, mixed with the blood of goats, at the feet of it. This mokisso or image they
- d call Queffono, and pay a great veneration to it. He saw a great number of other smaller idols, <sup>Idols.</sup> scattered in several parts of the town, the streets of which are paved with palm canes placed in regular order. Each of those images hath heaps of elephants teeth piled around them; and at the south end of the town stood another idol, which had above three tons of these teeth laid over it. The houses are here built of mud and straw, and of a round figure, like <sup>Houses:</sup> that of a hive; the insides of the more covered with curious mats, and the outsides of some of them, especially of those which belong to the whites, are of timber and clay interwoven, and so well covered over with mortar, as to look like squarestone<sup>s</sup>. There is one sea-port on this coast, if it be not the only one, in which the inhabitants make use of a base and ensnaring stratagem to make slaves, by permitting their women to allure men to their embraces, and
- e then accusing them to their husbands; who, feigning to be in the utmost rage for the affront, <sup>A base way of</sup> immediately imprison the gallant, and keep him there till they have an opportunity of selling him to the next stranger that trafficks in that way, and are never called to an account for it. <sup>making slaves</sup>

(B) We find this extraordinary tree thus pleasantly described by Purchas, from the report of the above-mentioned Battel (3). "The aliconda or eliconde tree is tall, and of a prodigious thickness, some of them being said to be as thick as twelve men can fathom. They spread like an oak, and some of them are hollow, and receive such plenty of water from the liberal skies, as to be able to allay the thirst of a thousand natives of these parched regions. Once have I known four thousand men draw water from one of them four and twenty hours, yet was it not exhausted."

"The negroes climb up by pegs of hard wood (which that softer one easily receiveth, its smoothness not admitting of any other way of climbing it) and I think that some of them hold forty tuns of water."

"The tree affords a no less bountiful hospitality to the back and to the belly, yielding (as her belly to their bellies), so her back to their backs; excepting that this is better from the younger trees, whose tender backs, being more seasonable for discipline, are soundly beaten (for man's fault, whence came the first nakedness), whereby one fathom cut from the tree is extended into twenty, and is presently fit for wearing, tho' not so fine as that which the infanda tree yields."

Dapper, who calls the above-mentioned tree liconda, adds, that the natives of this and other kingdoms along this coast, labouring under a great scarcity of wholesome water, make them serve instead of cisterns, to preserve the rain water for their use, which they do with such privacy, that those of one village are sworn not to discover them to those of another, and they would punish a man with the utmost severity that should be guilty of it (4), and the Benguelans are the more strict in this respect, as their country hardly yields any but what looks like lye, and is of a poisonous nature (5), excepting that which falls from the clouds, and is thus preserved in those large hollow trees.

whole coast.

With the money they buy other female slaves, whom they send upon the same ensnaring errand: but this is far from being the worst method the inhuman natives of this coast have of making and selling slaves: there are villains that will go up into the country, with a pretence of jurisdiction, and seize upon men for the slightest offence, and condemn them to be sold away for slaves; on which account our author thinks it unlawful to buy any on this coast. The misfortune is, that as, on the one hand, all the natives of this coast are so void of humanity, that they will betray their nearest relations, and even sell their own children into slavery, not only thro' misery and want, but wantonness, and in exchange for a few European trinkets; or a gallon or two of brandy, as we shall have occasion to shew in the sequel; so, on the other, there want not a sufficient number of those, who, tho' professed christians, make no scruple to encourage that inhuman traffick, and buy all that are offered under that name, without farther enquiry.

ture described.

We have now gone thro' every thing that we could find remarkable concerning this kingdom, excepting only the describing of a singular animal, said to be peculiar to it, and called by our geographer abada. It is of the wild kind, very shy and swift-footed, and of the size of an half-grown colt; but what singularizes it most, is a horn which grows on its forehead, and another on the nape of its neck, the former round, smooth, and hard, and about two or three feet in length, sharp at the point, but near the root about the bigness of a man's leg, and bending downwards; that on the nape of the neck is flatter and shorter, and of a blackish or dark brown hue, tho' white when scraped, and the hair about it more thick and harsh. Its head is not so long in proportion as that of a horse, but shorter and more flat, like that of an ox, only more hairy, and the hair more harsh. Its tail is like that of an ox, tho' not quite so long, and the hair more like that of the horse; its feet are cloven, like those of a stag, but much thicker. They tell us, when the creature is young, its front horn is straight, but that it bends gradually up, like the tusk of an elephant, as it grows older. The natives, who hunt it for the sake of that, and esteem it an excellent antidote, imagine that when it goes to the water to drink, it first dips the tip into it, in order to expel the poison that is in it. They look upon the virtue of it to be greater or less, as the creature is younger or older when it is killed; and the Portuguese, we are told, have a strange way of making trial of its goodness, which is done, it seems, by setting it upright upon the ground, and suspending a naked sword over it, point against point; if the horn be good and hard, the point of the sword only turns round it, without fixing itself into it; whereas, when the horn is soft and young, the sword quickly sinks into it; which shews its virtue not to be come to its full perfection, and lowers the value of it accordingly. They make, moreover, a pultice of the pulverized bones of this creature, mixed with water, which they pretend to be a sovereign remedy against all aches and pains in any part of the body, by drawing away all the peccant humours from the part affected, as well as from the whole mass of the blood * (C).

An account of the savage nation of the Giagas; their first discovery by the Europeans; invasion of Benguela; wars, ravages, barbarous customs, &c.

An account of the Giagas, and their ravages and conquests in this kingdom.

THIS savage and cannibal nation, which hath spread itself over the greatest part of Lower Ethiopia, is indifferently called by the Europeans, Gagas, Giagas, Giaquas, Jagos or Jagas, and is, like that of the Arabs, divided into wandering and fixed; for tho' they seem to have been originally of the former kind, and to have lived altogether upon ravaging and plundering of other countries, yet when they had once enriched themselves by them, they naturally sought out for a place of rest; and where-ever they met with any fertile and well cultivated provinces, they quickly made them their own, and settled themselves in them, contenting themselves with making excursions on every side, and returning to their families laden with spoil. And hence it is that we find them numerous and powerful in the kingdoms of Matamba, Anfiko, Fungueno, and other parts, and particularly in this of Benguela; where, having first over-run and almost ruined a great part of it, under their warlike chief stiled Giaga Kazangi, they at length fixed their habitation in one of the most commodious cantons of it, in which that chief kept his court, in the time of our country-

(C) We shall omit the rest of the animals of this kingdom, they being much the same that we have seen in our general account of Afric, as elephants, rhinoceros, zebra, or wild ass; and only observe, on the whole, from the few Europeans who have visited this country, that both the wild and tame kind are here of an extraordinary size, more particularly the crocodile and sea-horse, and are most fierce and dangerous (6).

a man Battel, if we may call by that noble title a monstrous heap of sorry huts of dirt and straw, covering a vast spacious spot of ground, and surrounded with a thick thorny hedge; for such was the place of his residence, and that of his successors, under the 7th degree and a half of south latitude.

THIS kingdom of Benguela, being the first in which these Giagas were seen by the Europeans, Battel's traf- and particularly by our countryman Battel, who lived and trafficked a considerable time fick and ac- with them, whilst they were conquering and ravaging some of its richest provinces, we judge quaintance this so much the more proper place to give our readers the sum and substance of what he with them. knew of that most cursed race from his own report <sup>a</sup> (tho' we shall find them in many other places, within our course along this coast) as he had all proper opportunities of informing himself in many particulars relating to them, which no other European ever had besides, as well as because Benguela was the unfortunate scene of the horrid depredations and conquests they made during his abode with them. His account, so far as relates to them (for we shall, for brevity's sake, omit what concerns his own history before, as foreign to our subject, and refer our reader to the two sections preceding that we are upon) is as follows:-

IT was on a second trading voyage from Angola to this kingdom, in company with a fri- His first arri- gate manned by 60 Portuguese, that, upon their coming towards the shore at the cliff of New val among Benguela, lately described <sup>b</sup>, in 12 degrees of south latitude, they observed a numerous camp them. on the south side of the river Cova, and upon their landing were accosted by about 500 of them, who came to enquire who they were, and what they came for. Being answered that they came thither to traffick, they told them in their turn, that they were Jagas, or Ginges, who came from Sierra de Leone, and had passed thro' the city of Kongo, and travelled eastward of the capital of Angola called Dongo. They were soon after followed by their chief or general, whose curiosity brought him also to the water-side; having never seen any white men before, they welcomed and invited them to bring their commodities on shore. They did so, and loaded their ship with slaves, whom they bought at a cheaper rate than they had ever done on that coast; and being ready to depart, were desired by the chief to let their boat ferry his men over the Cova; his design being to invade Benguela, which bordered on the other side of that river. This being complied with, they were conducted to his camp, where they were furnished with plenty of palm wine, cows, goats, flour, and other provisions, and houses where to lie for that night. On the next morning, before day-break, he ordered his gongo, a martial instrument, sounding like a bell, to call his troops together; to whom he declared, in a haughty speech, his resolution to destroy the kingdom of Benguela; upon Reception at which they all appeared in arms, and prepared to pass the Cova; in the doing of which they their camp. met with no small opposition from the enemy, and great numbers were killed on both sides. But this did not hinder the Giagas from getting to the other side by noon-time. The onset immediately followed at the sound of a great variety of martial instruments; but the Benguelans, unable to withstand the fury of the enemy, were soon either slaughtered or dispersed. Vast numbers of men, women, and children, were brought prisoners to the great Giaga; They invade and, amongst the former, was found the prince Hombiam Gymba, who was the chief monarch Benguela; of that country, with above one hundred of his lords, whose heads were brought and thrown make a horrid at the feet of the general; and after that, their bodies, and those of the slain, in order to be slaughter of dressed and eat by those inhuman cannibals, who prefer that flesh before any other. Here they settled themselves after their victory, and continued about 5 months; till the want of palm wine (of which they are very fond, but was now quite exhausted, there being no palm trees in that part of this kingdom) obliged them to remove their camp to the province of Bambela, about five days journey up into the land.

HERE it was that our countryman Battel, who, during these five months had made some advantageous trading journies to and from the town of Santo Paulo, found them incamped, at a place called Calicansanba, after they had ravaged and burned every place they had passed thro'. On his arrival at this new encampment, he met with a fresh welcome from the great Giaga; his camp was plentifully stored with corn, palm wine, oil, cattle, and all manner of provisions, and his Giagas wholly taken up with feasting, drinking, dancing, and other diversions. In this state of banquetting and jollity they continued another four months, making Horrid rava- now and then some new excursions round about, to supply them with fresh plunder and pro- ges in the pro- visions; which excursions became so much the longer, as the terror of their arms had spread vince of Bam- itself far and wide over the country; insomuch that the natives, at the least appearance of their approach, abandoned their habitations, and left nothing behind but empty houses, which they, in revenge, set every-where on fire, destroyed all their plantations, and left the most dreadful tokens of their savage fierceness where-ever they came. Some of the petty princes, our <sup>c</sup> author tells us, attempted indeed to oppose their fury; but with such ill success, that others, terrified by it, chose to submit, and become tributary to their chief, to avoid a worse fate. At length, after a four months stay in this place, and having probably exhausted the whole country about it of provisions, they resolved to remove to the sierras, or mountains, of Cashincabar, which are of a vast height, and abound with mines of copper, burning and ravaging all the way they went. From thence they marched to the river Longo, and having crossed it, settled themselves in the town of Calango, where they continued about six months, and thence marched into the province of Tondo, and came to the river Gonza, where the lord of that canton was uncle to the king of Angola, whose capital, a place of great beauty, they took and burned, and in the center of which they found the tomb of the deceased lord, Sbit-lambansa, covered over with great store of copper, cloth, and other valuable things, according to the custom of the country; and, what was still more remarkable, a hundred peacocks, which were kept over it alive and tame, and were esteemed, on that account, holy birds. From thence they continued their course and horrid depredations so far northward as Coanza, without meeting with any farther opposition, and advanced as far as the mountains of Cambamba, where, our author tells us, is a great perpendicular water-fall of that river, whose noise is heard thirty miles off. From this place they were driven by one of the lords named Longere, who was now a vassal to the grand Giaga, to the territory of a powerful and warlike prince, who seven years before had given a signal overthrow to the Portuguese, killed 800 of them, and 40,000 of their negro soldiers and allies. This brave lord strenuously opposed the Giaga, and had a most furious engagement with them, in which, however, failing of a complete victory, the enemy thought fit to fortify themselves in their camp, with a strong pallisado of trees, behind the fence of which they tarried some months, not without making frequent sallies against him, and committing many hostilities in his territory. All this while Battel had continued with them, and was in such high favour with the grand Giaga, particularly on account of the frequent services he did him with his musket against an enemy (for neither his men, nor any of the natives, knew any thing of the use of fire-arms) that, upon every engagement, he gave special charge to his best soldiers to take all possible care of him; who accordingly saved him from many imminent dangers, by carrying him away in their arms. It was by means of this long abode with those savages, and the confidence and friendship of their chief, that he became so much better acquainted with their manners and customs than any other European<sup>a</sup>. The only thing he was excluded from observing, was when the great Giaga was consulting his mokisso, or devil, about any new enterprize or expedition; at which time his conjurers obliged him to withdraw; telling him, that his presence was displeasing to that spirit: tho' even of this conjuring he found means to learn some of the chief ceremonies from the other Giagas, the substance of which, and other particulars relating to their religion, martial discipline, barbarous customs, &c. we shall now subjoin, in the same order in which our author had it from him<sup>e</sup>; for being tired now with his long abode with these canibals, he resolved at all hazards to give them the slip; which he accordingly did, tho' not without great difficulties and dangers, and got safe at length into the kingdom of Loango, where we shall find him again in the sequel.

THE camp or army of this great Giaga, whom Battel calls Imba Calandola, consisted of 20,000 men, commanded by twelve captains under him, each of which hath the charge of one of the gates of the camp, whilst he keeps his pavilion or residence, well entrenched in the center. He was a man of great courage, but undertook nothing without previous enchantments, and consulting his devil by sacrifices; by which means he pretended to fore-know the event of his enterprizes, and that he should never die but in the wars. On such occasions he rises before day-break, and sets himself on a stool, attended by two of his conjurers, one on each side, and about forty or fifty women standing in a circle around him, waving and flourishing a zovarus, or horse's tail, and singing. In the center is kindled a great fire, and an earthen pot set over it, with some white powder or paint, wherewith his conjurers dawb his forehead, temples, breast and belly, with long winded ceremonies and enchanting terms, which continue till sun-set; at which time they bring him his casengala, or hatchet, and put it into his hands, bidding him be strong against his enemies, for the mokisso is with him. A male child is then brought to him, which he immediately kills; next to that four men are brought to him in the same manner; two of whom he slays, and orders the other two to be killed without the camp. In like manner he orders ten cows to be killed, five within, and five without the camp, with the same number of goats and dogs; their blood is sprinkled in the fire, and their flesh eaten, with great festivity and triumph. The same ceremonies are likewise used by the inferior captains of the army, upon the like account; but neither they nor their chief make use of idols on these or any other occasions, but pretend that the mokisso frequently appears and speaks to them.

THE great Giaga Calango, in Battel's time, wore his hair very long, braided with many knots full of bambas, a kind of sea-shells, of great value among them; he wore a collar

- a about his neck of masoes, another sort of shell found upon that coast, and of great price likewise, our author says, twenty shillings each. About his waist he had a girdle made of ostrich's eggs, and round his middle a palm-cloth as fine as silk. His body was carved and cut with various figures, and every day anointed with human fat. He had a piece of copper two inches long, which hung across his nose, and at both his ears; and his body was painted with red and white. He had about thirty wives, who followed him when he went abroad; one of whom carried his bow and arrows, and four of them his cups and drinking utensils; and whenever he drank, they all kneeled down, and clapped their hands, and sang. He kept his men under the strictest discipline, and if any of them turned their back to the enemy, he was condemned to death, and his body eaten; and, the more effectually to deter
- b them from cowardice, he used to make an oration to them, from a kind of scaffold, every night, in dispraise of it, and commendation of intrepidity<sup>f</sup>.

THEIR constant method was to stay no longer in one place than it could supply them with all kinds of provisions, corn, cattle, palm-wine, fruits, &c. ready to their hands; for they neither sowed nor bred, but lived wholly on the plunder of the country, and abandoned it as soon as it was exhausted; and, what was still worse, destroyed all they could not carry away, particularly the noble and excellent palm-trees, with which this kingdom abounds, by greedily draining them, as long as they had any liquor left in them, so that they withered and perished soon after. Whereas the natives always take care to leave such a quantity of it to keep them alive, and in a condition to furnish them with a fresh supply, both of that, and c of its most beneficial fruit, from one season to another.

- THESE horrid devastations, joined to their other inhuman treatment of all their captives, they knew had rendered them so detested to the Benguelans, that they dared not venture to tarry in any place, tho' but for one night, without fortifying their camp after their manner, that is, by surrounding it with a strong palisade of the stoutest trees they could get; and for this they had always a sufficient number of stout men appointed, who completed it with surprising dexterity and expedition; and, if the time would permit, as when they resolved to make a longer stay in it, they never failed of lining their cincture, at least on the outside and top, with a thick hedge of thorns, to guard them from lions and other wild beasts. This precinct had commonly twelve gates, each commanded by one of their twelve chiefs, and
- d guarded by a sufficient number of men; their tents or houses were regularly pitched, and pretty close to each other; at the entrance of which each fighting man left his zarabhe, bow and arrows, and other weapons, so that the whole camp was ready, on the least alarm, to fall out completely armed. On these, and all other occasions, they fall on and fight with the most desperate bravery; knowing, as we lately hinted, that it is certain death to turn their backs to the enemy, and that a still more dreadful fate attends those that fall into their hands. They have another effectual way of breeding up their young soldiery to this height of martial intrepidity; these not being their own offspring, but that of such captives as they make in their excursions: for tho' they allow themselves to have many women, and these no less fertile than those of other African nations, yet they never suffer any of them to rear up
- e their children, but order them to be buried alive as soon as born; and, in lieu of them, make choice of such as are the most promising, from among those of their prisoners, to be trained up to arms, and to the plundering trade, to supply the mortality of their men. Infomuch that in Battel's time, which was but a little after their departure from Sierra Leona, they had not above twelve natural or original Giagas left alive in their whole camp; the rest being all the offspring of their captives of both sexes. These they commonly chose at about the age of 12 or 13 years, the females for procreation, and the males for war; and these last were no sooner inrolled, than they had a collar hung about their necks, in token of slavery, which was to be worn by them till they had brought home the head of an enemy, when it was publicly taken off, and they declared freemen of the canibal commonwealth, by whom the
- f unhappy remains of the captive train of both sexes were inhumanly reserved to be killed and eaten, not in time of scarcity of cattle and other provisions, but out of cruel wantonness, and in preference to all other flesh. This privilege of being accounted men, and freed from the badge of slavery, seldom failed of inspiring youths so chosen with an uncommon ambition to attain it at all hazards, and to face the greatest dangers with an intrepid boldness for the sake of it; and it was by this method that they kept up their number complete, and the fierce savage nature of the Giagan republic from degenerating into humanity and compassion.

THEIR manner of burying their dead, especially those of the male kind, is not without some manifest tokens of their savage cruelty. The deceased is not only washed, anointed, and bedecked with all his most valuable finery, but accompanied into the other world by two of his most beloved women, who are conveyed with him to his grave, with their arms broken. The body is carried to the grave in a chair, between two men, and placed in it as if still alive, and the two women, one on each side of it. As soon as they are thus deposited, a the grave, which is commonly a deep vault, is covered on the top with earth; and the relations, who are there present, sprinkle it with the blood of slain goats and palm wine, and make a funeral lamentation over it, after their manner. Those of higher rank are interred with more pomp, and the ceremonies and libations reiterated a longer or shorter number of days, weeks, &c. according to their quality. The natives of Benguela bury their dead much after the same manner; and those of the richer sort, with their most valuable goods, weapons, utensils, apparel, &c. performing many more superstitious ceremonies over their graves, than are in use even among the Giagas<sup>b</sup>. They think it the greatest happiness to leave behind them many relations, to repeat and prolong those funeral rites; and, on that account, none are reckoned so miserable, or think themselves really so, as those who leave b no kindred behind them, to perform that office for them, which some of the near survivors among them think themselves bound to continue, at proper seasons, as long as they live. But what is still more surprising is, that though they pay such a singular regard to their deceased friends, yet none of them will shew the least pity or concern for them in their sickness, but abandon and flee from them as from a plague, and leave them to expire in that miserable and destitute condition: an unnatural custom this, which reigns more or less thro' the whole eastern, as we have seen it do thro' the whole western coast<sup>b</sup>.

ALL that we have to add, with relation to the Giagas, is, that in this encampment, which was but three days journey from Mofangano, where the Portuguese have a fort, they met, in their excursions, with a river, a little to the southward of the Baya das Vaccas, in which they c found great store of gold, which they gathered up in large grains, which were washed down by the stream, and lay scattered on the sand; of which, however, they made no other use, than to grave or inlay on the handles of their hatchets, in the same manner as others were done with copper, which they look upon as the most valuable metal of the two<sup>d</sup>.

Thus far goes our countryman's account of the savage Giagas, whom he left in this encampment, to go over to the Portuguese. How long they tarried in this unhappy country after his departure, and what farther depredations they committed in it, no one has been able to tell us; tho', by their moving still northwards to Angola, and the rencounters they had afterwards with the Portuguese in that part, we may be induced to believe that they abandoned this of Benguela, at least for some time: yet, by their giving their names to some of the pro- d vines of it, as Giaga Canbuca, Giaga Calemba, and Cacoconda, it seems probable to us, either that they left some colonies there, or came back and settled themselves in them, as other tribes of them did in the kingdoms of Anfiko and Metamba, and in some of the provinces of Kongo and Angola; and we shall meet with some of them, in the subsequent chapters, more barbarous and diabolical, if possible, than those we have been describing in this.

Western Ethi-

THIS country is called Western, to distinguish it from the Eastern, otherwise called e Abissinia; of which we have spoken in a former chapter. It is also called Southern, because it is situated on the south side, or rather south-west side of it: and, on the same account, some authors likewise give it the epithet of Exterior, and Interior, in opposition to the other, which is called Interior and Superior Ethiopia. But it is most commonly known by that of Southern, from its lying on the south side of the line, with respect to Guiney, and other parts of Africa, which lie on the north side. What extent, boundaries, &c. the antient geographers gave to it we have formerly shewn<sup>a</sup>: as to its modern state, we can only say that it is much shrunk from its antient; for we do not find our modern authors better agreed about this, than the antients were about that<sup>b</sup>. The Portuguese, who first discovered this vast tract, extended the coasts of it from cape Gonzales, or De Lopez Gonzales, in thirty f minutes south latitude, to Capo Negro, under sixteen degrees twenty-two minutes of the same; containing near fifteen degrees, or three hundred leagues. They tell us, that all this vast tract, which extended likewise, where broadest, about ten degrees of longitude, or two hundred leagues from east to west, was formerly under one prince or monarch, whom they called Mani, who governed many provinces of it by his Sonas, or viceroys, whilst he gave his own name of Kongo to the whole realm, and was stiled Mani Kongo, sovereign, or, if you please, emperor, of Kongo; or, which is much more likely, took that title from it<sup>c</sup>.

a In process of time, these viceroys, or governors, grew powerful and wealthy enough to set up for themselves, and became petty tyrants of their own particular governments: after which they began to assume the title and quality of Mani; infomuch that the true and original sovereign found it difficult to preserve that part over which he governed in person, and which was more properly called Kongo; whilst, instead of only one Mani Kongo, there started up a number of other petty Manis, such as the Mani Dongo, Mani Loango, Mani Caconda, Mani Bengo, Mani Sonbo, and some others, of whom we shall have occasion to speak in the sequel; besides several others which bore an inferior title, as of duchy, marquisate, &c. At present we shall confine ourselves to three of the principal of the former; namely, of Kongo Proper, Loango on the north, and Angola, or Dongo, on the south of it (D). This division will not only prevent confusion in the following history, and help us to settle the true limits, both of each part and of the whole, but likewise of describing those kingdoms and principalities that have been dismembred from the great empire, as they lie contiguous to them, according to the best accounts we have of each<sup>d</sup>. We begin with that of

b KONGO PROPER, which is bounded on the north by the famed river Zair, or Zarab, which divides it from that of Loango on that side; on the south by that of Danda, which divides it from the kingdom of Angola; on the east, by the kingdoms of Fungono and Metamba, and the burnt mountains of the sun, those of crystal or saltpetre and silver, and by the river Verbela, or, according to a modern traveller<sup>e</sup>, by those of Coanza Berbela, and the great one of Chilandeia, or Aquilonda; and on the west by the Ethiopic sea, called also the sea of Kongo<sup>f</sup>. According to these limits, Kongo Proper extends, on that side, about three degrees from north to south; that is, from the mouth of the Zair to that of the Danda, or from six to nine degrees south latitude, but widens much in the inland, by the course of the first of those rivers, which runs winding above two degrees more towards the north, as we shall see when we come to describe it. We are more in the dark still about its breadth from east to west, for want of being better acquainted with the true situation and run of the mountains and rivers which bound it on the east. The only person we know of who hath penetrated so far into the inland, and hath given us the largest, and, in all likelihood, the truest account of all the parts of this Western Ethiopia, being most defective in this particular; not so much for want of time (E), as of proper instruments, and other helps to make his

(D) Some moderns have extended the limits of this country much farther (1); viz. on the north, to the kingdoms of Gabon and Macoco, more commonly called the Anskan kingdoms; on the east, by Danut, and the lake Zairo, a lake which our modern maps omit, as being no-where to be found; and on the south, to the kingdom of Benguela.

Another modern, and of later date (2), hath given it a still more prodigious extent to the northward, making it reach from the 15th degree north, to the 14th south latitude; according to which, its northern boundaries should reach quite to the country of the Nigrita, the eastern ones to Eastern Ethiopia, or Abissinia, and the southern to Cafraria; making a twofold division of the whole kingdom, viz. into Southern and Northern Kongo; the latter of which contains the kingdoms of Madra, Biasara, Calombo, and, in a word, what we call Southern Guinea.

But this Northern Kongo is justly rejected as chimerical and absurd; its utmost limits on that side, even taken in the largest sense, that is, including the kingdom of Loango, being far enough from reaching to the equinoxial line, and the most distant limits of Western Ethiopia beginning, as hath been observed above, at the cape Lobo de Gonzales, according to the most exact moderns, and that being situate under the first degree south of the said line (3).

the credit he gained, as well as the great employments he was entrusted with, gave him an opportunity of informing himself of every thing relating to them, with great exactness; particularly with respect to the religion, customs, manners, history, wars, product, commerce, &c. of those various kingdoms and provinces through which he passed; their towns, rivers, mountains, mines, animals, and other curious particulars, till then very little known to us.

The great hardships he suffered in those hot climates, the difficulties he was forced to undergo, in travelling through those barren deserts, dreadful mountains, forests, &c. joined to the variety and multitude of business attending his mission, and other employments, had at length so far impaired his constitution, that he was obliged to return to Rome, an. 1668, to recover his health; and there it was that he presented that congregation with a full account of all that he had observed in those vast tracts, during the space of fourteen years.

The native simplicity and sincerity that reigns thro' his whole relation, in which he asserted nothing but what he had either been an eye-witness of, or had been informed of by very good hands, gained it the universal approbation of all that read it, and was in such high esteem, as to be thought worthy of being made public to the world. The misfortune was, that the many languages he had been obliged to learn, and the constant use he had made of the Portuguese, in conversing with Europeans, had so far marred his own native Italian, that the congregation thought it a great pity so valuable a piece should suffer for want of being couched in a suitable language: upon which they desired the general of his order to appoint a proper person to put it in a more Italic dress; which was accordingly done, with the con-his observation by. The public were in hopes that this defect might have been supplied by a him, in his second voyage into those parts, or by some other of the brotherhood since his time. But we must be content with the singular discoveries he hath made in those parts, till then little known, except along the coasts, and so far as the Portuguese had penetrated into the inlands, which was inconsiderable in comparison of what our author hath seen of it, during his fourteen years residence in those parts<sup>g</sup>.

troduction of Christianity.

ACCORDING to him, the dominions of the kings of Kongo extended a great deal farther eastward and southward, before the Christian religion was introduced thither, than it hath since; a great number of those estates that were under its monarchs, either as subjects, or tributary, having withdrawn their allegiance, out of dislike to them upon that account. Most of them, especially towards the east, being of a wild and untractable nature, and living in woody and rocky mountains, difficult of access, refused not only to exchange their old superstitions and idolatry for so pure a religion, but likewise to pay any farther allegiance or tribute to a prince, who had embraced it out of complaisance to strangers, and wanted to force it upon them. Not content to oppose his officers and troops that came annually to raise the usual tribute, they made such frequent and powerful incursions into his dominions, both from the east and south, as obliged him to draw his forces nearer the center of his kingdom of Kongo, to prevent its being invaded by them; by which means it was, that so many of the remote provinces were dismembered from it, that itself was reduced, from an extent of above six hundred leagues in circuit, to less than one half of that extent.

climate.

KONGO PROPER, being situate under the torrid zone, and so near the equinoxial line, is of course subject to the same excessive heats that all those countries are liable to; intolerable indeed to strangers, but tolerable to the inhabitants, by the precautions they take against them, by the winds and breezes, rains and constant dews, which greatly abate their violence. We shall not therefore dwell longer upon that point, having said so much of it in our history of Abissinia, and other countries under the same latitude. Neither need we apprise our readers here, that these regions, being situate on the other side of the line, their seasons are opposite to those on this side; that their summer, for instance, begins when our winter doth, and so of the rest; only those that are nearer the line having theirs much longer. They commonly begin in October, and continue till February and March; during which time, the sun's rays dart with such force, that the atmosphere appears to an European as it were in a flame. But it is likewise mitigated by the equal length of their days and nights; which would be intolerable, were that luminary to continue longer than twelve hours upon it, and not be refreshed by an equal number of hours of the night<sup>h</sup>.

As their summer lasts six whole months, tho' with some difference of the degrees of heat, according as the sun is more or less vertical over their heads, so their winter is reckoned by them the other part of the year, with a proportionable difference of cold, or what they call so; tho' it is what an European, especially a northern one, would style warm or hot. These two seasons of winter and summer, which make up their year, they divide into six less considerable ones, which they call Massanza, Neasu, Ecundi, Quitombo, Quibiso, and Quimbangala.

MASSANZA enters in with the month October, which is the beginning of their spring, when the rains begin to fall, and continue during the two, and sometimes the three next months. When they do so, the low lands are commonly overflowed by the extraordinary floods, and all their seeding swept away and destroyed; this is commonly followed by a famine, which carries off great numbers of the lazy and indolent inhabitants, who take no care to lay up any provisions against such disasters, tho' they happen so frequently. This first season they reckon commences at the time the plants begin to pullulate.

THE second, called Neasu, begins about the end of January, when the green fields and lands have shot their product to their full height, and want but a few days to ripen them fit for harvest; which they have no sooner gathered in, than they begin immediately to sow them a-fresh for a second crop; their lands commonly yielding them two harvests<sup>i</sup>.

He was not long after sent thither a second time by that learned body, with the title of prefect of all these missions, and probably, with a view to supply, by new observations, what was wanting in the geography, and other parts of his relation; which, notwithstanding those important chasms, met with a general approbation in all other respects. As we have not heard since that he hath published any thing farther on that subject, another author of the Dominican order hath endeavoured to supply some of these deficiencies, in a French version the hath given us of his book from other writers (1). But as to what relates to the true situation and distances of places, and other geographical points, they cannot be attained to but by nice observations made upon the spot; and this is what few missionaries, except those of the Jesuitic order, ever trouble themselves with.

<sup>a</sup> THE third and fourth seasons, called Ecundi and Quitombo, are frequently blended towards The third or the beginning of March, when the more gentle rains begin to fall, and continue so to do, fourth autumn. till the month of May. It is the greater or lesser quantity of rain that falls during that interval, that distinguishes those two seasons: during the rest of the time, the air is either very clear, dry, and hot to a high degree; or, if the clouds are over-charged, they commonly are inflamed, and burst out into the most dreadful lightnings and thunders, without shedding the least drop of rain, tho' they seem loaded with it. These two seasons last till about the beginning, and sometimes till the end of September.

THE two last, viz. the Quibiso and Quimbangala, make up their short winter; this consists The two last, not in frost and snow, which are never seen here, nor any-where under these climates, but or winter. in dry blasting winds, which strip the earth and all the trees of their verdure, till the next Massanza, which is their spring, begins to restore them to their vernal bloom.

THEY divide the year into twelve lunar months, and begin it in September, like the Jews; Division of the and, whether by intercalary days or months, do, like them, bring it to so near an exactness, year into 12 as not to anticipate or retard the beginning of it, which falls, like ours, on the autumnal months equinox. One might imagine from it, that they had this calculation from the eastern whence. Ethiopians or Abissinians, as these probably received it from the Jews<sup>1</sup>, had they had formerly any relation or commerce with them, which they do not seem to have had; for, in other cases, they appear to be so unskilled in, and negligent of, all chronology, that it is next to impossible for the ablest chronologist to fix the epocha of any event they relate, unless they

BUT if they had received this division of the year from either the Abissinians or Jews, it is Of the week more than probable they would likewise have followed that of the months and weeks, and into four days. made this last to consist of seven days, whereas their week contains but four days; three of which are appointed for work, and the fourth for rest and religious exercises. Unless we should suppose, that either their devotion, or, which is more probable, their laziness, induced them to retrench two days from the former, that they might have more frequent opportunities of indulging themselves on the latter. For our author assures us they are very careful to abstain from all sorts of work on the fourth, which is their sabbath day<sup>2</sup>.

<sup>d</sup> IT is to this shameful indolence that we may ascribe the small product which the inhabitants reap from their lands; which, were they better cultivated, and fenced from inunda- Fertility and tions, might be made capable of yielding them more plentiful harvests, and a much greater product. variety of grain, pulse, fruits, and other nourishment. The vast and regular rains which constantly fall in their due season, and the mud which is produced by the gentle overflows of their rivers, were they properly improved by industry, would not fail of enriching their low lands, naturally fat and deep, and commonly yield a double, and sometimes a triple Extreme indolence. crop yearly. This plainly appears from the plenty and variety usually produced by those lands which are in the possession of the Portuguese; but the negroes had much rather run the risk of a most pinching dearth, than be at the tenth part of the pains which they see The heavy them take: to speak more truly, they seem to think it below them to use any exercises but slavery of those of dancing, leaping, hunting, shooting, and such-like; the rest of their time they spend in smoking, and downright idleness, and commit the laborious part of their household affairs, such as digging, sowing, reaping, cutting of wood, grinding of corn, fetching of water, &c. to their slaves, or, for want of such, to their wives. Nothing is more common their wives. than to see these poor creatures thus toiling in the fields and woods, with a child tied to their backs, and fainting under their excessive labour and heavy burdens; and, which is still worse, with hunger and thirst<sup>3</sup>. What is yet more surprisingly shameful is, that tho' they have plenty of domestic animals, which they might easily make use of, both for cultivating their grounds, and other laborious services, and see the Portuguese do it to great

THEIR ground produces variety of grain, tho' no corn or rice but what is cultivated by Divers sorts of the Portuguese. We begin with their maize, otherwise called Turkey or Indian wheat, which grain. grows very strong and well laden: of this the natives make their bread; and as it takes little Indian wheat, more from its sowing to its full perfection than three months, they seldom fail of two crops of it; and some of those which are ever so little cultivated, will, with industry and forecast, yield even a third crop. This grain, being well ground, is made into a kind of coarse bread, or is boiled in water into a pap. They likewise cultivate another sort not unlike to a second sort it, which they call massambola, or maubella, and which the Portuguese stile Saracen wheat or of it. bread; they never fail of two crops of it every year, as it will thrive in a dry season better

A third grain, of a windy nature. than the former sort. A third kind they sow which they call massingo, whose grain is not much unlike our millet, but larger and plumper, and hath a more agreeable taste and flavour; but is attended with this inconveniency, that it is apt to give the cholic to those who have not been used to it, either by reason of some inherent windiness, or, as they pretend, by its being too nourishing, and hard of digestion. But this ill quality seldom affects any but Europeans, the natives having stomachs of ostriches, able to digest the hardest food.

They have still a fourth sort of grain, which they call luno, which is of a triangular form, something like what the Dutch call buck, and we French wheat: it is smaller than the Indian, but much more strengthening and nourishing. Their country yields plenty of it, which makes some amends for their want of industry.

THEY also cultivate variety of pulse, as beans and pease, which likewise constitute part of their food; among the bean sort, they have a small kind, of a reddish hue, which they call npalla, and are very fond of; it is of a very good flavour and taste, when dressed a little more elegantly than these poor natives generally do. They have another sort which they call nitanza, and which is commonly known by the name of the Brasil bean, because it was probably brought hither from thence by the Portuguese. It is reckoned very good at the first, but is apt to degenerate in time; however, the curious know how to prevent that defect; but there are so few of that sort among the natives, that this kind bears little or no value among them, and is only in use among the Portuguese, who can have a fresh supply of it from year to year.

Of the pease kind, that which is called ouvado is very small, and grows upon a low shrub, which blossoms and yields its fruit all the year round, and will last three whole years. Some of the same kind are to be found in several islands of America, which bear seven whole years. That which is called jucuba is likewise small, and of a whitish hue, but difficult to be boiled tender; this kind, it seems, grows under-ground, in a kind of pod or purse. It bears a yellow flower, in scent much like a violet; the pease itself, if boiled soft, hath a fine taste, and sits light upon the stomach. But what the natives of Kongo more commonly live upon, and which suits their palate as well as their idle disposition, is a kind of nut like our filberds, which grow of themselves, and are to be found every-where; every nut that falls to the ground, producing a new shrub by the next year.

THEY have scarcely any fruit-trees but what have been transplanted thither by the Portuguese, and multiplied themselves in time; all the rest are wild, without blossom or fruit, or any thing but their leaves, which afford indeed a constant verdure, because the new buds spring up as fast as the old leaves drop off. The palm-trees grow here in great number and variety; they reckon no less than eight sorts of them, all of excellent use in their kind. But as most of them are exotic, and brought thither from America, we shall postpone what we have to say of them, till we have given an account of those which are natural to the country.

WE begin with that which they call aliconda, a tree of such monstrous bulk that ten men cannot fathom it round; the natives, who call it bondo, say that it is fit only to kill men and beasts, its wood being easy to rot, and becoming so exceedingly brittle, that a hard blast of wind will throw them down; for which reason they never build their huts near them, lest their fall should crush them to death, or their fruit, which is of the bigness of a large gourd, and easily broken from the tree, should knock them down. They nevertheless make some advantage of both; the bark of this tree, being well beaten and macerated, yields a coarse thread, of which they make their strong-ropes; and if it is macerated in water some days, and, when dried again, beaten with iron bars, or large clubs of hard wood, it becomes like a large piece of cloth, with which, tho' coarse, and of no duration, the natives cover their middle from the girdle to the knee. The shell or rind of the fruit, which is hard and tough, like that of a gourd, or calabash, being cleared of its pulp (which when dried yields an insipid meal, and may, in time of scarcity, be made into a thick and nourishing pap) serves for vessels of several uses, and proper to preserve water in, to which it gives a pleasant aromatic taste. The small leaves are often eat likewise in time of scarcity, and the large ones serve to cover their houses, or, being burned, to make good soap.

THE insanda resembles, in many respects, our laurel; and its bark, being beaten and macerated like that of the aliconda, is also made into a kind of stuff or cloth, but much finer, and is in greater esteem among them. Persons of the highest rank, and even monarchs, wear it about their shoulders like cloaks, and use it for girdles about their middle. Even the women of all degrees are fond of wearing them in the same manner, and embellish their heads with it, adding other ornaments and trinkets, more or less rich, according to their condition.

- a THE mulemba is not unlike to it, nor to what we call the royal laurel; its leaves are ever-green, and from its bark is made a cloth or stuff, which excels the former in beauty. The mulemba.
- THE manglos commonly thrive best along the Coanza, Danda, and other rivers, and even by the sea-side, and in marshy grounds. Some filaments shoot downwards from their branches, and taking fresh root in the earth, grow up again into new trees; infomuch that one single trunk may in time become a forest, like many others of a like and even different kind, which grow in Asia and America in great quantities (F). The mesica grows as large as our walnut-trees, and out of its wood drops a medicinal gum, of a warm nature. The colleva is likewise very large, and bears a fruit like a citron, but much bigger, whose kernels, about the size of a small nut, are reckoned to strengthen the stomach, they being so bitter, that the negroes are obliged to soak them in water before they can eat them. Manglos multiply into forests.
- b The zaffo is tall and large like our oaks, and produces a fruit not unlike some of our largest plums, and of the colour of fire, which being roasted in hot embers, yields an aromatic scent, and is a very delightful strengthener of the brain. The cassanevo's leaves which are like those of our laurel, and green all the year round, yield a kind of resin of an exquisite smell; its fruit, like our wild crabs, yields a very sour verjuice, disagreeable to the taste, but an excellent remedy against fluxes and catarrhs, and against a kind of disease very common in Kongo, which covers the whole body with ulcers. From this tree, instead of blossoms, issues a yellow gum, which, when roasted, is eaten with pleasure and safety, but when raw is very prejudicial to the stomach, being of such a caustic nature, that it will raise a blister or an ulcer where-ever it touches the naked flesh. The mesica.
- c The gegera is a fine stout tree, whose fruit, not unlike a ripe orange, but of an oblong shape, yields a liquor very agreeable to the taste, and good for the stomach. The niceffo, called by the natives of Angola maongio-acamburi, is about six feet high, and produces a very large fruit, not unlike a pine-apple, whose rind incloses from 100 to 200 oblong ones, like a small lemon, but of an exquisite taste, exceeding that of the finest melon; it begins to appear laden with it a few months after it hath sprung out of the earth, and keeps bearing it successively all the year round, so that one sees them in all their different degrees of maturity, some quite, some half ripe, some green, and some just budding. The cola, or as the negroes call it, the toglow, is a fruit of such fine relish, and so much admired in this country, that the natives are seldom without some of it in their mouths, and chew it as the Indians do their betel. Colleva.
- d THE last native plant we shall mention, is that which they call purgera, of the height of a filberd-tree, from whose nuts they press an excellent medicamental oil, which, burned in a lamp, yields a most agreeable scent. Zaffo.

WE come now to give an account of their various sorts of palm-trees, which having been in a great measure described in other parts of this work<sup>2</sup>, we shall just mention what is most peculiar in those of Kongo. We hinted above that they reckoned eight or nine sorts of them; the most common of them is that whose fruit, like our pine-apples, contains a vast number of kernels, of the breadth of a filberd, and of an exquisite taste when full ripe; the oil that is extracted out of them is likewise very pleasant, and used in cookery instead of butter; about the trunk of the tree grows a soft downy kind of moss, with which the rich commonly fill their pillows. The Giagas, a neighbouring nation, apply it to their wounds, as we do a cobweb on a cut, with good success. Most of the Moors cover their houses with the leaves of this palm-tree, as being very broad, strong, and lasting; its wood would be no less useful for building, if the negroes had but the art of sawing it for that purpose. They draw from these trees, by incision, a pleasant liquor, not unlike wine, but which, for want of knowing how to keep it, will turn sour in five or six days<sup>3</sup>. Various kinds of palm-trees.

e The fruit of the common sort.

- f THE second, which is not so tall, grows best in watery grounds, and produces much such a liquor as the former, though not quite so good: from between the foot of its branches its fruit grows downwards, whose kernel is delicious, and rind hard and smooth, and fit to be made into tobacco-boxes, and other such trinkets. The third is the coco palm-tree, too well known in the East and West Indies to need a farther description. 4. That which they call jamata bears excellent dates, and might produce very good wine, but the incision is apt to hurt the tree. 5. The matoba which yields a pleasant wine, but it is apt to spoil the stomach and blood, by reason of its acidity. 6. The smaller palm-tree, which yields much the same kind of pleasant, tho' unwholesome liquor, hurtful to the Europeans, tho' not to the natives who are accustomed to it. 7. The coccata, the fruit of which is of the bigness of one of our large melons, and yields a very pleasant food and liquor, and some oil; the pulp, mixed with sugar, may be made into an excellent jelly. 8. The Kongo palm-tree, so styled because it thrives better in that country than any of the former sorts; its liquor is reckoned as valuable as the wine which comes from Europe, tho' it is rather a kind of milk, sweet and agreeably tart, but will grow sour in three or four days, and is so strong and heady, that a pint of it is sufficient to intoxicate a person. If no incision be made to this tree, to extract the liquor above-mentioned, there will grow at the foot of its root some leaves, and a large fruit big enough to load a man. Its rind is hard and prickly, and the inside not unlike a peeled chestnut, in colour, taste, and substance; and, when roasted, is the common food of the poorer sort, to whom it costs nothing but the trouble of fetching it from the woods. They likewise extract a fat oil by dint of boiling, with which they dress their victuals; but the Europeans only use it to burn in their lamps. The last sort is that which they call maongir and macebecco, and is a kind of banana, which grows in Kongo and Angola in pretty large quantities, and need not be here described <sup>b</sup>.

THEY have likewise variety of shrubs of different heights, which yield very pleasant fruits, fit for those hot climes, but a detail of them would be too tedious. One of them, which they call capano, or the fig of hell, produces a kind of nut, out of which they extract an oil for the lamp, and which they likewise use in the composition of their ointments, plasters, &c. The leaves of the shrub, burnt to ashes, make a good lye, with which the natives wash their whole body. The conde, or count, a title given in all likelihood to a tree pretty common in Kongo, Angola, and Loango, and hardly any-where also to be found, is of two sorts; the one pushes its branches upwards to a point, and out of their stem grows a fruit of an ash colour, and in figure like a man's fist clenched. The inside is full of partitions like the pine-apple; but, instead of kernels, is filled with a white thickish juice, which, when condensed, is like that of our new cheese in colour and substance, but melts in the mouth, and hath a pleasant taste and flavour, and is refreshing to the stomach and bowels: its seeds, which are of a blackish hue, and in bigness like those of a cucumber, are reckoned great coolers of the blood. The second species of conde is not much unlike the first, tho' the substance of its fruit is neither so white nor soft, but exceeds it in lustre and flavour.

BESIDES these, the Portuguese have taken care to plant several other fruits, as oranges, lemons, citrons, granates, cedars, and others; which thrive as well as in their natural soil. <sup>d</sup>

VINES have been likewise brought hither from Candia, and where they are well cultivated, as in the gardens belonging to the capuchin friars, thrive to admiration, and yield excellent grapes twice a year. It is not so with the rest, which, for want of due care, run into leaves and branches, and the fruit seldom comes to its full ripeness; this neglect is, it seems, common in all their conquered dominions, and is owing partly to the fear of hurting the Portuguese wine trade, and partly to prevent the abuse of it among the Moors, who are much given to drinking it, and all other strong liquors, to excess <sup>e</sup>.

AMONG those that are of the aromatic kind, we shall only mention the two principal, 1. The dondo, a shrub, which is said to have the taste, smell, and every other quality of the cinnamon, and is used by the natives and Portuguese here instead of it. 2. The inquoffo, a kind of creeping vine, which bears a great multitude of small clusters, whose seeds are of the bigness of the coriander, but have the scent, taste, and strength of pepper, and are used in the stead thereof, in their cookery, as well as in their physical compositions, and are found to have double their warmth and virtue. It were endless to go through the vast variety of other trees, shrubs, plants, herbs, roots, &c. of the medicinal kind, which grow scattered and naturally in this country, some yielding odoriferous gums, others oils, berries, seeds, &c. Among the last, we shall take notice of the manioc, of which they make a good sort of bread, and is the same that is used in other parts of Asia and America; the potatoes, tambas, juganas, and others of the like kind, which yield a good taste and nourishment. Wheat is the only thing which the ground will not produce; it pushes forth indeed the straw and ear, the former of which grows high enough, we are told, to hide a man on horseback, but the latter is empty, and without one single grain fit for use (G). <sup>f</sup>

(G) This, at least, is the account which father Cavazzi, and other missionaries, give us of the wheat which hath been sown in any of the three provinces of Loango, Kongo, and Angola. But father Labat, who had observed the same thing in some of the American islands, where he lived a considerable time, tells us farther, that he had the curiosity to examine those ears more carefully, and had found some few grains; and that, having sowed them afresh, they produced very long ears, full of large and heavy grain. Whence he conjectures, that if the Portuguese had tried the same experiment in either of those three countries, it might, perhaps, have had the same effect. He therefore supposes they neglect cultivating that valuable commodity, lest it should affect the great trade of meal which they drive there (3). But here we cannot forbear observing, upon the whole, that they are so very much infected with the Moors disease of indolence and incuriousness in other cases, besides that of their vines and wheat, even where less care is required, and their health and pleasure

- a THE grafs likewise in their low lands grows fo high, thick, and rank, that it becomes one of the moft dangerous receptacles for great variety of wild and voracious beafts, and venomous infects. This makes travelling exceedingly hazardous, as they have few beaten roads in the whole country, and travellers are obliged to march over it, thro' vaft plains, in continual danger of rousing the former, or being bit to death by the latter; to fay nothing of the vaft unwholefome dews with which that grafs is covered, during fome part of the day, which wet both blacks and whites to the fkin, and caufe colds, cholics, and other grievous diforders in them, efpecially in the latter, who go almoft naked, and are more affected with them. The only way they have of guarding againft that nuisance, is to fet the grafs on fire in the hot weather, when it is quite parched by the heat of the fun; but even this cannot be done without the greateft danger, becaufe both the wild beafts and venomous reptiles, being furiously roused out of their retirement by the flames, will fly at all they meet in their way, tho' in ever fuch numerous companies; and there is no other way of avoiding their fury, but by climbing up the tallest trees, and defending one's felf by fire-arms, or other weapons. In this cafe the natives have a much better chance, who naturally climb up the higheft trees with furprifing fwiftness, whereas the whites are forced to make ufe of rope-ladders, which they commonly caufe their blacks to carry about them againft fuch emergencies, and to go up and faften one end of them to fome of the branches. But we fhall have farther occafion to refume this fubject, when we come to fpeak of their roads and way of travelling<sup>d</sup>; we fhall conclude this article of the product of thefe countries (in which we have chofen to join the three above mentioned provinces together, as it is nearly the fame in them, to avoid being obliged to repeat the fame things over again) with a fhort account of its flowers, which, tho' wild, and negligently fcattered by nature, in almoft every field and grove, yet yield a much nobler and more delightful profpect than thofe which we, with fo much care and coft, cultivate in our gardens, not only by the prodigious variety of their colours, but by the vaft quantity of heads which grow upon one ftalk; they feem indeed here to have loft their natural fragrancy in the day-time, that being in fome meafure wholly exhale<sup>d</sup> by the too intense and immoderate heat of the fun; but this is amply compensated after its fetting, and more efpecially a little before its rifing, when their sweetness is again condensed, and revived by the coldness and dews of the night, after which they exhale their various refreshing fcents in a much higher degree than ours.

Variety of wild flowers of exquisite beauty; lose their fragrance in the day-time.

- Thus the lilies, which naturally grow in great plenty in the fields, vallies, and woods, excell thofe of our gardens, not only in their extreme whiteness, but much more in a delightful fragrancy, without offending the head, as thofe of Europe do, by their faintish sweetness. The tulips, which there grow wild, tho' they are generally called Persic, but whether becaufe they were brought from thence, or from their near refemblance to them, have fomething fo furprizingly charming in the variety and combination of their colours, that they dazzle the eyes of an intense beholder; neither do their flowers grow fingly, but with ten or twelve upon one ftalk, and with this double advantage over ours, that they dif- fuse a very reviving and agreeable sweetness, and continue much longer in their full bloom. Of the fame nature are their tuberoles, hyacinths, and other native flowers, which fpring up in vaft groups of 100 and 200 from one root, tho' fomewhat fmaller than ours, fome of them finely variegated, and all of them yielding an agreeable fmell.

Tuberoles, &c.

- THEIR rofes and jessamines, and fome other exotics brought thither from Europe or America, come up likewise in as great perfection, but require a constant fupply of water, and diligent attendance, to prevent their degenerating; the American jessamine in particular, inftead of fingle flowers, will grow up by dozens in a bunch; fome of them of an exquisite white, and others of the colour of the moft vivid fire. And thus much fhall fuffice for the various product of their ground: and if we have not enlarged the catalogue or description of them, as other authors have done<sup>e</sup>, it was to avoid repeating what hath been already faid in other volumes of this extenfive work, and to confine ourfelves to the mentioning thofe, which are, either in the whole, or in part, peculiar to the three kingdoms of Kongo, Loango, and Angola, where they are found to be much the fame.

- WE come now to fpeak of the moft confiderable rivers which fertilize that of Kongo, properly now fo called; the firft and moft confiderable of which is the Zara, or Zair, which divides it from the province of Loango on the north, and is emphatically ftyled by the natives the great river, and the river of Kongo. It is indeed the more worthy particular notice, not only on account of its largeness, rapidity, and number of iflands, and the vaft tract of land sure might naturally infpire them with a little more diligence. This we mean particularly with refpect to their culinary and other refreshing herbs, fragrant and delightful flowers, which a fmall attendance might improve to a greater degree of perfection; yet are they, like the natives, contented to take them in the homely drefs in which nature offers both to them.

it overflows at particular seasons, when it looks more like a sea than a river, but more espe- a cially because our modern geographers have written so variously about its source, course, and other particulars relating to it; attributing it to the same origin with the famous river Nile, which we have elsewhere described<sup>f</sup>; and, after a long and almost opposite course to that, making it discharge its rapid torrent into the Ethiopic, as the other doth into the Mediterra- nean sea (H). It must be indeed owned, that we know as yet very little, if any thing, of its real source or course; neither doth it begin to take the name of Zair, till about 160 leagues, or 8 degrees, above the place where it falls into the ocean; from whence it flows with great rapidity in a course westward, bending a little to the south, without receiving any considerable rivers. b

Those that fall into it before, and which seem to form it, rather than be received into it, are the Bancaro, Vambra, Coango, and Barbela or Vervel; all of them pretty considerable, but especially the Coango, which springs from, or rather runs thro', the lake of Kilanda, or Aqui- londa, after it hath passed thro' the kingdom of Metamba, and continuing its course in an almost northward direction, joins the two former ones above-mentioned, after having crossed a tract of above 140 leagues from its supposed spring head, in the territory of Giaga, or Cazzangi, to its fall into the Bancaro. The Vambra or Umbra springs out of the mountains, which part the kingdom of Fungono from that of Numeramai, al. Monoemugi; its course is almost due west, and is supposed to be about 110 leagues. The Bancaro comes down from the territory of Macoco, or Anfiko; and its course, before its fall into the Vambra, is about 80 leagues west c and by south, and 20 leagues lower is joined by the Coango.

THESE are the chief rivers which form the Zair, which runs about 40 leagues lower before its first cascade, which is the most considerable of all, tho' it hath several lesser ones before it discharges itself into the ocean. These cascades, joined to its natural rapidity, the vast number of rocks and islands which lie scattered at small distances, and the sea-horses, crocodiles, monstrous serpents, and other destructive creatures, which swarm in them, render the navigation of it exceedingly difficult and dangerous, either upwards or downwards. The mouth of it, to which some give three, and some five or more leagues in breadth, discharges such a vast and rapid torrent, that the boldest and most experienced pilots sail into it with fear and dread; neither is any wind strong enough to force the ships upwards against the d stream, let them make all the sail they can, or employ ever so many hands at the oar. The only way they have, is to take the advantage of the repercussion which those rocks and islands give to the waves, the same which we observe the piers of a bridge to cause in the stream, whilst the current runs with its usual swiftness thro' arches. But this requires singular care and industry, and is seldom done without great danger<sup>g</sup>.

THE foremost of these islands, between which the Zair discharges its waters at seven different large chanel into the sea, are inhabited by Moors; and are planted by them, especially about the coasts, with some of those trees we lately mentioned, of whose leaves they make a coarse kind of cloth (I): and it is by the recoil which the stream meets with from each of them,

DAPPER, DAVITY, CAVAZZI, LABAT, &c.

(H) Pigafet, an author otherwise very judicious and exact, is the first who broached this notion (4), in which he hath been followed by many others (5) with such implicitness, that we need the less wonder at the good capuchin father Cavazzi's having taken it for granted (6), notwithstanding his long abode in that country. The natives were not able to undeceive him, and the duty of his mission would not permit him to expatiate so far as to trace it to its origin, so that it was natural for him to follow the general stream of those writers, as they had Pigafet, without farther enquiry; especially, as nothing had till then appeared in public in confutation of that error, and other geographers had ventured to assign the same source to the Niger, now more commonly known by the name of Senegal; which last hath been since clearly exploded by his translator Labat, in another work (7).

When we speak of these authors assigning the Zair the same source with the Nile, we do not mean its real source in the empire of Abissinia, formerly described (8), but three different lakes in this Western Ethiopia, from which they supposed those two famed rivers to spring; viz the Zambra, the Zaira from which the Lelunda and Coanza flow into the Zair, and a third lake which is formed by the Nile; but chiefly the first, which is reckoned the center, from which all the rivers of this Southern Ethiopia flow. The truth is, the spring head of the Zair is not as yet discovered with any tolerable certainty, and we may say the same of its course, till it comes into the kingdom of Kongo; or, to speak more properly, till its confluence with the Bancaro, which is the first considerable river it receives into its bosom, as we shall see in the sequel.

(I) All these islands, which are numerous, and of various extent, are well inhabited, and the natives are very dexterous in the construction and management of their canoes, which will carry 200 men, and in the conducting them through all the numerous rocks and islands of the river; the wood they build them with is called licondo, and is tough, and not easily broke, if it should hit against any of them. The two principal of those islands are Bommo and Quintalla; but neither they, nor any of the rest, pay tribute to the king of Kongo, or much regard him; neither is he very sollicitous about it, so long as they contribute so much, by their dexterity and industry, in carrying on so useful a them, that vessels are as it were tossed forward against the current, they being set very thick and near to each other all the way up. But a great number of them are wholly desert, and a receptacle for the voracious creatures above-mentioned, which prey indifferently on men, beasts, and fishes, and cause horrid devastations both on the water and the land. We have already hinted that the Zair overflows at some seasons vast tracts of ground, and by its rapidity carries almost every thing before it. We shall only add an observation more upon those floods; viz. that they happen here in a quite contrary season to what they do in Egypt; that being situate on the opposite side of the line to this: which is an evident proof, that the Zair and Nile flow from different spring heads, and vastly distant from each other <sup>h</sup>.

THE next in rank is the Danda, which parts Kongo Proper from the kingdom of Angola. This is also a considerable river, and is navigable quite up to the town of Icoa; that is, about thirty leagues and upwards. It gives its name to the province of Danda, and fertilizes all the countries thro' which it passes, without causing such vast overflows and devastations as the Zair; neither is its navigation so difficult or dangerous, unless it be on account of the numerous swarms of crocodiles, sea-horses, and monstrous serpents, which infect it, and make a dreadful havock amongst them that frequent it in canoes and small vessels <sup>i</sup>. Its course is from south-east to north-west; during which it receives the Lucale, and some other less considerable streams. The shores on each side, from the first entrance into its mouth upwards, appear to be much of the same height; yet in its course, especially when swollen by the fallen rains in April and May, frequently carries off some of its banks from one side to the other, or carries it into the sea <sup>k</sup>. The Bengo, and Lucale, and Danda, are supposed to spring from a lake among the high mountains on the east. On the northern shore of its mouth is a fort which Mr. De Lisle calls Danda Capitantria; which serves as a guard of the frontiers between Kongo and Angola.

OTHER rivers between the Zair and Danda are the Lebunda, Doce, Ambriz, Loze, Orzo, and Lutana, with a number of others of less note. The Ambriz, or Ambrisi, springs from the same lake, on the eastern mountains of Tenda, and runs westward into the ocean between the mouths of the Lebunda and Loze. It runs by the town of Saint Salvador; its course is rapid, chanel deep and large, its waters sweet but miry. It is only navigable by barges, by reason of the many rocks and islands that stop the mouth of it. About forty leagues up the river is a ford, where passengers are carried over on men's shoulders, on paying a certain duty to the king. The others have nothing remarkable enough to be worth farther notice.

THE kingdom of Kongo Proper, as well as those on the three sides of it, were, as was hinted at the beginning of this chapter, divided into several petty monarchies and principalities, dismembred from, and independent of, the antient monarchs. And when the Portuguese had once made themselves masters of it, and persuaded the natives to embrace the Christian religion, they thought fit to honour those petty states with some European titles, in order to give them a kind of lustre and dignity. At the first they divided the kingdom into six large provinces, to which they gave the titles of duchies, counties, and marquises, which were afterwards subdivided into lesser signories or lordships. Those provinces are situate as follows <sup>l</sup>.

ALONG the sea coasts the county of Sogno, and the great duchy of Bamba.

ON the north, the duchy of Sundi and the marquise of Pango.

ON the west, the duchy of Batta.

AND the inland, the marquise of Pemba (K).

THE duchy of Bamba is situate between the rivers of Ambrisi and Loze; the last of which parts it from the marquise of Pemba on the east, and the Ambrisi from the county of Sogno on the north. Along the sea coasts it extends itself still farther; viz. northward, to the river Lelunda; and, on the south, to that of Danda, which parts it from the kingdom of Angola. The governors of this province bear the title of dukes, and are always some of the first princes of the royal family, and as despotic and arbitrary in their government as if they were really kings, notwithstanding the care and pains their monarchs have taken to keep and commodious a commerce along that river, which would otherwise, in all probability, languish or be at an end without them (9).

(K) To these some authors add the following territories; viz. Dembo Amulaza, Dembo Ambula, Dembo Quingenga, and Dambi Angorga, together with the small duchy of Owando, and the canton of Sowa Covanga, concerning which we find little else besides their names,

The viceroys very tyrannic. them within their due bounds. The misfortune is, that those viceroys, by engrossing all the power into their hands, are become too stubborn to be curbed, and might quickly raise themselves to an absolute independency, if the Portuguese monarchs should offer to interpose their authority; so that they are in some measure forced to suffer them to fleece and oppress their subjects, and to be contented with such tribute as they think fit, instead of what they ought to pay the crown<sup>m</sup>.

Salt a rich commodity. THE duchy of Bamba is one of the largest and richest of the whole kingdom; its soil fertile, and able to produce all necessaries of life in great plenty, were but the natives industrious in cultivating and improving of it: but, where they groan under such an oppressive government, what encouragement can there be for them to be so? The sea coasts produce likewise a prodigious quantity of salt, which is easily made, and would yield an extraordinary revenue to the crown, were the duties of it duly paid, a great deal of it being exported into foreign countries, besides what is sold upon the spot for the use of the natives; but these governors have found out means to sink the greatest part of it, with impunity, into their coffers.

The fishery of zimbis, whose shell is the current coin. WHAT would still add more to their revenue, is the fishery of the zimbis, or little sea snail, whose shell is the current coin, not only in this and the two neighbouring kingdoms, but in other distant parts of Africa, and is caught along these coasts; so that this alone would be sufficient to enrich this kingdom to a high degree, since the sea itself furnishes them with such plenty of money, without employing any other minters than fishermen (L). To this, several authors have added a third kind of treasure in this province, viz. the mines of gold, silver, quicksilver, copper, tin, and iron, which are to be found in the mountainous parts of them; but there is much reason to doubt of the reality, and much more of the pretended richness of them: one thing is certain, that the iron mines are the only ones that are suffered to be made use of, and that there are very severe laws against meddling with any of the rest<sup>n</sup>. We shall have a more proper occasion to speak on this subject in the sequel.

2. Province of Sogno. THE second province of Kongo Proper, is the county, as it is dignified, of Sogno, or Songho, which extends itself, like the former, westwards to the Ethiopic sea, and is bounded on the north by the Zair, on the south by the Lelanda, which parts it from the duchy of Bamba above described, and on the east by the countries of Pango and Sundi. Its territory is mostly sandy and barren, but yields great quantities of salt along the sea shore; and, on the inland, produces great variety of palm-trees, which thrive best in such lean lands, and on whose fruits the natives chiefly subsist. The capital of this province is called Banza, or Banza Sogno, and is situate at about three leagues distance from Cape Padrone, on the south side of the mouth of the Zair. The town is small and thinly inhabited, subsisting chiefly on its commerce on the Zair, by which it receives most of its provisions, and those in such small quantity, that the Europeans justly wonder how they can subsist with so little, and much more so to see them not only chearful and contented, but singing and dancing under what seems to them a doleful scarcity, as if they enjoyed the greatest plenty.

Old wooden church. THE only thing worth notice in this town, is a church which the capuchin friars found in it, at their first coming into those parts, an. 1645, when the congregation de propaganda fide sent them thither to supply the want of regular and secular priests. Neither hath that structure any thing remarkable except its antiquity, being supposed to have been built ever since the coming of the Portuguese into that province, about the year 1482, and planting the Christian faith in it; which, if true, is the most surprising, as it is built only of timber, plaistered over on both sides with stiff clay<sup>o</sup>.

This province the first converted. THIS province being, as we shall see in the sequel, the very first of this kingdom which received the gospel, and the count of it the first baptized prince, whose example the king followed soon after, it is no wonder there should have been a great number of churches built by those first converts, from the earliest times of their conversion, which have continued ever since; especially as we are told that the natives have preserved the Christian faith in much greater purity than is to be met with thro' the rest of the kingdom. Accordingly, we find no less than three in this small town of Banza; the first of them stands within the circumference of the palace belonging to the counts, and is dedicated to the virgin Mary; the second stands at some distance from it, and is the burying place of those governors; the third dedicated to St. Antony of Padua, adjoins to the monastery of the capuchins, and serves them as

Paolo*, of which we shall speak more in the sequel, and about a quarter of a mile from the shore; these being of a smoother and finer brown, or grey, are most esteemed in all those parts. The kings of Portugal have the sole property, and make the same advantage of them, that other princes make of the richest metals; or, rather, have the power and art of purchasing the most precious metals and merchandizes, with those despicable trifles (2).

a a chapel, as well as a parish church. Besides these three principal churches, there are several other inferior chapels, not only in this capital, but all over the province, every Sova, or inferior governor, being obliged to maintain one in the place where he resides (M).

THE third province of Kongo Proper is styled the duchy of Sundi; it is situate in the inland (N), beginning about 13 or 14 leagues north-east of S. Salvador, capital of the whole kingdom, and is bounded all the way north by the Zair, yet so as not to prevent the dukes of it encroaching gradually on great tracts of land on the other side of that river. However, it is bounded on the south by the duchy of Batta, and marquifate of Batta; on the east and north-east, by the kingdom of Macoco, and the crystal rocks, at the foot of which the river Bancaro falls into the Zair. Its capital, which is situated about six leagues south of the great cataract of that last river, is called Banza Sundi, to distinguish it from that of Sogno; or rather from Banza, the capital of the whole kingdom, in the province of Pemba, of which we shall speak in its proper place, and which is emphatically so called on that account; the word Banza, in the Ethiopic, signifying a Court or place of residence. But as to this of Sundi, we find nothing worth notice said of it.

THIS province, or duchy, is subdivided into several governments, the greater part of which are removed from the capital, and extend themselves a great way into the mountains on the eastern side, which being very difficult of access, the inhabitants pay little regard to their governors, and are often insolent, and raise commotions in the whole kingdom; for tho' they have, like the rest, been converted to christianity, yet they retain so much of their old heathenish customs and superstitions (O), that the missionaries have not been as yet able to make them tolerable Christians, notwithstanding the indefatigable pains they have been at, most times at the hazard, and sometimes the loss of their lives<sup>p</sup>; nor hath the civil power ever been able to civilize them, so far as to cultivate their lands, though fertile, and well watered by a great number of rivers. Their mountains are said to have mines of the richest metals, but are not permitted to be opened, except those of iron, which they work into all kinds of instruments, both for agriculture and war. Only one mine of copper, of a most beautiful yellow, which is found among the mountains on the north side, and near the great cataract of the Zair, is suffered to be wrought; and thither the inhabitants of the kingdom of Loango come to buy it in great quantities.

d THE marquifate of Pango, heretofore called Panga Logos, had then the title and prerogative dignity of kingdom, but hath lost both ever since the king of Kongo subdued and reduced it to the rank of a province. It is bounded on the north by the duchy of Sundi, and the river Vervel or Berbela; on the east by the mountains of the sun, and the country of Dembo; on the south by the duchy of Batta; and on the west by the same river Vervel. Its capital is called Banza Pango, and is situated on the banks of the same river, near its conflux with the Coango; it hath nothing extraordinary, its territory and inhabitants, as well as those of the whole province, are much the same with those of Kongo, of whom we shall speak in the proper place<sup>q</sup>.

e THE duchy of Bata, or Batta, is situated on the south-west of Pango, hath Dembo, Amulassa, and the saltpetre mountains on the east; on the south the marquifate of Incussu, and the burnt mountains; and Kongo and Pemba on the west. It is of a considerable extent, and was heretofore called Anguirima, or Aghirimba, and was a kingdom of itself, till both king and people submitted to the kings of Kongo; on what account our authors could not learn. Some think that of Sundi was once subject to it, and that it extended itself on the two sides of the Zair; and that the kingdoms of Lulca and Kongo Rbioncango, as well as the provinces of Nfonzo and Nsongo, and other territories belonging to the barbarous Giagas, on the north

(M) The counts of this province have a great number of vassals and tributary governors, among whom is the marquis of Chova, who holds the first rank under them, and hath a vast territory adjoining to that of Mombalassi, or Mombalassingi, and pretend to some particular privileges and immunities, on account of their being obliged, in some measure, to be always in arms against them (3).

(N) Hence the mistake of several writers is manifest, who tell us, that this province was the first that was converted by the Portuguese to Christianity; for, as they came thither by sea, they must have made their way through the province of Sogno, to come at that of Sundi, which is near three days journey from the sea. It is therefore more probable, that they converted the first before they ventured into the second. This mistake probably was owing either to the inadvertency of the writer, or the carelessness of the transcriber, in writing Sundi instead of Sogno (4).

(O) These mountaineers seem to be descended from, or to have so strongly imbibed the barbarous customs of, the Giagas, a savage nation, which we have already spoken of in the preceding chapter, that neither the preaching of the Portuguese missionaries, nor the authority of the government, hath hitherto been able to dissuade or deter them from them. They are, in some measure, always up in arms, fierce and cruel in their wars, eat the flesh of their captives, and chuse to live upon plunder and rapine, rather than by industry; and tho' their country be fertile, and able to produce the necessaries of life, yet they prefer a vagrant life, and making excursions on their neighbours, in which they commonly are guilty of the greatest outrages and cruelties.

side of the Zair, depended on, and were tributary to it<sup>r</sup>; however that be, the country is a mostly fertile, and plentifully watered by variety of rivers, and produces several sorts of grain: the inhabitants are more civilized and affable than their neighbours, and were more easily converted to christianity, as well as more firmly grounded in it<sup>r</sup>.

THE capital city of this duchy, called Batta, is not considerable for any thing but the fertility of its territory, and its being the residence of the governors of this province, who are allowed to have a number of arquebusiers in pay, to defend it from the incursions of the wild Giagas, or Jagas, who inhabit near its eastern frontiers, beyond the mountains of the sun and saltpetre, living chiefly by ravaging their neighbours on all sides, and would do the same by this, were they not over-awed by those troops. The road between this capital and that of the whole kingdom, now called S. Salvador, hath, we are told, a great number of b houses and hamlets on both sides; a thing uncommon in these parts<sup>r</sup>.

THE last province of this kingdom is styled the marquisate of Pemba, and is situated almost in the center of it; and tho' of much smaller extent than any of the rest, hath always had this singular advantage, that its capital hath ever been the cradle, throne, and burying place, of all the kings of Kongo, whether gentiles or christians, as it hath been since the residence of the viceroys, or, to speak more properly, the chief governors of the marquisate. This city is seated at the foot of a mountain, called by the Portuguese the Burnt Mountain, tho' different and distant enough from a ridge which bears the same name, and spreads itself along the east side of the county of Ambuila. The territory of it is well e watered, as is the whole province, not only by the Lelunda, which runs quite through it, from east to west, but by the Kai Ambrisi, and some others, which equally contribute to its fertility, and the riches and happiness of its inhabitants. For the constant residence of the king and his court, which is very numerous, doth not a little excite the people to industry; whilst the great consumption of all provisions, and other merchandizes, improves their commerce, encourages their diligence, and increases their wealth; the fruits of which they quietly enjoy, without being exposed to the extortions of foreign viceroys, or the excursions of barbarous neighbours, by being so happily situated in the heart of the country<sup>r</sup>.

BEFORE we go to other remote provinces within the same dominions, it will be necessary here, according to our promise, to give our readers a short description of the capital of the whole kingdom, known now by the name of Banza S. Salvador, and is by Marmol<sup>w</sup>, or d rather his French translator D'Ablancourt, called Amâas Kongo, if he did not really mistake the word Amâas for Banza. However that be, that of Salvador was afterwards given to it, and is the name by which it is known by the Europeans (P). It is situate almost in the center of the province of Pemba, upon a very high hill, mostly solid rock, about two leagues in compass, and near fifty east from the sea, and on the south-east side of the river Zair. It is beautifully shaded with variety of fruit-trees, such as the palm, lemon, and orange-trees, and yields a most delightful prospect all around, whilst it commands all the country about, as far as the sight can go, without being obstructed by wood or mountain; and on the river's side the descent is very steep. The Portuguese gave it, on that account, the name of Oteiro, that is, a vantage prospect, watch-tower, or singular height*; and it was e chiefly for this reason, that the monarchs of Kongo chose it for their residence, being next to inaccessible to an enemy, and consequently neither easy to be surprized or attacked. The common highway that goes up to it is broad but winding, and the ascent of about five miles in length.

ADD to this, that its situation being, as we lately observed, almost in the center of the kingdom, the kings were the more ready at hand to send their orders, or a speedier relief, to any part of the realm; and that the top of the hill having a large plain, well watered and manured, and covered with hamlets, farms, and other houses, containing in our author's time about 100,000 souls, and feeding a great number of cattle, the place could be easily supplied with all manner of provisions. The mountain hath likewise some iron mines of f singular use to the inhabitants, who fabricate it into weapons, and instruments of agriculture; so that it was not without great reason and fore-cast, that those monarchs chose this spot for their usual residence.

THE town stands on an angle of the mountain, facing the south-east, and enjoys a serene and healthy air, and being so strongly situate by nature, hath no walls except on the south side; and these were not built till the reign of Don Alphonso, the first Christian king of

(P) We have already observed, that the capital of the kingdom bore the same name with it; being known by the name of Banza Kongo, till Christianity was planted among them; since which the name of Kongo is still retained by a small town at some distance from St. Salvador, on which account the capital of Batta, which was also called Kongo, is called Kongo de Batta, to distinguish it from the other.

- a. Kongo, who caused the quarter of the Portuguese to be surrounded with them, in order to secure them from insults.

HE likewise caused his palace, and all the royal houses, to be walled round, leaving a wide space within, wherein to build a palace and burying-place. The top of the hill is covered with houses, which stand pretty near to each other, most of them belonging to persons of quality, who join such a number of apartments within one cincture, that they appear like little towns; those which belong to the inferior people run in a strait line, and form very handsome streets; they are mostly spacious, but their walls are all of straw, except some which the Portuguese have caused to be built of brick, and covered with stubble or straw.

- b. THE royal palace is a spacious structure, surrounded with a four-square wall, and has the appearance of a little city; but the wall that faces the Portuguese quarter is the only one that is built of stone and mortar, the other three sides being only of straw, though neatly enough disposed; the walls of the inner apartments are of the same materials, but covered with hangings, or mats curiously wrought. The inner court contains gardens and orchards, adorned with alleys, arbours, and pavilions, handsome enough for the country, tho' neither grand nor costly. Here are ten or twelve churches, whereof the cathedral and seven others are within the town, and three within the prince's castle. The jesuits have a college, where four of them are constantly employed in teaching the Latin and Portuguese, and in catechising the people. The town is supplied with plenty of fresh water by two fountains, the one in the street called St. Jago, and the other in the palace, without being at the charge of keeping up or repairing the aqueduct. Besides these, there is, on the east side, near the foot of the hill, a spring of excellent water, which is called the Vese, and falls into the Lelunda, which serves to water the adjacent grounds. They have here few sheep and oxen, but great plenty of goats and hogs, which they inclose in the night in some kind of parks adjacent to their houses; they have a large market on the piazza before the great church, which is furnished with all sorts of provisions. The rest of the square is surrounded with spacious houses, having each a large gate which opens towards it, and are mostly inhabited by noblemen, as are also many others in the suburbs of the city, and in the country round about. That part which is inclosed, and called the Portuguese city, is reckoned about a mile in circuit, and the king's palace nearly the same; the walls about each of them are very thick, but the gates of neither of them are either shut, or kept under a guard. It is not easy to ascertain the largeness of the rest of the city, the houses not adjoining so regularly on the out-skirts as in the center, but we are assured that it was very populous in Lopez's time.

The royal palace.

- c. THE adjacent plain, as well as the vallies below it (besides the various fruit trees lately mentioned, which yield a constant verdure, as well as plenty of fruit) produce several sorts of grain, the chief of which is an exotic, brought thither from the banks of the Nile, called leuco, in shape and bigness like the millet; the meal of it, when ground, makes very good bread, and is preferred by the natives to that of wheat, which last they only use at the mass. Here groweth also great quantity of maize, called by them Mazza Kongo, or corn of Kongo, but which they use only to fatten their hogs with; their pasture grounds likewise yield very good grass, with which they feed a greater number of cattle than in any other part of the kingdom. And thus much may suffice for the description of this metropolis.

- d. WE come now to the several other lesser provinces of Kongo Proper, which are independent of the six principal ones we have now gone thro', and among which the greater part are barren, and inhabited only by savages, who either lurk in their thick and impenetrable forests, or bleach upon their rugged and inaccessible mountains, and both of them lead a life little different from that of brutes. The names of those provinces, for we know little else concerning them, are Zuiona, Zujamazondo, Ndamba, Nsuffo, Nsellajurva, Alombo, Nsolo, Nzanga, Marfinga, and Mortonda; the three last of which confine upon the country of Ajacoa, whose nation is more barbarous and inhuman than any of the rest.

Other provinces.

- e. THE duchy of Ovando, situate between Kongo and Angola, and now in the possession of the Portuguese, was heretofore subject, or at least tributary to, the kings of Kongo; but the people have since withdrawn their obedience, and put themselves under the protection of the Portuguese monarchs. Its capital, called St. Michael, is situate upon the river Danda, but is a place of no great note, though the prince of this province hath some considerable feudatories, and among them the counts of Ambuila, who took formerly the title of Mani, or princes, tho' then tributary to the kings of Kongo. The county of Dambi, and some other inferior ones, followed the example of that of Ovando, and shook off the yoke of the kings of Kongo, to put themselves under the protection of the Portuguese, induced to it by the hopes, and perhaps the promises, of being less oppressed, and of enjoying more liberty under these, a than they did under their own monarchs.

Other wild provinces that pay tribute by force.

As to the rest of those more distant provinces, especially towards the east, they still acknowledge, in some measure, the authority of the kings of Kongo, but pay them no other tribute than what they are forced to by the troops, or small flying armies, which are yearly sent among them to raise it; and then, if they can but have timely notice of their coming, they immediately retire to their inaccessible mountains and forests, with their families, cattle, and effects, and return not till they are well assured those forces are gone far enough from them. It is even dangerous to exasperate them too far by these military executions, which are however very common in most parts of Afric, because they are always ready to repay themselves with advantage, by their sudden incursions into the richer provinces adjoining to b them, where they commonly commit dreadful outrages, as well as load themselves with spoil; after which they quickly return to their lurking places, where they know they cannot be come at without great danger and difficulty. However, they all own so far a subjection to the king, that in time of war he may draw what succours he pleases from their respective districts, in proportion to their largeness; and these readily come armed after their manner, tho' probably more from the prospect of plunder, than any affection to him. The worst of it is, that they are but wretchedly armed, and worse clothed, having nothing upon them but a piece of cloth or skin about their middle; and tho' they fall on with great fury, and most hideous outcries, on the enemy, yet, either upon the fall of their leaders in the first onset, or on a slight wound, or even a superstitious omen, will betake c themselves to flight, and can hardly ever be rallied again<sup>a</sup>, as we shall see in the sequel.

THE kingdom of Kongo, like most other parts of Africa, breeds a prodigious variety of living creatures, both wild and tame, but especially of those of the wild kind; of which we shall have the less to say, as we have already spoken of them in some former volumes. Among the terrestrial, the elephant, justly esteemed the noblest, most useful, and docile, is so well known as to need no farther description than what we have given of it elsewhere<sup>b</sup>; these are mostly to be found in the province of Bamba, which abounds with woods, pasture, and plenty of water, in which they delight much, and wash and bathe themselves in the heat of the day. They commonly go in troops of an hundred or more, old and young. Some of them are here of such a monstrous bigness, that the print of their hoof hath mea- d sured four, and some of them as far as seven spans in diameter<sup>c</sup>. There is commonly found in the ventricle of those that are grown old, a stone of the bigness of a hen's egg, which being hardened in the air or sun, is reckoned an excellent bezoar. From the hair that grows upon their tails, and that of another animal they call induvro, the natives, especially the women, weave themselves collars, bracelets, girdles, and other ornaments, with variety of figures and devices, which denote their quality, and are in such esteem, that the hair of two elephants tails is reckoned the price sufficient to buy a slave with; the reason of which is, that the natives have not the art of taming them, but are obliged to send their bravest and stoutest men to hunt them in the woods; which is not done without great labour and danger, they being here exceedingly fierce. The most common way of catching e them is by digging deep holes in the ground, the top of which they cover with branches and leaves, as is practised in most parts of Asia. And this it is that makes their hair more scarce and valuable; insomuch that both the men and women take singular delight to attire their heads and other parts of their bodies with it, which they do in a very agreeable manner; and a person must be very indigent indeed, who will not afford to wear some ornament made with it, notwithstanding the dearness of it (Q)<sup>d</sup>.

WE do not find that this kingdom breeds any rhinoceros's; but by the quantities of their horns which are brought thither, and the variety of uses made of them, both in physic and otherwise, we are inclined to suppose that they have them from the Nazichi, or some other neighbouring countries (R). (Q) This noble and gigantic creature is yet frequently destroyed by the sting of a small insect, which they here call insondo, and is not much bigger than an ant; this insect getting into its trunk, causes such a stimulation, that the beast, not being able to bear the pain of it, quickly grows mad, running and beating itself against trees, rocks, or whatever comes in its way, till it falls down dead (5).

(R) One of our authors mentions a horned creature, which is mostly to be found in those provinces which lie near the center of the kingdom, and which the natives call abada, and some neemba. He owns he never saw one, but speaks of it only upon their credit, as bearing a resemblance to the rhinoceros, and having a horn just above the nostrils. But as it hath only one, and its hide, instead of being scaled, is smooth, like that of a cow, it may be more properly ranked in that class, than in that of the rhinoceros (6).

(6) Labat ex Cavazz. tom. i. c. 9, p. 169. mals, a mals, are here in great plenty, and do much damage, as they do every-where else; also monkeys of a vast variety of sizes and shapes. The zebra, or, as the Portuguese call it, the zebra, another wild animal, well known for its surprising swiftness, and the extreme beauty and regularity of its streaked skin, is likewise found here, and hunted by the natives, who esteem its flesh as a very dainty food, and its hide a valuable commodity to send into Europe.

THEY have here likewise a great abundance of buffalos, and wild asses. The dante seems peculiar to this country; it is shaped and coloured much like an ox, tho' not so large; its horns are like those of a he-goat, but very smooth and shining, and of a blackish hue, of which the natives make great variety of pretty baubles. The skin of this creature is commonly bought by the Portuguese, and sent into Germany, to be tanned and made into targets, which are then called dantes. The natives make use of the raw hide dried, to make their shields; which are so tough, that no arrow or dart can go through them, and large enough to cover the whole body. This creature, which they call impangazza, hath two horns growing out of the forehead, and in other respects is not unlike the buffalo. It is vastly swift of foot, and, when wounded, will follow the scent or smoke of the gunpowder, with such fury, that the hunter hath no other way to avoid it, but by climbing, with all possible speed, up to some tall tree, by the help of a rope-ladder, which they always carry with them upon such occasions, and take care to fasten to some branch before they venture to fire. The wounded creature, finding its enemy to be out of its reach, stays at the foot of the tree for him, and sits not from it till a second, or perhaps a third shot, hath laid it dead under him. Their flesh is very good to eat; upon which account not only the natives, but the lions, tygers, and other beasts of prey, wage continual war against them; but nature hath given them such an instinct to guard against the latter, that they commonly go in large droves of seldom less than an hundred; which, when attacked by them, dispose themselves into a ring, with their horns outward, with which they defend themselves with surprising agility and strength. One sees them here of different colours like our cows, some brown, some grey, and others black. Their marrow is reckoned a warm restorer of paralytic and decayed limbs, and their flesh a wholesome and dainty dish<sup>f</sup>. Elks, though commonly supposed to live only in the colder climes, are here in great quantities, and of large size. The natives call them neocco, and hunt them for their flesh, horns, and hides, but much more for their hoofs, which, when the creature is killed in a proper attitude, and at a proper season, they reckon an effectual remedy against the epilepsy and apoplexy (S), being worn next to the skin. They make their hides into short boots, to defend their legs and feet from thorns, when they are obliged to go through their thick forests, where the paths are commonly very narrow and full of them.

THE impalanca is of the shape and bigness of a mule, and its hide is spotted with divers colours; it hath two horns growing upright upon its head, twisted about from the root, according to the number of its years, and drawing upwards to a sharp point. The flesh of it is white, fat, and tender, and fit to eat at all seasons, except in their rutting time; but it is chiefly valuable for the stone that is taken out of its ventricle, which is reckoned an excellent antidote against all poisons, if taken out soon after the beast is killed, and dried either in the air or sun. Stags and others of the deer kind, as well as wild goats, are here very numerous; the former are called by the general name of golungos, and the latter by that of viadi, or bambi. Neither of these two kinds have any horns except by chance, and then scarcely two inches long. It is in the ventricle of these, when they come to be old, that the genuine bezoar is found. Their flesh is delicious, except in rutting time; but many of the superstitious heathens abstain from it, from a notion which their priests have put into their heads, that it infects those that eat it with the leprosy.

THE nsossi is of the bigness of a cat, and of an ash-colour, and hath two small horns on its head. It is perhaps the most fearful creature that lives, ever in motion, and starting

(S) According to them, this noble creature is very subject to the falling sickness, but carries with it its own cure; so that, upon the first warning it feels of its approach, it immediately falls to scratching itself behind the ear with its hinder hoof, and recovers quickly after. This, says our author, is the only proper time to shoot it, and to cut off the foot with which it scratched itself. The difficulty is to find them in this attitude, and yet no other time will have any effect; the hoof receiving its virtue by its friction against the horn. This foot, according to them, must be cut off when the sun is in Aries, for no other season will serve but that. It must be done moreover, before the elk hath coupled with any female; for, after that time, it will have no virtue. And as all these difficulties must of course enhance the price of such an extraordinary medicine, so the buyer of it cannot but run great risk of being cheated, supposing the reality of such a virtue, and much more so if it be only chimerical (7).

or running at the least noise or breath of air; even when it is drinking, it swallows one a single gulp, and runs away, as if pursued, and returns with the like fear, till it hath satiated its thirst; it doth the same when browsing on the grass, at every blade it takes in its mouth. use of its skin. Its flesh hath an exquisite taste, and the natives prefer its skin to that of any other creature to make strings for their bows.

Danger in hunting it.

THE nfima, or civet cat, is the true creature from which that odoriferous drug is taken, and when genuine, which is what one seldom meets with, is valued at the rate of gold dust; the hunting of it is dangerous, by reason of its strength and nimbleness, and its dreadful biting when it is caught. The fura is a kind of land rat, which burrows underground, like our moles, and whose flesh is so exquisite, that a feast among the grandees would be looked upon as defective without it. Yet there are some sects among the gentile natives, who, like the Jews, look upon the eating of this creature, and some others of the same kind, as unlawful<sup>g</sup>.

Several kinds of wild cats. Wild dogs fierce and dangerous.

CAMELIONS swarm in this country: we need not give our readers a description of them, as they are so well known, but shall only observe, that they are so far from living on the air, or on small flies only, that, upon the opening of some of them, their stomach hath been found to contain a variety of other food, such as the flower of the manioc root, the seeds of sundry fruits and herbs. They have several sorts of wild cats, as the gingi, nsossi, and maimoni, whose furs excel those of the finest tygers, in their beauty, variety, regularity of their streaks and spots. The forests also swarm with wild dogs, who, like the wolves, prey upon the tame cattle, and are so fierce, that they will fly upon armed men, and surround whole droves of cows, goats, or sheep, leaping upon them with as much fury as the fiercest lions could do. Their teeth are exceeding keen and sharp; they never bark, but make a dreadful howling when famished, or in pursuit of their prey. We could name a great variety of others, both small and great, and so different in their shapes and sizes, that the natives themselves know not under what class or kind to rank them, nature seeming to sport itself in these hot climates, with such strange variety of productions, as would require a volume to describe them (T). What we have already said, may more than suffice, for such an extensive work as this, concerning the wild beasts of this kingdom<sup>h</sup>.

As to their tame ones, such as oxen, sheep, hogs, horses, mules, asses, &c. though they might easily make them useful and profitable, as they have them here in great numbers, yet such is their pride and indolence, that they rather chuse to let them run wild, and be devoured by the wild kind, than to reap any benefit from them, either by breeding, or breaking them for riding, agriculture, or any other uses. They dare not even get upon a horse that hath been broke by the Portuguese; and these make but little use of them in their journies, because they can be more commodiously carried in their palanquins, or hammocks, by their slaves, who are in a great measure the only beasts of burden and labour. However, where they have been more conversant with the Portuguese, they have learned of them to inclose cows, sheep, and goats, for their use; especially the grandees, and those of the richer sort. But the chief benefit they reap from them is their milk, of which they are very fond, and drink it by itself, but have not yet learned to make butter or cheese with it<sup>i</sup>.

Land and sea fowls. Ostriches. Peacocks.

IT would afford matter sufficient for a long chapter or two, to speak of the vast variety of fowl, both of land and sea, which this kingdom affords. Among the former, their ostriches are of a surprizing bigness and beauty, and in great plenty. Their feathers, mixed with those of the peacocks, which are here no less numerous and beautiful, are used instead of ensigns and standards, and made into delightful umbrellas. The king of Angola, we are told, keeps vast numbers of the latter in a wood, surrounded with high walls, and suffers none in his dominions to breed or have any of them, because he uses their feathers in his royal ensigns<sup>k</sup>.

TURKIES, geese, hens, and ducks, both wild and tame, are here also in vast plenty; and pheasants are so numerous and familiar, that the boys take them alive in their gins. The same may be said as to the prodigious quantity of pigeons, doves, wood-cocks, and

(T) We cannot pass by a singular kind, which, tho' a quadruped, never sets its feet upon the ground but it dies soon after, but keeps itself constantly upon the trees. It is called entiengia, and is very small, and its skin so beautifully spotted, that none but the kings of Kongo, the princes of the blood, and such nobles as obtain the privilege from him, have the liberty of wearing it. And even the kings of Loango, Cacongo, and Gey, receive that extraordinary fur as a considerable present and a particular favour.

The same may be said of the fine beavers, which are chiefly found in the province of Batta, near the banks of the Zair, whose fur is so exquisitely fine, that none but the king, and such nobles as have obtained that favour from him, are permitted to wear it (7).

- a other smaller birds, which are common in all these countries, and need no farther description. The fongo, or vuichi, so called from the noise it makes when it hath discovered some wild honey, to allure travellers to come and share it with him, has been spoken of in our account of Abissinia<sup>1</sup>, and they are both here and there so cherished by the people, that it would be dangerous for any stranger to do them any hurt. The honey-bird.

- THE next kind of birds in favour among the natives, is the parrot, of which they have the greatest variety, both for size and colour; particularly a small sort, not much bigger than a sparrow, but of a most lovely shape, and the most delightful colours. But the most esteemed of all, are those which they style, by way of excellence, the birds of music. They are somewhat bigger than our canary bird, their bills red, their feathers of the same colour, some of them green or mixed, and only their bill and feet black; others are grey, others dun, and some all white, or all black; which last sort is the most admired for the sweetness of its note, but much more so for some articulate sounds they give, which would incline one to believe, that they speak as well as sing. This last kind is so much esteemed through the whole kingdom, that persons of rank have, from time immemorial, taken singular delight in keeping them in cages and aviaries, for the sake of their surprising melody<sup>m</sup>. Variety of parrots. Music birds.

- ON the other hand, as the Kongoes are superstitious to the last degree, there are several kinds of birds which they look upon as ominous, and are so terrified at the sight, or hearing of them, that if they were going upon ever so momentous an expedition, if they were met in council, or were going to engage an enemy, with ever so great an advantage, the flight or cry of such birds would throw them into a general panic, and disperse them in the utmost haste and confusion. The most dreaded of the ominous kind, are the crows, ravens, and such-like ravenous ones; bats, owls, and especially the great owl, which they call, in their tongue, kariam pamba, which is the name they give to the devil<sup>n</sup>. Ominous birds. The great owl called by the devil's name.

- BIRDS of prey, such as eagles, vultures, falcons of sundry sorts, sparrow-hawks, and others of the like nature, are here likewise in great quantities, tho' never bred, or used by the natives, for the game. Herons, bitterns, and some others of the like voracious kind, commonly abound in their marshes, lakes, and other washes. Among these, they have a noble one, in shape and size like a crane, with a red bill and feet, and feathers of a most beautiful red and white, intermixed with grey, brown, and other shades; that which the Portuguese call the pelican, is of a large size and whitish colour. It will swim a good while under water, and hath such a wide throat, that it will swallow a whole fish at once. Its stomach is reckoned so very hot, and such a strong digester, that the natives wear the skins of it upon their breasts, when their appetites fail them, in hopes to reap the same benefit from it<sup>o</sup>. But the most surprising of this kind, is that which they call the fisher, which flies up, and keeps himself still, at a great height in the air, with his head bent downwards, whence it discerns the fish that swims below, whether in the sea, or in rivers; and when he perceives his prey under him, plunges down with great rapidity upon it, and never misses carrying it off, unless, which is often the case, some stronger one of the same kind, snatch it out of his jaws. This creature is most fond of that fish which swims in shallow and sandy waters, in rapid rivers and cataracts, and runs the risk of dashing itself into pieces against rocks, or the hard bottom, by the vehemence of its fall<sup>p</sup>. Birds of prey. The pelican. The fisher. Whence so called.

- THE fish kind is in this part likewise, as in other maritime countries, in great plenty and variety, both from the sea, and from the multitude of rivers, which we have elsewhere described; we shall content ourselves with mentioning only some few of the most curious, without entering into a particular detail of the rest. The pico marina, so called from the resemblance of its mouth to the beak of a wood-pecker, is a sea-fish of a large size and prodigious strength. It hath four fins on its back, three under its belly, and one on each side of its head; its tail is large and forked, by which it cuts the waves with surprising force and swiftness. It is at war with every fish that swims, and with every thing it meets in its way, without being intimidated by the largest vessels; a surprising instance of which we are told by some missionaries, whose ship was attacked by one of them, near these coasts, in the dead of night: the violence of the shock which it gave to the vessel quickly awakened the captain and the rest of the people, who immediately ran to that side of it where the shock had been felt, where they perceived, by the help of the moon's light, this huge monster, as if fastened by its forehead to the ship, and making the strongest efforts to disengage itself; upon which some of them tried to pierce him thro' with their pikes, but he was got off before they could accomplish it. On the next morning, upon visiting that side of the vessel, they found, about a foot below the surface of the water, a piece of its beak stuck fast into the wood, and two or three inches of it sticking out. They went presently after to visit the inside of the ship, and discovered about five or six inches more of the point of it, besides what stuck within the thickness of the wood; so that if he could have drawn it clear Plenty of fish. The pico, a strong and dangerous fish. An instance of it.

The sea-raven. THE corvo marino, or sea raven, is about six feet long, and big in proportion; but what this creature hath the most singular, is the stone that is found in its head, to which the natives ascribe some medicinal virtues which we dare not vouch, and the delicate taste of its hard rowe, which is still more admired when dried in the sun, and becomes as hard as a stone. The requino of America, or, as the Italians and Spaniards call it, tuberone, or tiburone, and pesce cana, is too well known to want a description, only we are told that it is most dangerous in these parts when the male and female begin to couple <sup>r</sup>. The cholone is another sea-fish, of which vast quantities are caught at the mouth of the river Coanza, and on the coasts of the province of Loanda; the Portuguese are no less fond of catching it than the natives, on account of an oil which is drawn from it, which they esteem an excellent remedy against wounds, burns, &c. This oil is drawn first by exposing the fish in the sun, till it hath done dropping it, and afterwards by laying it over the fire, which forces out the rest of it; both are reckoned very good, but the former is most esteemed. The last we shall mention of the sea kind, is that which they call the sea elephant, not for its bigness, it being scarce above eight or nine inches long, but because it hath a proboscis like it. This, and that called by the Portuguese squilone, are about the same bigness; but the latter is a fresh-water fish, and is in great request for its exquisite taste and fatness, so that it is mostly eat without any sauce; it is likewise remarkable for a soft kind of down that grows about its mouth. But the most wonderful of all of the fresh-water kind, is that which the natives call ngullu-a-maza, and the Europeans, improperly enough, pesce donna, or woman-fish, seeing they are here of both sexes, and neither of them bears any the least token of the female softness; the head of it is almost flat like that of a frog, and its mouth to the full as wide, shewing two rows of teeth, white and small, like those of a dog, and with scarcely any chin underneath; the eyes are round, large, and protuberant, the nose flat, and nostrils large and wide, the forehead small, the ears long and large, like those of a cropt mastiff; the hair long and harsh, hanging a good way down its back, the neck thick and short, and its shoulders very broad; the breast or dugs full and plump, the flesh from thence downwards below the navel hairy or rather bristly; the sex well distinguished, the arms of great length and very sinewy, with five fingers to each hand, and three joints to each finger; each finger being joined to the other by a thin membrane, like the feet of a duck. From the lower belly downwards, it is one continued fish, covered with large scales, and ending in a forked tail; it is covered behind with a thick and loose skin, reaching from the neck down to two thirds of its body, with which it can cover itself around, and carry its young ones under it. From all which circumstances our author conjectures the male to be the triphon, and the female the najade, mentioned by the antients.

Where mostly caught. THIS surprising creature is caught in the rivers and ponds of this kingdom, especially in the lakes, where they shelter themselves under the reeds and weeds that grow in and about them; and as the males and females are seldom parted from each other, the natives kill them both without mercy, notwithstanding their loud and doleful cries. Their flesh is well tasted, and much admired by the Africans, whose stomachs can digest any-thing; but unwholesome, and sometimes very pernicious, to the Europeans, who nevertheless catch them, when they find them in any of their rivers, by making large holes along the banks filled with water, into which they throw some dead fish, which they immediately go to devour, and, being exceedingly greedy and sluggish, become an easy prey to them. The natives ascribe some extraordinary virtues to the small ribs, and the two little bones that grow behind the ears of of this creature, neither worthy of our credit or notice <sup>s</sup>. And thus much may suffice for their fresh-water fish, which might be here in much greater plenty, were not their lakes and rivers so prodigiously infested with swarms of sea-horses, and crocodiles of a monstrous size and length, which make the most terrible devastation, not only amongst the fish and cattle, but even among the long-boats, and other vessels, which row or sail up and down; inso-much that some of them will, by their strength, overturn pretty large wherries, and devour the people that are in them. We have already described those amphibious destroyers in other places <sup>t</sup>, and shall only add, that the natives set a value upon some stones of the bezoartic kind, which are found in their paunches, and esteem them to be excellent antidotes against poisons, and the bite of venomous creatures. They likewise find between their breasts and shoulders, some kind of tumours or swellings like boils, the bag of which contains within it a brownish liquid substance, which being inspissated by the sun, exceeds the finest musk in the world, but is apt by time, or by being too much exposed to the air, to evaporate, and lose its odoriferous scent. Their eggs, likewise, which they lay by hun-

a dreds upon the banks of rivers, and cover with sand, to be hatched by the sun, are reckoned such excellent food, that the natives are very fond of gathering them, tho' they run no small hazard in doing it, as well to feed upon them, as to prevent their multiplying too fast; tho', with all their diligence, they cannot prevent their rivers and lakes from swarming with them <sup>ⁱ</sup>.

THEY are likewise infested with a vast variety of serpents, some of them of a monstrous length and thickness, such as we have described in our history of Abissinia, and other parts of Africa*; rattle-snakes, vipers, and other venomous reptiles, whose bite is immediate death, if some powerful antidote be not speedily applied. Some of them poison by their breath, which they retain some time in their lungs or mouth, and then blow upon the object with such force, that it suffocates it, whether man or beast; others emit a kind of corroding juice out of their mouths, which will deprive a person of his sight, unless a proper remedy be quickly applied; and even then the eyes will be greatly impaired by it, and remain in a constant convulsive motion. The bama is of the amphibious kind, and ever at war with the crocodile; and some of them have been found with one of them in their belly, half digested; but this kind is not reckoned venomous, and their flesh is esteemed exquisite meat. There are others which are small and thick, which the natives call nhambi, and of which they are most afraid; because, being of the colour of the bark of a tree, and keeping themselves twined about it, they are not easily perceived, and their bite is of the most deadly kind. The leuta's skin is sleek and smooth, and beautifully variegated, but its venom is such, that the very touch of the creature is affirmed to throw a person into violent convulsions: the natives make use of its gall as an efficacious antidote, not only against its venom, but likewise against that of any other creature. There is still another sort more beautifully spotted, with red, white, and black, the colours bright and lively, but the red predominant, which makes the creature look like a piece of fine spotted coral; upon which account the Europeans, both here and at Fernambuca in America, call it biscia di corallo; but its venom is not the less dangerous, notwithstanding its beauty<sup>⁷</sup>.

SCORPIONS, and other venomous insects, both flying and reptile, are here likewise in such variety, that our readers would be easily tired with the description of them, especially as they are common to all this part of the world. The most pernicious and dangerous kind of them is the ant or pismire, of which they reckon no less than six several species of different colours and sizes, and all of them formidable, both on account of their prodigious number, and the mischiefs they do, not only to the fruits of the earth, but even to men and beasts, whom they will surround in the night in such swarms, that they will eat them to the very bone (U). Some of them infest the houses in such numbers, as to undermine the very foundations, and plague all kinds of inmates, almost, and sometimes quite, to death. Others lay so thick upon the paths and highways, that one cannot move a step without treading upon them, and having one's legs and thighs almost devoured by them. A third sort of a white and red colour, tho' very small, will gnaw their way through the hardest wood, penetrate into a strong chest, and in a little while devour all the cloths, linen, and every thing that is in it, except metals and stones. A fourth sort, small and black, leave a

(U) It is even a common practice, we are told, among the kings of Angola, to condemn persons guilty of some atrocious crimes to be stript naked, and tied hands and feet, and thrown into a hole where these small insects swarm, where they are sure to be devoured by them in less than twenty-four hours, to the very bones. But these criminals are not the only ones who are obnoxious to the jaws of these little devouring insects; the most innocent persons may, even in their own houses and beds, have their flesh eaten off their bones in the space of one night. This obliges the natives to be careful where they lay themselves down, and to kindle a small fire, or at least to make a circle of burning hot embers around their beds.

This caution is still more necessary in the country villages and hamlets, where persons are otherwise in danger to be attacked by millions of them in the dead of night. In such a case, the only expedient to save one's self is to jump up as soon as one feels the bite, and to brush them off with all possible speed, and then at once set the house or hut on fire. The danger is still greater in travelling through those climes, where one may be obliged to take up one's lodging on the bare ground, and may be overtaken by the heat of the day with such profound sleep, as not to be awaked by these diminutive canibals, till they have penetrated through the skin, which is yet quickly done: for in such a case, nothing will prevent their devouring a man alive, were there ever so many hands to assist him.

It is not at all surprising, that these insects should swarm in such prodigious quantities, considering that this country breeds such numbers and variety of monkeys, which are ever ferretting them out of their subterranean habitations, and feed upon them with as much greediness, as if they had nothing else to live upon. This can only be ascribed to the natural indolence and laziness of the people, which is such, that they not only neglect to rid their lands of them by proper cultivation, but will suffer their houses, and, if our good capuchin may be credited, their very churches, to be undermined, by that destructive vermin (8).

most intolerable stench upon every thing they touch, or crawl over, whether clothes or a household-stuff, which are not easily sweetened again; and, if victuals, are entirely spoiled, and unfit to eat. A fifth fort harbours chiefly upon the leaves and branches of trees; and if a man chance to climb up thither to save himself from a wild beast, he is so tormented by them, that nothing but the dread of the jaws of the one could make him undergo the stings of the other. The sixth and last fort is of the flying kind, or rather of one of the former kinds, which live wholly under-ground, till age furnishes them with wings to fly; and then they rise in such swarms as darken the air, in the same manner as the locusts, of which we have spoken among the destructive insects of Abissinia<sup>z</sup>; and both would make terrible havock among all kinds of vegetables, did not the natives, who are very fond of their flesh, come out against them in whole companies, and by dint of flaps, and other flat weapons, knock them down by myriads, and laying them in heaps, set fire to their wings, and half broil them for their food<sup>a</sup>. Amidst a great variety of these pernicious flying insects, they have one species of a more friendly and profitable kind, viz. the industrious bee, which furnishes the inhabitants with excellent honey and wax, in such prodigious plenty, that there is scarcely a hollow tree, cliff of a rock, or chop of the earth, in which they do not find great quantities of their combs. But as we have already spoken of these beneficial animalcula in our Abissinian history<sup>b</sup>, we shall dwell no longer upon them. But, having mentioned what is most remarkable in the living creatures, let us now take a view of what is most so in the natives of this kingdom.

Bees in great plenty.

Of the number, genius, customs, religion, superstition, language, and traffick, of the natives of Kongo Proper; fossils, minerals, metals, and other natural and artificial rarities of that kingdom.

WE have already given so ample and clear an account of the origin, antiquity, government, colour, and other particulars relating to the ancient Ethiopians, from whom the natives of this kingdom are descended, that it were needful to repeat here what hath been so fully discussed in our ancient history<sup>c</sup>. We shall therefore confine ourselves to what more properly regards the history of the modern ones, from the time of their country's being first visited by the Portuguese missionaries, An. Dom. 1482, seeing all that hath preceded it up to where our Ancient concludes<sup>d</sup>, viz. the conquest of the Homerites, is wrapt up in inextricable darkness.

The populousness of the kingdom of Kongo.

1. WITH respect to the populousness of this kingdom, some authors, writing rather from mere conjectures, or at best by precarious inferences, than by experience, have represented it as thinly peopled (X). Their metropolis, as scarcely containing 5000 souls; their other most

(X) The arguments on which this supposed thinness of inhabitants is founded, were, 1. The excessive heat of the climate, which made the ancients imagine, that no part of the torrid zone was inhabited; and, when that error was confuted by experience, yet so much of it was still retained, as that only some few parts of it, which were more moderate than others, from the nature of their situation, or some accidental advantage, were peopled; but that the rest was still uninhabited, and incapable of being made otherwise.

2. That those parts that could admit of inhabitants, such as the two Ethiopias we have been describing, and more particularly this kingdom of Kongo we are now upon, could not be supposed to be populous for several reasons; as 1st, The unhealthiness of the climate, occasioned by the burning heats, prodigious rains, vast inundations, stagnated waters, and such-like disasters, which corrupted the air, caused great mortalities, and pestilential diseases, which carried off myriads of people, and prevented the rest from enjoying either health or long life.

2dly, From the vast impenetrable forests, which not only occupied a great part of the country, but bred an infinite number and variety of voracious beasts, and venomous insects, which made no less dreadful havock among the neighbouring inhabitants. 3dly, From the vast spacious mountains, barren and inaccessible in their nature, and which covered another great part of their country, and rendered it altogether uninhabitable. 4thly, From the vast sandy and barren deserts, which took up a third and considerable extent of ground, altogether incapable of producing any sustenance either for man or beast. 5thly, From the natural and hereditary indolence and laziness of the people, which would not permit them to reap the tenth part of the benefit, which by labour and industry they might easily do, from their fertile land. The consequence of which neglect is, that they are frequently overtaken with grievous famines, which sweep them away by myriads, and sometimes depopulate whole kingdoms. 6thly, From the cruel depredations and destructive wars which one kingdom or tribe waged against another, wherein there were commonly vast multitudes killed on both sides, and perhaps a greater number made prisoners, who were sold for slaves, and shipped off for America. 7thly, From their polygamy; which was allowed among them till they were converted, and is still in use, not only among the unconverted, who are still very numerous, but even among multitudes of those who are become Christians only in part, or only in appearance; and who, though they marry but one wife, yet allow themselves a multitude of concubines, in spite of all the remonstrances and censures of the missionaries and priests, and which is allowed to be a hindrance to the increase

- a most populous towns as coming vastly short of that number; the greater part of them as containing about 50 or 60 families; and the rest of them as still proportionally thinner<sup>c</sup>. Whereas nothing is more plainly or more unanimously contradicted, by those who have been in those parts, and have had all the proper opportunities of being better informed. Accordingly we find the accounts of the Portuguese, both missionaries and others, point-blank opposite to them; they found the country for the most part covered with towns and villages, and those swarming with inhabitants; the cities well filled with people, particularly the metropolis of it, which, as we hinted above, is affirmed to have at the most but about 5000, is found to contain, in fact, above 50,000 souls. The provinces, tho' not equally populous, yet in the whole make up such an amount, as plainly proves that what is wanting in the one, is amply made up by another. Thus we are told, that the duchy of Bemba is still able to raise 200,000 fighting men, and was once in a condition to furnish double that number; and that the army of the king of Kongo, in the year 1665, consisted of no less than 900,000 fighting men, besides an infinite multitude of women, children, and slaves, and all raised out of his dominions above-described; to which if we add, that the number of converts to Christianity, which a small number of capuchin friars made among the more civilized sort, within the space of a few years, is affirmed to have amounted to 600,000; and that the more barbarous sort are no less numerous, tho' confined to their thick forests, or on the tops of their rocky mountains; we shall have so little reason to imagine, with the authors mentioned in the last note, this great kingdom to be depopulated by the wars, diseases, and inundations that frequently rage among them, or from the vast numbers of wild and venomous creatures that swarm in most parts of it, that we shall be rather apt to conclude it impossible for such a prodigious number and constant increase of natives to subsist, especially considering their strange neglect of cultivating their lands, without being forced to devour one another, unless they were frequently thinned by such destructive calamities and disasters<sup>f</sup>. To all this we may add the surprising fecundity of their women, the hardness with which they bring up their children, and the stoutness and healthiness of their men, which, if the missionaries may be credited, is such, that their villages and hamlets do so swarm with men, women, and children, that a father will exchange one or two of the latter for some commodity he wants, or even for some trifling bawble he fancies; inasmuch that the number of slaves they sell abroad, doth seldom amount, communibus annis, to less than fifteen or sixteen thousand. Nor can their poor low diet, and miserable way of living, be objected as a hindrance to their prodigious increase, seeing experience sufficiently assures us of its having by far the advantage of luxury and high living in this respect; and we can have no greater evidence of this than that of their foresters and mountaineers, who, tho' they live wholly on roots, herbs, and other spontaneous product of their impenetrable forests, and high barren rocks<sup>g</sup>, are yet by far the most numerous and prolific, as well as the longest liv'd.
- AFTER all that hath been said above, and in the foregoing note, of the vast disadvantages and calamities, poverty, slavery, and supineness, which this kingdom constantly labours under, one would be apt to think it impossible for its wretched inhabitants to entertain any very favourable, much less any proud and big conceit, either of themselves, or of their country; nevertheless if the unanimous consent of all that have been most conversant among them may be credited, there is scarce a nation under heaven that entertains a more exalted idea of both, than this of the Kongoese, or is more hardened against all conviction to the contrary, from reason, experience, or the most impartial comparison with other countries in Europe or Asia. Neither indeed can they easily be brought to think otherwise, when it is one of the fundamentals of their belief, that the rest of the world was the work of angels, but that their kingdom of Kongo, in its full and ancient extent, was the handy-work of the Supreme Architect, and must of course have vast advantages and prerogatives above increase of mankind. 8thly, From the great number of human victims, which some of the barbarous unconverted provinces, such as the Giagas, Anzichi, and others, of whom we shall speak in the sequel, offer to their idols, as well as of the many others who fall into the hands of these inhuman anthropophagi, who torture and butcher them in sundry ways, in order to render their flesh more delicious to their taste, inasmuch that they expose it to sale in their shambles, as we do our mutton and beef (1). the frequent earthquakes, burning and suffocating winds, storms of hail, and dreadful lightnings, moving sands, and other the like disasters, to which these countries are more or less subject. all others; their monarchs must be the most opulent, wise and powerful, and their subjects a the noblest, richest, most ingenious, and happiest in the universe. Tell them of the magnificence of some of the European or Asiatic courts, their immense revenues, the grandeur of their palaces and edifices, the riches and happiness of their subjects, the vast progress they have made in the arts and sciences, commerce, manufactures, and other advantages, to which their country is wholly a stranger, they will coolly answer, That all this must come vastly short of the dignity and splendor of the kings and kingdom of Kongo (Y); and that there can be but one Kongo in the world, to the happiness of whose monarch and people all the rest were created to contribute, and to whose treasury the sea and river pay their constant tribute of zimbis (the shells which are their current coin), whilst other princes must condescend to enrich themselves, by digging through rocks and mountains, to come at the b excrements of the earth; for so they stile gold and silver, which are in such value among other nations <sup>b</sup>.

ACCORDINGLY they imagine, that the nations that come to traffick among them are forced to that servile employment by their poverty and the badness of their country, rather than induced to it by their luxury or avarice; whilst themselves, with the utmost ease and content, can indulge their natural indolence and sloth, tho' attended with the most pinching hunger and misery, rather than disgrace the dignity of their blood by any kind of industry; which, how laudable and beneficial soever, is looked upon by them only as a lesser degree of slavery. Hence it is that they are neither ashamed or afraid of their extreme indigence or poverty, tho' it obliges them to go almost naked, without covering on their heads, or c shoes to their feet; exposed to the scorching beams of a vertical sun from above, and the burning sand and stones from beneath. With the same ease and content they can take their repose on the bare ground, either in their wretched huts, which are exposed to all winds and weathers, or, if need require it, in the open air, without any inconvenience; or, if they contract any distemper by it, without any other help or remedy than patience and natural strength. Hence it is that they chuse to support nature with such a small quantity of grain or pulse as their wives can sow and reap; or, when that fails, with some fruits, roots, and other spontaneous vegetables, rather than debase their nobility by joining their hands to the plough or spade. And on the same account they neglect the breeding of cattle of any kind, how profitable soever they might prove to them, and allege, that it is too d much below their dignity to take the care of beasts upon them <sup>d</sup>.

IT must be owned, however, that since the coming of the Portuguese into those parts, their example hath stirred up many of them out of their fantastic pride and shameful sloth, into some kind of laudable industry. The munesi konghy, or burghers, for instance, who had till then an irreconcilable aversion to all sorts of labour, and used to spend their whole time in singing, smoking, dancing, and other idle diversions, have been since excited to apply their thoughts to some useful labours; such as weaving of nets, and other coarse stuffs, sawing of boards, several branches of carpentry, and other trades. But it must not therefore be supposed that they did any more in it than set their slaves to work, and make a gain of their labour, without giving them any other help than that of the lash, whenever they e find them lazy or negligent.

IN like manner the mobati, or those who live in villages or hamlets, have also learned from them to grub and cultivate the lands, to plough and sow, and to weave coarse stuffs for their own use. But even these usually commit the most laborious part to their wives and slaves, without the least ambition of excelling one another in any branch under their care; and this not for want of natural capacity, for both those burghers and peasants who are more conversant with the Portuguese, have since discovered a very lucky genius and readiness to imitate them in several curious works; from which it is supposed the credit and profit they gain by it will spur them on still to farther improvements.

BUT though it be generally esteemed so much beneath their dignity to apply to any use- f ful work, yet they think it no disgrace to beg and steal. With respect to the first, they are

(Y) This stupid conceit, we are told, extends itself to those of the lowest class, and the most indigent circumstances; insomuch that those who are forced to beg or borrow a small piece of linen, to cover a new-born infant, in order to bring it to the font, when they are asked, how they will have the child named, never fail to tack the title of Don, or Donna, to its Christian name. The same stile they also use in common conversation, wherein the meanest and poorest scoundrels never address one another without the title of Don, or

Donna; in the same manner as it is practised by the better sort.

As for these last, they carry their arrogance to a much greater height, and never suffer those of an inferior rank to address them, but with bended knees, and faces bowed to the ground, nor to receive their commands, but in the same suppliant posture (3). A ceremony, which, however extravagant it may appear to be, is no less in vogue in Portugal, if not brought thither from thence.

With regard to the last, they deem no theft unlawful or scandalous, except it be committed in a private manner, and without the knowledge of the person wronged. In all other cases, it is esteemed a piece of bravery and gallantry to wrench any thing from a person by violence; and this kind of theft is so common, not only among the vulgar, but among their great ones, that they make no scruple, in their travels from place to place, to seize not only upon all the provisions they meet with, in towns and villages, but likewise upon any thing else that falls in their way; which obliges those poor people, who are accustomed to such violences, to conceal the few valuables they have in some secret places out of their knowledge and reach; and they think themselves well off if they can escape a cruel bastonading, or other severe usage, which these harpies frequently make use of, to oblige them to reveal the place where they lie hid, and perhaps a second bastoning, as a punishment for that concealment<sup>k</sup>.

- THE complexion of the genuine natives, both men and women, is black, tho' not to the same degree, some being of a deeper dye than others, as in most countries under this zone. We have formerly endeavoured to account for their being of that swarthy colour<sup>l</sup>; but since their intermixed marriages with the Portuguese, they have varied from their native hue; some to a dark brown, some to an olive, and others to a blackish red, especially the younger sort. Their hair is black and curled, and some have it also of a dark sandy; their eyes are mostly of a fine lively black, but some of a dark sea-colour; they have neither flat noses nor thick lips, like the Nubians and other negroes; their stature is mostly of the middle size; and, excepting their black complexion, they much resemble the Portuguese, tho' some of them are more fat and fleshy than they<sup>m</sup>.

Their complexion, shape, &c.

- THEY are for the most part as black in the inside as they are on the out, mistrustful, jealous, envious, and treacherous; and where they once take a distaste or affront, will spare no pains, nor stick at any base means, to be avenged of, and crush their enemy under their feet; whilst, for the most part, the occasion of the quarrel or dislike is only the success or happiness of one party above the other. Nor need it seem strange, when we consider that they are brought up without any the least natural affection, either to their nearest relations, or even between their parents and children, husbands and wives; insomuch that a father will sell a son or daughter, or perhaps both, for a piece of cloth, a collar or girdle of coral or beads, and often for a bottle of wine or brandy (Z). A husband may have as many wives, or, if a Christian, as many concubines, as he pleases, and repudiate, or even sell them, tho' with child, at his pleasure. The concubines may get themselves divorced by their unfaithfulness; and, if but tolerably handsome, will not fail of meeting with men that will take them upon those terms. The very wives, tho' it be a capital crime for them to break the conjugal faith, have a way to rid themselves of their husbands, if they are dissatisfied with them, or have set their affections upon some new gallant; which is by falsely accusing themselves and them of an atrocious crime, as it is deemed among them, of which we shall have occasion to speak in the sequel. Upon such accusation, the husband is sure to be put to death, whilst the wife is left at liberty to be married to another<sup>n</sup>. Where therefore the relation between men and their wives, and concubines, is exposed to such uncertain fluctuations, it is not to be expected there should be any natural affection between them, much less

(Z) Our capuchin missionary, among other instances of this worse than brutish unnaturalness, tells us, that being one day, in the year 1654, in his convent of St. Salvador, a private man came into the church belonging to it, and made such loud and doleful lamentations, as drew the whole convent thither. At first they supposed some dreadful mischance to have befallen the poor wretch; but, upon farther inquiry, were informed by him, that the extreme misery he laboured under, had reduced him to the utmost despair; that he had sold all his brethren, and one sister he had, and next to them his wives and children, and last of all, his father and mother, and that he had not one soul left of his family to make a penny of. The good fathers, strangely surprised at such a declaration, endeavoured in vain to convince him what an unnatural monster he was, and how justly deserving he was of a worse fate than that he complained of. He coldly told them, that he had done nothing but what had been constantly practised in that country, and there could be no crime in reducing them to the slavish condition to which he himself had run the risk of being reduced by them (4).

It will not be amiss to be observed here, that though those inhuman wretches that come hither to traffick for slaves, openly declare against buying any but what are already such; yet they make no scruple to buy all that are brought to market under that notion. In vain do these unhappy captives protest themselves free, and the nearest relations, perhaps, of the seller; and that they were kidnapped by him, by the most atrocious treachery. It suffices those harpies that they are brought to the market either in chains, or barely bound with a rope, and that the seller swears them to be otherwise, to make them pay the price down, and carry them off as slaves (5).

THE religion of this country, before the Portuguese introduced the gospel into it, was, and is still among the unconverted, a monstrous compound of idolatry and superstition, and of the most absurd and detestable rites and customs, invented and calculated by a set of gangas (so they stile their priests) merely to keep the people under the most cruel tyranny, subjection, and misery. We observed, indeed, at the beginning of this section, that they acknowledged a supreme being, whom they call in their language Nzambiam-pongu, and believe to be all-powerful, and to whom they ascribe the creation of their country; but this did not hinder them from affirming, that he had committed all sublunary things to the care and government of a great multitude and variety of subordinate or inferior deities; some to preside over the air, others over the fire, sea and earth, lakes and rivers, winds, storms, rains, lightnings, and drought, heat and cold, men and beasts, fowls and fishes, trees, fruits, and other products, fertile and barren, healthy and sickly seasons, and, in a word, on all the blessings and curses to which this world and all its inhabitants are subjected, according to their blind votaries care or neglect of rendering those subaltern deities more or less propitious to them. Hence proceeds that immense multitude of false deities, idols, and altars; and that prodigious variety of gangas or priests, and superstitious rites, that are still in vogue in those parts of the kingdom, which have not yet received the gospel, especially towards the east, to say nothing of a great number of them which are still practised among those who nevertheless make open profession of Christianity <sup>p</sup>, and which it hath not been in the power of the missionaries to abolish.

BUT tho' the ignorant people were taught by their knavish priests to acknowledge such a variety of inferior deities, they were left wholly at liberty to make which of them they thought fit the object of their worship and confidence, and to represent them in what shape they pleased, whether of living creatures, as serpents, crocodiles, lions, tigers, he-goats, &c. or of trees and plants of different kinds; or, lastly, of statues or images, unskillfully carved or painted, some of which they worshipped in their houses, and others in sorry temples erected to them. Their worship consisted indifferently in genuflexions, prostrations, fumigations, and other such superstitious rites; but what was most insisted on by the gangas, and without which all the rest were unavailable, was the offering to them some of their most valuable effects, whether for food, apparel, or other useful purposes: in this consisted the principal income of the gangas, who sell them the favour of those deities at the most extortionate price, and set up for the sole brokers and retailers of those blessings, according to the price the pretended dispenser whom they invoke is pleased to set upon them.

THESE gangas are the errantest and most impudent tricksters, perhaps, in the world; they spare no stratagem or knavery, where-ever idolatry still reigns, to harden their votaries in it, and deter them from embracing Christianity, under pretence that all the calamities that happen, either public or private, are the unavoidable effects of the anger and resentment of their gods, not only against the apostates from their worship, but against their votaries, for suffering strangers to come in among, and debauch them from it. So that these greedy harpies are the only enemies who oppose the missionaries; and, were it not for them, the people might be easily reconciled to Christianity, were it only to be freed from a thousand extortions and tyrannies which they exercise against them, of which the few instances we shall subjoin in the margin will suffice, to shew with what surprising stupidity and implicit blindness, they suffer themselves to be imposed upon, fleeced, and tyrannized over, by these religious blood-suckers, merely from the dread they are kept in, that the least disobedience or disregard to their commands would infallibly be followed by some dreadful judgment from their gods <sup>q</sup> (A).

(A) As it could not but prove tedious and irksome both to us and our readers, to run through the manifold impostures and knavish practices by which those religious charlatans keep their infatuated votaries in the greatest subjection and dread, we shall content ourselves with exposing some of the most flagrant ones, which are publicly practised among them, as a specimen of the rest. They are those that follow:

1st, They instill into them a firm belief, that no public calamities, such as earthquakes, inundations, heats, droughts, smothering sands, to which this country is often subject, pestilence, famine, and such-like, happen unto them, but through the displeasure of their gods, between whom and them they pretend to be the sole mediators, and of course the proper judges of what sacrifices, oblations, &c. are necessary to disarm their anger, and remove the punishment; and these never fail of proving very heavy on the laity, though in ever

a As these unhappy wretches are very numerous, and extend themselves vastly towards the eastern parts of the kingdom, so they are divided into as many sects as they form communities, every one of which have their peculiar gods, manner of worship, and their different kinds of gangas, and every ganga hath his particular office, the bare mention of which would both tire our readers, and carry us too far beyond our bounds. Extent of their country.

SOME of these gangas are applied to procure blessings, others to avert judgments, to cure diseases, to undo witchcrafts and enchantments; others are consulted about making of war, the success of their excursions, proper times for sowing and reaping, about repaying their deities with proper rites and sacrifices for blessings received, appeasing their anger when chastised by them, and such like: in all which cases, they must never come empty-handed, or refuse to pay a price equivalent to the blessing desired. They are generally so scrupulous and fearful in this respect, that they will not venture to build a house or hut without consulting some ganga, and putting the fabric under the protection of a deity; neither doth the owner dare enter into the possession of it, without having previously employed the ganga to make the proper sacrifices, fumigations, and other ceremonies, in order to secure that protection. The same caution is observed in almost every-thing else; and even the Giagas, the most barbarous people of this kingdom, never venture to put the sickle into their harvest, till they have previously offered various, and even human, victims to their gods, and gorged their gangas themselves with human flesh, and the first fruits of their ground.<sup>r</sup> Offices of their gangas.

EXCEPTING their new moons, they have no set festivals or times of worship, but such as the ganga iliqui, or president, appoints, either ad libitum, or as occasion is supposed to require them; as after a victory, a good harvest, or any other public blessing. 'Tis he who hath the privilege to appoint the sacrifices, and other rites proper to the solemnity, to receive the appointed offerings from the people, and to offer them upon the altars of their deities: he Superstition of the people.

so extreme poverty. If these succeed, new ones must be made by way of thanksgiving; if the contrary, their inefficacy is owing either to their insufficiency, or some other default; so that the blame is sure to fall upon the people, whilst those vile jugglers must go still unsuspected, without losing one grain of their credit or authority; or, if they should, have variety of artful and malicious ways to palliate their frauds, and punish the detectors of them, by summoning them before the chalombe, or high-priest's tribunal, where they are sure to be judged and condemned without mercy, to no less than some cruel death.

2dly, They are no less fraught with knavish stratagems in private calamities; if any person in a family be sick, or in grievous pain, or in any other affliction, he must begin with appeasing the gods by such sacrifices as the ganga prescribes. If these fail, and he cannot afford to offer new ones, the patient is confined to some uneasy posture, out of which he must not stir upon any pretence; if he cannot continue in it, which is perhaps absolutely impossible for him to do, the tutelar god is displeased, and refuses to recover or heal him: if he is strong or resolute enough to bear it out, and no cure follows, then some enemy hath bewitched him by some powerful charm, which must be countermined by a superior power, or the priest must find out the enemy, and accuse him before a Quorum of the same juggling tribe.

Here, 3dly, he may purge himself from the crime by several kinds of ordeals which are allowed and practised among them; some by fire, others by water, others by a poisoned draught, which is to kill him if guilty, or prove harmless if innocent. But in all these cases, the ganga hath the whole management of the trial, and can order it so by his artful juggling, that the guilty, if he bribe him but high enough, shall go through any of these trials unhurt, and be cleared; whilst the innocent, for want of that caution, shall die under it, and be adjudged guilty. What is still worse, these villains will often take bribes from both sides, and acquit that which gives most, or which they like best; so that a person, in spite of his innocence and large bribes, shall be condemned as guilty, and the criminal or false accuser come off with triumph.

4thly, They have an endless variety of juggling tricks, to extort money from the credulous and fearful laity; from some for preserving them, their families, lands, and houses, from evil demons, enchantments, and other disasters; from others for removing them; in a word, there is no case or circumstance in life, or any thing that happens, out of which they do not squeeze some gain, without troubling themselves about the good or ill success of those pretended helps which they sell to them at so dear a price, their chief concern being only to be well paid before-hand.

But the most dangerous and diabolical notion which they instill into the people is, that no man or woman can die naturally, but that their death is occasioned by the anger of the gods, who permit some malevolent member of the community to bewitch them to death; so that the nghombo, who pretends to have an extraordinary power of curing all manner of diseases, having tried all his medicines and charms on his patient to no purpose, makes no scruple to pronounce him bewitched to death. The friends of the deceased being desirous to bring the offender to punishment, he has recourse to his conjuring delusions, which are performed either in public or private, according as he is paid by them, in order to find him out. If in private, he gets them into his house, and after many frightful exorcisms, contortions, and other pranks, gives only some vague and obscure description of him; by which however some of the most sanguine pretend to know him well enough, to lead all the rest to some innocent person, whom they massacre without scruple or mercy. If the ceremony be performed in public, he makes choice of some woody or gloomy place, where, having played all his former pranks, he rushes furiously on some one of the company, seizes and ties him fast, as the guilty person; who is thence led to a place, where, by way of ordeal, he is obliged to drink a draught, which the nghombo hath taken care to charge with such strong poison, as never fails of dispatching him, and proves him guilty in the eyes of the multitude.

We hope we have by this time said enough to convince the reader of the miserable thralldom under which those infernal guides keep the poor infatuated provinces, and of the chief and devilish arts they use to prevent Christianity from getting ground in those countries. The reader may see more in our author if he thinks it worth his while (6).

Ceremonies observed. likewise prescribes the other ceremonies, rejoicings, music, feasting, and dancing, which are to crown the solemnity, and which are all of so shocking and barbarous a nature, accompanied with such intemperate eating, drinking, hideous howlings, robust exercises, immodest dances, gestures, and actions, as are only fit for the worship of some infernal furies.

The chalombe's high dignity. First fruits paid to him. BUT the highest in power and dignity of the whole priestly tribe, is he whom they style shalome, or chalombe, whom the people look upon as a kind of deity. It is to him they offer the first of their whole product, with the most scrupulous exactness; they are mostly brought to him by the master of the family and his principal wife, with songs and music suitable to the occasion: if he is satisfied with them, he bids them go and live merrily, and expect an hundred fold against the next harvest: if not, he sends them away with tokens of dislike. When sowing time is come again, they bring him a fresh present; in return for which, he sends some servant of his to go and strike the first stroke of the spade or mattock into the ground, which they esteem as a great blessing upon their future harvest; and which, if it answers their hopes, they never fail to interpret as the effect of his powerful intercession with their gods; but if the contrary, they are infatuated enough to attribute it to some default of their own.

No person comes near their houses. Sacred fire kept in them. His chief tribunal. Great power. No person of any rank is allowed to come into, or even near, the house of the chalombe, under the severest penalties, unless it be by his permission, or on some most urgent occasion; because it is there that he pretends to keep the sacred fire, which he distributes among them at a very high rate. Here likewise he keeps his sovereign tribunal, not only for religious, but likewise for civil matters, for the dispatch of which he appoints a certain number of substitutes or delegates, over whom he presides in chief. This gives him such an uncontrollable authority and sway, that if a person be sent souza, or governor, over them, they dare not acknowledge or obey him, unless he be previously approved of by him. This obliges those governors to pay a singular regard to him, and to buy his friendship and protection at a great price. They must likewise be very cautious not to do any thing of a public or even military nature without his approbation, or to attempt the obtaining of that by any means, but by dint of presents. But when once a right understanding is fixed between them, they become such an effectual support to each other, that they fleece and tyrannize each in his particular province, without any opposition or danger; by which means the civil officer seldom fails of repaying himself, with interest, the prodigious extortions which he is obliged to pay the chalombe<sup>a</sup>.

High regard paid to him in his absence. SUCH is the deep regard which the people pay to this chief priest, that they think it a capital and unpardonable crime to have any conjugal commerce with their wives or concubines all the time that he is absent from his usual residence, either upon public or private affairs; of which he always takes care to give them previous notice, as well as of his return. And the natives, though otherwise very libidinous, are exceeding careful to abstain from it, for fear of putting themselves into the power of those frail and vindictive females. Notwithstanding which it sometimes happens, that a woman, weary of her husband, will accuse him of incontinence at this time, merely to get rid of him, and marry another. Among all the high notions which those unhappy provinces entertain of this grand impostor, there is one, however, which prevails among them which is not so advantageous, nor, in all probability, so agreeable to him; viz. that he is, by the dignity of his office, exempt from dying a natural death; and that, if it should ever happen otherwise to any of them, the world would soon be at an end. To prevent this fatal calamity, they no sooner perceive his life to be in danger, either thro' sickness or old age, than his successor is impowered to go and dispatch him with his own hand, either by knocking him on the head with a green cudgel, or by strangling him with a rope<sup>t</sup>, and is immediately after installed into his dignity.

Other ranks of gangas under him. How this succession is established among them, whether by election or inheritance, our author doth not tell us; tho' he hath given us a very particular account of his substitutes, and of their different ranks and distinct offices; with which, however, we shall not trouble our readers here, seeing these ministers are no better than a set of tyrannic extortioners, and arrant cheats, like their principal. Nevertheless, for the sake of those who are curious in such matters, we think it not amiss to subjoin in the margin a short account of their several ranks and provinces (B), and refer them to what hath been said in the last note, of their various ways of cheating and fleecing the credulous people.

(B) The next in rank to the chilome is called nghombo; we have spoken something of his office and knavish tricks in the last note. He pretends, moreover, to pry into futurity, and is consulted both in public and private affairs; but, like the old heathen oracles, delivers his answers in such obscure terms, as to secure a hole to creep

<sup>a</sup> THESE considerations, joined to the abominable rites which they have introduced in their worship, of which we have already given some flagrant instances, hath inspired the kings and princes of Kongo with a truly laudable zeal of extirpating so detestable a religion out of their dominions; and they have frequently ordered the secular power to assist the missionaries in so pious a work. But those ministers of Satan have hitherto found means to elude all those endeavours; so that they no sooner saw themselves in danger of being beset by the royal troops in one place, but they immediately caused their votaries to flee into another, or to retire into impenetrable woods and deserts, or upon some inaccessible mountains, far enough, as they think, out of the reach of the sword, either of the flesh or spirit; so that these zealous princes have at length been forced to stop their pursuit, for fear of occasioning at last some grievous rebellion by it among a barbarous people, so inveterately hardened in their idolatry, and irreconcilably prejudiced against the gospel. But we have dwelt long enough among these idolatrous eastern provinces, which we may properly call mediterranean; let us now take a view of the more civilized ones along the coasts, in which Christianity hath been in a great measure established, ever since their first discovery by the Portuguese <sup>Vain endeavours to abolish idolatry.</sup>

<sup>b</sup> at last some grievous rebellion by it among a barbarous people, so inveterately hardened in their idolatry, and irreconcilably prejudiced against the gospel. But we have dwelt long enough among these idolatrous eastern provinces, which we may properly call mediterranean; let us now take a view of the more civilized ones along the coasts, in which Christianity hath been in a great measure established, ever since their first discovery by the Portuguese <sup>Danger of a rebellion in attempting it.</sup>

How it was first introduced and propagated thro' the maritime provinces of the kingdom, will be more properly seen when we come to the historical part of it. We have indeed taken notice in a former part <sup>c</sup> of a strange account which a Dominican frier gives of it in his history of Abissinia, in which he pretends, that not only this kingdom of Kongo, and those of Angola, Loango, &c. but the far greater part of Afric, and even the Caffers and Hottentots, were converted to Christianity by the monks of his order, who were by the emperor of Ethiopia settled in his dominions, and from thence went and spread the gospel thro' the whole African continent. But that history of his hath been so justly condemned by the world as a heap of forgeries, and on that account so wisely suppressed by his Portuguese brethren, that we need say no more of it. <sup>The state of Christianity in Kongo.</sup>

NEITHER need we tell our readers, that those first preachers, who were sent hither for that purpose by the court of Portugal, were priests and monks of the church of Rome, and consequently could not instruct their new converts in any other doctrine or discipline than what was conformable to that, and which met with so ready an admission, that it is become the established religion of all the converted provinces of the kingdom. This carries indeed a <sup>Superstitions and vices of the converted Christians;</sup>

creep out at, let the event prove how it will. He distributes charms and amulets against diseases and other misfortunes; some of his votaries, who have been since converted, having brought these amulets to the missionaries, they have been found to contain nothing but dirt and rubbish, though he made them pay dear enough for them.

The third rank of gangas is called ngosei: his office is to incense their idols, not with odoriferous gums, but with smoke of burnt straw, which gives them the same complexion with their votaries. It is to this ngosei that people wronged and oppressed apply for redress, not as to a judge, but as to a minister who is to obtain it for them from the gods. As soon therefore as his client and he are agreed about the price, he cuts off a lock of his hair, and having mixed it with some straw, he fumigates the idol with it, recommending his client's cause to him, and desires him to avenge him not only against his adversary, but also against his whole family. This office, which is so suitable to the revengeful and envious natives, could not fail of being advantageous to the owner, had he as much power to hurt as he pretends.

The fourth in rank is the npindi, who sets up for superintendant of the atmosphere, and to bring down rain, thunder, and lightning in their due season; and as these are, generally speaking, very regular, he always takes care to rear some little mounts, against that time, about his house, which is commonly built on some eminent place, or where several roads meet: these mounts he adorns with little flags and other trinkets, to draw the people to him; and it is to the pretended conjuring tricks which he performs before them, and for which he is well paid, that they ascribe the seasonable rains, thunders, &c. that follow; and if they chance to fail, as it sometimes happens, it only gives him a handle to exact a fresh tribute, in order to appease the angry gods of the air by richer and more acceptable sacrifices.

These may serve as a specimen of the rest of these jugglers, whom the credulous missionaries believed to be real conjurers, and the ignorant natives reverence, as endowed with sundry supernatural powers, some over the fire, others over the water; some preside over the product of the earth, the cattle, birds, &c. and convey the victuals and other offerings for the dead to their souls in the other world; and all these are so many famished leaches, which suck the blood and vitals of the laity.

One thing we must observe here to our readers; viz. that when our author speaks of the chalombe, nghombo, ngosei, &c. in the singular number, he doth not mean that there is but one of each sort through the vast heathenish provinces of this kingdom, but as those territories are divided into a great variety of districts or communities, so every one of them hath a set of those idolatrous gangas, subordinate as above, with one chalombe at their head; each of them bearing much the same office in one district as in the other, and all of them, in their respective ranks, abusing their authority and credit over the insatuated people to the worst purposes, the impoverishing and enslaving of them to enrich themselves (7). Thus we are told that the chalombe, or, as he is there called, the chilomba, of the duchy of Sundi, who wears his long hair tied up in stiff tresses, and adorned with bugles and other trinkets about his head, so as to resemble one of the Avernian furies, will not so much as suffer any of his laity to look him in the face, or approach him, without his leave; which must be paid for before it can be obtained. This chief, when he comes out of his house to give audience, hath always, according to father Hieronimo de monte Jarchio (a capuchin missionary, who had resided a considerable time in those parts) one of his deities carried before him, by four of his ministers, lying at full length, on a kind of bier, such as we formerly used to carry our dead upon to their graves (8).

great found; but, if we may believe the generality of writers, Christianity hath been so neglected, and all those countries, whatever be the cause, have laboured, since that time, under such a scarcity of priests and preachers, that the major part of those extensive regions have little else but the bare name of Christian. Whilst some appear wholly ignorant of the fundamental doctrines and precepts of Christianity, others pay so little regard to them, that they scruple not to entertain a great number of concubines, over and above their lawful wife; and a third sort appear to be but half converted; and whilst they openly conform to the public worship of their church, do privately indulge themselves in the practice of sundry heathenish and abominable superstitions and immoralities.

those of the Portuguese.

It hath been indeed affirmed by some, that the Portuguese, who are settled amongst them, have not a little contributed to confirm them in their old superstitions, as well as in the degeneracy of their morals. Some of their missionaries, both in these African parts, as well as in the East and West-Indies, have loudly complained of the ill effects which their bad examples had on their new converts; and those of this kingdom of Kongo have been obliged to wink at those irregularities which they could not reform, and to give up some points to preserve the rest. Neither is it to be supposed that the new clergy, which were ordained from among the natives, would be less remiss than they. However that be, we find here nothing of that pomp and religious pageantry which is practised in other Romish countries; no stately cathedrals, except one collegiate, and other churches; no patriarchs, archbishopricks, bishopricks, rich abbeys, and variety of monasteries. We read but of one bishop in all the kingdom, viz. that of St. Thomas, who makes his constant residence in the island of Loando, and seldom visits his diocese (C). The jesuits, who are every-where so very numerous, have here but one convent, and that is also in the same island. They have the care of instructing the Christians of Kongo and Angola, but their number is far too small for two such large kingdoms<sup>y</sup>; and it is no wonder the inhabitants of both live in such profound ignorance of the fundamentals of Christianity; and, if what another author tells us may be depended upon, the ambition and avarice of some of their clergy have prevented not only its progress, but its maintaining itself in that kingdom<sup>z</sup>. But whether it be owing to that, or to the neglect of the prelates or princes, or some dislike which the latter may have taken to the former, we do not read that any of them founded either universities or seminaries, or that they have any but inferior schools for boys, who are taught their catechism by the same priests who celebrate the mass to the people. We hear nothing of their grand festivals and solemnities, except such as are rather of a secular nature, and on which the court and nobles of the kingdom repair to the church in great state, and sumptuous apparel, to hear mass. Did Christianity make a better figure in this kingdom, we need not doubt but the Portuguese and other missionaries would have acquainted the world with it, especially as several other authors have given us so melancholy an account of that church, not only with respect to its outward appearance, but much more with regard to its inward state, and the sad depravity of its faith and morals. Some represent one part of these converts as arrant hypocrites, who embraced the gospel only to ingratiate themselves with the Portuguese, whilst they retain all their old heathenish superstitions, and privately wor-

(C) There seems indeed some difference between the authors who speak of this bishopric; whilst one tells us the cathedral of it was in the city of St. Salvador, the metropolis of Kongo, which we have elsewhere described (9), others place it in the island of Loando, belonging to the kingdom of Angola, where is the great church and convent of St. Paul; whence one might be inclined to believe that there was a bishop's see in each kingdom; which would be no great wonder, considering the vast extent of both would have reasonably required a much greater number. Yet, upon the whole, it doth not appear, that there ever was above one founded to serve both kingdoms, whose cathedral was fixed in the metropolis of St. Salvador, the residence of their monarchs, and which was, we are told, subject to the patriarch of Lisbon, but whose bishops did afterwards remove to that of St. Paul, in the island of Loando above-mentioned, whence they seldom stir out to go and visit either their cathedral of St. Salvador, or any part of that diocese.

arrival at that metropolis, the canons and clergy so corrupt and degenerate in their morals, and insolent in their behaviour, that upon his first attempt to reform them, they not only refused to submit to his authority, but even to acknowledge that he had any real power or superiority over them; and if they were upheld, as it is most likely, by the king and court, in this pretended independency on the see of Lisbon, it is not at all surprising that he should go and take his residence at the other part of his diocese, that is, the convent of Loango, and that he and his successors should so seldom visit that of Kongo, where they met with such ill treatment.

This will appear the more probable still, if we consider that the kingdom of Angola did not receive Christianity by far so soon as that of Kongo, and was still involved in idolatry in Lopez's time; for he tells us that that prince, being exceedingly desirous of embracing it, had sent more than once to intreat the king of Kongo to send him some missionaries, but had not been able to obtain any, that monarch excusing himself from it by telling him that he had none to spare; and this might, in all likelihood, procure the bishop a better reception and settlement at St. Paul's than he had at St. Salvador, and induce him to make it the place of his residence.

- a ship their old deities, even lions, tigers, serpents, and other such pernicious creatures, and cannot think themselves safe without those abominable practices; they openly carry their beads and crosses, and inwardly their heathenish charms and amulets. Others, who have perhaps been better instructed by living nearer the churches, and under the eyes of the Portuguese, will express a contempt, or even abhorrence, of such senseless superstitions; and, in complaisance to the church, will conform so far to its laws, as to go regularly to mass and confession, and will consent to have but one wife; but could never be persuaded of the unlawfulness of having as many concubines as they can maintain<sup>a</sup>. The same thing we may add of other immoralities, such as drunkenness, cheating, fraud, oppression, idleness, and excessive pride and sloth, which they not only see more or less practised by the European Christians that live among them, but which they know to be no less public and common in all other countries that acknowledge the pope's authority.

- b THOSE of the duchy of Sogno are reckoned much better Christians; they have a much greater number of churches, in which the divine service is performed with greater pomp; their clergy are also more numerous, most of them natives, and the people in appearance such zealous catholics, that they never appear abroad but you see them loaded with beads, crosses, medals, and other religious utensils; yet they are not without their old superstitions; and if the saints to whom they apply themselves do not grant them their petitions, they seldom fail of addressing themselves to their fetters, or old heathenish deities. The dukes or governors of this province commonly affect to appear in great state when they go to church, and to be adorned with collars of gold and coral beads, and other such fantastic baubles, besides their military weapons. They are preceded by drums, cornets, and other instruments, and surrounded by a body of their guards, with their standards flying. At the head of them march commonly five or six musqueteers, who fire their pieces from time to time as they march, and the procession is closed by multitudes of other spectators and attendants. These princes, as well as those of Bamba and Pemba, have always signalized themselves by their zeal for the Christian religion, and been particularly careful to preserve their respective governments from being corrupted by the heathenish gangas, or priests, lately described; and, if any such are ever caught within their dominions, they are sure to meet with such severe treatment, that they never attempt to come again<sup>b</sup>.

- d THE government of this kingdom is monarchical, and as despotic as any in Asia or Afric. The kings are the sole proprietors of all the lands within their dominions, and these they bestow upon whom they please, upon condition they pay them a certain tribute out of them; and turn them out upon failure of it, or any other neglect (D), or even at their own pleasure. Even the princes of the blood are subjected to the same law, so that there is no person of any rank or quality that can bequeath a foot of land to his heirs or successors; and when these owners under the crown die, they immediately devolve to it again, whether they were in their possession, or had been let to ever so many tenants under them; so that it entirely depends on the will of the prince upon the throne, whether those lands shall be continued in the same, or be disposed into other hands. The Portuguese, however, since their settling in those parts, have prevailed upon the monarchs to permit the heirs and successors to continue in the possession of such lands, in order to avoid the confusions and commotions, and sometimes rebellions, which the alienation and deprivation of them frequently occasioned in the realm, and to oblige the tenants of them to pay their tribute more readily and exactly than they usually did before. This tribute, or tax, which was affixed to the grant of the lands, not only to the governors of the six chief provinces above-mentioned, but to several marquises, counts, and other nobles, is expressly ordered to be brought to court once in three years at the farthest; which, joined to the ambition and avarice of those lords paramount, makes them rack the people at a cruel rate, and not only strip them of all they have, but even to sell them, without the least mercy, men, women, and children, for slaves.

- f WHAT is still more dreadful is, that these grievous extortions often end in a revolt, and open rebellion; not indeed from the people, who, be their condition ever so bad, can hardly be other than passive; but from their tyrannic governors, who become in time so rich and powerful, as to neglect and refuse to bring their tribute, when called to it by repeated

(D) These land owners under the king are bound not only to pay him the tribute above-mentioned, but likewise to keep all the roads through which he is to pass in repair, and to be swept clean upon previous notice given to them, though ever so short. They are likewise obliged to appear with their servants, clients, and tenants, to welcome him as he passes by, and by their shouts and acclamations to express their joy and gratitude for the honour he doth them in coming through their territories. The omission of any of these punctilios might endanger their forfeiting of the grant (1).

expresses from the court, many of whom are purposely way-laid, and murdered in the very frontiers, or are clapt into a dismal dungeon, and there left to die with hunger and misery, especially when those revolted governors live at a great distance from the capital. Nor is this all; for they commonly ally with other revolted provinces, and strive to excite the neighbouring ones to join with them in the rebellion; and if they refuse, openly invade and plunder them, and put all to fire and sword that fall in their way. Our author gives us several instances of such rebellions, which happened during the twelve years of his abode in this kingdom, the most considerable of which had been raised by one of the king's sons-in-law, whilst that monarch was quelling another in a distant province; so that, not being able to suppress both, he was obliged to patch up a peace, and to grant a general amnesty to his unnatural son-in-law, without so much as obliging him to pay any more tribute; to prevent the insurrection spreading farther<sup>c</sup>.

tive.

PIGAFET, and other authors after him, tell us, that the crown of Kongô is hereditary, and that the females only are excluded from the succession; but our missionary, who was better acquainted with the political constitution of that kingdom, assures us, that it is partly so; and partly elective; that is, that no candidate can be chosen to it, but who must be of the royal blood. Whether of a nearer or further branch of it, whether by the male or female side, whether born of the wife, or of a concubine, is the same thing; a bastard being esteemed equally capable of succeeding to the throne, as one born in wedlock. So that, upon the demise of a monarch, there seldom fails to be a great number of competitors to it, tho' the choice commonly falls on him who brings the best retinue, or greatest number of friends and forces with him, on the field of election, provided he be a Christian of the church of Rome; for, since the conversion of those monarchs to the gospel, none but such are admitted to stand candidates for the crown.

THE three grand officers who preside over, and must necessarily be present at, the election, are the mani elefunda, the mani batta, and the count or governor of Sogno; and when these perceive that the contest between the competitors is likely to rise to a dangerous height (E), they summon them to repair to the bishop, or, in his absence, to his vicar, and there to determine it before him. As soon as they have agreed upon a successor, all the grandees of the realm are summoned to appear on a plain near the metropolis of St. Salvador, whence they proceed in pomp to the cathedral, once a most noble structure, built by the Portuguese, but since then, thro' the iniquity of the times, run to decay, and turned into a kind of public hall, but which hath, upon these occasions, an altar reared, richly decked, at one end of which is a stately throne, where the bishop or his vicar is seated; and at the other end of it is a chair of state for the mani elefunda, surrounded by the candidates, who know nothing as yet of the person pitched upon, but wait with impatience to hear him declared.

BEFORE the mani proclaims him, he rises from his chair, and kneeling before the altar makes a prayer; and, after being re-seated, a long elaborate speech on the duties of a monarch, and the manifold cares and difficulties that attend it; after which, he declares to the assembly, that he and the other electors, having duly and impartially weighed the merits of the candidate princes, had chosen such a one to the sovereign dignity.

He then immediately goes and takes the new monarch by the hand, and brings him to the bishop, before whom they prostrate themselves; and the king, still upon his knees, receives a short but pathetic admonition from the prelate, in which, among other duties, he exhorts him to shew himself a firm and zealous protector and promoter of Christianity, and an obedient son to the catholic church. The usual oaths are then administered to him, which he pronounces with a loud voice; after which the bishop leads him by the hand to the throne erected for him, puts the royal standard into his hand, and the crown upon his head; upon which the whole assembly fall prostrate before him, acknowledge him for their king, with loud acclamations, clapping of hands, sound of martial instruments, and presently after by the salvos of the whole artillery. The ceremony being over, the new king takes the name of Alphonso, as all his predecessors have done before, ever since the reign, and in honour, of

(E) These open ruptures chiefly happen when the deceased king hath left one or more sons grown up, and in condition to support what they think their right to the throne; for as the electors seldom, if ever, elect any such to succeed, lest the crown should in time become hereditary, so, let them make ever so prudent a choice, those princes will never submit to it, unless they be driven to it by the superior force of their competitor. In such cases a dreadful war is kindled between them, in which the rivals mutually invade, and carry fire and sword into each others provinces; nor is the contest ever decided, but by the death, or at least the total overthrow, of one of the competitors, which is commonly attended with the most horrid ravages and butcheries in those provinces that adhered to him. This is what our author assures us he had been an eye-witness of, during his abode in that kingdom (2).

(2) Cavazzi ap. Labat. Ethiop. occident. l. ii. c. 10, p. 318, & seq.

- a Alphonso, the first Christian king, who took that name at his baptism; as we shall shew more fully in its proper place<sup>b</sup>.

THERE are two grand ceremonies which follow that of his coronation, by which one may judge in what height of power, grandeur, and esteem, those princes are held by their subjects. The first and most considerable is that of their giving their public and solemn blessing to the people, upon certain occasions; and that of his granting the investiture of the principal posts and fiefs of their dominions. The days fixed for each of them are proclaimed with great pomp and ceremony through the kingdom, and in the capital of St. Salvador, by the sound of various musical instruments, and the fire of the artillery. The first of these always brings the vastest concourse from all parts, as they set so great a value upon his blessing, that they would esteem themselves worse than accursed to be deprived of it, or if they wilfully missed of it. On the day appointed, the monarch appears in the utmost splendor, surrounded by his guards, and a numerous court, together with all the governors and nobles of the kingdom, all magnificently apparelled and attended. The ceremony is performed in a wide spacious plain, sufficient to contain the innumerable multitudes that flock to it; on one eminent part of which is raised a most sumptuous throne or canopy, from which he can see and be seen by them, and clearly distinguish every one of his ministers and nobles, who are all situated nearer or farther from him, according to their rank.

- AND here it is, that if any of these have incurred his displeasure, through any neglect of duty, or other default, whom, by reason of their great distance from the court, or their being grown too powerful, he was obliged to let go unpunished, he casts his first looks upon them, and causes them to be driven from his presence, as wretches unworthy of his blessing, to which none but faithful subjects can have a claim. The very disgrace of being thus cast away, would be looked upon as one of the greatest misfortunes that could befall a man of quality: but this is not all; the populace, emulous to express their zeal for their prince, lay violent hands on the obnoxious persons, drag them off without mercy or regard, tear their cloaths off their backs, and treat them with such variety of outrages and indignities, that many of them lose their lives before they can get out of the numerous crowd. By this stratagem those monarchs often rid themselves with ease of such bad ministers, whom they could not have attempted to punish by any other way, without imminent hazard of seeing their authority despised and affronted by them.

No sooner are those obnoxious persons removed, than the king, addressing himself to the rest of the assembly, exhorts them to continue true and loyal to him, and promises them his favour and protection; after which, rising from his throne, whilst they prostrate themselves on the ground before him, he gives them his blessing, not in words, but by a peculiar spreading of his arms over them, and gesticulation of his fingers; for which they, on their part, express their joy and gratitude by loud acclamations, and clapping their hands, and the whole ceremony concludes with the sound of various instruments, and the fire of the artillery. From that time, those who have survived the disgrace of being cast off from a share in the blessing, are looked upon with horror and contempt, and esteemed as excommunicants, unless they can, by the help of their friends, by rich presents, ample refundings, and submissive behaviour, regain the royal favour; which if they do, they are admitted to his presence, and his blessing wipes away all former disgrace<sup>c</sup>.

- THE other ceremony is performed with much the same pomp, solemnity, and grandeur, and equally shews the deep submission which the people pay to those monarchs. They appear in all their magnificence on their throne on the day prefixed; whilst all who are candidates for a new post, fief, or investiture, lie prostrate before him, surrounded by vast crowds of spectators, in the same posture. At the third discharge of the artillery, the candidates are regularly introduced at the foot of the throne, accompanied by all their relations and friends, all in the richest attire, by the master of the ceremonies. There on their knees, at the last step of the throne, the grant is brought to them by some chief minister; which having received with the deepest submission, the king informs them, by a set speech, of the greatness of the favour he bestows upon them, the conditions upon which he grants it to them, the duties he expects from them; to all which they take a solemn oath to conform themselves: after which, the insignia of their dignity are likewise delivered to them, which are a white bonnet, more or less rich, according to the dignity granted, a scymitar, a flag of honour, a chair of state, and a carpet. The whole pageantry concludes with prostrations, clapping of hands, and other slavish postures of the person invested, and with the shouts and thankful acclamations of his friends, who extol the royal favour to the skies, though it be commonly saddled with such taxes, tribute, and other hard conditions, as are impossible for him to perform but by tyranny and oppression of those that are under him.

As soon as the whole business is dispatched, the king rises up, and then the ceremony is closed as it began, with the loud huzzas of the audience, and the noise of the artillery and musical instruments, in the midst of which he is conducted to his palace. It seems, however, as if these later monarchs had abated much of their former state and pageantry, extravagant as it may appear to us even now, seeing the ritual of the court of Kongo formerly obliged a petitioner for an investiture, tho' a count, duke, or prince of the royal blood, to approach the throne, not only in the cringing suppliant guise above described, but with his face, head, and shoulders, covered with an ordinary veil, besprinkled all over with dust and dirt, in token of the deepest abasement<sup>a</sup>; which last piece of state seems now wholly set aside, perhaps since those monarchs became Christians; tho' some other kinds of respects, which they still permit to be paid to them, are of so extravagant a nature, as to come little short of that which they pay to the Supreme Being, and is still stiled by them by the solemn terms of worship and adoration<sup>c</sup>. But tho' the ritual above-mentioned shews those monarchs to have been arrived to that intolerable height of pride long before the Portuguese came among them, yet it doth not appear that they had any-thing answerable to it, either in the magnificence of their palaces, court, furniture, dress, &c. till after that time, when they began to imitate, and by degrees strove to out-do them, in the richness of their apparel, the grandeur and sumptuousness of their retinue and equipage, and the costliness of their furniture. Their garb was formerly made of no richer stuff than a cloth which they wove from a better kind of their aliconda before-mentioned<sup>f</sup>, with which they covered their waist downwards, and bound with a girdle of the same stuff, but more curiously wrought; they likewise affected to hang before them some delicate furs, either of young tygers, civet cats, fables, martins, or the like, which came down below their knees, like our aprons. Next to their skin they wore an incutto, or rochet, woven of the finest palm-cloth, in the fashion of a net, and neatly fringed at the bottom with threads of various colours, and these were turned up on their right shoulder, to give more liberty to that arm; and to the place where they were fastened hung, by way of ornament, the tail of a zebra; and, over the incutto, was a cape which went round their neck and shoulders. Over their heads they had nothing but a small square cap of red and yellow colour, which just covered the top of the head, and was worn rather for shew than use. They wore a kind of sandals, or short buskins, on their feet, the sole of which was made of palm wood; and this last they allowed only some of their nobles to wear, whilst the rest of his court and subjects were obliged to go barefoot<sup>g</sup>. This was all the finery they affected about their persons, and their nobles and grandees were careful to make a proportionably inferior appearance, both in their garb and furniture.

BUT after they were converted, and became more conversant with the Portuguese, both kings and nobles became so excessive fond of their finery, and the richness and fashion of their cloaths, that one might see them strive who should most imitate them in both. Short cloaks, scarlet jackets, caps, long spadoes, became now the universal dress of the Kongoese court and nobility; rich cloaths, silks, velvets, gold and silver tissue, lace, fringe, and other finery, were the distinguishing apparel of the great and wealthy; the king himself expressing no less emulous a liking for the fashions, than he did for the religion of those new comers. His court, retinue, table, furniture, and attendance, his throne, audiences, and ceremonial, were quickly regulated after the Portuguese model; and if there was any difference between them, it was only in the grandeur and magnificence in which the new convert strove to outshine his new European ally. His table is covered with variety of the most exquisite meats, his side-board with the most delicate wines and other liquors, and he hath tasters to examine every thing he eats and drinks; his cup and side-board are furnished with the richest vessels of silver and gold, and other precious materials, consecrated solely to his own use, as he always eats alone, and never suffers any one, tho' of the highest rank, to sit with him, but only to stand about him; and these are only princes of the blood, and his other great officers, but with this difference, that the former stand with their heads covered. The throne of state, on which he gives public audience twice or three times a week, is equally grand and costly; the foot of it, which consists of three steps, is all over covered with Indian tapestry; and the chair of state on which he sits, as well as the table that stands before him, are covered with crimson velvet, adorned with bosses and nails of gold; and, when he sits as judge, or to receive petitions and hear causes, none are permitted to speak to him but his nobles and lords.

HE very seldom goes abroad, except on such particular occasions as we have already spoken of, and then he is always attended with a numerous guard, consisting of Anzichi (F), and

(F) The Anzichi, or Anfiki, are a barbarous nation, famous for their eating of human flesh, and exposing it to sale in their shambles. They are, in other respects, a stout and warlike people, and such quick and expert archers, situate on the northern confines of the kingdom of Loango, and river Bancara, formerly described, and in-

- a and some other neighbouring nations, in whom he puts a great confidence, and who are armed, some with musquets, and others with lances, bows and arrows, &c. but march without any regularity before him. These are followed by crowds of musicians, or players upon martial or other instruments, the sound of which, Lopez tells us<sup>a</sup>, could be heard five or six miles off, and serves to give notice of his approach. Next to these are the officers of the household, followed by the knights of the Holy Cross, an order instituted by the first christian king of Kongo, and which hath maintained itself in great credit ever since. The king appears next, preceded by two young squires of the noblest families in the kingdom, the one bearing the royal shield, covered with the tyger's skin, and the sword of state, adorned with precious stones; the other holds a staff in his hand, covered with red velvet, adorned with two massy knobs of silver, one at each end. On each side the king ride two officers, who keep fanning him with horses tails, and behind these is a third, who carries a large umbrella over his head, of red damask, richly fringed and embroidered: these three last must likewise be of the most illustrious families of the kingdom; as they are allowed to be nearest to his majesty's person<sup>b</sup>.

He goes to mass with much the same retinue and pomp; and, upon his alighting at church, is led by two masters of ceremonies to his own place; where there is a chair without arms for him to sit upon when he thinks fit, and several velvet or damask cushions to kneel upon. As soon as he is placed, a lighted taper is put into his hand, which he gives to his next page to hold, till the gospel is read, at which time he takes it from him, and holds it up till that is ended, when the priest brings it to him to kiss. At the offertory he marches towards the altar, where the priest gives him the paten to kiss; after which he makes his offering, and retires to his place. He retakes the lighted taper at the elevation of the host, and continues upon his knees during most of the remainder of the mass; all which time the music continues playing, and the proper anthems are sung; the service being finished, the king sits down, and receives the compliments of his court, and, in return, gives them his blessing and his hand to kiss, which is esteemed a singular favour: the ceremony being ended, he returns to the palace in the same order and pomp<sup>c</sup> (G).

archers, if we may believe our author, that they will hold twenty-eight or more arrows in their hand, and shoot them all successively, before the first lights on the ground, and kill birds flying without missing their mark. Both their bows and arrows are shorter by much than those of other African nations, the former is covered with snake skins of various colours, so smoothly joined that they seem to grow to the wood.

Besides that, they use other weapons with equal dexterity, one of which is the axe with a short handle, the iron very bright and keen at one end, the other blunt, and serves for a hammer. They have likewise a short dagger by their side, sheathed with a snake's skin, and the warriors hang it to their girdle, which is made of elephant-skin, three fingers broad, and very thick.

They are very active and nimble, climbing the mountains and rocks like goats; they are no less expert and nimble in fighting, and in repelling the enemy's first discharge with their hatchets, which they whirl round over their heads with such surprising swiftness, that the dart or arrow seldom fails of recoiling against the iron.

But what is most valuable in that barbarous nation is their singular fidelity, loyalty, and simplicity, insomuch that they will sacrifice their lives in proof of it, in defence of their princes, or of their friends and allies. Their king is also king of Miccoco, and hath his residence at Monzol, the capital of Anziko. We know very little more of this vast country, except that it hath several mines of copper, and great quantity of sanders wood, both red and grey; the last of which, called by them chiconga, is the most esteemed, and used medicinally both by them and the Portuguese.

Their traffick with the Kongoes consists in slaves, both of their own country and of such as they have from the kingdom of Mujak, upon which they border towards the south; linen cloth, elephant's teeth, and the above sanders wood; in lieu of which they carry back salt, two sorts of shells called lumache, or sea-snails, which pass with them for money, and are worn by them as fine ornaments. They likewise purchase silk, velvet, linen, looking-glasses, and other merchandizes brought thither by the Portuguese.

They circumcise their males; but whether out of religion, or from other motives, we cannot learn. In other cases they are idolaters; and, if our authors were truly informed, so inhuman as to eat the flesh not only of the enemies they take in war, but also that of their nearest friends and relations, even mothers eat that of their children. The men take as many wives as they please, and divorce them when they will. They account it an ornament to flash their faces more or less, according to their rank; they all go naked from the waist upwards, and wrap up the rest of their bodies with linen or other cloth, more or less fine, according to their circumstances. The rich, among the men, wear on their heads, hats or caps of Portuguese velvet, or red, yellow, or black silk; those of the middle rank have linen caps, and the rest go bare-headed; and all, except those of the better sort, go likewise bare-footed; as do also the women, except those of distinction, who wear sandals, and cast a veil over their bodies, which covers them all over from head to foot, their faces excepted, which are said to be very handsome for that hot climate. The language of this country differs entirely from that of Kongo, but the Anzichi easily learn this last for the sake of trafficking with them. In other respects, they live much like the wandering Arabs, upon hunting and plunder. Thus much may suffice for that wild nation, whose bravery and faithfulness alone recommends them to the kings of Kongo for their life-guard (3).

(G) There is, we are told, one odd ceremony more upon this occasion, which is peculiar to this court, viz. That when the king is come to the threshold of the church-door, one of the officers who carry the horse-tail kneels down, and waves it several times before him, as if he was sprinkling him with holy water; after which, fixing his eyes intently upon him, he gives three loud claps with his hands, to notify to the people that

THE king's court is both very numerous and brilliant, consisting not only of the proper officers of his household, but of all the governors of the kingdom; who, when they come to pay their respective homage and tributes, never appear but with a very large and sumptuous retinue; to which we may add the vast number of his generals, and other officers of war, who are likewise obliged to resort thither, and to give an account of the success of their arms, and the state of the forces under them, and such-like. Besides these, he hath his auditors, judges of different tribunals, counsellors, secretaries, &c. whose respective business, how momentous and difficult soever, is quickly dispatched with him, because all is transacted here in a verbal and summary manner, and without any writings; yet the multiplicity of affairs, of one kind or other, obliges them to appear frequently before him; for, as few of them can read or write, his decisions and orders can only be received by word of mouth, and be conveyed by them to their distant clients, by persons of known character, and intrusted with some undoubted token that what they bring is the result of the royal will. If the distance of the place, or the nature of the message requires a fuller discussion, the king's orders are sent in writing, by an express, to the governor or officer concerned to see them executed; but then he is obliged to get some missionary, or learned clerk, to read it to him, and to write an answer to it, to be sent by the same courier, or to let his majesty know, in due time, how punctually his orders have been obeyed; the least failure in duty, or even in circumstances, being reckoned a sufficient offence to deprive him of his office, or even of all he is worth<sup>1</sup>.

So that these grand officers, notwithstanding their pretended high titles, vast authority, and outward grandeur, are in fact as great slaves as those they tyrannize over, and live in continual expectation and dread of some signal token of his diffidence or resentment; either of which, whether well or ill-grounded, they know is more than sufficient to hasten their ruin, under so despotic a government, and prince, who knows himself to be obeyed rather through fear than affection, and from a principle of the basest selfishness, rather than of duty and loyalty.

THE royal palace and apartments are vastly spacious, grand, and commodious; but all this is owing to the Portuguese, who built them mostly after the European manner, for their own use, within the great cincture of the castle; which, after their expulsion, of which we shall speak more fully in its proper place, became the residence of the Kongoese monarchs; but they have been far from keeping up the sumptuous grandeur in which they left it, any more than some stately churches they had reared within that inclosure, one of which hath now nothing left but bare walls; within which they have caused barracks to be built for their soldiers and life-guard. As for the apartments, we have already said something of them, particularly of his stately throne and sumptuous table, by which the reader may guess at the rest. As to his seraglio (for tho' he marries but one wife, yet he may keep as great a number and variety of concubines as he pleases) it is rather a prison than a palace, into which being once entered, they are confined during the remainder of their life. Their apartments are surrounded either with strong high walls, or quickset hedges, of such height and thickness, that no mortal can go over or through them; the care and government of this female inclosure is usually committed to some nobleman in the highest esteem and favour with the king.

THE lady who is lawfully married to him is stiled mani mombanda, or mistress of the women, because she is set over all the rest of his seraglio. Before his marriage he causes a tribute to be levied over all his kingdom, which is to be instead of dowry or appendage, to the young princess, and is called pintelfo. On his wedding day, proper officers are ordered to measure the length and breadth of every bed; and the owner of it is taxed according to it, so much for every span: as soon as the marriage ceremony is over, she is conducted to her apartment in the royal palace, with all the young ladies that are to be her constant attendants, where most of their time is spent in diverting her and themselves; and, if we may believe some authors<sup>m</sup>, they mutually gratify each other's inclinations. The queen permits the greatest part of them to lie out of her apartment at nights; whilst they, in return, wink at her irregularities, and at any bold gallant that dares venture his neck over those high walls or hedges for her sake, and at the risk of a sure and dreadful death, in case of a discovery, tho' he were of the greatest quality in the kingdom, or even a Portuguese (H). As his majesty is in good health, which is answered by them with acclamations of joy. The king then reaches the extremity of his fingers to him to kiss, which he doth with great devotion and respect, three times, continuing all the time upon his knees, till he beckons to him to get up, and continue his march (4).

(H) We must here observe, that, in other cases, the Portuguese have here a peculiar privilege, that if they have a law-suit with a native, they are tried by a judge of their own, allowed by the king, and according to the laws of their country; and if it be in the case of a capital crime, the king contents himself with banishing

a As for the king, he not only hath free access to her when he pleases, but makes no scruple to take the same freedom with any of those young ladies he likes, as he doth with his other concubines, notwithstanding all the remonstrances of his father confessor, or of the most zealous missionaries. And it is the great liberty he takes with those women which often provokes his queen to infidelity, especially as there is no distinction made between the children he hath by her, and those he hath by his concubines<sup>a</sup>.

His revenue, which consists chiefly in the tribute that is paid to him by several vassal princes, as those of Angola, Loango, and some other inferior ones, and which the mani or governors of the six chief provinces are obliged to pay him, comes generally very short of what it ought to be, and of which consequently no exact estimate can be made. There are others that make him a kind of free-will offerings, some of cattle, others of grain, wine, palm-oil, and the like, as an acknowledgement for the lands they hold under him; these are commonly brought to him on St. James's day, when he is obliged to give them a sumptuous feast, and to make them some small presents, which, if we may believe some authors, amount to within 80 crowns of the full value of what they bring<sup>b</sup>. He is, moreover, the sole proprietor of all the zimbis, or cockle-shells, which are the current coin of this and other neighbouring kingdoms, which bring him, in exchange, slaves, elephants teeth, Sanders, stuffs, cattle, millet, and other commodities. This branch is reckoned so considerable, that he prefers it to that of his mines of silver and gold, which he either suffers to go neglected, or perhaps keeps in reserve, as having a more intrinsic value (I). The renewing of fiefs and investitures, fines and confiscations, likewise brings him a considerable income; to which we may add that he can levy taxes upon his subjects as often as he pleases; but seldom doth it, except in case of necessity, the poverty of his subjects being such as might drive them into despair, or a revolt, if they were too frequent.

His standing forces are neither numerous nor well disciplined, and still worse armed and clothed; after the peace concluded with the Portuguese, wherein these engaged themselves to protect the king of Kongo against his enemies, they advised him to erect fortresses in several parts of his dominions; particularly on the coasts, in the islands Quindangas, and in the inland at Maopanga, Ambacca, Massangano, and some other parts of his frontiers, and to garrison them partly with Portuguese, and partly with his own troops; and these last were to be disciplined by the former, as far as it could be done, after the European manner. But whether the same was done with respect to his other troops or no, it is plain they have since returned to their old way, tho' they are all obliged to appear at their stated musters, where they are usually exercised, but not so much how to use their offensive as defensive weapons, and to cover their bodies, which are naked from the waist upwards, with their shields made of thick skins, with such precaution and dexterity, as to avoid the missile ones of the enemy. They are likewise inured to fall on the foe with a dreadful kind of bravery, or rather fury, which they do accordingly upon all occasions; but, as their arms are of little use in such violent and irregular onsets, for want of better discipline, they are easily put to the rout; and, when they are so, are seldom able to rally; so that the breaking of the very first body is mostly attended with a general rout, and precipitate flight.

THESE musters, or exercises, which they call sangamentos and nsangaro, and which are rather for shew than service, are constantly made on St. James's day, when there is, as we hinted above, the greatest concourse of nobles and prime officers at the court; that being the day on which the vassal princes and governors bring their offerings to the king, and on which he not only feasts them, but gives them his blessing, in the manner we have before described. These reviews making one part of the festivity, every soldier is emulous to appear at them; but their figure and variety of arms hath something so uncouth, that a stranger would take them for nothing less than a stated muster; some appearing with bows and arrows of differ-them. And if they can, by money or presents, gain some friends at court, they are frequently recalled. But, in case of a criminal converse with this queen, that privilege would not, it seems, be allowed to him (5), though we do not meet with any instance of it in their history.

(I) We are told by Odoard Lopez, that Don Sebastian, king of Portugal, having been informed that there were mines of gold and silver in several parts of the kingdom, sent thither some persons well skilled in that art, to make what discoveries they could of them; but that the king of Kongo's confessor, F. Francesco Barbuto, though a Portuguese, had dissuaded him from consenting to such a search, alleging to him, that the discovery of them might cause his dominions to be taken from him by little and little. Upon which those artists were directed to places where there were no such mines to be found. This cheat, however, our author tells us, though it prevented, in all likelihood, the loss of those mines, was attended with that of vast numbers of Portuguese merchants, who traded in those parts, and forsook them soon after, to the great detriment of the traffick between those nations, as well as the decay of Christianity in that kingdom, occasioned by the great scarcity of Portuguese priests which ensued soon after (6).

ent makes and sizes, others with broad swords, spadoes, daggers, and cutlasses; some without any other cloaths or arms than their long targets; others with their bodies covered with various skins of beasts, from the girdle to the knee: some with their face and skin painted with figures of various kinds, the more monstrous the more warlike; and all of them armed and accoutred, according to their fancy or ability, and those who cannot afford themselves a broad sword of metal will get one of some heavy wood. What still more disgraces their appearance, is that their colours are commonly no better than dirty rags torn and mangled; their steel and iron weapons eat up with rust; their wooden ones ill painted and imitated. Add to this, that as the invalids, a mixture of old and young, blind and lame, are likewise obliged to assist, one sees some without arms, others without legs, and carried upon other mens shoulders; their heads are dressed with variety of feathers of different colours, and in almost as many different fashions as there are men; and all of them, besides their particular weapons, affect to appear with some kind of tool belonging to his particular trade, if he has any.

ALL this huge army is divided into several bodies, at the head of each of which the king marches, attended by his court, takes a full view of them, and commends or discommends, punishes or rewards, promotes or degrades, as he sees occasion. After this, these bodies engage and make a sham fight one against the other, and with as much seeming fury as if they were engaging an enemy; and these mock battles seldom fail of ending in dry blows, broken heads and limbs, and other deadly wounds, every one being eager, in the heat of the action, to shew his valour before the king and court, who appear there in all their pomp and brilliancy, tho' greatly eclipsed by the vast clouds of dust which are raised by these military exercises. All this while, the princes of the blood, and great officers, are animating them to fight valiantly and intrepidly under the standards of so glorious and powerful a monarch.
Where is there such another to be found under heaven? cry some: Where is there one that can be compared with, or dare make head against his formidable power? cry others: Let him live for ever, answers a third groupe; let his throne be exalted above the sun and stars:
let all his enemies be confounded, and trodden small like the dust under his feet, answers the general chorus. Immediately after which, the martial music is ordered to strike up, which brings on a fresh and more furious onset, in the heat of which, vast numbers are laid sprawling on the ground, and many seem even to court death, for the sake of falling before such an illustrious assembly.

THE musqueteers are indeed the best disciplined, and make the finest show upon the field; these, having been formerly taught the use of fire-arms by the Portuguese, do still retain the art of handling them with surprising dexterity and judgment; and, upon these and the like occasions, make continual discharges with their musquets, and may some time or other prove too hard for those who instructed them. The ceremony of the fight being over, the king commonly treats the combatants with a plentiful supper, on the field of battle, which is as greedily devoured by his hungry guests, tho' in the midst of the same dismal clouds of dust, which a stranger, unused to them, could hardly breathe in, or see through. After they have consumed all the provisions that are laid before them, the feast usually concludes with music, dancing, and other diversions: during which they are so often obliged to wash down the dust they raise anew, with quaffing strong liquors, till quite overcome with them, and the fatigue of the day, that they all lie down upon the bare ground, and sleep, till the morning lights them towards their respective homes<sup>a</sup>.

THESE troops are under the respective mani, or governors of the provinces, and obliged to march under them upon all expeditions or incursions they think fit to make into an enemy's or other independent provinces: but when the king goes in person, they are all obliged to repair to the royal standard, under their respective officers, with their arms and provisions. These last are generally inconsiderable, and just sufficient to keep them alive two or three days; but we must here observe<sup>r</sup>, that in all such excursions they seize on all that comes in their way, without regard to friend or foe, fruits, grain, cattle, beasts, wild and tame, serpents, insects, even the bark and root of trees; all is alike to those famished troops, who leave nothing behind but horrid devastation and misery where-ever they pass thro'; whilst the poor inhabitants of the villages and hamlets are forced, at the first alarm of their approach, to retire into the woods, mountains, or other places of safety with their families, cattle, and what other effects they can carry off with them, and to leave their houses, and the rest of their goods, to their mercy. Notwithstanding all which dreadful ravages, vast numbers perish in their march, thro' hunger, sickness, and so many other accidents, that the king loses more than half his army before he comes in sight of the enemy, and is sometimes obliged to return homewards with less than one third part of it, through the unfitness

a of the season, without having struck a stroke, or done any harm to any but his own subjects (I).

If they are to engage the enemy, they always affect, if possible, to do it in some spacious plain, where both armies engaged, as was lately hinted, fall upon each other with greater fury than regularity; the commander's authority ceasing to have any check upon them from the moment the onset is begun. They continue fighting in the same desperate obstinacy till one side begins to give way, which is no sooner perceived, than the rest betake themselves to their heels, without minding the efforts which their officers make to rally them. The flight of one army never fails of encouraging the other to an obstinate pursuit; during which time the slaughter continues without intermission, no quarter being given by either side till

b the vanquished are got out of their reach; upon which they return and plunder the enemy's camp, seize all the men, women, and children, sick and lame, they find there, as well as all the stragglers that fall in their way, whom they brand as their slaves, and look upon as the most considerable part of the spoil, and gladly dispatch, as soon as they can, to the sea side, or to some inland market, to be sold to the Europeans for slaves. As for the wounded, few, if any, survive their defeat, their weapons being poisoned to such a degree, that they cause a speedy and unavoidable death where-ever they draw blood, unless the person be provided with some extraordinary antidote, which is the case of but few, excepting those of higher rank.

c It seldom happens that a victory is not soon followed by a peace; but which, being concluded upon the victor's terms, hardly proves of longer duration than till the vanquished hath sufficiently recovered his strength to renew the war. The kings of Kongo are even frequently forced, tho' conquerors, to forego that advantage, and to hurry up a peace at any rate, with an enemy, or even a revolted vassal, to prevent a new rebellion being raised in some other part of his extensive dominions, or to suppress some other already raised; of this we shall meet with various instances in the sequel of their history. We shall conclude this article of the Kongoese monarchs, with an account of the honours paid to them at their funerals.

d In former days, before they were converted to Christianity, they used a multitude of pompous and superstitious ceremonies, as sacrifices of various kinds, accompanied with suitable music, howling, dancing, and feasting, which lasted a whole week, and were resumed once a year, on the anniversary of their demise. All the mani, princes, governors, &c. were obliged to assist, and to appear with their usual grand retinue, in their funeral guise; and, what was a still greater mark of honour, a certain number, either of his favourite concubines, or of the young ladies belonging to the court, were to accompany the corpse, not only to, but into, the grave. The number of those who were allowed to be buried alive with him, and to accompany him into the other world, seldom exceeded twelve; but that of the candidates to that honour was much more considerable; and their struggle so violent, that they even fought for it with surprising eagerness, till the contest was decided by some proper officer of his court, or sometimes by lot; and so happy did those young females think themselves who were nominated to it, that they strove to appear on that occasion with all possible pomp and gaiety. Their near relations seemed no less sensible of the honour done to them by it, and presented them with jewels, the richest cloaths and other ornaments, to enable them to make the noblest appearance, both at this solemnity, and in the other world. Christianity hath long since abolished that inhuman custom, but hath not been able to do the same by some others, which, tho' less barbarous, are yet a disgrace to it; particularly the drunken revels which are still indulged, both during the octave of the obsequies, and on the anniversary ones. In other respects, they are performed after the ritual of the church of Rome, and with the splendor which is used to crowned heads; excepting, perhaps, that those of this kingdom are deposited in a large tomb, or rather vault, in a fitting posture, upon a stately armed chair.

f THE Kongoese have no written laws, but custom and tradition serve them instead of a code and commentaries, unless favour or bribery interpose. As the people are naturally brutish, envious, and vindictive, they are so often at law with each other, that the judges would hardly have any thing else to do but to hear and judge causes, had they not as expeditious a method

(I) What is still more dreadful to read of, if not exaggerated by our author, is that those unfortunate troops, who, thro' sickness, violent heats, rains, fatigue, &c. are not able to follow the body of the army, are abandoned, without pity or remorse, both by the king and their officers, to whom the new recruiting is so cheap and easy, to perish in the way, either with hunger or thirst, wild beasts, serpents, or other dreadful calamities; and that the kindest office which their nearest friends can do, is to free them from the terror of their condition, by a speedier death; which they readily give them at their request, by severing their heads from their shoulders, or running them through the body (1).

of dispatching them. Every province hath a chief justice, or, as he is stiled, a royal judge, both for the civil and criminal affairs; from whom, however, an appeal may be made to the king, who presides twice a week at the supreme court, and determines the contest by his absolute authority. The royal judge has inferior ones under him in every town and community, from whose sentence the parties may appeal to him; but this is seldom done, except in matters of great moment, the remedy being looked upon as worse than the disease in those of a more trivial nature; so that they commonly chuse to acquiesce with their sentence, and, how unjust soever they may think it, seldom venture to complain against it. Every judge chuses a number of assistants, commonly twelve, out of his own community; and, when the cause is brought before him, hears and examines the parties and their evidence; the plaintiff and defendant are the only pleaders, the former opens and endeavours to prove his cause as well as he can, and the other answers to it in the same manner. If any think themselves incapable of pleading their own cause, they are allowed to substitute a friend to do it for them, who must be instructed in every thing before he appears at court. When both sides have been heard, sometimes once, and sometimes oftener, the judge recapitulates the whole evidence to his assistants, and asks their opinion; if any difference or dispute arises between them, he endeavours to bring them over to his side; but whether he doth or not, he immediately pronounces sentence, and dismisses the parties; so that the beginning and ending of a law-suit seldom takes up above two or three hours.

THE worst of it is, that these judges, who are all extremely liable to be corrupted, do often refuse the parties a sufficient time to get their evidences ready, for want of which they are unjustly cast, whipped, and imprisoned, till the antagonist is satisfied. On the other hand, he that gains his cause, especially if by bribery and corruption, is obliged, in some measure, to exhaust himself in feasting his judge, evidence, and other friends several days successively, and in a more expensive manner than his circumstances can possibly afford<sup>a</sup>.

THE method is much the same in criminal cases, wherein only three offences are deemed capital; viz. treason, murder, and sorcery. In the former the offender's punishment chiefly depends on the prince's will, who commonly condemns them to the loss of their heads and estate, the latter of which is confiscated into his treasury. The man convicted of murder is immediately beheaded, unless some atrocious circumstances be thought to require, or the relations of the deceased petition for, a more severe death; in which case he is usually delivered up to them, to suffer such punishment as they think proper to inflict on him; which is generally done immediately after the sentence is pronounced. Magic, or sorcery, a crime very rife and common in the unconverted provinces, is, on that account, punished the more severely by the Christians, and the person convicted of it is immediately burned alive; which punishment seems to have been introduced into this kingdom by the Portuguese, after their planting the gospel among them. Other punishments, for lesser crimes, are the bastonade, whipping, fines, and imprisonments; on which we need not dwell longer than to observe, that, as in most other arbitrary governments, so in this, the two former generally fall to the lot of the poorer, and the two last to that of the wealthier sort. These and many other arbitrary instances of cruelty and oppression (K), which are practised by those in authority, and but too frequently allowed and winked at by the prince, tho' both making open profession of the gospel, doth but still further confirm what hath been more than once observed in this chapter, both of the low degree to which Christianity hath been reduced, since their first conversion to it, and of the occasion which the example of some Europeans, who are settled there, hath given to that degeneracy<sup>w</sup>. These do not carry their rigor so far as to sell their insolvent debtors for slaves; neither perhaps doth the government allow them that liberty; but they commonly seize on all his slaves, and keep them for their own use, till they are fully paid; which is, in fact, depriving the poor debtor

(K) There is still a more flagrant piece of injustice and cruelty practised with impunity by persons of rank on those of a lower class: if one of the latter sort chance to run in debt to one of the former, he is not only liable to be stripp'd of all he hath, not excepting his wife and family, who, in such cases, are often sold for slaves, but to be also ill-treated, bastonaded, dragged to a jail, and inhumanly used in it, in order to oblige some of his friends to procure him his liberty at an exorbitant rate.

What is still more unjust and inhuman, is, that if any insolvent debtor secrete himself from his tyrannic creditor, or flee into some other country, either to avoid a jail, or being sold for a slave, it is looked upon as a flagrant crime; and the creditor would make no difficulty of seizing on some wealthy relation of his, and imprison him in his stead, and by way of security, till he had extorted, by the most cruel usage of him, a sufficient sum from his other friends, to satisfy the runaway's debt.

This arbitrary cruelty extends even so far as to debts contracted by gaming, a vice to which the Kongoese are much addicted; for should one of a lower rank happen to lose two or three cofis, or pistoles, to a superior, and not be able to pay him, he would be equally exposed to the same hardships and ill treatment as if he had borrowed it, and given his bond for it (2).

a of his whole livelihood, tho' not of his liberty. On the other hand, the Kongoese pay still less regard to them, and, if any of them prove insolvent, will seize on any effects of the rest, as if they all stood bound for each other; against which these have no other remedy than opposing force to force; or, as it sometimes happens, when they have the upper hand, by making reprisals upon them. This plainly shews how little either of them are governed by reason or equity, when they get the power into their own hands. As for the Portuguese, we must here observe, that they are allowed a judge of their own nation, not only for their law-suits among themselves, but between them and the natives, who decides all controversies according to the laws of Portugal; a privilege which is granted to no other Europeans *.

b ST. SALVADOR is the chief place of their residence and traffick; there are reckoned to be about 4000 of them settled in that metropolis, who traffick with most parts of the kingdom; the chief commodities they bring thither are either the product of Brasil, or of the manufactures of Europe. We have elsewhere spoken of the former, which consists chiefly in grains, fruits, plants, and other provisions for the mouth. The latter usually consists in Turkey carpets, English cloth, and other stuffs; copper and brass vessels, some kinds of blue earthenware, rings, and ornaments of gold, silver, and other baser metals; coral, glass beads, bugles, and other trinkets; tobacco, wine, brandy, and other spirituous liquors; light stuffs made of cotton, linen, and woollen, for cloathing; and a great variety of tools and utensils. In return for which they carry off such a prodigious number of slaves for the plantations in America, that some make the yearly amount from this kingdom, and some other settlements they have on the same African coasts, to be little less, if at all, than fifteen or sixteen thousand †.

consists chiefly in slaves.

HERE we must observe, however, that the best and most serviceable of them are brought from the kingdom of Angola, the county of Ambuila, the countries of the Jingos, Jagas, and other adjacent parts, where they are robust and healthy; whereas those of Bamba, Sogno, Pemba, and other provinces of Kongo, being for the most part brought up in sloth, hunger, and ease, either die in their passage, through misery and sickness (L), or soon after their arrival, thro' change of climate, or hard labour. They used likewise to bring from thence elephants teeth, furs, and other commodities of the country; but, as their commerce hath been greatly impaired thro' the ill usage they formerly received from the natives, of which we shall give an account in the next section, that of slaves hath been the chief branch of it ever since ‡.

Other branches dwindled away.

THE Portuguese settled in this kingdom have taught the natives the use of weights and measures, of which they had not, till then, the least notion; neither have they, to this very time, any great use for them, considering their poverty and way of living. The English and Dutch do likewise carry on a traffick with these parts, but more particularly from Angola.

(L) This we need not wonder at, if we consider the inhuman manner in which these poor unfortunates are shipped off and conveyed from one country to another. Seven or eight hundred men and women, promiscuously squeezed, like herrings, or mackerel, into one ship, where they can lie only on one side, upon the bare boards, and often forced to lie double, during the whole voyage, with no other food than horse-beans and water, stifled up for want of air, and with their own stench. Some dead, some dying, and most of them labouring under some grievous infirmity, if not under a complication of distempers, without any refreshment, except perhaps a little fresh air to breathe in once a day, if they are able to come upon deck, or any other prospect than that of a miserable slavery for the rest of their life, when they are come to the end of their voyage.

But this is not by far the most melancholy side of the prospect which these unhappy wretches have continually before them; there is a strange and dreadful notion so strongly rooted into them, that no reasoning, nor any thing but a contrary experience, can efface; viz. That all that are sold for slaves in America, are immediately to be butchered in some horrid manner, in order to have their bones burned and calcined to make gunpowder with, and their flesh, fat, and marrow to be pressed into an oil, which, they believe, is the only sort which the Europeans bring into Africa. What confirms still more this last prejudice, is, that it is brought in skins, which they imagine to be those of the poor slaves, from whose flesh the oil is extracted. This notion is so firmly believed through all those parts, that the very threatening of the most obstinate and stubborn slave, to sell him into America, is sufficient to terrify him into the most obsequious suppleness and obedience; the notion of being burnt into gunpowder, and melted into oil, being more dreadful to them than the worst punishment that can be inflicted upon them (3).

All these inhuman hardships and dreadful fears considered, one might rather wonder that so many of them should still be strong enough to out-live their passage, and much more that any creatures in human shape, and especially Christians, should be hardened to such a height of barbarity, as to treat poor creatures of their own species after so shocking a manner, for the sake of reaping a little more profit by each voyage. For as one of them that is bought in Kongo or Angola for 3 or 4 pounds, seldom sells for less in America than 25 or 30, one would be apt to think that a sufficient return to procure those miserable objects a more compassionate treatment, religion, and even humanity, set aside.

BESIDES those slaves which are continually brought from other parts into Kongo and Angola, to be shipped off for America, there remain a sufficient number in the kingdom, to do all kinds of laborious works in it; such as building of houses, felling and sawing of timber, cultivating the lands; to carry men, and other burdens; to work at sundry manufactures; to be cooks, butchers, huntsmen, fishermen, and to perform all the lower offices of a family. And indeed, if we except some few moveables and cattle, slaves are reckoned the greatest riches that those of the inferior and even middle rank have to boast of, or bequeath to their children and relations. The greater number of these a man hath, the more he is respected, and the more comfortably he and his family can live by their labour, whether in that low degree of agriculture, of which we have already spoken in another place<sup>2</sup>, or in those other trades and manufactures which bring their masters a still greater gain. As to the more liberal arts or sciences, we might as well look for them among the Hottentots, as among the Kongoesse; and the reader will have the less cause to wonder at it, when he comes to see, under the next head, in what degree of rudeness and imperfection the most useful and necessary trades are at this day, to what they see them among the Portuguese and other Europeans who live among them, in which art and industry so greatly lighten the labour; whilst in theirs hardly any thing is to be seen but dint of labour, without art or ingenuity.

*Carpenters and

WE need not seek for a more pregnant proof of their invincible indolence than in their iron manufacture, which is an art in great esteem among them; not only on account of its extraordinary usefulness, but much more so on account of a tradition, which goes current with them, that its first inventor became afterwards king of Kongo; but which has, nevertheless, received so little improvement from them, that a stranger, who saw them work at a forge, would be apt to think it still in its infancy with them, as well from the clumsiness of their tools, as from their more clumsy way of using them. There he would see a workman sitting upon the ground, or at best upon a stone (for they have no notion of working in a standing posture) with an ill-shaped hammer in one hand, and his iron in the other, and his anvil, which is no other than a large pebble, or a piece of a hard stone, between his legs, upon which he beats and shapes one iron, whilst his foot is moving a wretched pair of bellows to heat another. It is well for them that their iron is so good and ductile as it is; and for this they are indebted to nature rather than art: they do not dig it out of the mines, but content themselves with such quantity as the heavy rains and torrents bring down with them into the vallies and highways, in a small kind of dust or dirt, for the reception of which they dig holes and trenches. When it is settled at the bottom, and the water taken off or dried up, they cover the whole with charcoal, and by dint of blowing them up, purge the metal from its dross, and melt it into a lump, which they afterwards fabricate in the clumsy manner above described; so that even the points of their lances, darts, and arrows, their scymitars, cutlasses, and other weapons made of that metal, are not only blunt, clumsy, and ill shaped, but take up four times the time and labour to work them to that imperfect degree, that it would cost an ingenious artist to bring them to the greatest degree of perfection<sup>3</sup>.

THE weaving trade is in a still more pitiful condition, notwithstanding its great usefulness; and one would be astonished how they can make such curious works in that way with such wretched tools; they have neither loom, shuttle, nor other instruments, which are in use in most other nations; they fasten their threads only at both ends, to two pieces of timber, laid upon the ground at no considerable distance, because they never weave a piece of any greater length than will serve for one single garb, such as we have elsewhere described. When they have braced the threads of the woof as tight as they can, they conduct the cross-web between them with a singular patience, and as if they were rather darning than weaving. Notwithstanding the length and difficulty of which, some of them adorn their web with sundry curious net, checker, diamond, flower, or other work, and in various colours, with surprising neatness, considering the tools and materials; but, upon the whole, a tolerable weaver, with a proper loom, will be able to do more work in one day, than these can do in twenty. We have already observed that these stuffs are made of the bark of trees, particularly the palm, and of some sorts of beaten weeds, like our hemp; in the spinning and preparing of which, we may suppose they are hardly more dextrous, nor provided with better tools, than they are at weaving of them; all which, rightly known and considered, would make their performances still more admired with us than they are<sup>4</sup>.

If we pass from the weaver's to the joiner's or carpenter's shop (for these two trades are but one and the same among the Kongoesse), we shall find their whole apparatus to consist in a mis-shapen ax, one side of which serves for a hammer, and in a strange kind of tool, one end of which is like a chissel, and the other sharp pointed like a puncheon, and both fastened to a wooden handle. The work produced by these is of a piece with the tools, that is, clumsy

a and without art, tho' six times as tedious in the doing, as a compleat one would be, with better tools, and a better hand. The potters, for want of a wheel, shape their clay by the help of a piece of a gourd or pomkin; which serves them as a mould; and, instead of an oven or kiln, content themselves with burning a quantity of straw over and about it; the reader may thence judge of the beauty and goodness of the work, as well as of the brightness of their invention in the mechanic arts. We shall only observe farther, that in many cases, as in the making of their ordinary huts, hammocks, boats, nets, and the like, every one is his own workman: and that in every thing they betray not only an extraordinary want of genius, but also of industry.

A FARTHER proof of their natural indolence and sloth, is their way of travelling, not only in their long and troublesome, but in their shortest and most pleasant journies, or even from one part of a town to another. They have neither coaches, carts, beasts of burden, or even saddle-horses, mules, asses, &c. as in other countries, but all is carried on the shoulders of slaves; be it ever so far, and the roads ever so bad. The richer sort commonly travel in their hammocks, with a covering over them, to shelter them from the sun, and perhaps a running slave with an umbrella in his hand, to shade his master on the sunny side, and often only for grandeur and ostentation. These hammocks, some of which are made of strong stuffs, and others of net work, are fastened at both ends to a pole, and carried upon the shoulders; or upon the heads, of two stout slaves, who trudge and sweat under their burden, and are relieved, at proper turns, by two others, or more, if their master can afford it, whilst he lies lolling in his hammock, reading, smoking, or sleeping, and in all the various attitudes of slothfulness.

SOME of these carriages are borne by four slaves, like one of our biers, and made in the fashion of the palankins of America, with a canopy above, and curtains around, and an easy couch and bolster underneath. These are still more convenient to travel in, and require a greater number of slaves; and are, on that account, only fit for persons of distinction; and as such are commonly very richly embroidered with gold, silver, and flowered with silk. Those of the lower rank, on the contrary, content themselves with being carried sitting in a kind of open chair, or even a broad leathern strap, like a swing, and fastened to a pole like the hammock, and holding an umbrella in their hand. All these ways of travelling require, besides the slaves of relay, as we may stile them, another set to carry provisions, tents, and other conveniencies for the journey; and those who have not a sufficient number of them, may hire of those that have. Even among those of the poorer sort, who are forced to trudge it on foot, one may observe some shocking and unnatural instances of sloth in the men, who, for want of other slaves, oblige their women to bear their full share of the burden; which is harder upon those poor females, because, instead of carrying them on their heads or shoulders, as the men do, they bear it all upon their backs, fastened to a leather strap, which comes over their foreheads, which, for the most part, hangs down so low, and proves so cumbersome and heavy, that they are forced to walk almost under it; and their case is still worse when they carry sucking children about with them, and are ready to sink, at every step, under their double load, whilst the brutish husband stalks it along with his pipe in his mouth, regardless of their hardship and doleful complaints.

FROM what hath been said the reader may easily judge how chargeable, inconvenient, and tedious, their best way of travelling is; for even those who are best attended for expedition, must be contented to let their porters and carriers rest, so often, and upon so many occasions, some real, and others pretended, that they seldom make half the speed they might. But could they be forced to do so, yet the badness and difficulty of the roads, the want of them thro' most parts of the kingdom, where they must frequently cut their way thro' woods, thro' thickets, full of thorns and brambles, or steer thro' pathless deserts and burning sands, to say nothing of their high and almost impassable rocks and mountains, the dangers of wild beasts, venomous insects, and bands of banditti, to which one is continually exposed the farther one moves from the maritime provinces. The most easy and delightful conveniencies for travelling appear tedious, irksome, and in some cases dreadful; especially if we add to them the many large and rapid rivers one is obliged to cross, with the most imminent danger of one's life, sometimes only by the help of a rope half rotten, that is thrown over them, and fastened to a tree, and at the best upon some old boat, made of the bark, or cut out of the stump, of a tree (M).

ONE

(M) This is another shameful instance of the indolence of the people, as well as of the negligence and avarice of their princes and chief governors, in not erecting either bridges, or, at least, ferries, over those

many rivers, but leaving the people to cross them with so much difficulty and hazard of their lives; notwithstanding their having so great a plenty of timber wood, as is of itself another great nuisance to the travellers.

Trouble and danger of tra-

ONE would imagine that, in a country where travellers are exposed to so many other hardships, from their violent rains, their prodigious morning dews, which are equivalent to, and cause as many inundations in the low lands, as a constant rain of twenty four hours, to the great fatigue and discouragement of the traveller; to say nothing of the knavery of the carriers, who make use of this and every other pretence they can invent, to make long and frequent stops, by which a journey is made to take up twice the time it needs; one would imagine, we say, that the Kongoesse monarchs should long enough ago have obliged their viceroy and governors, at least of the principal provinces, to take care to have all the great roads thro' them made as convenient, easy, and safe as possible, not only for the merchants and passengers; but likewise for their own troops, when they are sent to quell some new revolt, rebellion, or invasion, as they often are, in one part or other of the kingdom; for want of which precaution, one half of the forces perish in the way, thro' hunger, fatigue, and variety of diseases, before they can reach the enemy. Neither would it be less the interest of their head governors to order those high roads to be kept safe and commodious, considering how frequently they themselves are obliged to repair to court from their distant provinces, and with the vast retinue which always accompanies them to and from it. Yet such is the indolence of the Kongoesse nation and government, there are but very few of them kept in any tolerable repair; tho' what we here term tolerable, would be justly termed intolerable amongst us in any part of Europe.

THE only ones we read of that seem to deserve a more favourable epithet than the rest, are those between Loanda and the capital of St. Salvador, and from this last to those of Batta and Bamba, and some few other inland parts of the kingdom, where commerce is carried on with a little more vigour, and by a much greater number of wealthy merchants. In these few provinces, as well from Loanda to Massangano, and Ambaica; in the kingdom of Metamba, and in that of Angola, between its capital, and Arajo and Cassingo, the roads are pretty broad and commodious, as well as more frequented, and safe from banditti, and other wild and dangerous vermin. But, excepting these, the rest of the country may be justly termed a continued wilderness, thro' which there is no other path, except what the passengers are obliged to make to themselves, thro' vast heaths and plains, thick set with thorns and briars, or thro' thick forests, craggy rocks and mountains, at immense labour and charge, and with the extremest hazard of their lives, from wild beasts and venomous insects. And this is still the more surprising, as not only the mercantile part of the people, the king's forces, and officers of the government, but even the most lazy and indolent of the people, are ever in motion, and, thro' a lightness natural to them, are ever shifting from place to place, with their indigent families, in hopes of amending their wretched condition; insomuch that the lower class of the people, which is by far the greater part, may be more truly stiled travellers and wanderers about, than inhabitants of the kingdom. They are still in a more deplorable case; whenever sickness overtakes them in those desert tracts; which is often their case in those sultry and immoderate climes; where, being destitute of all proper help, they are left to perish in the extremest misery.

EVEN to those who travel most at their ease, and have all their conveniencies and attendance of servants with them, it often happens, that, instead of the regular rest which nature requires, after a long fatiguing night's journey (for the excessive heat permits them not to travel during the greatest part of the day) they are obliged to fortify their little camp all around with thick thorn hedges, boughs of trees, and other fences, against wild beasts, and keep continual watch against them, as well as against bands of robbers, which infest most parts of the kingdom; so as to be ready, at the least alarm, to be on their defence against either sort. We shall say nothing of those still more subtle enemies which steal upon them unperceived; such as serpents, vipers, scorpions, and a variety of other venomous creatures, which lie concealed, perhaps, in those very hedges which they make for their defence; these are therefore the most dreadful enemies they have to encounter, seeing there is no fence or weapons that can be of any service against them; whereas the firing of a single musket will

The danger of crossing these rapid rivers by the help of those ropes, consists not only in the hazard of their breaking thro' age, in which case the unfortunate traveller is swallowed up, and perishes inevitably, which frequently happens; but they are moreover exposed to the jaws of crocodiles, sea-horses, and other voracious fishes; with which those rivers swarm, and which often seize on them, whilst they tread, as it were, the water with their feet, and hold their hands fastened to the rope.

This is not all; in many places, the water is either too wide to admit of such ropes, or there are no inhabitants near, or only such as are too slothful to take that trouble upon them. In which case they are obliged to stay till their slaves have fabricated some kind of float, or flat ferry-boat, with the barks of trees, or some slight timber; on which nevertheless they cross not over without imminent danger from the violence of the current, the boisterous winds, or even from the voracious monsters from beneath (4).

- a scare away not only lions, tigers, and other voracious beasts, but even a whole drove of banditti. These various dangers considered, our readers will easily judge, how short and interrupted their repose must be, even after the greatest fatigues; but here it must be observed, that sound sleep is the least thing the Kongoesse covet or require; instead of which, The people use but little rest, one part commonly betake themselves to singing, dancing, and smoaking, while the other take a short nap by turns; after which they rise as much refreshed, as if they had enjoyed a sound night's repose; and, for the most part, with as sparing a share of diet as they have of sleep. But may not this scantiness of the one render the other less needful? And may not their frequent anointing their bodies every day with oil, which prevents their wasting their spirits with sweating, whilst the Europeans they carry in their hammocks feel their own quite exhausted by it, be the very means which enable them to undergo such extraordinary fatigues with so slender a diet and so little rest<sup>c</sup>,

- But by this time our readers will doubtless think they have travelled long enough with them through these dreadful untrodden wilds, and with their wretched accommodations, and will be glad to see how much better they fare within their own homes. We have already given some description of their cities, towns, and villages, by which one may easily guess at the meanness of the rest of their houses, on the inside as well as outside of their habitations, and the scantiness of all conveniencies in them, except what are so absolutely necessary that they could not possibly live without them. And tho' all this wretched poverty be visibly owing to their natural indolence, yet they make no scruple to ascribe it to their peculiar greatness of mind, which inspires them with a contempt for all kind of superfluities and nice accommodations, as the effects of luxury, and sordid ostentation<sup>f</sup>.

- Accordingly, their houses are for the generality no better than round sorry huts, low and ill-built, upon the naked ground, such as they find it, of wood and mud, without floor or cieling, ill-contrived within, and poorly thatched with straw or fern, as if only calculated to defend them from the sun, rain, and wind; they have no windows, nor any light but from the doors, which are commonly so low that the shortest man must stoop to go in and out, and the tallest can hardly stand upright in them. They are so slight, that they are easily carried off by a moderate land-flood, or whirled away by a brisk blast of wind; they are more or less spacious, according to the largeness of the family, who live promiscuously in them, and at night light a fire in the center, the smoak of which makes its way through the thatch, whilst they lie around it, with their heads towards the wall. Those indeed of the city of St. Salvador, and some other towns of note, are somewhat higher, better thatched, and whited within and without, and divided into apartments, the chief of which have their floors matted. Those which belong to persons of rank and substance are still more capacious, and have a kind of hall to receive their visitors, besides distinct apartments for their wives, servants, and slaves, which stand like so many houses, either adjoining to each other, or inclosed within the same cincture.

- We must, however, except those of the Portuguese, which are commonly built of brick and mortar, after the European manner, and, for the most part, pretty well furnished and adorned. Those likewise of the city of Loanda, the capital of Angola, and the place of the greatest commerce in the whole country, are built after the same manner, and some of them make a tolerably grand appearance; but neither of them have been able to raise the emulation of the Kongoesse to build their own after a better, or even after a stronger manner, than we have described; tho', besides all the inconveniencies already mentioned, they are still liable to a much greater and more dreadful one; viz. their being infested by serpents, and venomous insects of various kinds, mentioned in a former section<sup>g</sup>, which frequently make a most dreadful havock among them<sup>h</sup>.

- The furniture of their houses is much of a piece with their structure; it consists chiefly of some few ill-contrived instruments for agriculture, a hatchet to fell timber, a cutlass, which they commonly carry about them when they are travelling, or going to war; some few calabashes, wherein to store their provisions, as their roots, pulse, grains, ointments, and such-like; and their kitchen furniture, viz. a pot, a kettle, a ladle, and a few earthen platters, a hand-mill to grind their corn, and some small calabashes to eat or drink out of. Their best bedding is a large coarse sack-cloth, filled with straw, leaves, or other such stuff; with a slight covering, and perhaps a stump of wood instead of a pillow. As to the meaner sort, if they have any-thing better than the bare ground to lie upon, it is only some straw, fern, rushes; or leaves; and as they are all obliged to kindle a fire at night, it often happens that it communicates itself to their bedding, and in a moment sets the whole house in flames, before they can have time to get out of it, and from that one spreads itself over a whole hamlet or town. Tables, chairs, and stools, are unknown among them; and we have already shewn how poorly the workshops of their artificers are furnished with proper tools for their respective manufactures<sup>i</sup>.

introduced amongst the great by the Portuguese ;

IT must be owned, however, that since the coming of the Portuguese amongst them, their a princes and great lords, who had till then affected the same simplicity and meanness, have begun to imitate them in some degree in the sumptuousness of their furniture. But even all this finery consists in having their floors nicely matted, or covered with a fine carpet, and their mud walls hung with tapestry ; in a few large chests which are ranged about their apartments, wherein they lay up their provisions, and over them hang their armour, belts, weapons, &c. in an irregular manner. Above the rest, they have a large and gaudy umbrella or two, together with some other costly baubles, which they buy of the Portuguese merchants, as looking-glasses, pictures, cabinets, caskets, stately couches, and easy chairs, tabrets, cushions, plate, china, glasses, wardrobes filled with rich cloaths, and such like costly household furniture, with which their halls and chief apartments are adorned. But b these are only to be met with in the palaces of some of the chief princes and viceroys ; whilst those of a lower rank, unable to go to the extravagant price of them, content themselves with either imitating something like them in a less degree, or, which is more common, with despising them with a philosophical pride, as things unworthy the regard of a great mind <sup>k</sup>.

Marriage much disregarded and abused,

IT were happy for them, if this pretended contempt of all superfluities had been able to restrain them from affecting it most, where religion and nature itself do most discountenance and condemn it ; we mean with respect to their plurality of wives and concubines. We have already taken notice, that polygamy was allowed all over the kingdom of Kongo, until the time of their embracing of Christianity ; since which time the missionaries have in vain c endeavoured to persuade them to be contented with one wife <sup>l</sup> ; their constant disregard to that Christian institute seems to imply, that upon their being first initiated into it by baptism, they had reserved to themselves the liberty of dispensing with it, and of going on still in the same old way as they did before their conversion. To be obliged to marry one wife, and to be confined to her during life, is looked upon, even by the most open professors of Christianity, as so unreasonable, and out of their power, that they would sooner renounce it, than submit to such a state of continence ; and it is merely to avoid a total apostasy, that those good fathers have been obliged to wink at sundry irregularities which those voluptuous converts fell into, by way of salvo, and which all their zeal and eloquence have not been able hitherto to root up ; among which, that of their having a multitude of concubines, besides d the lawful wife, is far from being the worst ; for many of them, looking upon that liberty as no less inconsistent with the marriage institution, than confinement to one wife is to their vicious inclination, carefully avoid the fetters of the one, and indulge themselves in all the excesses of the other. These do indeed pretend to their confessors, when reproved for this licentiousness, that they mean only to fix upon one from among the number to make their lawful wife, as soon as they can find one that is worthy of the preference ; and, under that plausible pretext, will not scruple to keep twenty-five or thirty at a time ; but it seldom happens that they make that choice.

All customs winked at.

EVEN those who seem to comply most strictly with the laws of the church, with respect to marriage, reserve to themselves the liberty of conversing with the person they have made e choice of for a wife, and to enjoy with her all the privileges and endearments of the nuptial commerce, for two or three years before they will venture to tie the indissoluble knot with them ; both hers and his relations allowing it to be reasonable that he should make so full a trial, before he is obliged, by the marriage ceremony, to confine himself wholly to her.
If, during that time, any thing happens that displeases him or her, he makes no difficulty to send her away, nor she to withdraw herself from him ; nor doth such a parting bring any disgrace upon either of them, let the fault be on which side it will, or prove an obstruction to their being married to some other person <sup>m</sup>.

Bastards held equal with the legitimate issue.

IT must be owned, however, that the relations on both sides, as well as the priests or missionaries, will interpose their good offices to reconcile them, especially if any children f have been born during that time, who, unless the marriage ceremony ensue, must be looked upon as bastards, and to belong neither to the father or mother. But, even in this case, the Kongoesse make so little difference between their legitimate and illegitimate issue, that they often prefer the latter to the former to the succession, or at least put them all upon an equal footing, that is, look upon them all indifferently, as so many young creatures under their power, to be disposed of, or used as they think fit ; so that there is seldom seen any natural affection between parents and children, or husbands and wives ; but rather, for the most part, jealousy and hatred ; or, at best, a strange indifference and coldness reigns through the whole family, every one pursuing their separate pleasures and interests, as well after as before the celebration of matrimony. Hence ensue those frequent divorces and elopements g which we have formerly had occasion to speak of <sup>n</sup>, and which neither their confessors, nor relations, are able to prevent or remedy.

Natural affection banished.

a THIS being the melancholy footing on which matrimony stands among them, our readers must not expect much ceremony, much less gallantry, in their courtship. Among those of the middle rank, when a young woman is thought by her friends, or thinks herself, fit for a husband, she anoints herself with oil, and paints herself all over with a red fort of wood, and confines herself to a private or obscure case or hut, for a whole month, during which time, a number of young candidates attend her every day, bringing her some venison, or fowl, or flesh of their own killing, fruits, and other presents. At the month's end, she declares for him who hath served her best, or whom she likes most, who immediately furnishes her with the best cloaths and ornaments, that he can afford her; after which the marriage ceremony is performed with more or less profuseness, according to their circumstances, but always to, and often beyond, the utmost of their power<sup>o</sup>.

*Matrimony
disregarded.
Courtship among those of the meaner

b THE case is somewhat different with respect to those of a higher rank, whose views commonly are to obtain the woman as soon, and to procrastinate the nuptial rite as long, as they can. If one of this sort can but obtain the good liking of the person he hath fixed his affection upon by suitable presents, and can, by the same means, obtain the consent of her parents, which is the principal article, and especially to the terms lately mentioned, of two or three years trial, which among them is seldom thought too long for a man to have a thorough knowledge of a woman's temper, and good or bad qualities, all the other preliminaries are quickly adjusted, and she is brought with as little noise and shew as possible to his house, attended with a few friends of her own sex, and is quickly entered into her state of probation. The nuptials, which are commonly expensive, among the lower as well as the higher rank, are not celebrated till the term agreed on is expired, nor sometimes even then; because the stipulated dowry is to be paid at the same time; which induces many of them to defer them as long as they can, notwithstanding her earnest solicitation for the concluding ceremony, which alone gives her the title and privilege of a wife.

higher class.
Matrimony
how celebrated;*

c As soon as she hath prevailed upon him to appoint the day, notice of it is sent to all his and her relations, who never fail to appear on that occasion, dressed up in the most costly ornaments they can either purchase or borrow, every one being ready, at such a time, to assist their friends and acquaintance, whether they be rich or poor, with some of their best accoutrements. As soon as they are all met at his house, the husband publicly declares his intention to them of making her his lawful wife; upon which they break out into their usual congratulations and good wishes. The priest, if any can be had (for in some parts of the kingdom they are sometimes whole years without seeing the face of one, or of a missionary) comes in and performs the ceremony, or, for want of one, some substitute; then follows the dowry, and some mutual presents, suitable to their condition.

d THE marriage-ceremony is quickly succeeded by a sumptuous banquet; and in these, if in any-thing, it is that they strive to display their hospitable munificence to the highest degree they can possibly reach, or even beyond what their income can afford. The very poorest of them will, on these occasions, sell a child or two to purchase a cow, or an ox, and some Portuguese wine or brandy, to entertain their guests. The repast commonly lasts till after sun-set, or rather as long as there are any victuals or liquor left; for the Kongoesse, accustomed, as hath been already observed, to a sparing diet, commonly repair to these feasts with such a craving appetite, that if they did not meet with a suitable affluence, their panegyrics on the master, of which they are very lavish, would quickly be turned into the most stinging reproaches.

banquet;*

e No sooner are the provisions devoured than they all fall to diverting themselves every one in his own way; some by singing and dancing to their rough and uncouth music; others by drinking, smoking, or sleeping, which last generally crowns the feast, and the next rising sun sends them all to their own homes<sup>p</sup>.

f HAVING mentioned their music upon this occasion, our reader may not perhaps be displeased to know what it consists in, and what instruments commonly accompany it. As for the former, if it is still so barbarous and irregular since it hath received some improvements from the Portuguese, who have introduced several musical instruments amongst them, we shall hardly think it an exaggeration, when they tell us it was fitter to scare wild beasts away, than to delight an European ear<sup>q</sup>. There is indeed nothing in their voices, language, or accent, but what seems more adapted to affright than to please; and their most fervent shouts and gestures of joy and pleasure might be easily mistaken by a stranger for the dismal outcries of persons in distress or torment. This it is that makes them so insensible to the most melodious harmony, that our most excellent compositions can only provoke their laughter and contempt, except where there is something harsh and warlike to affect them; and hence it is also that the Portuguese have been able to introduce so few musical instruments but those of that kind.

and among the

WE have already taken notice of those that usually attend their monarchs, whenever they go out or appear in public<sup>r</sup>; viz. the trumpet, cornet, French horn, and the shrill fife, most of which are of different sizes, and by their different tones make a tolerable contrast, considering the unskilfulness of the players, who seem perfect strangers to rule and harmony, and are therefore best heard by an European at a distance. They will likewise prove of singular advantage to him in drowning the still more disagreeable discord of their fingers, which would otherwise be intolerable to him. These various wind instruments, which were at first introduced by the Portuguese, have ever since continued to make a considerable part, not only of their monarch's retinue, but likewise of their princes and great men, who affect to have a number of them about them where-ever they go. As for the common people, they are contented with their fifes and tabors, at their weddings and other rejoicings.

BESIDES the wind instruments above-mentioned, they have some stringed ones, which, by their rude construction, seem to be natives of the country; their nsambi somewhat resembles the Spanish guitar, but is without bottom; the strings of it are made of the fibres of the palm, or some other bark, and would give a tolerable sound, were it tuned and touched by a skilful hand. The marimba hath something more curious and compound in its structure, and consists of fifteen or sixteen small calabashes, of different sizes, fastened to a flat board, by strings that go across the mouths of them, and which, being touched by small pieces of wood, like the sticks of our dulcimers, give an agreeable variety of sounds. This is by far the sweetest of all their stringed instruments, when well tuned and played. Their drums are made of a long hollow trunk of a tree, with one single skin stretched over one end of it, the other being left open; they are beat either with the fists, or by sticks made of some heavy wood, and are used at their feasting and dancings, as well as in the army. They are called ngambo, or ingombo, and give but a dull heavy sound, but which is raised either by that of the shrill fife, or of the longa, which consists of two or more small bells, such as are hung about the necks of our carriers horses. The rest of their instruments are still more rude and uncouth, and not worth any farther notice<sup>a</sup>.

THEIR dancing comes not one jot behind their music in roughness, and consists in a promiscuous round of men and women, all striving who shall shew the greatest agility and variety of gambols, contorsions, and indecent postures. When they have no music to regulate their motions, they chuse one of the most expert dancers to do it by his voice, that is, by a kind of song, set to some of their grotesque tunes, which, by words and tone, directs the gestures and movements of the whole circle. The Kongoese are extremely fond of these kinds of diversions, and spend whole days and nights in that rough exercise, without scarcely any refreshment; they have a great variety of these dances, and those who invent new ones are held in the highest esteem in the whole canton, where they all express the greatest eagerness to learn and perfect themselves in them, and ever after call it by his name. It often happens that they heat their blood to such height with those songs and dances, especially when they abound with such luscious words and gestures, without which they would yield them no relish (N), that they are seized with a kind of frenzy, which drives all the rules of the dance out of their heads, sets them on inventing, singing, and acting something new of the same kind, till they fall into such a general confusion and disorder of singing, roaring, and lewd actions, that a stranger would be apt to think himself present at some lewd Bacchanalia, or among some of the unconverted Kongoese, or the still more barbarous Giagas, where those dances are accompanied with the most shocking and lascivious gestures and actions that can well be imagined.

THE missionaries have in vain exerted all their zeal, and some of the Christian princes of Kongo their authority, to extirpate all those diabolical scenes of lewdness from among their converted subjects; and not only forbid them under the severest penalties, but have likewise introduced other dances of a more modest as well as ingenious nature at their court, which are from thence stiled royal balls, in hopes to allure them by the one, and deter them by the other. These balls were exhibited with the utmost decency and order, and yet with all the agility and variety of music and action, together with an additional pomp of dress, regular cadency, and excellent order, the whole performance of which was, and is still, at court,

(N) The good father Cavazzi, who had in vain tried all the methods which his zeal could inspire him with, to deter his converts from those filthy diversions, but without any success, gives us a list of these dances, which are called either by their inventors names, or from the provinces where they were first hatched; but all of them so abominably lewd, that he thought the bare mentioning of them a defilement to his pen. One in particular, called mampombo, he tells us, is so transcendently impudent and filthy, that none but the devil himself, he thought, could be the inventor of it (1); and yet in such vogue are they among the people, that they encourage these dancers to go strolling about the country, where they are sure to be entertained with what victuals and drink they please, by those before whose doors they come to play their lewd gambols, and who think themselves so highly honoured by the compliment, that they will even exhaust their little substance to treat them with such cheer as they think will most induce them to exhibit the most abominable scenes (2).

- a and among the nobles of the kingdom, regulated by some expert master in that way, who by his voice, song, and motions (for they all sing and move in concert with him), and by the help of a pair of small calabashes, which serve him instead of castinets, directs and animates the whole circle of dancers in the most decent and agreeable order; but, for want of the usual condiment above-mentioned, could never be relished by any but the better sort of the nation; the rest chusing to expose themselves to any penalties, rather than to be confined to dance without it<sup>t</sup>.

- b from wordly cares and toils, should exempt them from most distempers, in a climate so serene and hot, and a soil for the most part stony, sandy, and dry; and it must be owned that they are thereby kept free from a multitude of loathsome distempers which luxury and intemperance have introduced among us; but nevertheless they are not without some considerable ones, which rage with great fury, and make terrible havock among them; and, which is still more deplorable, they have neither physicians, surgeons, physic, nor any other assistance than that of their pretended conjurers, who set up for curing all diseases, wounds, and other ailments, by their enchantments, and who are a set of the most ignorant and rapacious cheats and blood-suckers, having nothing in view but sordid gain, and even increasing their patient's misery, at the hazard of their lives, in order to extort a greater reward for the promised cure<sup>u</sup>. And so besotted are even they who make open profession of Christianity, to those deluding jugglers, and the heathenish part still more, that it is with the greatest difficulty that the missionaries, who commonly practise physic and surgery with good success, and are provided with all proper medicines and other conveniences for their cure, can prevail upon them to put themselves under their care, though they never pretend to expect any return, but bestow all their pains and medicines upon them gratis. What is still more surprising is, that if any of them, after having tried in vain all the pretended helps of those heathenish charms, agree at last to submit to be cured by a missionary, they prove such untoward and untractable patients, that they will submit to no prescribed rule or regimen, but commonly elude by their perverseness all the skill and care of their charitable physician, and render abortive the effects of his best medicines, by their wilful opposition to his directions<sup>w</sup>.

AMONG the diseases which make the most terrible and destructive havock, that which we commonly stile the venereal, and they chiranga, the just consequence and natural effect of their boundless incontinency, may be well reckoned one of the chief; not only on account of the difficulty of its cure, and the cruel and butcherly method of treating it, but much more so on account of the exquisite torments they endure under it, and the fatal effects which commonly attend it. They reckon four kinds, or, as we should rather chuse to call them, four degrees or stages of it, the lowest of which is dreadful enough, one would think, to put a curb to their excessive lewdness, seeing its acrimony, for want of proper discharge, raises the most dreadful ulcers in the mouth, throat, and joints, especially those of the hands and feet, and not only deprives them of the use of their limbs, but causes the most excruciating pains all over the body.

THE second covers the whole skin with the most loathsome and corrosive ulcers, attended with an intolerable stench, which being mostly exposed to view in a country where they go almost naked, cannot be beheld without the utmost horror.

THE third sort, or degree, commonly seizes on the soles of the feet, raises a tumor in them of the shape and bigness of a middling mushroom, which, if not timely and skilfully cauterised, quickly rots the whole foot, and sends the unhappy patient out of the world in the most dreadful convulsions.

THE last, and most terrible of all, conveys its deadly poison into the whole habit, and into the very marrow, destroying, in a very little time, the strongest constitution, taking away the use of all the limbs and senses, and leaving the unhappy person wholly insensible of every thing, but of his inexpressible anguish and misery, and a prospect of approaching death. Among those who have the good fortune to escape with their lives, there are few to be seen who do not carry about them some brand or mark of their incontinence, either by the loss of a nose, lip, or ear, or by some scars, ulcers, &c. or even by a distasteful scurf spread over their skin like a leprosy, occasioned either by the unskilfulness and ignorance of the doctor, or, which is oftner the case, by the perverseness and irregularity of the patient<sup>x</sup> (O).

THE next raging and destructive disease, and most difficult to cure, is the diarrhæa, chiefly owing, according to the authors last quoted, to their mean diet, and especially to their excessive eating of fruits; which, by their cold nature, destroy the tone of the stomach, obstruct digestion, and fill it with crudities, relaxing the bowels from their retentive quality, causing a general disrelish to every thing, and in a little time bringing a man to death's door (P). The most common remedy they use against it, is by girding the patient as tight as possible round the body, and over the navel, and anointing him with oil of moni, commonly called by botanists ricinus Americanus, and vulgarly palma Christi, which is of a hot and active nature, and giving him plenty of nicaffo and chiroco, or other such-like warm fruits, boiled in water, or baked on the embers, to eat. They likewise make use of sundry sorts of cordials against it, and sometimes of bathing in warm water. But as none of these remove the cause, great numbers of them are carried off by it at the return of the season; so that all the benefit they receive by these remedies, proves, for the most part, rather a short reprieve than a thorough cure.

A THIRD destructive disease amongst them, which in a short time carries them off by thousands, and frequently depopulates whole villages, is the small-pox, the virulency of which is chiefly owing to their want of sense in using proper precautions and remedies against it, and leaving nature to take its own course. They suffer the sick and well to live and lie promiscuously, and to indulge themselves in every thing that their appetites crave, and they can procure; and, what is still worse, suffer them to bathe frequently in cold water, which stops the pores already sufficiently clogged, by their daily anointing the skin with oil; so that, for want of a proper outlet, it runs into a confluent pox, or seizes their vitals, and carries them off in a few days <sup>y</sup>.

A FOURTH disease which rages here, especially among those who live on the sea-coasts, or use the sea, is a grievous swelling in the groin and lower belly, occasioned, as is supposed, by the excessive heats to which they are exposed in those hot climates. The pain which this disorder occasions is so acute and violent, that the patient quickly becomes delirious. The remedies they use against it are of the cooling kind, particularly the herb bichio, from which the Portuguese have denominated that distemper, which is likewise very rife in Brasil, and other parts of America.

FEVERS, attended with violent pains in the head, are likewise very rife and dangerous, especially in the winter, when the great rains render the air unhealthy and infectious. Against these they make use of the sandal wood lately mentioned, whether red or grey, tho' the former is most esteemed; this being reduced into powder, and mixed with palm oil, they make into an excellent ointment, with which they anoint the patient all over two or three times, which seldom fails of curing. But if it doth not allay the pain in the head, they have recourse to bleeding in the temples by incision and suction, an aukward way in use among them, which we shall describe in its proper place <sup>z</sup>.

THE last distemper we shall mention is that which they call npichi, and is much like our violent cholicks, occasioned by their mean unwholesome diet and water, which fills them with crudities; against these disorders they scarcely use any other remedy than abstinence, and will be two or three days, or even more, without eating or drinking <sup>a</sup>. Thus much may serve for the principal diseases of the natives, and their method of curing them. The Europeans are no less subject to the same disorders, upon their first settling amongst them, especially if they are obliged to conform to their way of living; the change of diet and liquors, joined to the excessive heat of the climate, soon begin to display their pernicious effects on them, by the excessive effervescence of the blood, which can be kept under by no other method, than by frequently letting it out, and in such great quantities as would be deemed gainst that distemper, and of which nature hath provided them with whole forests, is used among them with so little success, though in its full bloom and virtue, whilst it performs such wonders in other countries, where it is used dry, and in some measure divested of its salubrious and purifying quality; for whether there be any defect in their preparing or administering it, it is certain, that if both these were ever so carefully and judiciously performed, yet the efficacy will still depend, in a great measure, on the exactness of the patient's observing his doctor's directions, which, as we have already observed, is not to be expected from people who will run into the most absurd and dangerous irregularities, merely to obtain a little present ease; there being nothing more common among them, than to see them plunge themselves in a pond or river, over head and ears, several times a day, even when they are under a regimen that is quite opposite to it, and for which they can give no other reason, than that they are unable to bear the excessive heat they labour under, and must endeavour to assuage it at all hazards (4).

(P) We might perhaps assign a more rational cause for the dreadful havoc which that destructive disease makes amongst them, were we to ascribe it to those frequent surfeits they must be liable to by their immoderate dancings lately mentioned; which, having heated their blood to a high degree, naturally leads them to allay their heat and thirst by cooling fruits and liquors, which they have not discretion enough to forbear; such ill conduct being less strange than that which we have lately had occasion to observe in them, when labouring under the most dangerous distempers.

a extremely dangerous in their own country; so that, to use our author's word, they must require frequent letting of blood. make what haste they can to exchange their old blood for a new sort, which is more suitable to the country. Yet doth not all this phlebotomy, joined to other precautions and remedies which they use, prevent vast numbers dying, before they can be seasoned to their climate and aliments<sup>b</sup>. But to return to the Kongoesse;

THEY are still more awkward at their manual operations, and cure of wounds, to which defect it is owing, next to the badness of their blood, that the smallest pimples, contusion, or scratch, often degenerate into loathsome and painful ulcers, which the warmth of the climate quickly fills with worms and stench, or incrustates with a nauseous scurf. They have the use of phlebotomy, but, for want of lancets and incision-knives, perform the operation in a sad butcherly manner, tho' in imitation rather of our cupping than bleeding. Instead of cupping-glasses, to which they are strangers, they use a small calabash, a horn, or a shell, perforated on the top. These they apply to an arm, leg, belly, or head, or any other part which they imagine to be the seat of the distemper, after having first made as deep a gash with a knife as the skin will admit of. They next apply their mouth to the hole of the calabash, or horn, and suck the blood thro' it till it is full. This they repeat till they have drawn a sufficient quantity of it from the patient; in some cases they will, instead of a calabash, make use of an earthen pot or pipkin, such as they boil their victuals in, and apply it with lighted tow, as we do our cupping-glasses; but with what stupid unskilfulness the reader may guess, by an instance which our missionary tells us of his own knowledge, and which for its singularity deserves a place in the margin (Q):

WE shall conclude this section with an account of their funeral obsequies, in which, notwithstanding their parsimony, poverty, and want of natural affection for their nearest relations, they strive to shew themselves most profuse and generous, as if they were desirous to compensate for their former disregard, and want of duty to them. The rich and great are not only profuse to a high degree, but likewise extremely bountiful in assisting the poor with such things as they are not able to purchase on these occasions; on the other hand, these last, notwithstanding their extreme aversion to discover their own poverty, will not scruple to apply to the former, and even to the king and princes for their assistance, when their friends and acquaintance are not in a capacity to help them. So that the most indigent among them are commonly enabled to wrap up their dead in a piece of coarse cloth of the manufacture of their country, and to have the bier decently covered with matts; whilst the better sort array their own with the same fine European linen cloths which they themselves wear, and cover the bier with black cloth.

THOSE that live at a distance from the cities and towns, whether Christians or heathens, retain still their old custom of interring their dead in places at some distance from their dwellings. But the more polite and stricter sort of Christians, always interr them either in their churches, or consecrated cœmeteries, that they may be nearer at hand to visit their graves, and pray for their souls; the former still retain an old heathenish but innocent custom, which is, that after the body is put into the grave, a person, who has the sole privilege for it, mixes a certain quantity of earth and water, to the thickness of mortar, and approaching the grave backwards with it upon his shoulders, throws it into the hole, till he hath filled it up to the top; upon which his friends and the rest of the company emulously strive to ram it down with their feet, which is done, as some say, to prevent the soul leaving the body; or, as others will have it, to signify to the living, that the deceased wants now nothing more from them, and that they need not give themselves any farther care or trouble about him. This is contrary to the notion of the stricter sort of converts, who bestow a great number of masses upon them, both at their interment, anniversaries, and upon other occasions; and, where they cannot procure a sufficient number of priests, bestow the money upon poor people, to engage them to pray for their souls<sup>c</sup>.

WE have already spoken of the obsequies performed to their kings, to which we shall only add, that it is looked upon as a great crime to shed tears for them, and a person who should be convicted of it would be severely punished. In lieu of which they keep certain patient with anguish. In vain did the unskilful quack endeavour to disengage it from him; he found all his efforts, and those of the by-standers ineffectual, and the poor slave ready to expire under it. He was at length delivered from his misery and danger by an European, whom Providence had brought to his hut, and who, with one blow with his stick, broke the vessel in pieces, before the patient was brought to his last gasp (5).

men in pay, whose business it is to go to all the public places in the city or town, and to remind a the subjects of his death, by the mournful sound of their ivory cornets; most probably to induce them to pray for him, and to inspire them with a due respect for his successor. The princes and nobles affect to be interred in vaults wainscotted round, and hung with black, the entrance of which is closely stopped, to prevent any nauseous smell being perceived without; whilst two of their old domestics are hired to guard the place by turns, and to pray for the deceased; other prayers and masses for their repose are likewise ordered to be offered on the anniversary of their decease, and on all-souls day, at which time their graves are opened, and the hangings exchanged for new ones. Among those that are still unconverted, several other superstitious ceremonies are used towards deceased great men, such as bringing rich offerings to their graves, in which they are very profuse, and burying alive b one or more of their wives with them<sup>d</sup>, and some others not worth troubling our readers farther with<sup>e</sup>.

retained.

In the kingdom of Metamba, which is subject to this of Kongo, but hath been but imperfectly converted, they indulge themselves in several strange ceremonies towards persons near expiring, altogether cruel and unnatural, tho' under the specious colour of love and friendship to them; for, under pretence of shortening his agonies and misery, long before the breath is gone out of a man's body, they pull him out of his bed or hammock, by the arms and legs, and tossing him up into the air, with most doleful outcries and dreadful howlings, let him fall on the ground; where, after having viewed him attentively for a while, they throw themselves promiscuously upon the body, embrace, kiss, and mourn over it, c rolling themselves with it on the earth in a frantic guise, till they are quite exhausted. They then dress the body in the most decent manner, after which the oldest person in the family, whose peculiar privilege it is, sprinkles him all over from head to foot, with a kind of meal, whilst the rest of the by-standers sing some mournful dirge over it, accompanied with woeful outcries; and in this manner he is conveyed to his grave on a bier, neatly covered with mats, and laid in the ground.

Customs of the Giagas, and other heathens.

Various ways of interring.

Among the heathenish parts, especially the Giagas<sup>f</sup>, they dance about the grave in a frantic manner, bring them victuals, drink, and other conveniencies; and, as they are divided into a variety of sects, each observes their peculiar customs. Some lay the body flat on its back; some on the right or left side, and order the grave accordingly; some lay d the body on the surface of the ground, and raise a mound of earth, stones, palisades, and such like, to a considerable height, planting here and there some stakes, on the top of which they fix death's heads, flags, and other ensigns of distinction. Some of those that were most respected among them, instead of a grave or monument, are only anointed all over with some resinous substance, and left to lie naked on the ground, with a guard over them (R), till all the flesh, skin, and entrails are rotted; after which they carefully gather the bones, which they deposit in wooden boxes, and carry about with them wherever they go, as extraordinary relicks, and singular preservatives.

Monuments

their funerals.

The tombs above-mentioned are so ordered as to distinguish the condition of those that lie buried under them; those of high rank have commonly a seat or chair, with a bow, e arrows, and other martial weapons, fixed on the top; the handicrafts-men place some of the tools belonging to their trade, or some other coarse hieroglyphic upon them. Their funeral dances for a great person are always regulated by a person chosen for that purpose, and last eight whole days without any intermission, except whilst they take the refreshment of eating or drinking, or of a short repose; and great care is taken to have the feast well supplied with provisions; the residue of which they throw upon the dead corpse at every meal they take, which in those hot climes increases the stench of the body to an intolerable degree to a stranger; tho' custom, and the pleasure which they think the deceased receives from the whole ceremony, makes it all easy and pleasant to them. The worst of all is, that, with so many victims which they butcher upon those occasions, they never fail of intermix- f ing a number of human ones, which, according to the quality of the deceased, amount commonly, if our author was not misinformed, from 10 to 100, or more, whose flesh not only enhances the splendour of the feast among those cannibals, but gives the greatest satisfaction to the soul of the deceased<sup>g</sup>.

(R) The reason they give for this practice is, that if they were to cover their bodies with cloaths, or even with rags or leaves, the veneration which the people have for them, would induce them to steal them away; yea and to cut their flesh off their bones; and it is for the same cause that they order a guard to be set over the corpse, whilst their flesh lies rotting on the ground, that their bones may be preserved till then, and gathered up in order to be kept in memory of the deceased; especially if he hath signalized himself by his valour, generosity, or any other qualities which are held in esteem among them (6).

a BOTH rich and poor observe a kind of mourning for their near relations ; it begins with a close confinement and abstinence from all refreshment, which is to last three whole days. Their mourning how performed ; After which those of the common sort shave their whole head, and anoint themselves all over with oil, upon which they rub such a quantity of earth and dust, and dried leaves of various sorts, as gives them the most dreadful appearance. But those of a higher rank content themselves with shaving the upper part of their heads, and binding it about with a list of cloth, linen, or leather ; and confining themselves in their houses eight whole days ; after which they gradually return to their former way of living.

b THE widows are obliged to submit to a much longer retirement, especially at court and in the populous cities, where it would be a scandal for them to be seen abroad before the year is out ; but in towns more remote, they are allowed to go about their own affairs much sooner. Upon their coming abroad, they usually appear in black, with a cap on their head, which falls back upon their shoulders ; their upper garment, which is commonly of woollen, is open on the sides, and comes down to the knee both before and behind. That of the women of quality is of the same stuff and colour, but fuller and plaited about the neck. The widow slaves of St. Salvador, Loango, and other places of great commerce, are distinguished by a sharp-pointed cap, about thirty inches high, which makes a strange kind of parade, especially when one sees forty or fifty of them together, attending, as is usual, a Portuguese or other lady of distinction. Born by the slaves.

c WE shall conclude this article and section with a strange and barbarous notion which the Kongoesse entertain concerning dying persons, viz. that they are just upon passing from a wretched and troublesome life into a state of ease and happiness ; from which they absurdly infer, that it is the most charitable kindness one can do them, to accelerate their deliverance by any proper means. Hence it happens, that even among the more regular Christians, a person is no sooner observed to be near expiring, but he is stunned by the hideous outcries and howlings of the family ; insomuch that their priests and missionaries are scarcely able to perform the last offices to them with any tolerable decency or presence of mind. This is, however, but a mild treatment, compared to what is commonly practised among the more impolite, where they strive who shall dispatch the dying person soonest, by stopping their mouth and nose, thumping them upon the breast with their fists or knees, with all their might, and other such inhuman usage ; which they yet imagine to be the most acceptable to him, as it shortens his last struggles and agonies, and sends him quickest into a state of rest and bliss. But were we to trace this barbarous custom to its true original, we should find it to owe its birth chiefly to that want of natural affection, which we have elsewhere observed to reign in most families throughout the kingdom<sup>b</sup>. From all which, as well as from a great number of the superstitious customs they still retain, and vices they still indulge, we may infer what imperfect converts the Portuguese made of them to Christianity, if their ill lives and examples have not proved too hard an obstacle to its taking root among them, as it hath been in most of their missions in Asia and America, as well as in this kingdom, of which the universal complaint of their missionaries is an irrefragable evidence<sup>c</sup>. Barbarous notion still rife among them. Ill treatment of their dying friends. Their imperfect conversion to christianity.

S E C T. III.

e FROM what we have formerly had occasion to observe, that the Kongoesse were utter strangers to writing and letters<sup>d</sup>, till the Portuguese introduced both among them, it will hardly be expected we should be able to look back very far into their antiquity, or offer any thing new concerning their origin and history before that time, unless we were to fetch it from their fabulous traditions, which would be entertaining our readers with an ill-concerted series of the most incredible events ; in the compiling of which, national pride, assisted by a warm imagination, rather than a tenacious and faithful memory, had the greatest share. To this we may add, that they were no better chronologers than historians, and knew nothing of computing the time by years, but only by moons, till they were taught it by the Europeans, after their conversion to Christianity. They were even strangers to the distinctions of ours of day and night, nor could ever quote any past transaction, but by saying that it happened in such a king's reign<sup>e</sup>. Hence it is that there is no possibility of fixing either the time of the foundation of their monarchy, tho' so small distance of time from the epocha of the first arrival of the Portuguese, nor even of obtaining an authentic series of the kings that filled the throne from the reign of Luqueni, their first monarch and founder, down to that epocha, tho' his successors did still occupy it during a considerable space after their arrival. Ancient state of Kongo fabulous, and uncertain. The Kongoesse bad chronologers. The time of their monarchy's foundation uncertain.

FET, l. ii c. 7.

BUT tho' we cannot possibly fix the time of so remarkable a transaction, our readers will not be displeased if we give them the best account we can of it, stripped of all the fabulous stories with which the Portuguese have filled it. This æra doth the more deserve our notice, as that vast tract of land was then divided into a great number of petty estates and variety of governments, and all of them reduced under the obedience of that enterprising warrior; besides a great number of others which were since dismembered from it, under the reigns of his successors, and mentioned at the beginning of this chapter<sup>m</sup>, and many others of which the Portuguese have made themselves masters, and of which we shall speak in the sequel.

History of their first founder.

THE founder of this vast monarchy, and the first who took the royal title upon him, was named Luqueni; his father Eminia-n-Zima was a petty prince, whose small territory lay situate on the banks of the Zair, in the province of Corimba; and his mother named Luqueni-Lua-Sanze, was the daughter of another petty lord in the same neighbourhood. Eminia-n-Zima, after this alliance, began soon to be weary of seeing so many equals around him, and to listen to the dictates of his ambitious spirit; and being now quite dissatisfied with the small extent of his dominions, resolved to subdue those of his neighbours, who lived in a state of independency, and composed a number of small republics, no less jealous of their liberties than he was eager to invade them. He met, accordingly, with a brave and strenuous opposition from them, which lasted a considerable number of years, but which his valour and good fortune at length so far overcame, that he made himself master of a considerable spot of ground, so strong by nature, that it served him, from that time, for a safe retreat against the united forces of his opposers, it being very difficult of access, and very easy to defend; so that he could now, with impunity, continue his inroads and ravages against them, and retire upon all occasions into his impregnable fortress, which was now become the repository of his arms and ill-gotten treasures.

Luqueni's
father invades his neighbours territories;

Subdues them, and fortifies himself on a rock.

THIS place, to which he took care to add several stout fortifications for its defence, was situate on the banks of the Zair, and, by its eminence, had an advantageous command over that famous river, enabled him to lay several forts of duties and customs on all the trading vessels that sailed up or down, by which he soon became opulent and powerful enough to make it the place of his residence, and a place of concourse and great commerce. This was the first rise of the ambitious Eminia-n-Zima, which was quickly after followed by an accident which enabled his son Luqueni to lay the foundation for a much more extensive dominion.

his own aunt.

HIS father had left the youth to take care of the fort, whilst himself was gone upon some new expedition, when his own aunt, then big with child, happened to pass by the place, on board a vessel, from whom the young nephew made no scruple to exact the same duties that his father did from all other passengers. She, as his father's sister, in vain pleaded an exemption; and upbraided him with his ambition and avarice; the rash youth, without any regard to her pregnancy, or the relation she bore to him, at one stroke ripped her belly open, and murdered both her and the child. His father, being apprised of this unnatural action, was highly exasperated, and would have inflicted some severe punishment upon him for it, had not some of his men interposed, under pretence that there was something martial and heroic in the action, and rescued him out of his hands. They quickly after ranged themselves under his standard, and proclaimed him their chief under the title of king, a title which his father had not yet dared to assume. Luqueni, elated with his new dignity, and the increase of his army, carried all before him, and easily subdued the whole province of Npembacassi, since called Kongo, and proved so successful in all his enterprises, that he enlarged his conquests from the mouth of the Zair<sup>n</sup>, quite to the city of St. Salvador, formerly described<sup>o</sup>, that is above 180 miles into the inland, almost without opposition; the prince to whom all that large tract belonged having been defeated at one of the first onsets, and forced to wander as an exile to the day of his death.

Is rescued from his father's resentment;

sets up for himself, and assumes the royal title.

He subdues a vast tract of ground.

The heirs protest against him in vain;

THIS unhappy prince, who was called Mabambolo, and stiled Mani Pangala, or king of Pangala, left some sons behind him, who, having recourse to the clemency of the conqueror, obtained the investiture of some inferior lordships, as fiefs from him, on condition they should acknowledge him their sovereign, and pay him a certain annual tribute. They did, however, retain the title of Mani Pangala, and many of their successors have made several fruitless efforts to recover their ancient dominions, but have hitherto been obliged to content themselves with their short allowance, and with making an open protest, from year to year, against the usurpation of Luqueni and his successors, to prevent their title to them becoming proscribed (S). These protestations, however, do not excuse them from coming regularly to court,

(S) This is done, our author tells us (1), by constantly sending a woman to court every year, to order the king on the throne to retire to his own territories, and to resign a realm which doth not belong to him. He adds, that the king doth not fail of giving her a public audience, and having heard all that she hath to say, ana court, to pay their homage and tribute to the king; and, upon his demise, to receive a new investiture from his successor. forced to pay tribute to him.

BUT to return to Luqueni; he no sooner saw himself firmly established on his throne, than he began to make proper regulations, and to give his new subjects such laws as were most suitable to their genius, and most likely to secure his conquests to him. Among other public acts, he convened the chief officers of his dominions, among whom he distributed the government of his new conquered provinces, according to their respective merits, and the services they had done to him during the late wars, which so highly obliged them, that they strove, in gratitude to him, to add still fresh conquests to his old ones, till they had reduced the kingdoms of Angola and Metamba under his obedience. Of all which vast dominions, his father Eminia-n-Zima, who lived to an extreme old age, saw him in quiet possession before his death; tho' whether he beheld his vast successes with pleasure, or inward jealousy, is hard to guess<sup>p</sup>. His successors have maintained themselves on the throne ever since to this day; though, as we observed before, some of them have had the mortification to see a considerable number of provinces dismembered from it, besides that of Angola, of the best, if not the biggest part of which, the Portuguese have made themselves masters; and that of Metamba, which was conquered from them much about the same time, by the queen Membacemba, as we shall shew more fully in the sequel of this section. He divides his new conquests; his family still in possession of them.

As for the lords or dukes of Batta, of whom we have had occasion to speak in a former section, as still enjoying singular privileges in the kingdom<sup>q</sup>, they are the descendants of Nfacu-claw, Luqueni's father-in-law; and it is likely that he bestowed that duchy upon them in fief, after his subduing it, as it lies within the course of his conquests. But whether it was so, or whether it was their paternal estate, they were obliged to pay a kind of homage to the kings of Kongo, which consisted only in their making their appearance at court at certain seasons, which yet they by degrees began to neglect, and contented themselves with sending a kind of embassy to them in their stead. But as those monarchs grew by degrees more powerful, they let those dukes know that they resented their neglect, and that they would quickly feel the effects of it, if they did not alter their behaviour; upon which they wisely resolved to comply with their duty, and to appear in person before them, and acknowledge their dependence upon them, as well as the honour they had of being so nearly related to them. And we are farther told, that one of them, above a century ago, being come to court to pay their usual homage, and receive his investiture from the new monarch, was not only received with all the marks of honour, but had the title of Niacongiamene, or ancestor of the kings of Kongo, bestowed upon him<sup>r</sup>. The capital of their duchy was called formerly Anghirimba, or, according to Dapper, Anghirimba, and is, most probably, the Agi-symba we find in Sanfon's map. At present it is called by the name of the duchy of Batta, or Bata, and stands about 30 leagues east of St. Salvador, and 150 from the sea coast. It was once a pretty considerable city, but is much reduced since, tho' it is still the residence of the dukes and governors. The territory about it is still very fertile, and the road which leads from it to St. Salvador, is interspersed all the way with pleasant villages and hamlets<sup>s</sup>. Dukes of Batta, whence descended; pay homage to the kings of Kongo.

THIS is the sum and substance of what our author could learn of the foundation and history of this great monarchy, until the coming of the Portuguese into these African parts. Some other particulars the Kongoese related to him, concerning the foundation of the city of St. Salvador, which, tho' curious and surprising, yet not seeming altogether so credible as the rest, we shall give our readers in the margin (T), and proceed to the first discovery of this kingdom by the Portuguese, in the year 1484, from which æra both their history and chronology have been preserved and conveyed to us by abler hands, and may be better relied on. *The capital of their duchy. swers her in a polite manner, that it is God that hath raised him to the throne, which he intends to transmit to his own successors; and that her masters ought to be contented with their lot, and live quietly under it, lest their attempting any innovation should bring a greater misfortune upon them. After which he makes her some considerable present, and also sends others by her to her masters.

(T) The Kongoese pretend, that Luqueni, designing to build that city on this high, and till then almost inaccessible mountain (2), in order to make it the metropolis of his new kingdom, was obliged to employ a vast number of his forces to cut a way to it, mostly through the hard rock, which was not done without immense labour.

When they were got up to the top of it, they found the much greater part of it covered over by a spacious lake of very great depth, which he caused to be filled up, and to be turned into that delightful plain, since called the green, on which their yearly numerous reviews are made. To this they add, that the ponderous weight of stone and earth which he caused to be flung into it, pressing hard upon the springs that fed the lake, forced the water out at several vents on the sides of the mountains, from whence flow a multitude of delightful fountains and cascades, of the clearest and sweetest water in the world (3). Our readers may remember that we have given elsewhere an account of some of those springs, which supply the city and adjacent villages with that delicious water, in our description of that capital (4).

HERE we shall not need to remind our readers of the vast discoveries which the Portuguese nation made, not only on these and other coasts of Africa, but in the East and West-Indies, under the patronage of their excellent prince don Henriques, of which a full account hath been given in the general history of Africa<sup>1</sup>; much less shall we concern ourselves in the dispute whether the Portuguese were the first discoverers of these African coasts; an enquiry which would both carry us too far, and be but to little purpose; but begin our account with the first European vessel that discovered the mouth of the river Kongo, or Zair, and cast anchor in it.

first discovers the coast of Kongo.

It well received by the natives.

THE design of king John of Portugal in making discoveries on the coasts of Ethiopia, was in order to facilitate, as he rightly judged it would, the finding out a way into India. It was therefore with this view, that he pitched upon the famed Diego Cam, one of the expertest b sailors in his service, and a gentleman of the most enterprising genius, to be sent upon that expedition. Cam, upon his arrival near the Ethiopian coasts, fell insensibly upon the rapid stream of the river Zair above-mentioned, as he was endeavouring to double the cape Catalina; and its vast breadth and depth quickly determined him to sail nearer, and to cast anchor at the mouth of it, not doubting but there must be inhabitants on both sides of it. He had not rowed far up before he saw a number of the natives, whose shape, complexion, and hair, greatly resembled the other Ethiopians, whom he had already seen; neither were they in the least alarmed at the appearance of these new comers, but came up to them in the gentlest manner, and presented them with some of their fruits and other refreshments, which Cam gratefully accepted, and requited by some equivalent presents. The misfortune was, c that they could not understand one another by any other way but by signs; so that it was not without some difficulty that he was apprised at last that they belonged to a very powerful prince, whose residence was a few days journey up into the inland<sup>2</sup>.

CAM, highly delighted with their account and behaviour, and no less desirous to know who this powerful prince was, and, if possible, to make some alliance with him, prevailed upon four or five of the natives, by some presents which he made to them, to conduct an equal number of his officers to St. Salvador. These were charged with considerable presents for the king and court, and were allowed a certain time for their return; but the rapidity of the river, contrary winds, and other obstacles, joined to the length of the journey, prevented their being back so soon as he expected; so that, after having tarried double the d time assigned, he resolved to leave them behind, and to sail back for Portugal; and taking with him four natives who were in his ship, and proved to be men of noble extract and excellent understanding, as hostages for his own countrymen, weighed anchor and sailed away (U). Some say they willingly offered themselves to accompany him into Portugal. However that be, it is certain that he took great care of them all the voyage; so that by the time of their arrival at the Portuguese court, they had made such surprising progress in learning that language, that they could inform his majesty of several important matters which he enquired of them; with which king John was so highly delighted, that having made them several very considerable presents, he ordered Cam to sail with them back to Kongo, and sent by him other very valuable presents and European rarities to their king and e his court; charging him, moreover, to exhort that monarch, in his name, to become a convert to the worship of the only true God, and to permit the Christian religion to be propagated thro' his dominions<sup>3</sup>.

CAM, upon his return to Kongo, on the following year, was greatly pleased to find his men in good health, and highly satisfied with the kind reception they had met with at court, as well as from the rest of the natives. It was not long before he sent a formal embassy to the king, accompanied with the rich presents from Portugal; whilst the four young natives, no less charmed with all they had seen, and the noble treatment they had received in that country, were blazing both at their own court, and where-ever they came, the magnificence of the Portuguese monarchs and nation. A firm alliance was quickly agreed on between the f two crowns, which subsists to this day, tho' often suspended by some intervening wars, of which we shall speak in the sequel.

(U) We cannot find out from what author the late Mr. Le Quien, who, after Jarric and others, calls this noble adventurer Can and Canus, took a singular circumstance which he relates of him; viz. that, during his short abode in Kongo, he erected on one of the coasts a column which he had brought with him from Portugal, with a cross on the top, and the arms of the kings of Portugal, and an inscription under them in Latin and Portuguese, to inform the reader of the time in which, and the person by whom, that coast was first discovered; seeing neither the decades of either John de Barros, nor of Emanuel de Faria, make the least mention of it; it being scarcely credible, that either of those two authors should have omitted or overlooked so material a circumstance, which was a kind of taking possession of that country, and ascertaining the first discovery of it to the Portuguese nation. Neither do we know of any other writer who hath taken any notice of it, except the author above-mentioned (5).

(5) De hoc, vid. Labat, lib. ii. c. 12, p. 363, & seq.

a WHILEST this alliance was transacting at the Kongoese court, Cam set sail for the discovery of the Ethiopian and African coasts, as far as the 22d degree north, and, at his return, went to pay a grand visit to the king, to thank him for the favours done to him and his nation, and was received with all possible magnificence. At his request he gave him an ample account about the grandeur of king John's dominions, of the Portuguese laws, customs, and government, and more particularly of their religion; the result of which was, that that prince conceived the highest esteem and regard for the Portuguese, and an earnest desire of becoming a profelyte to their church. At his departure, the king appointed Zachut, one of the young nobles who had sailed with him into Portugal, to go now as his ambassador at that court, with orders to entreat his Portuguese majesty to send some holy men to instruct him and his subjects in the Christian faith; he likewise sent a number of other young Kongoese with him to be educated in it, together with a large quantity of elephant's teeth, carpets, and cloaths made of the leaves of palm-trees, as presents to his Portuguese majesty. Cam departed soon after, and, at his arrival at Lisbon, presented the Kongoese ambassador, and the other young gentlemen, to the king; who was highly satisfied with the success of that expedition, and gave those noble strangers a most gracious reception.

DURING the time they staid in Portugal, which was near three years, great care was taken that they should be instructed not only in the principles of Christianity, but in all such other polite exercises as were suitable to their rank; and, at length, they were baptized at Beja, to which place the court was retired on account of the plague which raged with uncommon fury in the city of Lisbon. The ceremony was performed with the utmost splendor and magnificence, king John himself vouchsafing to stand godfather to the ambassador Zachut, to whom he gave his own name. Not long after the solemnity was performed, he caused them to be conveyed into their own country, in three ships which he had ordered to be fitted for that purpose, the command of which was given to Gonzalez de Souza, a person descended from a noble family, with whom he sent likewise several priests, together with fonts, mitres, chalices, and other church vessels and ornaments of great value. The misfortune was, that several of those who embarked with them from Lisbon, carried the dire contagion with them on board; many of whom died in their passage, and among them the commander Gonzalez de Souza, who was succeeded by Roderigo Souza, a near relation, by the unanimous consent of all the officers<sup>1</sup>.

THEY all arrived safely, and landed at Sogno, on the river Zair, on the August following, and were joyfully received by the governor of the province, a prince of the royal blood, who had fixed his residence in that capital for the sake of carrying on a commerce with the Portuguese, and had been so well instructed by them in the Christian faith, that he was baptized by some of those holy men, soon after their arrival, by the name of Emanuel, which was that of the king of Portugal's brother. The ceremony was performed in the open country, in the presence of the Portuguese admiral, who had caused a sumptuous altar to be erected for the purpose; and where, after mass was ended, this noble profelyte, with one of his sons, and some of his officers, were received into the church before a vast concourse of the natives, who flocked thither on that occasion, and expressed their satisfaction by their joyful shouts. All this while the Portuguese, leaving the care of making converts to the monks and priests they had brought with them, were very busy in making new discoveries and settlements on the African coasts, and had by this time settled so considerable a commerce, as, tho' but then in its infancy, failed not to raise the jealousy of several European crowned heads<sup>m</sup>.

IN the mean time admiral Souza, taking leave of his noble converts, hastened to Banza Kongo, where the court then was (W), and there gave the king an account of his uncle's conversion and baptism; with which he was so highly satisfied, that he enlarged his dominions, and gave him full power to pull down and destroy all the heathen temples, and other monuments of idolatry, within his government. His majesty was no less delighted with the commissions, holy vessels, and ornaments, which he brought from Portugal; but he was still more charmed, when, at his request, they were brought to him, and exposed to the view of the whole court, amidst great crowds of his subjects, who all beheld them, we are told, with the deepest veneration, particularly the cross, before which the Portuguese falling upon their knees, the Kongoese followed their example in their own way, and prostrated themselves before it. His majesty was very curious in observing every vessel and vestment, and uncommonly attentive to the explication which the priest gave him of every particular;

(W) It may be necessary to remind the reader of what hath been formerly observed, that the word Banza, which signifies excellent city, is always used to signify the capital of a province, and is commonly joined with the proper name of it, as Banza Kongo, Banza Sogno, Banza Batta, &c. By Banza Kongo, therefore, here is only meant, the capital of a small province of that name, and not of the whole kingdom; which, as have shewn elsewhere, is called Banza San Salvador (6).

The king dies, and Alphonso succeeds him;

the result of which was, that he immediately resolved upon building a sumptuous church <sup>a</sup> in his capital, for the reception of these holy men and utensils; and, tho' he was obliged to have the chief materials for it from some of the remotest parts of his kingdom, yet his zeal, and the great number of hands which he employed in that work, quickly completed the edifice according to his desire; some say it was finished in three months, and soon after consecrated by those holy men, under the name of the church of the Holy Cross.

THIS solemnity was quickly succeeded by a greater; viz. the public baptism of the king and queen, and several of the nobility, with extraordinary magnificence, in his new church. The king took the name of John, and the queen that of Eleanora, in compliment to the king and queen of Portugal, and in the presence of their ambassador, who assisted at the ceremony as their representative. Their example was followed by many thousands of their subjects; and the king did the more zealously encourage them to it, as he was going at that juncture to engage some rebellious subjects who were up in arms in the province of Macocco, and ravaging some of its best territories. Upon this occasion, Souza, the Portuguese ambafador, presented him with a royal standard, on which the cross was embroidered, and, in his master's name, exhorted him to put his whole confidence in that divine Saviour, whose religion he had now embraced, and to rely solely on his assistance for the success of that expedition, to which he himself would accompany him with an hundred of his armed Portuguese. The king accordingly gained a most complete victory over the rebels, and had the satisfaction to see his newly converted troops behave with an intrepid bravery, which they had never shewn before. He was just upon the point of entering into their territories, with a full resolution to chastise those revolvers with the utmost severity, according to the custom of the country, when Souza was so generous as to divert him from it, and, by his timely mediation, to prevent that province being put to fire and sword. <sup>b</sup>

Souza took leave soon after of that monarch, with great civilities on both sides, and left with him a great number of Dominicans, to carry on the affairs of religion, and to preach the gospel to the people. About the same time the king's eldest son, who had been sent upon an expedition against some rebels in one of the southern provinces, when his father and mother were baptized, returned victorious to court, and was no sooner informed of it, and of the success which attended his father's arms, than he earnestly requested to be instructed, and admitted to baptism; which being readily granted, he received the name of Alphonso, <sup>c</sup> which was that of the eldest infant of Portugal. He continued a zealous proselyte to, and great promoter of Christianity, during his whole life, and more especially after his accession to the crown; but his younger brother proved quite the reverse: his name was Panzo Aquitima; and his signal fondness for the heathenish superstitions in which he had been brought up, made him an irreconcilable enemy to the Christian religion, inasmuch that he left no stone unturned to extirpate it out of the kingdom. What topics he used to render the Portuguese and their religion suspected by his father, we can only guess; yet they were such as but too easily prevailed upon that weak prince, not only to apostatize, but to persecute all the Christian converts that refused to follow his example. Among these, his eldest son, prince Alphonso, having resisted all his caresses and menaces, and endeavoured with all his might to defeat all his brother's cabals, was accused by him of treasonable practices, and rashly condemned to banishment into some remote province, and his younger brother appointed his father's successor, who saw himself quickly surrounded by a numerous court, and at the head of a most powerful party. <sup>d</sup>

His father having soon after detected his treachery against Alphonso, not only recalled him from banishment, but gave him the government of one of the chief provinces of the kingdom, and at the same time ordered Panzo to return to court. Alphonso, with his usual zeal, began his government by forbidding all worship of idols, under the severest penalties; which not only drove a vast number of his new subjects over to his brother, now the declared patron of idolatry, but obliged his father to recall him, unless he immediately repealed his law against it. Alphonso excused himself from complying, and at the same time sent the king word, that he had then such a multitude of business upon his hands, that he could not possibly leave his government to come to court. <sup>e</sup>

By this time the king, worn out with age, fatigues, and infirmities, was visibly hastening to his end. Alphonso was advised by his friends to march against his brother, and to seize upon the capital; which he however declined till he was fully assured of his father's death; after which he ventured to enter in the night time, according to his mother's advice. On the next morning he appeared upon the spacious green before the royal palace, at the head of his friends and Christian forces: by whom, after a short speech, acquainting them with the king's death, and his being the next heir to the crown, he was proclaimed with the usual formalities, and joyful acclamations. Panzo was at that time at the head of a numerous army, which, upon his receiving the news of his brother's being in possession of the throne, he divided into two columns, and marched directly against him. Alphonso, who had only a handful of Christian soldiers, and about thirty-seven Portuguese, expected him with undaunted <sup>f</sup>

- a undaunted courage, and both by his words and example inspired his men with such intrepidity, that they behaved with surprizing valour, gained a complete victory, and drove the disconsolate Panzo, accompanied only by an old experienced officer, into a wood; where, in their flight, they both fell into a large trap, set up to catch wild beasts. The prince died about two days after, partly by the hurt he got by the fall, and partly of grief and despair: whereupon the old officer sent a submissive message to the king, acquainting him, that it was indifferent to him, whether he obtained his pardon from him, or an order for his execution, such as his treason justly deserved; but begged, that if his majesty chose the latter, he would permit him to be first admitted into the Christian church by baptism. He added, that as he could not but look upon his late victory over so superior an army as altogether miraculous (X); it was his earnest request that he might die a worshipper of that great God from whom he had obtained it<sup>o</sup>. Whether his behaviour was sincere, or mere artifice, the king was so highly pleased with it, that he freely pardoned and promoted him, and caused him to be instructed and admitted into the Christian faith. The rest of Panzo's army readily offered to submit to him; but he refused to admit them to take the oaths of fidelity to him, unless those who were idolaters consented to become converts, and those who had apostatized from the faith, were regularly readmitted into it.

- This zealous resolution of the new king, joined to the good example he set before them, was quickly followed by the conversion and reduction of myriads of his other subjects; so that we may justly look upon his accession to the crown, as the æra of the re-establishment of Christianity in his dominions<sup>p</sup>. And, if we may believe Ossorio, and other Portuguese writers, he, being no less excellent a preacher, than he was a zealous king, was wont to make long discourses upon the truth and excellency of the gospel, the certainty of future rewards and punishments, of a future life, and other such momentous topics as were most likely to confirm them in their belief and practice<sup>q</sup>. But that which most effectually contributed to it, next to the strict conformity of his example to the Christian precepts, was the great regard he shewed both to the Portuguese nation in general, and especially to the Dominican monks, who had been sent thither by their monarch to convert his subjects. To the former he granted the extraordinary privilege of settling in what part of his kingdom they liked best, gave them considerable lands and immunities, and enacted severe penalties against such of his own subjects as should venture to molest them in their new possessions and settlements. As for the latter, that is, the Dominican friars, whom his late father had so ungratefully and cruelly treated, during the short time of his apostasy, and stripped of all the lands, houses, and slaves, formerly granted to them for their maintenance, these he took more particularly under his protection, and not only restored them all their old, but added sundry new grants, by way of compensation for the extreme disgrace and misery they had been reduced to by him. He built several new monasteries and churches for their use, in several parts of his kingdom, and omitted nothing that could render them respectable and beneficial to all his subjects. He even vouchsafed to learn the Portuguese tongue, that he might interpret to them the sermons of those preachers, and at the end strove to inculcate them the deeper into their minds by some judicious remarks, or pious exhortations of his own<sup>r</sup>.

EMANUEL being now on the Portuguese throne, and highly delighted with the progress which the Christian religion had made in the Kongose dominions, earnestly intreated Alphonso to send his eldest son to be educated in Portugal in the Latin tongue, and all other polite literature. Alphonso not only thankfully complied with his generous request, but sent with the young prince a number of other young noblemen to Lisbon, to reap the same benefit. Emanuel took upon him the charge of their education, and spared neither pains nor cost to

(X) And so it must have been indeed, if what some of our Portuguese authors tell us be true; that the Virgin Mary appeared in a gigantic form, standing by Alphonso's side, just before the onset began; which injected such an universal panic into the rebellious army, that none of them dared to stand out against his handful of forces, but betook themselves to a precipitate flight.

Labat, who, in this particular, differs from the good father Cavazzi, whom we have followed in the text, adds one or two more circumstances to his account, which we shall subjoin in this note. One is, that the rebel prince Panzo, and his lieutenant-general were taken, and brought before the king, by whom they expected to have been condemned to immediate death. But, to their surprize, the good prince went and embraced his rebellious brother with the utmost tenderness, and offered to forgive and promote him, if he would embrace Christianity; which he absolutely refused, and died of the wounds he had received in the fight, notwithstanding all the help which Alphonso provided for his cure; and that to his death he continued obstinate in his idolatry, in spite of all his brother's endeavours to convert him; so that he was the only one in the whole army that did so, all the rest having been readily induced, by their late wonderful defeat, to embrace Christianity.

As for the lieutenant-general, he tells us, that he was pardoned; but upon condition that he should dedicate the rest of his life to the service of the church of the Holy Cross, and bring thither all the water that should be wanted for the baptizing of all the new converts from paganism; which office he discharged with such pious simplicity and exactitude, as left no room to doubt of the sincerity of his conversion (7).

procure them the ablest teachers and best helps: some of those youths gave themselves up a to the study of divinity, and made such progress in it, that, upon their return into Ethiopia, they vastly increased the number of converts by their learned discourses and exemplary piety.

K. Emanuel

His letter to him.

IN the same year he sent a splendid embassy thither, accompanied with magnificent presents, particularly a noble standard, with arms which the king and his successors were afterwards to bear, richly embroidered upon it, with all their proper colours and ornaments. They were a cross argent, upon a ground gules, cantoned with four other scutcheons of the same, charged with five torteaux fables, faulterwise; and these are the arms which the Kongoesse monarchs have borne ever since. These were likewise accompanied with a most obliging letter, wherein Emanuel gave Alphonso the title of brother, highly applauded his zeal for the Christian faith, and earnestly exhorted him to persist in it, and his friendship to the Portuguese nation; with all which Alphonso punctually complied, during the whole course of his reign; and such b veneration had he for king Emanuel, that he used to say, he should never have any real pleasure in life, till he went to Portugal, and threw himself at his feet, to acknowledge all the many obligations he had to him, particularly that of enjoying, thro' his means, the light of the gospel, worshipping the true God, and aspiring to eternal happiness. But that pleasure the state and circumstances of his kingdom would never permit him to allow himself; the fear of a relapse among his fickle and unsettled subjects, and the too small number of monks and priests that were left by this time in his vast dominions, many of whom had died through want and misery, or were withdrawn into the farthest provinces, made it appear dangerous to leave his dominions, till Christianity was better settled, and a more c considerable number of preachers could be obtained from his good new brother Emanuel. He therefore wrote very pressing to him for a fresh supply of them, and that good prince immediately ordered that his request should be granted with all possible speed.

A NEW set of them was accordingly ordered to be conveyed to him, consisting of five Dominicans, five Augustines, and five capuchins, besides a great number of secular priests, all of them men of uncommon learning and piety, who, upon their arrival, met with a most affectionate reception, and were dispersed among the several unconverted provinces; where the divine providence blessed them with such surprising success, that they added myriads of new converts to the old ones.

His excellent character;

and death.

ALPHONSO, who lived five years since their arrival, had the satisfaction to see the major d part of his subjects confirmed in the Christian faith before he died. A little before his death he sent for his son Don Pedro, and in the most pressing terms exhorted him to use his utmost power to preserve and protect the true religion, and to extirpate idolatry out of his dominions, as the most effectual means of procuring the divine protection on himself and his subjects. He gave him his last blessing with his last breath, and died universally lamented, as may easily be inferred from the most excellent character he left behind him; a short extract of which the reader will find in the margin, out of the learned bishop of Silves (Y).

his son Pedro, who augments
the revenues of the church.

HE was succeeded, without any opposition, by his worthy son Don Pedro, the first of that name; a prince who not only possessed all his father's virtues, but strove to outshine him in his liberality, by the considerable augmentation he made to the revenues of the church, for the better maintenance not only of the missionaries, and of the divine worship, but likewise of those Portuguese who were settled in his dominions, and promoted arts and commerce in them.

A bishop sent to Kongo.

IT was in the beginning of his reign that the pope granted unto the bishop of St. Thomas the spiritual jurisdiction of the whole kingdom of Kongo; in consequence of which he took upon himself the title of bishop of Kongo (Z). It is hardly to be expressed what joy his arrival

† PIGAFET, JARRIC, LABAT, & al.

(Y) He was, says that learned prelate, a prince of the most excellent qualities, most severe to the wicked, and no less generous to the poor and virtuous, and indefatigable in settling the affairs of his kingdom; irreproachable in his morals, and zealous to render every thing subservient to religion, a constant regard to which he always preserved in all his conduct, whether in peace or war. He opened public schools for the instruction of youth, not only in arts and sciences, but in piety and virtue, and endowed them with a royal liberality. He was a great reader, well versed in the holy scriptures, and had acquired a great deal of his knowledge by frequently conversing with priests, to whom he paid a deep attention. He frequently addressed himself in discourse to the people, in order to inspire them with piety and religion. He was a person of sound understanding and retentive memory. He read over five books of the

Portuguese laws, and greatly admired their constitution, but thought them in some instances too minute, and swollen to too great a multiplicity; and would sometimes ask, in a jocular manner, what punishment they had for throwing a louse on the ground. He always preserved the deepest gratitude towards king Emanuel, and wished for nothing so much as an opportunity of passing into Portugal, and at his feet to acknowledge the vast obligations he had to him; and that it was entirely owing to that excellent prince, that he enjoyed the light of the gospel, the knowledge and worship of the true God, and aspired to a blissful immortality (8).

(Z) The reader may remember, that we elsewhere mentioned the island of St. Thomas, as inhabited at first only by poor fishermen, but it was afterwards given to the Portuguese, who quickly made a considerable settlement in it, and drove so great a commerce, that they

- a arrival caused, not only at court, but in the whole kingdom, when he came to take possession of his new bishopric. The king in particular distinguished himself in the magnificent reception he gave him; he caused the roads through which he was to pass from the sea-side to his cathedral, which is above 150 miles, to be plained, and covered with mats, the trees and hedges on each side to be trimmed, whilst the way was crowded all along with myriads of his subjects, who testified their joy and reverence by the humblest prostrations as he passed by, and by joyful acclamations when he was gone, and as they followed in the rear. Many of them presented him with suckling lambs, kids, or pigs; others with partridges, chickens, and other tame and wild fowl, and several sorts of venison. Multitudes of both sexes and of all ages came and entreated him so earnestly to be baptized by him, that he was obliged to comply. This much retarded his arrival, and obliged him to go furnished with water, salt, and other holy ingredients used in baptism by the church of Rome; but there was no other way of satisfying their importunity *.
- b Upon his approaching near the city of S. Salvador, he was met by the king and court, and the whole clergy, and conducted to the church of the Holy Cross, which he appointed from thenceforth to be his cathedral; and after having performed the divine service, was conducted in the same splendid manner to a sumptuous apartment prepared for him. In a word, the good king spared neither pains nor cost to express his high regard to so worthy a prelate, and to engage him to make that capital the place of his chief residence. The bishop, on the other hand, to shew his gratitude to his majesty, and how worthy he was, both of the singular honours done to him, and of the new dignity he was now possessed of, immediately ordered the cathedral to be magnificently adorned, appointed twenty-eight prebendaries, some chaplains, singers, and other inferior officers to serve in it; he presented it with a stately organ, altar-piece, and other costly ornaments, and with a handsome ring of bells, and with every thing that was requisite for the performance of divine service. His next care was to divide the city into parishes, and to appoint proper pastors in each of them, and to regulate the several districts of the missionaries thro' the kingdom. He had several other designs of the like pious nature in view; but whether the air of St. Salvador disagreed with him, or the conduct of his prebends and priests displeased him, he made so many journies by water to and from the island of St. Thomas, that death put an end to all his other religious prospects, to the inexpressible regret of the king and court, who had conceived extraordinary hopes from his learning, piety, and munificence. Before his death he expressed an earnest desire to be succeeded in his diocese by a hopeful prince of the royal blood, who had been educated in Portugal, and whom he had admitted into priestly orders, before his departure thence. His choice was highly approved both by the king of Kongo and that of Portugal, who sent him immediately to Rome, where the pope, after due examination, having found him sufficiently qualified for that dignity, readily confirmed him in their choice, and sent him home with his new title of bishop of Kongo, laden with considerable presents, blessings, and indulgences. But he was unfortunately seized with a violent distemper in his passage to his diocese, which carried him off suddenly; by which accident that diocese continued vacant several years, as we shall shew in the sequel.
- c His death was followed not long after by that of the pious king Don Pedro, who dying without children, left the crown to his brother Don Francisco, a prince no less worthy of succeeding him, as inheriting all his excellent qualities, and in particular his sincere and exemplary zeal for the Christian religion, and for the abolishing of idolatry throughout his dominions; a zeal the more commendable and requisite at this critical juncture, as the church was now destitute of a prelate, and the clergy were more solicitous about their own, than for the interest of Christianity. But he likewise enjoyed but a short reign of two years, before he left the crown to a first cousin, named Diego, or James, and died highly regretted by all his good subjects.
- d Don Diego failed not to notify his accession to the crown to Don John III. now on the throne of Portugal, by a particular embassy, which was at the same time to inform him of the state of Christianity, and to beg of him a fresh supply of missionaries, to supply the place of those whom the heat of the climate, and fatigues of travelling thro' such barren deserts, and variety of seasons, from province to province, had deprived his subjects of. King John, who inherited all the zeal of his predecessors, readily complied with his request; and, with the congratulatory embassy which he sent him some time after, made choice of a pretty large number of jesuits, whose order had been instituted, about forty years before, by Ignatius Loyola, chiefly for the propagation of the gospel in foreign parts, and who voluntarily offered themselves for that purpose, to go upon that mission, instead of the Dominicans, capuchins, and other friars, who had been sent thither by his predecessors. These did not, however, arrive at Kongo, till a little before Don Diego's death, tho' he had been some years expecting them with no small impatience. All this while he was studying every method he could think of to oblige the Portuguese nation; he conformed to their ways, and imitated them even in their luxury, affecting to have his palace adorned with all the sumptuous furniture he could procure from them, and to go dressed like them in the richest apparel, which, after having worn once or twice, he liberally bestowed on some favourite courtier, and appeared in a new one<sup>a</sup>. During his reign, a new bishop, a Portuguese by nation, was sent to St. Salvador, who was received with no less magnificence than his predecessor both by the king and people. The prebends and priests were the only ones who took a dislike to him, on account of his too strict morals, which were such a reproach on their loose lives, that they made no difficulty to disown his authority. The good king thought fit to interpose his own in behalf of the bishop, and sent some of the most unruly and debauched prisoners into Portugal, and others to the island of St. Thomas; whilst others privately conveyed themselves away with all their wealth<sup>b</sup>. Don Diego did not long survive this disaster; but, after a short reign of eight years, during which Christianity had made a more than ordinary progress thro' his dominions, died without children; which proved the source of a long series of evils to the Kongoese nation, but more especially to the Portuguese that were settled amongst them, in some of the best provinces of that kingdom.

THESE were indeed no more than they justly deserved, as they were the prime cause and first promoters of all the troubles that ensued. They were by this time become so numerous and opulent, thro' the great privileges and immunities which had been granted under the three former reigns, that they took it into their heads to fill up the throne with a person of their own chusing, and to think themselves powerful enough to maintain him in it, as they knew him to be well affected to their nation, tho' he was not of the royal blood. Such a bold enterprise did not fail of alarming the whole court, and to stir up, in a little time, the whole kingdom against them. The princes of the blood, the governors of the principal provinces, and the rest of the Kongoese nobility, justly looked upon it as an open and avowed attempt to subvert their constitution and government, and to reduce the whole nation into a downright slavery. They soon rose up in arms against them, wherein their party were not slack in standing up in their own defence; but proving too weak to withstand the fury with which the Kongoese fell upon them, they were all massacred to one man without mercy or distinction (A). Only the clergy and missionaries were spared, out of regard to religion, and were allowed to enjoy all their revenues and privileges, and to pursue the concerns of their vocation with as much quiet and freedom as if no such disaster had happened<sup>c</sup>. They used the same moderation towards the Portuguese that lived in other parts of the kingdom; for it doth not appear that this slaughter extended farther than to those who were concerned in this conspiracy, and had taken up arms in defence of it, the rest being permitted to live as unmolested as formerly<sup>d</sup>; tho' this bold attempt could not but render them suspected to the Kongoese, and oblige them to keep a more watchful eye over them.

As soon as this bloody execution was ended, which restored to the natives their freedom of electing their monarchs, the states assembled again, and raised Don Henriquez to the throne, without any opposition. Some authors tell us, that he was the real brother of the late king Diego, but had, for some secret reasons, been privately detained by him at a great distance from the court, and sequestered from public affairs, tho' a prince of great valour and excellent qualities<sup>e</sup>. However that be, his reign proved but short and troublesome, and his success vastly short of his merits. He was, soon after his election, obliged to engage in a dan-

(A) We must inform our readers, that Pigafet's account of this transaction differs in some particulars from that which we have given from the authors above quoted; and our readers will not wonder to find it more favourable to the Portuguese, seeing he had it from Odoardo Lopez, who was of that nation, and may reasonably be supposed to have written more partially than the rest in favour of it.

According to him, Don Diego left a son, who was one of the three competitors to the crown; but, for want of friends to support his claim, was quickly made away by the two opposite parties. The other two candidates were princes of the blood royal, one of whom was elected by his partisans, with the good liking of the majority of the people, but utterly against the minds of the Portuguese, and some few lords who were on the opposite side, and therefore determined to go into the church, and slay the new chosen king, not doubting but if he was once taken off, the other would succeed of course. But whilst they were taken up with this bloody enterprise, the opposite faction, resolved to do the same on that which the Portuguese had elected, had already dispatched him; so that both kings were murdered at one and the same hour. Upon which the people, seeing themselves deprived of a legal successor, and laying the whole blame on the Portuguese, fell upon, and massacred them all, but spared the churchmen, in the heat of their resentment. Thus far our Portuguese (1).

He was succeeded by his son Alvarez, whom he had left regent during his absence, a wise and brave prince, a zealous Christian, and every way worthy of a happier reign than fell to his lot. His first care, after his election, was to send a solemn embassy to Don Sebastian, at that time king of Portugal, to excuse the late massacre of the Portuguese, before his father's election; and, in order to render it more acceptable to that prince, he recalled all the Portuguese whom the war above-mentioned had dispersed into several parts of his kingdom, received them with the utmost kindness, and 1542.

b acknowledged them innocent of all that had been laid to their charge, with relation to the late disasters, assuring them that he would quickly inform the king their master, and the bishop of St. Thomas, of it, by letters under his own hand. He concluded with giving them fresh assurances of his protection and favour, and of his taking the most effectual means to dissipate all former animosities between his subjects and them, and earnestly recommended it to the priests and missionaries to use their utmost efforts to restore peace and a good understanding between them. He was as good as his word, and dispatched his ambassador with all speed, but gave him express charge to take the island of St. Thomas in his way, and deliver his letter to the bishop, which he accordingly did, and withal intreated him in the most pressing terms, Sends for the bishop to court.
c put a stop to sundry crying abuses, which had crept in among the clergy. This message had made so deep an impression upon the good prelate, that he presently set sail for St. Salvador, which he had not dared to attempt during all the time of the late troubles; but he was obliged soon after to return to that island, where a fit of sickness quickly ended his days, and left the kingdom of Kongo a third time destitute of a prelate <sup>h</sup>. who complies, but dies soon after.

To return to the Portuguese embassy. The person who was at the head of it, being a man of great penetration as well as intrepidity, instead of palliating the late conduct of the Portuguese in Kongo, made no scruple to expose it in its true colours, as an attempt to overturn their constitution and government, seeing they could not pretend to raise a stranger to the crown, without the most manifest violation of their laws, and crying injustice to the princes The ambassador accuses the Portuguese to Sebastian, d of the blood, who laid claim to, and were then contending for it. He stopped not there, but represented to his majesty how odious his subjects there had made themselves to the natives, by their intolerable pride and avarice, and the tyranny they treated them with in all the parts of the kingdom where they settled. In a word, he gave so many instances of their misbehaviour, and backed them with such irrefragable evidence, that Don Sebastian, who was then on the eve of sending a powerful army thither, to revenge the slaughter of his subjects, was easily persuaded to listen to more amicable terms, and to live in peace and friendship with the new king and his subjects <sup>i</sup>. This happy reconciliation proved of singular benefit to the kingdom of Kongo, the greatest part of whose inhabitants must, some time after, and pacifies him for the late massacre.
e have perished with the extremest misery, had not king Sebastian sent orders to his subjects in those parts to behave with less pride and arrogance towards the natives, and to live in peace and friendship with them.

This storm was no sooner thus happily blown over, but king Alvarez saw himself and realm surrounded with a fresh one, but more dreadful and destructive than the former could have been. It was no less than an irruption of the Giagas, or Giachas, a fierce and barbarous nation of canibals <sup>k</sup>, who invaded his dominions on all sides at once, before he had time to raise an army sufficient to put a stop to the horrid devastations they every-where committed, putting all to fire and sword, without distinction or remorse. So that seeing himself altogether unable to stand against such numerous forces, he was obliged to retire, A dreadful irruption of the Giagas.

(B) These complicated judgments are ascribed by some historians to the great degeneracy, licentiousness, and vile apostasy, which reigned under his mild government, to the great dishonour and decay of Christianity. A great part of the missionaries were dead by this time; and those whom the king recalled were too much intimidated to endeavour to stop the torrent of vice and impiety, which raged every where, without check or opposition; and the new ones, who were expected from Portugal, with the Kongoese ambassador, were hardly embarked there. So that, according to those authors, it was that inundation of immorality, irreligion, and apostasy, that drew down those dreadful judgments from heaven upon the nation, not without some visible displays of the divine interposition; one remarkable instance of which we shall here subjoin, which is said to have happened about the very time we are speaking of.

One Don Francesco Bulla Mataro, or, as others write it, Bulla Mantani, a person of high rank, who had apostatized from Christianity, that he might give a greater scope to his licentiousness, died about this time in his infidelity, and without the least shew of remorse for having so strenuously opposed the progress of Christianity. Yet, out of regard to his quality, being a privy-counsellor, some say a relation to the king, he was permitted

As soon as the Giagas were retired, with all the plunder they could carry with them, the king returned to his capital, and caused all the houses which those barbarians had burned, to be rebuilt. The natives, who had retired into the woods and inaccessible mountains, to avoid their fury, likewise returned to their habitations, with the few goods they had saved, and began to till and sow their lands as usual; but, for want of a ready crop, to supply their present wants, a grievous famine soon ensued, which carried off vast numbers of them. The next year proved still more terrible and afflicting, their hoped-for harvest being wholly devoured by the locusts, which covered the earth in such swarms, that they left not one blade of grass, nor grain of corn, upon it after them. The very leaves and barks of their palm and other trees were eaten up; which reduced them to such extremity, that the parents were forced to decimate their children, and to sell one of them to help to support the rest; insomuch that the markets for slaves were so over stocked, that the Portuguese merchants had not ships enough to transport them into the Brasil colonies.

What was still more shocking and deplorable was, that those famished wretches fell greedily upon any carcases they found rotting upon the ground, whether of man or beast, whether lately dead, or half corrupted, to satisfy their excessive hunger; which quickly occasioned a more grievous pestilence than any they had ever felt before, and which broke out in loathsome blotches all over their bodies, and were more virulent and infectious than the worst small-pox; all which was occasioned by the stinking and corrupt aliments above-mentioned; insomuch that the whole kingdom must have been depopulated by it in a short time, if the Portuguese had not come to their assistance, and furnished them with proper physic and more wholesome food. But here it was that king Sebastian shewed himself truly generous, not only in the timely supplies of both, which he ordered to be conveyed to them, but in the orders he sent to his subjects there to cultivate a greater extent of ground, in order to assist them with corn, and such other provisions as they stood in need of.

The reader may best guess at the dreadful condition this miserable country was in, before the Portuguese came to their succour, when he is told by an eye-witness<sup>m</sup>, that many persons of quality, and even princes of the blood, voluntarily sold themselves for slaves to them, and readily submitted to be sent chained among the common herd, into their plantations, in hopes to meet with some relief, even in this sad exchange of misery. How long these calamities continued before the divine providence saw fit to remove them, whether any of these unhappy princes and nobles ever returned from slavery, and how many years it took up to restore the country to its pristine state, we cannot be sure. As for the still unfortunate king Alvarez, he had scarcely begun to enjoy the satisfaction of seeing it on the mending hand, before he was seized with a violent dropsy, occasioned by the badness of the aliments, and unwholesome air of the island, to which he was retired during the late famine and pestilence, of which he languished to the time of his death. He was likewise engaged in some other wars, both against the Giagas, and some of his rebellious subjects, in which he was greatly assisted by the Portuguese, under the command of Don Francesco de Govea; and as soon as peace was restored in his dominions, he married the lady Catharina, by whom he had four daughters, besides two sons and a daughter, whom he had by a concubine<sup>n</sup>; the eldest of mitted to be buried with the usual solemnities in the church of the Holy Cross, by the degenerate prebends; and in spite of the opposition which some zealous missionaries made against it; there being then no bishop to interpose his authority: so that the sacred edifice must have continued in its polluted state, had not Providence speedily interposed, in a miraculous manner, to cleanse it from it.

For (believe it who can) on that very night, part of the roof of the church was taken off by some evil spirits, and with such horrible noise, as alarmed the whole city; and the apostate's carcase was conveyed away, the church-doors still continuing close shut all the time, till, on their being opened, as usual, on the next morning, the tomb was found without the dead body. Thus far Lopez (2). He adds likewise, that the king, who, tho' a Christian, preferred a licentious life to the married state, was, by this wonderful accident, made truly sensible of his error and remissness; though not thoroughly cured of it till he was chastised into it by some heavier strokes of the divine discipline.

Father Cavazzi, or his translator for him, for we have not been able to procure the original, differs in some particulars from Lopez's account; 1st, in the character which he gives us of the king Alvarez, which is that of a pious, mild, and peaceable prince, without giving the least hint of his licentiousness; 2dly, he takes no notice of the uncovering of the roof of the church, but says that the hideous noise that was heard in the body of it having affrighted the whole city, they flocked thither from all parts; and that, taking it for granted that the terrible hurly-burly they heard within was owing to the apostate's body being interred in that holy place, they burst open the doors with a resolution to convey it away. But as the frightful noise still continued, and none of them dared to venture in, they agreed to stay till the next morning, when they went all in a body; and, after due search, finding that the corpse had been really conveyed away, they concluded it was gone after the soul into hell, without waiting for the resurrection (3).

This last account is, indeed, by far the more probable of the two; inasmuch as the whole contrivance may have been carried on without the help of a miracle; and what is farther mentioned by Pigafet, may be no more than a pious addition, to give it the appearance of one.

a which sons succeeded him, according to the custom of the country, which makes no difference between bastards and legitimate children °.

DURING captain Govea's stay in Kongo, king Sebastian, having been informed that there were several rich mines of gold, silver, and other metals in that kingdom, had sent some expert men thither, who had been formerly employed in those of Castile, to search for them, and send him a true account of them. But, as we have already shewn, king Alvarez had been dissuaded before, by his father confessor, Francesco Barbuto, a Portuguese, from suffering those mines to be discovered, lest it should tempt that monarch to make himself master of them, and by degrees of his whole realm<sup>p</sup>; so that, instead of telling those artists where they lay, he sent them into some other provinces, where there were none to be found. This ill-timed policy, as Lopez styles it, cost him dear; king Sebastian and his Portuguese subjects, being disappointed of their high expectation, quickly altered their behaviour towards him in such manner as left him no room to doubt what was the principal object of all their zeal: it was not long before he had the mortification to see the wealthy Portuguese merchants abandon his dominions, and the public commerce daily run into decay. On the other hand, his splendid embassies to the court of Lisbon were received with a formal coldness, and his most earnest and unwearied entreaties for a fresh supply of missionaries, to revive the spirit of religion, which was, in a great measure extinct, were answered by affected promises and delays, without perceiving that one single step was taken towards a performance. Christianity lost ground every day, whilst licentiousness and apostacy gained new proselytes and promoters; king Sebastian and his court were apprised of it, and of the noble efforts which Alvarez made to suppress the one, and to support the other, not only by a fresh embassy, of which Don Alvarez, his own kinsman, was the chief, but likewise by the frequent accounts which the residue of the missionaries sent thither gave of the melancholy state of religion; yet was that ambassador obliged to return to Kongo, without one single missionary, or religious person<sup>q</sup>.

ABOUT three years after, Don Antonio de gli Ova arrived from Lisbon, at St. Thomas, with the title of bishop of that island, and a commission to visit the kingdom of Kongo. Some quarrel which he had soon after with the governor, obliged him to cross over to the continent, where he met with a very rude repulse; the governor having represented him as a haughty turbulent person, an express had been dispatched to him from court, to forbid him to set his foot in the kingdom. But, upon better information, the king not only invited him thither, but sent his son to conduct him to his capital, where he stayed about eight months, and left two monks behind him, and departed a little before king Sebastian sailed for Africa, where he was afterwards overthrown, as we shall see in a subsequent part.

By this time king Alvarez was become so sensible of the ill step he had taken in concealing the gold and silver mines from the Portuguese, that, upon the accession of Philip of Spain to the crown of Portugal, he sent him a letter by the same messenger who came to notify it to him, named Sebastian de Costa, and who was then returning to Madrid; wherein he offered that monarch to discover them to him, and sent him, at the same time, an account of several trials he had made of them. This offer, however, was on condition that that monarch should send him a new recruit of missionaries, for which he had so earnestly solicited king Sebastian to no purpose. De Costa did not live to deliver this letter to king Philip, the ship which carried him over being cast away on the coasts of Portugal, and every person in it drowned. It was, however, found in a little casket which was thrown on shore by the waves, together with some memorandums and directions with which the king of Kongo had charged De Costa, which were carefully conveyed away to the court of Madrid.

IN the mean time king Alvarez, finding his distemper gaining daily upon him, and impatient to have his request granted by Philip, that he might have the satisfaction to see Christianity restored in his dominions before he died, dispatched Odoard Lopez, often quoted in this chapter, as the chief person from whose memoirs Pigafet compiled his history of this kingdom, with fresh letters both to king Philip, and to the court of Rome, with proper credentials, passports, and other recommendations, to treat with both courts, about the discovery of the said mines, and a fresh supply of missionaries; and at the same time to give them a full account of the great decay and deplorable state of Christianity throughout his kingdom, as he was a person of age and experience, and had made so considerable an abode in it, that he was perfectly well acquainted with every matter he was to lay before them (C). Lopez, notwithstanding-notwithstanding the king's eagerness for his departure, was eight whole months before he a set sail, and was forced to do it in an old crazy ship, which sucked in so much water, that they were in continual danger of sinking, and were at length obliged to take the wind in their poop, and, after weathering many storms and disasters, arrived at last at the kingdom of Cumana, or, as it is since called, Granada, in a very shattered condition, and was obliged to stay there eighteen whole months before he could set out again for Spain.

In the mean time, king Alvarez, still as impatient as he was unsuccessful, determined to try the fortune of a fresh embassy, and made choice of Don Pedro Antonio, the second person in his realm, to go on that expedition. He appointed one Gaspar Dias, a wealthy Portu- b guese, to accompany him, and to furnish him with what sums he should want to obtain a speedy compliance from either court. He gave them farther orders, that if they should chance to meet Lopez in their way, they should take him with them, and be directed by his counsel. This last embassy had still worse luck than the former; the ship being taken by an Englishman, and wrecked upon the English coasts, where Don Pedro Antonio and his son were unfortunately drowned. Don Gaspar had the good fortune to escape, and to get safe to the court of Spain, where he met with Lopez, who was but newly arrived thither, and was just entering upon his embassy. Upon which he committed the whole conduct of it to him, and returned to Kongo to acquaint the king with the ill success of both embassies.

By this time king Alvarez, worn out by his dis temper, and so many grievous disappointments, had departed this life after a long but thorny reign of above forty years, and left the crown to his son Alvarez II. The news of his death soon reached the court of Madrid, where king Phi- c lip, now wholly intent upon the conquest of England, was glad to put off the negotiation of the embassy to a more favourable time, and to advise him to go to Rome, and try his fortune with the pope. Lopez accordingly set out for that court, where he met at first with a very kind reception, and failed not to lay before his holiness the miserable state of Christianity thro' the whole Kongoese dominions, in the strongest terms. He not only apprised him of the extreme want it laboured under of missionaries and other clergy, to attend on the fervice of religion, but added, that having gained great riches during his abode in that country, he had made a vow to found a seminary of priests in it, for the administration of the Christian sacraments, the instruction of the people, and the revival of the Christian religion, which was almost extinguished; to which end he begged of his holiness, that he would d grant him his approbation, together with such indulgences, dispensations, and jubilees, as might best promote his pious views. The pope readily complied with his last request; but as to the main subject of the embassy, and the sending of a new supply of priests, he was pleased to refer it to the king of Spain, to whom, he said, it did more properly belong. We have dwelt the longer upon the transactions of this long reign, as the greatest part of them serve to point out clearly to our readers the true causes of that surprising and deplorable decay of religion in this unhappy kingdom, of which we gave them an account in a former section<sup>u</sup>, and how happily it might have been prevented, if the pope, and the other catholic crowned heads, had shewn the same zeal for the interest of Christianity as their deceased monarch had done, during his long and painful reign.

We hinted above that he was succeeded by his son Alvarez, the second of that name: This new prince, not at all discouraged by the ill success of his pious father, renewed the same requests from his first accession to the crown, which he could the more easily do, as he ascended the throne without any opposition. His first care, therefore, was to send a most solemn embassy to Philip II. of Spain, in which, after having expatiated on the great services which his predecessors had received from the Portuguese monarchs, and the strict alliance which still subsisted between that crown and him, he entreated him to revive all the antient treaties with him, and withal that he would procure to his dominion a new prelate from Rome, and send him a new set of missionaries, to repair the extraordinary losses which the Christian religion had sustained during so long a series of years. Philip, now more at leisure to listen to his f ambassador, not only complied with all his requests, but obtained from the pope a peculiar bishop for the kingdom of Kongo, who was not long after convoyed thither on board a a Portuguese vessel, accompanied by several eminent ecclesiastics, and a considerable number of missionaries, of different orders, who were, quickly after their arrival, dispersed over their several districts, and, by their indefatigable zeal, restored, in a great measure, the Christian religion to its antient state, in a smaller number of years than could have been expected, considering its extreme decay, and the much greater difficulties they had to surmount than any of the first preachers ever met with. Their zeal and success.

For, by this time, the far greater part of the nation, apprehending some fresh invasion from the barbarous Giagas, had left the plains, and were retired to their inaccessible mountains, with all their families and effects, and had lived in such a licentious and abandoned manner, that they were dwindled into mere savages; such were the people whom the missionaries were obliged to seek for, and encounter, among the rugged barren rocks, and afterwards to civilize, before they could make them converts to a religion, which was not only quite obliterated among them, but the most opposite to their bestial way of living. Providence, however, so far blessed their labours, that they gradually brought them away into their antient habitations; where finding themselves secure from the inroads of the Giagas, by the various fortresses which the Portuguese had built upon their frontiers, they became by degrees more inclined to listen to their spiritual guides, and better disposed to receive the gospel. The benefit of their preaching did not confine itself to these numerous conversions which were every-where made, but help to suspend, if not wholly to suppress, the revolts which so frequently happened under almost every reign; so that Alvarez had the double satisfaction to see at once the surprising progress of Christianity, and to enjoy a peaceable reign during the space of twenty-seven years; after which he left the crown to Bernard, the eldest of all his sons. Religion restored to its antient state.

BERNARD, the first of that name, and eighth Christian king, had hardly reigned one year before he was killed, according to common report, by his next brother Alvarez, in a duel (D); or, according to others, assassinated by his order. Alvarez was then duke of Bemba, and the eldest of all his other brothers; and, immediately upon Bernard's death, caused himself to be proclaimed king, under the name of Alvarez III. King Alvarez II. dies. 1614. King Bernard killed. 1615. Alvarez III. ascends the throne;

ONE of his first cares after he mounted the throne, was to disculpate himself the best he could from having had any hand in the death of his brother; and, among other public acts, he ordered a church to be built on the field of battle, and on the very spot on which he fell; and as soon as he was well of the wounds which he had received in the fight, went himself to the stone quarry, attended with a numerous retinue; and, the more effectually to hasten the work, took up a stone upon his shoulder, and carried it to the place where the church was to be built. His example was followed by his attendants, and the next day by his queen, at the head of her court, and attended by some of the Portuguese nobility. He likewise dispatched a sumptuous embassy to the court of Madrid, and another to pope Paul V. from whom he received a fresh supply of jesuit missionaries. But whether he had by that time taken any dislike to their society, or had conceived a higher opinion of the capuchin order, his ambassador was particularly ordered to beg of that pontif to favour him with a number of them, and to bring them with him at his return. tries to disculpate himself from the murder of his brother.

THIS last embassy, at the head of which was one of the first nobles of the kingdom, attended by sixteen young persons of quality, met with a gracious reception from Paul V. who defrayed all their charges during their stay, and readily complied with all the king's requests, one of which was, that he would favour him with some new regulations, which his council thought extremely needful at that time, for the better support and government of a Sends a grand embassy to the pope; begs that some

(D) Or rather in single combat, and at the head of his army. The two brothers had been then, according to our author (5), furiously engaged for some time, each at the head of a numerous force, and Alvarez had received already some slight wounds, by which he had lost a quantity of blood, when Bernard, eager to end the contest in the most expeditious way, sought him out amidst all the fire and volleys of arrows, and found him fighting at the head of his troops, his cloaths and arms stained with his own blood. Bernard, as yet unwounded, and in the utmost height of his vigour and fury, rushed upon him with his arm uplifted, and with a design to have cut him in sunder with one blow with his scymitar; when Alvarez, who, in spite of the inequality of the match, stood his ground firm against him; and taking that opportunity to run him through the body, laid him dead under his feet. The consequence of which was, that Bernard's forces betook themselves to flight, but found all avenues so closely stopped by those of Alvarez, that they were forced to submit, or be cut in pieces.

This account, if it might be depended upon, doth doubly justify the conduct of Alvarez; 1st, as it makes him to be the legitimate successor to the crown, and Bernard therebèl and aggressor; and 2dly, as it represents his killing his brother as done in his own defence. But, besides that it so manifestly contradicts that which we have from other authors, we must observe to our readers, that this comes to us by the hands of the jesuits, to whom that prince, after his accession to the crown, was an extraordinary friend, and had granted very singular privileges, which may be seen at the end of the chapter last quoted (6).

capuchins may be sent to him. Christian flock, just growing up to maturity, and surrounded with barbarous idolaters, whose priests left no stone unturned to prevent its growth, and pervert the feeble and wavering to their impious superstitions and idolatries. Such regulations, coming immediately from the fountain head, were by this time become so much more indispensable, as the kingdom was then stocked with plenty of priests, both secular and regular, and the latter consisting of different orders, as Dominicans, Augustines, jesuits, and capuchins, between whom it may reasonably be supposed the same discords and animosities reigned in as high degree in this, as we have seen them do in all other missions; as in China, and other parts of the East-Indies<sup>2</sup>, in Abissinia, and other parts of Africa<sup>3</sup>, and in most of those of America, as we may have further occasion to shew in the sequel of this work, to the great offence and discouragement, not only of the new, but of the old and best confirmed converts.

THE misfortune was, that whilst the ambassador was waiting for completing of those regulations, the change of air, diet, and way of living, joined to the fatigues of so long a voyage, and of attending the Romish court, threw him and most of his retinue into a severe fit of sickness, which carried him off in a little time, notwithstanding all the care and pains which the pope took to have him attended by the best physicians, and plentifully supplied with proper restoratives. His death was attended with all the marks of a sincere Christian; and that pontif, who had often visited him in person during his illness, caused him to be magnificently interred in the church of Santa Maria Maggiore, and a noble epitaph to be engraven upon his tomb<sup>b</sup>. What the farther success of this embassy was, or the effect his holiness's regulations had upon the missionaries and clergy, we are not told, only in general we find Christianity making a considerable progress during the short reign of the then pious monarch, who died in the 7th year of it, greatly regretted both by his subjects, and the Portuguese, who enjoyed very great privileges under him, as well as other strangers who were settled in his dominions. He was, by all the accounts we have of him, a wise and generous prince, valiant and liberal, a zealous promoter of Christianity, and a most liberal benefactor and protector of those who propagated it, a great lover of his native subjects, and a singular friend and patron to strangers<sup>c</sup>.

Xth. Succeeded by Don Pedro II.

A noble instance of his wisdom and justice.

Friendship to the Portuguese.

A fresh instance of it.

HE was succeeded by his son Don Pedro II. of that name, and tenth Christian king of Kongo, who reigned only two years, but in that time had an opportunity of giving one or two signal instances of his wisdom, moderation, and justice, one of them especially upon a critical juncture, which might else have been attended with some fatal consequences. The occasion was no less than an open rupture between his subjects and the Portuguese, the particulars of which our author doth not inform us farther of, than that both parties had taken up arms against each other, and were come to blows, and that the latter had been defeated. Upon the first news of this, the king's council, the nobles, and chief officers of his kingdom, without enquiring into the matter, or who were the first aggressors, unanimously expressed their resentment in the highest terms, and insisted upon his ordering them to be plundered, and cut in pieces out of hand, and the rest to be banished out of his dominions without farther trial or delay. The king was the only person who declared himself against such a rash and unjust proceeding, or against resolving upon any measures, till a full and equitable enquiry had been made into the occasion of that hostile breach, and it was not long before he was fully convinced that his subjects were in the wrong, and had been the first aggressors. Upon which, tho' much against the liking of his court and council, he honourably acquitted the Portuguese, gave them fresh assurances of his favour and protection, and took the most equitable method to accommodate matters between them; so that he quickly compromised the whole affair with the Portuguese governor of St. Paul of Loanda, without the least derogation to his royal dignity<sup>d</sup>.

HE gave not long after a fresh proof of his justice and friendship to the Portuguese nation on the following occasion. Five of their merchants who were settled at St. Salvador, as they were travelling thro' part of the frontiers of the kingdom of Micocco, laden with their rich merchandizes (E), fell into the hands of a troop of soldiers, or rather banditti, who stripped them of all they had, and brought them to that prince, who loaded them with fetters, and confined them in a strait prison. The king of Kongo was no sooner informed of it, than

(E) The kingdom of Micocco is situate on the most northern frontiers of that of Kongo, and is tributary to it, but frequently revolts, especially when the kings of Kongo are engaged in any war with the Gingas, or other neighbours, or in suppressing any rebellion within their own dominions; the people are idolaters, very barbarous, and live mostly upon plunder (7). The Portuguese carry on a considerable trade, as far as, and even beyond, those parts; and, as they have no current coin, they barter their merchandizes for others, and must be supposed to make a vast gain by it, to compensate for the length of the way, the heavy carriage, and the difficulties and dangers of travelling through those hot countries, from robbers, wild beasts, &c. of which we have formerly spoken (8); for many of those Portuguese merchants, notwithstanding all these disadvantages, are immensely rich (9).

a he sent an express to reclaim them and their effects, and, upon his refusal, determined to declare war against him. Two great difficulties were started against it by the Portuguese general, who was to assist him in that enterprize, viz. the impossibility of transporting their troops into those remote parts time enough, and the danger lest the king of Micocco, a barbarous prince, should cause those merchants to be massacred in their prison, out of revenge. Upon which they agreed upon redeeming them; but the friar who was sent thither to treat about their ransom dying in the way, they must in all probability have perished in their jail, had not a grievous famine and pestilence which followed soon after, and was interpreted by that prince and his priests as a judgment for his injustice and cruelty to those strangers (joined most probably to a dread of the king of Kongo's resentment, who was then making some hostile preparations against him) determined him to set them at liberty. His fear, it seems, was such, that he not only caused the full value of all their effects to be restored to them, but ordered one of his officers to conduct them safe to St. Salvador, and to excuse his former conduct to the king of Kongo. As soon as the king was apprised of their arrival, he sent for the officer, and gave him a gracious reception, commended this last action of his master, and sent him home laden with rich presents for him.

Don Pedro did not live many months after this generous action, but died justly regretted by all his subjects, who had conceived the greatest hopes of him from those instances of wisdom and magnanimity which they had observed during his short reign. He had, it seems, proposed to himself the example of his predecessor and name-sake, Don Pedro the first; and they were all in high expectation that he would have even out-done that great and noble monarch, when his unexpected death threw the whole realm into real mourning<sup>d</sup>.

He was succeeded by Don Garzia, the first of that name; but whether his son, or a near relation, our author doth not inform us; there is, however, no room to doubt his being a prince of the royal blood, because none but such, as we have shewn before, are ever allowed to ascend the throne<sup>e</sup>. He was, moreover, an excellent prince, and highly esteemed by his subjects; but his reign proved as short as that of his predecessors, and he died about the latter end of June, in the 2d year of his reign.

His successor, named Don Ambrosio, the 12th Christian king, was no less excellent and pious a prince, and as much beloved by all good Christians as he was hated by the merchants, whose male practices he punished with great severity. We have no other particulars of his reign, except that it lasted only some months less than five years, he dying in the month of March.

He was succeeded by Alvarez IV. of that name, the son of Alvarez III. of whom we read little else, but that he died in the month of February, in the 5th year of his reign.

His successor Alvarez V's reign was as unfortunate as short; he being killed in the second battle which he fought against the duke of Bamba, six months after his accession to the crown. The occasion of this quarrel was a secret but unjust suspicion he entertained of that duke, who was indeed very wealthy and powerful, but no less loyal towards him. He had a brave brother named Garzia, who was then marquis of Chouva, who was equally suspected by Alvarez; inasmuch that his ill treatment of both obliged them to join forces in their own defence.

THEY soon came to a decisive battle, in which they had the good fortune to defeat the royal army, and took the king himself prisoner; but, contrary to the usual custom of those barbarous nations, who seldom fail of putting them to death, these two brothers contented themselves with confining him in one of their palaces, where he was treated with as much respect as if he had been in his own, they themselves attending, and serving him upon their knees, and giving him daily fresh assurances of their inviolable fidelity; none of which, however, could gain credit with that mistrustful prince. At length, to his great surprise, they resolved to give him such a proof of it, as they doubted not would at once rid him of all his fears; which was to restore him to his throne, and to carry him in his hammock upon their shoulders into his own capital, attended with a numerous escort, royal music, guards, and other marks of royalty.

THE ungrateful monarch, however, instead of becoming more flexible towards them by this singular mark of respect and loyalty, grew the more incensed against them; and looking upon it as a disgrace to owe his life to his subjects, was no sooner restored to his throne, than he began to levy new forces, marched directly against them, and attacked them with the greatest fury. The fight was long and bloody; but at length his forces were totally overthrown, and a vast number of them slain. The king's body being found dead among them, the duke ordered his head to be cut off, and carried in triumph, on a lance, to the capital; where the states of the kingdom being soon after convened, the duke was unanimously chosen and proclaimed king, and crowned with the usual solemnities, amidst the universal acclamations of the people, and took the name of the deceased<sup>f</sup>.

bloody tyrant:

ALVAREZ, now the VIth of that name, and 14th Christian king of Kongo, proved a wise and pious prince. His first care, after his accession to the throne, was to send a magnificent embassy of homage to pope Urban the VIIIth, and to entreat that pontif to send him a fresh supply of missionaries, to retrieve the decay of Christianity. He seemed wholly bent upon restoring it to its pristine flourishing state, when he was unfortunately murdered by his own brother Don Garzia, above-mentioned; who became no less odious to his new subjects by that black action, than he did by his other cruelties and tyranny, and more particularly by the methods he took to force the states of the realm to elect him to the crown. As he had murdered the noble Alvarez with no other view but to ascend the throne, so he had taken care to appear at the head of such a numerous force before the electors, as should at once suppress all reproaches on account of that enormous and unnatural crime, as well as all opposition to his election; so that no one daring to utter a harsh word or complaint against him, they found themselves obliged to declare him successor to his deceased brother. We do not find that he changed his name like his predecessors; at least he is only known in the list of Christian kings by that of Garzia II. However, in the beginning of his reign, he made a great shew of imitating their zeal and piety, by the pains he took to promote Christianity, and to increase the number of converts among the idolaters. But more especially by his kind and generous reception of the capuchin missionaries, whom his brother had obtained from pope Urban VIII. to whom he assigned convents and churches, lands for their maintenance, and slaves to cultivate them, upon their arrival at his capital, and took them under his special favour and protection, above all the other orders of monks. Infomuch that his subjects began to conceive a high respect for him, and to think that he was endeavouring to atone for his fratricide and ambition, by his zeal for Christianity, and liberality to the preachers of the gospel.

He did not, however, continue long in this good disposition, before his eager desire to secure the succession to the crown to his eldest son made him alter his conduct, and degenerate into a downright tyrant. He began with persecuting all the princes of the blood, who could lay the least claim to the throne, and putting them to the most cruel deaths; neither did he cease this bloody conduct, till he had cut off every one of them that could give him the least umbrage, excepting some few of them who had the good fortune to escape into the kingdom of Angola, where the Portuguese governor readily took them under his protection. These horrid cruelties, which did but too openly discover his ambitious views, failed not to alarm the states of the kingdom; yet none of them had the courage to expostulate with him. The clergy, the missionaries, and particularly the lately arrived capuchins, did indeed venture to represent to him, in the humblest terms, the guilt and danger of his proceedings; but the repulse they met with from him quickly cooled the zeal of the greatest part of them; and those who still persisted in condemning his conduct, became the objects of his hatred and resentment. Some of them were cruelly persecuted, and, with the utmost inhumanity, left to rot in loathsome jails, laden with fetters, and in the most extreme misery and poverty.

ALL these dreadful examples, which he clearly perceived rendered him more and more odious and detestable to his subjects, served only to alarm his fears the more, that they would put an invincible obstacle to his son's succession; and this obliged him to have recourse to more execrable measures, especially after a desperate fit of sickness had reduced him to the necessity, as he thought it, of recalling all the crew of pretended diviners, forcerers, and enchanters, whom his pious predecessors had banished out of their dominions<sup>a</sup>, to his assistance. These vile wretches, thinking this a proper time for introducing once more their abominable rites and superstitions, and finding at their arrival at court, that his eldest son, prince Alphonso, was of all his other children the most averse to their idolatries and diabolical practices, quickly agreed to embrace that favourable opportunity of taking him off; and to that end, did but too easily persuade the credulous prince that his sickness was occasioned by some charm or enchantment which that ambitious youth had made use of in order to open his way to the throne. Garzia, without giving himself leisure to hear what his son had to say in his own defence, convened the states of the kingdom, at least such as were nearest at hand, and in their presence declared the eldest prince, Alphonso, unworthy and incapable of succeeding him to the crown, on account of his unnatural parricide; and caused his next son, named Antony, to be elected and crowned king. He lived long enough after this to commit sundry other crimes, and acts of cruelty and tyranny; and did not end his detested reign till the 21st year of it, and till he had charged his successor, who inherited all his vices, with some other dreadful commissions to be executed after his death<sup>b</sup>.

DON Antonio, the first of that name, and seventeenth Christian king, if such a bloody tyrant can deserve so honourable a name, had no sooner performed the obsequies of his father, than, like a true offspring, he set about performing his dying commands, and perhaps with a greater degree of inhumanity than had been enjoined him. He began with his eldest brother Alphonso, whom he ordered to be cruelly butchered, and deprived of the benefit even

- a of the meanest burial; he closely pursued his father's maxim in putting to death all the remaining princes of the blood who had not escaped into Angola, not sparing even his younger brethren, lest any of them should, with the assistance of his discontented subjects, attempt to dethrone him. Those nobles and officers of his kingdom, of whom he entertained the least suspicion of disrespect or disaffection, were sure to undergo the same fate; till the shedding of blood became as familiar a practice with him, as if he had been brought up among the worst of canibals. He grew, at length, to such a height of cruelty, that he could hardly get any servants or slaves to attend on him; all his subjects shunning him as a ravenous monster, and his very slaves chusing to flee into the thickest forests, upon the most frightful rocks and deserts, and at the hazard of being starved to death, or devoured by wild beasts, rather than be exposed to his more inhuman treatment.

- b HE was, however, much affrighted at some dreadful appearances in the air, which happened about that time, some threatening comets, and other phænomena of the like alarming nature, which continued visible for a considerable time; but especially a dreadful raging pestilence, which destroyed myriads of his subjects, and carried off the stoutest of them in less than two or three days, had so far terrified his superstitious mind, that he seemed to be deeply touched with remorse at the vast quantity of blood which he had caused to be unjustly shed. But no sooner were those judgments removed, than he fell into other enormous impieties; one of which was marrying, contrary to the laws of the church, a very near relation, with whom he was enamoured, whilst his own wife was still alive; and, when the clergy and missionaries opposed it, behaved himself with such haughtiness towards them, as plainly convinced them, that if he had not really apostatised from, yet he paid but very little regard to, the Christian religion; and of this he ventured to give them such signal proofs, as drew upon him the censure of the bishops, vicar-general, and of the whole church (F).

contempt of religion.

- THE king, now no longer able to bear the opposition of a set of men who were become odious to him, resolved to pull off the mask, and to declare himself an irreconcilable enemy not only to all ecclesiastics, of all denominations, but to all the Portuguese in his dominion, whom he stiled a set of beggarly indigents, who were forced by hunger and poverty to abandon their native country, and to seek for a livelihood among all distant nations that would harbour them. These he not only threatened to exterminate, but, to shew that he was in earnest, made all the haste he could to raise all the forces (or as they may be more properly called, the militia) of his kingdom, which, when brought together and mustered, amounted, as we are told, to 900,000 men; a prodigious number this! But it will appear less incredible to our reader, if he remembers what hath been said before, of the extraordinary populousness of that country, and of their method of raising such stupendous armies<sup>a</sup>.

raises a vast army against them.

- ALL this while the Portuguese, well informed of his threats, and that those vast preparations were intended against them, had found out a specious pretence for being before-hand with him, and revived their former demands for finding out the gold and silver mines, pursuant to the offer which king Alvarez had made of them to Philip king of Spain, as was lately mentioned, and were come to a resolution to be no longer baffled with the delays of the Kongoese court, but to go and seize upon them vi & armis; so that, under that pretext, they had not only raised a sufficient force to make head against that blustering monarch, but had already penetrated pretty far into his dominions by that time he had got his numerous army together.

seize on the gold mines.

HE did not, however, depend so far upon that dastardly multitude, as to venture them against the known valour of the Portuguese, without previously consulting his idolatrous

(F) As an instance of his disregard to religion, he took it into his head one day, as he assisted at the solemn procession on Corpus Christi festival, to have the royal umbrella carried over his head; which none of the Christian princes before him had ever done, because it is borne on that day, out of respect, over the sacrament, which is carried about. One of the principal dignitaries of the church ventured to approach him, and, in the humblest terms, to represent to him, the scandal it gave to the people, who would not fail of interpreting it, as if his majesty was putting himself upon a level with the body of Christ that went before him.

The king contented himself with casting a scornful look; and turning about, left the procession, and marched directly to his own palace, his whole court following him thither; but he sent soon after to one of his head officers, to tell the clergyman, who was the bishop's vicar-general, that if ever he presumed again to make any such remonstrances to him, he must expect nothing but the severest effects of his resentment. The vicar, though but too well acquainted with his vindictive temper, answered the king as became his character, That if his majesty carried his disregard to religion so far as to insult it in so public a manner, and in the midst of their most solemn devotions, he must not be surprised, if he thought it his duty to admonish and expostulate with him, as became his function and dignity. But that if his majesty had still any worse designs against it, he should find him and his whole clergy ready to lay down their lives to maintain the honour of their holy faith, for which his majesty's ancestors had shewn so laudable a zeal, and profound regard.

This answer, which would have mollified the king's resentment if he had had the least regard for Christianity left, only enraged him the more; so that, in the height of his rage, he swore he would be speedily revenged, not only on the vicar-general, and the whole clergy, but on all their friends and supporters, meaning the Portuguese (1).

diviners and magicians about his success, and offering some sacrifices to render their pretended deities propitious to him. The answer he received from those juggling priests, was, that he should certainly enter in triumph into St. Paul de Loanda, which is the metropolis of Angola, and belonging to the Portuguese; and that the prime officers of that nation should carry him thither upon their shoulders. This assurance, so confidently given to the superstitious king, made so strong an impression on his mind, that he thought himself already victorious, and in possession of that important place, and all the Portuguese either dead at his feet, or laden with his chains; and, in this confidence, accelerated the march of his troops as much as possible against them.

Defeated and slain.

umph.

BOTH armies came soon after in sight of each other; and our good capuchin assures us, that the divine providence so far interposed in favour of the Portuguese, as to send a miraculous rain of fire, driven by a hot scorching wind, full in the face of the enemy; which so grievously annoyed them, that great numbers dispersed themselves and fled, whilst the Portuguese fell upon the rest, and made a most dreadful slaughter among them (G). The king, who had posted himself on a small eminence, to observe the fight, was soon after surrounded and slain by them; which, being perceived by the remainder of his army, occasioned an universal flight; and the Portuguese, weary by this time of butchering them, neither offered to stop or pursue them. They contented themselves with cutting off the impious king's head, and carrying it in triumph to their capital of Loanda, into which he made indeed a solemn kind of entry, though very different from that which he had promised to himself, from the answer of his juggling priests<sup>1</sup>.

XVIIIth.
Don Antonio seizes upon
the crown.

HE had reigned above three years, when his defeat and death put an end to that war, which seemed to threaten not only the total extirpation of the Portuguese nation, but of the Christian religion, out of his dominions. But the kingdom was not yet free from the danger of falling under the power of even a more impious and merciless tyrant: this was a prince of the blood, but one of the lowest class, whom the late king had spared, as appearing too despicable in his eye to be worth his notice, or raise his jealousy; but who, taking advantage of the confusion that reigned every-where, after the late bloody overthrow, and the king's death, gathered up a sufficient force to enable him to seize upon the crown by downright violence, and caused himself to be proclaimed under the name of Alvarez VII.

His vices cause him to be dethroned.
Is succeeded by XIXth, Alvarez
VIII;

HE was a monster of impiety, cruelty, and lewdness, and no farther a Christian, than as he had been baptized in his infancy, but had neither been instructed in the principles of Christianity, nor ever made any profession of it. His reign, whilst it lasted, was one continued series of the most horrid murders, extortions, and licentiousness of all kinds, till he became so odious to all his subjects, that they rose up in arms; and, with the assistance of the count of Sogno, drove him from thence, in the month of June of that very same year<sup>2</sup>. The count immediately caused the states of the kingdom to be convened, who made choice of another prince of the blood, about twenty years of age, who took upon him the name of Alvarez VIII. and was the 19th Christian king. He was a wise and promising prince, and might have made his subjects once more happy, and himself have enjoyed a longer and more peaceable reign, had he not found the kingdom distracted by factions, and so miserably exhausted of all its wealth and strength by the dreadful wars and horrid butcheries of the two former reigns, which furnished the then marquis of Pemba<sup>3</sup>, a prince no less ambitious than powerful, an easy opportunity to revolt from him, and in a little while, to wrench the crown from him, before he had enjoyed it full four years. And with this remarkable epocha our author concludes his history of the Kongoese monarchs<sup>m</sup>; since which we do not hear of any author who hath thought fit to continue it farther.

(G) It is most likely that the whole miracle consisted only in the blowing of one of those burning winds which are so frequent in all these hot regions; the dreadful effects of which we have elsewhere described (2); and in the advantageous choice made by the Portuguese of their situation, so as to have it upon their backs, whilst it blew full in the enemy's faces.

But our author is so fond of miracles, that he could not forbear adding another to that, which we leave to the reader's choice to believe or reject.

He tells us, that the king, from his eminence, beheld a fine majestic lady, surrounded with luminous rays, and holding a child in her arms, who stood all the time of the action at the right hand of the Portuguese general, and seemed to direct all his motions; and that he could not but know her, as he had been brought up a Christian, to be the Virgin Mary, as several of his retinue deemed her, who saw the apparition as well as he. Yet could he not forbear crying out, in a sarcastical manner, What strange people are those Portuguese, who carry their wives and children to the wars with them! immediately after which, he received a mortal wound, which put a stop at once to his profane jest, and his impious life and reign (3).

C H A P. XII.

- <sup>a</sup> HAVING gone through the history of the kingdom of Kongo proper, we come now <sup>The kingdom of Angola.</sup> to speak of those other provinces which formerly made a part of that vast empire, and were subject to its monarchs, but were, in process of time, dismembred from it; and from inferior lordships, or governments, erected themselves into considerable kingdoms, under their own monarchs, though in some respects still tributary to those of Kongo<sup>a</sup>: in the describing of which we shall avoid as much as possible repeating any thing which has been said in the last chapter, concerning the Kongoese nation in general, with respect to their religion, government, commerce, produce, customs, and other such particulars, wherein they differ from each other only in very inconsiderable matters; and confine ourselves to such wherein we find an essential difference between them: so that where-ever the reader meets with
- <sup>b</sup> nothing of this kind in the following description of them, he may conclude them to agree with the general description already given of the kingdom of Kongo<sup>b</sup>. We there observed that the two principal provinces which dismembred themselves from it, and erected themselves into independent kingdoms, were those of Angola on the south, and Loango on the north<sup>c</sup>. We shall now begin with the former, as the most considerable of the two, if not in extent, yet in wealth, commerce, fruitfulness, and other advantages, which we shall have occasion to mention in the sequel.

S E C T. I.

- <sup>c</sup> THIS country, which was antiently called Abonda, or Ambonda, and since Dongo, and <sup>Its antient names.</sup> by the Portuguese Angola, and is most commonly known by this last among the Europeans, may be, for distinction sake, divided into Angola proper, or that which was antiently a province of Kongo, and the kingdom of Angola, as it was afterwards formed into, and vastly enlarged by its new monarchs, after they had made themselves independent <sup>Division of Angola.</sup> of it. In the first sense, it is confined between the two rivers of Danda, which part it from that on the north, and that of Coanza, or as others write it, tho' more improperly, Quansa, on the south. In the second sense, that is, with its additional conquests, it extends itself <sup>Extent and limits.</sup> along the Ethiopic coasts, from the mouth of the Danda above-mentioned, situate in 8 degr. 10 min. of S. latitude, to that called St. Francis, in 13 degr. 15 min. according to some;
- <sup>d</sup> but according to the most accurate geographers, quite to Cape Negro, in 16 degr. 21 min. According to this last extent the kingdom of Angola forms a coast of eight degrees and some minutes, that is, 160 leagues, or 480 miles, and upwards, but, with its winding, reckoned a great deal more still*; and the Cabo das Vaccas, or the Cape of Cows, which lies in 12 degr. 22 minutes, cuts it in the middle: what is its breadth from west to east, or its extent from the sea coast into the inland, is very different, and, for the most part, unknown, especially as one advances farther towards the south; but its greatest depth eastward is in the province of Angola proper, which we are now to describe.

- <sup>e</sup> THIS part of the Angolic kingdom, and by far the most considerable, is situate, as hath been already hinted, between the two great rivers of Danda on the north, which part it on that side from Kongo proper, and that of Coanza, which parts it from those of Cabezo on the south<sup>d</sup>. It hath on the east the kingdoms of Metamba and Higher Ganghela, and the ocean on the west. The whole country is very mountainous, there being but few plains to be met with in it, except on the maritime side, and between the huge ridges of the mountains.

- <sup>f</sup> WE have described the former of these rivers in the last chapter<sup>e</sup>. The Coanza is large, <sup>Rivers.</sup> deep, rapid, and empties itself into the same ocean with the Danda, about the 9th degr. <sup>Coanza; its mouth and cascades.</sup> 20 min. south latitude, and about 12 leagues south of Loanda San Paulo, capital of the kingdom. It is navigable 150 miles upwards, quite to Cambamba, where the Portuguese have a fortress and capetaneria, or settlement, under a governor stiled by them captain. It abounds with variety of fish, forms several islands, and has some cataracts, one in particular, which
- <sup>f</sup> bears its name. As for its source, and the length of ground it crosses from east to west before it comes to the Portuguese settlement, it is altogether unknown, as well as the eastern countries which it waters, and the many rivers it receives in its course. The chief of these are the Mocos, Luenta, and Calucala. Its mouth, which runs between the capes Palmerino <sup>a</sup> and Lego, is above a league wide; the northern shore is the deepest, and that at which the vessels sail in. It hath a good depth all the way up to Cambamba, but afterwards is full of rocks and dreadful cascades, which render its course so rapid that there is no possibility of going higher. Its fall into the ocean is likewise so rapid, that the sea appears quite muddy <sup>b</sup> two or three leagues below it. Its mouth is not easily perceived from the open sea, by reason of an island quite covered with high trees, which lies just before it. About fifteen or sixteen leagues above it, it divides its waters into two streams, of which the southern is the deepest and most frequented <sup>c</sup>.

Islands in it. THE two chief islands that are formed by this river are that of Massander, which is six leagues long, and about two miles broad, and is very fertile in maize, or Turkey wheat, millet, and some other grains, which are reaped at three different seasons of the year. It produces likewise a vast quantity of manhioc, a root of which they make a coarse kind of meal, which serves them instead of bread; and nourishes vast numbers of palm and other fruit-trees, of which we have spoken in the last chapter <sup>d</sup>. The other island is called Motchiama, about four or five miles long, and one in breadth, mostly plain, and producing variety of roots and herbs, and breeds plenty of cattle. There were formerly five or six Portuguese families settled upon it, who carried on a considerable trade in them, especially in slaves <sup>e</sup>. Other rivers, which cross the kingdom of Angola between the Danda and Coanza above mentioned, are the Beango, or Zemza, which runs in the same westerly course, through the province of its name; of which we shall speak in the sequel, and empties itself into the same ocean; and some other small ones, of which we shall make mention hereafter. One thing more we must add concerning these two rivers of Danda and Coanza making the northern and southern boundaries of the kingdom is, that tho' their mouths are hardly above 70 or 80 miles from each other, yet their distance grows so considerably wider by their deflection, as you penetrate farther eastward into the inlands, as to be much above twice, if not three times, that number, tho' how much cannot be exactly known <sup>f</sup>.

Other provinces south of the river. BUT besides the provinces inclosed between these two rivers, there are several others included formerly within the boundaries of the Angolic kingdom, which our capuchin had likewise visited, and are situated on the south of Coanza above mentioned, and extending themselves as far as, or even beyond, the Lutano, or Lutina, or, as the Portuguese have since <sup>d</sup> named it, Rio San Francisco, or St. Francis's River, which is another very considerable one, and which disembogues itself, after receiving many others into its bosom, into the same Ethiopic ocean, about the 13th degree of S. latitude, or about three degr. and a half south of the Coanza <sup>e</sup>. These provinces are still, or the greatest part of them, involved in the same barbarism of manners, and abominable idolatries, as the Giagas, formerly described <sup>f</sup>; being little better than savages in human shape. In this most geographers, as well as our capuchin, who have gone thro' them all, unanimously agree; but as to their situation, extent, limits, and even their names, they all differ from each other. We shall therefore chiefly follow him in the division and description he hath given us of them in the same order he hath set them down, and only take notice of what is peculiar and most remarkable in each <sup>g</sup> of them.

The division of Angola into 17 provinces. THE kingdom of Angola, according to him <sup>m</sup>, is divided into seventeen provinces, among which that of Benguela still retains the title of kingdom, tho' in other respects reduced to a level with the rest. 1. The province of Chissama holds the first rank, and is situate under the 11th degree of south latitude, near the mouth of the Coanza. It is now become a Portuguese settlement, or captainrick: the people there pretend to some peculiar immunities and privileges above the rest; but the Portuguese governor and officers have thought fit to deceive them from this fond conceit, by using them with more arbitrariness and harshness than any of the other provinces. Here are three commanderies, whose despotic governors behave more like tyrants than inferior officers over the natives; which is perhaps one cause, why <sup>f</sup> the country, which is mostly mountainous, is so poorly cultivated by them. It abounds however with a peculiar salt, which the peasants make from a briny kind of water which they dig for, and, being congealed, they cast it into oblong square cakes like bricks, of about five or six inches in length, like those we have formerly described in Abissinia <sup>n</sup>; and those they exchange with the Portuguese for meal, oil, and other commodities. It is reckoned so excellent, not only for food but for physic, as being a pleasant diuretic, that the merchants convey it thro' all Ethiopia, and make an extraordinary gain of it. The province abounds likewise with fine honey and wax, but labours under an extreme scarcity of fresh water, because they have no rain from May to October, and their mountains are without springs or rivers; so that those who are near the Coanza are glad to fetch their water from that river, tho' at the hazard of being devoured by the wild beasts, which swarm along its banks, <sup>g</sup>

- a 2. THE next province is that of Sumbi, situate under the same climate with the former. The natives are tall and strong, but, like the rest of the Ethiopians, are so lazy and indolent, that, tho' their country is, for the most part, flat and well watered by the Rica, Caiba, Calacombola, and other smaller rivers, and consequently very fit for breeding vast herds of cattle of all kinds, as well as for sowing of grain; yet, partly thro' indolence, and partly thro' the vast numbers of wild beasts, which they neglect to destroy, they do not improve these advantages by a tenth part so much as they might, unless it be in some of the islands that lie at the mouth of the Calacombola, which are very rich, populous, and free from voracious beasts, and where they breed vast quantities of excellent cattle. 2d. Sumbi. The people lazy tho' stout.
- b 3. THE third province is that of Benguela, which, as we hinted above, still retains the title of kingdom, and is permitted to enjoy some small privileges by its masters the Portuguese. The river Rimba, called also Cumani, borders it on the east, and the Coanza and Cubogi, on the north, and its extent westward reaches quite to Cape Negro. It produces abundance of salt, tho' of an inferior nature from that lately spoken of, but which is yet in great request, and the merchants lade their vessels with it for exportation. The zimbis, or cockle money, formerly mentioned <sup>o</sup>, are caught upon its coast, and pass in payment either by weight or measure. The country, which is mostly mountainous, swarms with wild beasts, particularly elephants, rhinoceroses, and wild mules; the former of which is a dainty dish with the Negroes, especially after it begins to crawl with worms. The lions, tigers, crocodiles, and other carnivorous kinds, destroy vast quantities of their cattle. They have but few flat lands, except towards the sea-side, where the Portuguese have erected a stout fortress, called Fort Benguela, in which they maintain a strong garrison, to keep the savage Giagas in awe, who had almost ruined the whole country, during the reigns of their ancient monarchs; who, tho' they stiled this province alone their kingdom, yet never resided in it, but committed the government of it to some faithful Sona, or noble, but who were hardly ever powerful enough to withstand the inroads of those plundering barbarians. So that it was a happiness for this province that it was conquered by the Portuguese, and put under the government of the viceroy of Angola <sup>p</sup>. But with all their care and power, they have not been able to restore it to its pristine state of plenty, when their fertile plains produced numberless herds of cattle, both small and great, and of excessive bigness, which are now become very scarce. Nor hath their zeal been able as yet to reduce the natives from their old idolatry; tho' our author tells us some of them began in his time to give a little more attention to the missionaries. 3d. Benguela; bearing the title of kingdom. Its fall. Zimbi, or shell-money. A strong fortress and garrison. Its ancient fertility impaired.
- d 4. THE province of Rimba, situate between that of Sumbi on the west, Lubolo on the north, Tamba on the east, and Scetta on the south, is divided into twenty lordships or districts, whose lords take care to entertain a good number of militia. It produces great store of grain, and abundance of fish. They are mostly idolaters; but our author, who was there an. 1658, tells us, that he found them very docile, and had the satisfaction to baptize a good number of them <sup>q</sup>. 4th. Rimba, and its 20 lordships.
- e 5. THE province of Scetta, on the south of the former, and on the north of Benguela, is one of the most rocky and mountainous in all the kingdom, particularly on one side, where a ridge of perpendicular rocks covers a space of thirty miles in length, without interruption, and looks like a whole solid piece cut straight downwards, as if done by the plummet. The top of it however, dreadful as it looks, is both well inhabited and cultivated, enjoys a serene and wholesome air, and plenty of fresh water; which may be well looked upon as a wonder in such a burning climate as this, and is yet no more than, as we have shewn in a former chapter, is to be met with in several parts of the kingdom of Abissinia <sup>r</sup>. The low lands are likewise fertile, and well watered, and feed prodigious herds of cattle; which would be still more numerous, were it not for the wild beasts that devour them. The rivers and torrents which come down from the hills, carry with them vast quantities of iron ore, which the inhabitants gather carefully, by laying of straw and other such materials across the stream to receive it; and, having laid it up in heaps, convert it into metal by dint of fire, and make an excellent iron of it. There are found likewise in this country great quantities of a kind of transparent ore, pointed at one end, which they call Tarc, and believe to be engendered in the air, and fall from thence in thundering weather; nor is it possible to convince them of the contrary. In this province the residence of the governor is built on the declivity of a high mountain, called Lombo, on the frontiers between this and the province of Rimba, and he is so powerful that he hath twenty-two inferior governors under him <sup>s</sup>. 5th. Scetta. Its stupendous ridge of rocks. Well inhabited and watered. The low lands fertile. Iron hath been made here.
- f 6. THE province of Bembea, which is divided into Higher and Lower, extends itself on one side along the sea, and on the other divides the kingdom of Angola from the other foreign states on the south. The country is large, populous, and abounds with large and small 6th. High and Low Bembea.

cattle, with the fat of which they anoint their heads and bodies, and clothe themselves with their hides, coarsely dressed. They are addicted to the same idolatrous superstitions with other parts of the kingdom, but speak a quite different language. They use a politic stratagem in war, which is to drive great numbers of their cattle towards that side on which the enemy is expected, whilst they lie perdue either under the high grass, upon their bellies, or lurking among the heath or copses, which seldom fail of inticing them out to the plunder; upon which they furiously fall upon them, in the height of their disorder, with their armed clubs, and force them to surrender themselves, in order to be sold for slaves to the Europeans. The great river Lutano, or San Francisco, waters and fertilizes most part of this province, but swarms with crocodiles, sea-horses, and monstrous serpents, which, besides destroying much of its fish, do a great deal of mischief to the adjacent grounds.

7th. Temba.

Abounds with wild cattle, and wholesome
roots.

7. TEMBA is a flat low province, full of small rivers and rivulets. The Rio Longo, or Long River, springs there out of a rock, on which the Portuguese have built a fortress, which defends the whole district. Four other rivers fall into the Rio Longo, which swell it very much, and make it navigable a considerable way. The whole country abounds with wild cows and mules, which might be of great service, if the natives had the sense to tame them, instead of hunting them for food. It produces likewise some excellent roots, one in particular, much like to our parsnips, but of a finer taste, and affirmed to purify the blood, and attenuate the phlegm. The province is divided into twelve lordships, whose chiefs, tho' under the protection of the Portuguese, yet live free and independent, and are only obliged to furnish them with a certain number of militia, in case of need. And though they often quarrel with each other, yet they could never be subdued by the Portuguese, but were as quickly reunited as they perceived themselves in any danger from that quarter. Our author had the satisfaction to convert and baptize a good number of the natives, an. 1658, whilst he was among them, and to find in many of the rest a ready disposition to forsake their abominable idolatries.

8th. Oacco.

Abounds in springs, &c.

The people stinted in their lands.

8. OACCO, situate between the Coanza on the north-east, and Lubolo on the south-west, is beautifully variegated with hills and plains, without any of those high rocky mountains which cover some other provinces, and is so well watered with rivers and springs of excellent water, as to render it one of the most delightful provinces in that kingdom. The misfortune is, that the natives have not industry enough to cultivate it as it deserves; and, what is still worse, the lords of it will not allow their subjects any greater quantity of land than what is barely sufficient for their families, and suffer the rest to go untilld. The Kongo, which falls into the Coanza, runs thro' the province, and renders it very fertile, but its fruits, we are told, are more insipid than in other provinces.

The lord of it baptized.

Twenty governors under him.
Their militia.

Distempers and cure.

QUINZAMBABO, who was lord of this province, and was baptized an. 1657, induced, by his example, a great number of his subjects to become Christians. He hath twenty Sunos, or governors, under him, whose principal business is to discipline and exercise the militia, in the use of all their martial weapons, and even in that of fire arms: so that it is esteemed by far the best in the whole kingdom. There is a distemper peculiar to this climate, which commonly begins with a violent head-ach and vertigo, and is followed by convulsions, which quickly reduce the patient to a mere skeleton. Their remedy against it is a plant not unlike our hyssop, which they pulverise, and drink the infusion of. They likewise extract an oil from it, with which they anoint the parts convulsed. Our Europeans who live there, use the above-said powder in their drink, broths, &c. by way of prevention, with good success.

neck.

A venomous insect.

The sting how cured.

THE natives of this province are likewise subject to a kind of terrible swelling, which begins at the mouth, and spreads itself all over the neck, which it often swells to the bigness of the head, causes excessive pains, and is often attended with suffocation.

HERE is likewise an insect not unlike our horse flies, but under the belly like our millepedes, whose sting is so dangerous, that if a quantity of blood be not drawn very speedily, the person is immediately thrown into a burning fever, attended with excessive tortures, that commonly end in a total delirium, and, if not speedily relieved, in convulsive death. The natives use a remedy against it, which, tho' altogether superstitious (A), is yet so effectual,

(A) The poor idolaters, in this case, have recourse to their conjuring priests (1), who seek out for an insect of the same kind, and put it into a hole which they have dug in the earth, adding sundry fumigations, exorcisms, and superstitions, understood only by them; after which they fill the hole with water, and replenish it as that sinks, stirring it, and letting the earth settle again several times. At last, without staying till it is quite clear, and divested of its disagreeable earthy taste, they give the patient plenty of it to drink, which seldom fails of throwing him into a violent fit of vomiting, by which so great a part of the poison is thrown out, that their natural strength may easily get rid of the rest. But yet our author adds, that even those that are cured by this odd method, are, for the most part, seized, some time after, with pains and convulsions in their nerves, which commonly end in a settled lameness, and often in a dead palsy (2).

(1) De his, vid. sup. p. 465.

(2) Labat ex Cavaz. lib. i. c. 5. p. 81, & seq.

a that the Europeans, unable to bear the excessive pain, will have recourse to it, in spite of the express prohibitions of the church. What is still more surprising is, that those who have been cured seldom fail of a relapse, occasioned by the bare remembrance, without being stung afresh; and some of them feel such excessive torture, that they have killed themselves to be rid of it.<sup>t</sup>

9. THE province of Cabexzo joins to Oacco above mentioned on the north, to Lubolo on the south; hath the Coanza on the north-east, and Rimba on the south-west. It is populous, and well stored with cattle and other provisions, and hath a mine of iron on a mountain, called from thence The Iron Mountain, which yields great quantities of that metal, which the Portuguese have taught the natives to purify, and forge it into warlike and other useful tools. Its fine iron.
 b The Rio Longo, and other small rivulets, lakes, &c. supply them with plenty of water. Their trees are vastly large, and they have one sort of them not unlike our apple-trees, the bark of which, being slashed with a knife, yields an odoriferous resin, of the colour and consistency of wax, and very medicinal, only of a little too hot a nature for our Europeans, unless qualified by some cooling drug. A fine resin.
Malamba-Angy, the lord of this province, was baptized an. The lord of it baptized. 1658, whose example excited many of his nobles and officers, and a great number of his subjects, to be the same. The avenue to his palace had, among other embellishments, twelve palm-trees, of such exquisite largeness and beauty, that the curious came far and near to see them; but they were originally brought hither from the adjacent province of Lubolo.

10. LUBOLO, situate along the southern banks of the Coanza, between the provinces of Cabexzo, last mentioned, on the east, and that of Quissama on the west. Some geographers include the ten provinces above described under the general name of Lubolo; nevertheless they most of them agree that this we are upon is the only one to whom that name more properly belongs. It is much famed for its noble and excellent palm-trees, mentioned in the last article; and it seems as if its soil and climate was peculiarly adapted to them, so greatly doth the oil, wine, and other produce, which they yield<sup>u</sup>, exceed all that is to be met with in all the other parts of the kingdom<sup>w</sup>. The greater part of the people of this province are Christians, after the example of their chief lord, but not much to be depended upon for their zeal and constancy. They are tributary to the Portuguese, and the militia are at their command. All these ten provinces are on the south side of the Coanza; but as to their extent, limits, number of their governments, and other such particulars, authors differ so much from one another, that we dare not rely on any, much less attempt to direct our readers to which of them to give the preference (B). 10th. Lubolo. Famed for palm-trees. Tributary to the Portuguese.

WE come now to the other seven provinces within the Coanza, the principal of which is that of Loanda, an island on the coast of the kingdom of Bengo, and which is chiefly remarkable for the capital of Angola, called from it San Paulo de Loanda, built upon it by the Portuguese, as we shall see in the sequel, an. 1578, under the direction of Paulo dias de Novais, the first governor of that nation in these parts. It is large and populous, pleasantly situate on the declivity of a hill near the sea-coast, and facing the south-west. It is not surrounded with any walls, but only with churches and monasteries, which answer the same end. It is, however, defended by a stout and spacious fortress, which hath in it a church dedicated to St. Amaro, and a convent of Sestertians, besides some few bulwarks that serve to guard the entrance of the port. Near and about the above mentioned fortress are the castimbo, or ditches, which are a kind of reservoirs of water, for the use of the Negro slaves belonging to the town. 11th. Loanda. Its capital, built by the Portuguese, described. Its castle.

THE jesuits, who are here held in great esteem, have their convent in the center of the city. It is a large stately edifice, endowed with a considerable revenue. On one side of it is the hospital called The Misericordia, which hath twenty-four rooms or wards, besides the apartments of the directors, physician, surgeon, apothecary, and other attendants. The revenue of this house consists in some portion of lands appropriated to it, and a tax of two rees which every vessel pays to it that comes into the port. On the other side of the jesuits college is the church belonging to the fraternity of St. John the Baptist. The cathedral, which stands at a small distance from those three, is a large stately structure, dedicated to our Lady of the Conception, under which is another dedicated to the Holy Sacrament, like our Convent. Hospital; how maintained. Churches.

(B) We cannot but suppose here, that Cavazzi was mistaken in the extent he gives those ten provinces, or that his translator Labat has either misunderstood him, or hath suffered some errors to creep into the numbers of his version, when he tells us from him, that they all put together extended only about 25 leagues from north to south, and no more than 12 from east to west; when his map of it, affixed to the first book, would induce one to believe (had not the numbers been wrote at full length) that he had omitted at least the last figure; there being above seven degrees, or, according to him, 140 leagues, between the mouth of the Coanza and Cape Negro, which is the southern limit of the kingdom: which is pretty near the distance which Lopez, and other authors quoted at the beginning of this section, give us between these two boundaries (3).

(3) See before, p. 419, & seq.

St. Faith under St. Paul's. The capuchins, carmelites, and other friars, have likewise their a monasteries and chapels, which, together with some other parochial churches, as that of St. Anthony de Lisbon, but vulgarly St. Anthony de Padua, that of Our Lady of Nazareth, the chapel of St. Mary Magdalen, and some others, do so surround the city, that they answer the end of walls and fortifications, for the safety of the inhabitants *.

Their confidence in their saints.

YET do the Portuguese place less confidence in these kinds of bulwarks than they do in the protection and prayers of those saints to whom they are dedicated; which plainly appears from the exactness and magnificence with which they celebrate their festivals, above all other popish towns; sparing no cost nor profuseness upon those occasions, to express their high veneration for, confidence in, and gratitude to, those imaginary protectors; insomuch, that among the several fraternities of that city which are composed of mere laics, merchants, b handicraftsmen, &c. each of which hath a patron belonging to their respective trades, there are no less, we are told, than 30,000 crowns spent every year on such their anniversary festivals.

Courts spiritual and temporal.

THIS city is very populous, and much resorted to (C), as it is the residence of the Portuguese governor, or viceroy, of the bishop, and the chief courts of judicature, for the whole kingdom. The public buildings are sumptuous, as are those of the merchants, and officers both spiritual and temporal. The town is supplied with excellent fresh water from a curious spring in a neighbouring island, which we shall speak of by-and-by; and the whole country round about is fertile, well cultivated, and delightfully variegated with villas, gardens, and stately fruit-trees, and other fine vistas, besides that of the open sea. On the north side of c the city, at a small distance from it, is a hill somewhat higher than that on which this is built, and which still bears the name of San Paulo, and upon it are still to be seen some few houses, together with the ruins of a monastery formerly belonging to the jesuits. As for the new city, it suffered very much when the Dutch took it, an. 1641; and, after the ensuing peace, the Portuguese have in vain endeavoured to restore it to its former splendor, tho' they have spared neither pains nor cost to do it *.

Its port and island of Loanda.

Its port is spacious, safe, and commodious, tho' the town is not built upon any river, and is sheltered by the small island of Loanda, which lies almost over against it, at about half a mile distance from it. The island is about five leagues in length and one in breadth; and it is upon the coasts of it that they fish for the zimbis, or simbos, formerly mentioned, d as the current coin in most parts of Western Ethiopia *. This little island doth moreover supply the capital above mentioned with excellent water, from the curious springs they have dug in it; insomuch, that you need not go farther than two or three feet into the earth before your pit is filled with fresh and delicious water, clear and light, and excellent to drink. But here, as in several islands of America, and even nearer in the little one of Cadis, you must draw your water during the high tide; for as that sinks, it becomes more and more brackish, till, at low tide, you find it quite salt, almost like that of the sea itself. This is a phænomenon that hath not yet been accounted for by any of our naturalists, tho' too well known here and in other parts of the world to admit of a doubt †. The Portuguese have built abundance of houses on this little island, and keep a great number of gardens upon it e well cultivated and stored. They have likewise several handsome churches, and a convent of the jesuits upon it; besides which they keep up a good number of lime-kilns, in which they burn oyster shells, and which make excellent lime.

Vast numbers of slaves.

THE reader may guess by this one article, what a number of slaves must be employed in the supplying so populous a place with a sufficient quantity of that element only, for the month; but the goodness of it makes amends for the trouble of carriage. The bread that is commonly eaten by the inhabitants, being made of the meal of the root called maniock, brought thither originally by the Portuguese from the West-Indies, is neither pleasant nor wholesome. They have plenty of good meat of all sorts, but their pork is reckoned the best of all, at least by the Europeans; for among the Angolans, dogs flesh is esteemed by far f the daintiest meat, and as such they fatten and kill, and expose them at the public shambles, where they bear the best price. However there are few Europeans that care to eat of it, any more than of their common mutton, which is here of that large kind, whose great tails are heavier than any other quarter.

(C) Baudrand tells us, that, in his time, it was reported to have no less than 3000 houses belonging to the Portuguese, all built of stone and mortar, and covered with tiles, and most of them very sumptuous and richly furnished. The streets are strait, wide, and regular, the convents and their chapels neat and decent, and suitable to their different orders. As for the houses of the native negroes, though they are much more numerous, they are mostly mean and plain, built only of earth, and thatched with straw. The town hath likewise a prodigious number of slaves, employed in tilling the ground, carrying of burdens, and in other inferior offices; insomuch, that the Jesuits, who here officiate as parish priests, and preside over the schools, have no less than 12,000 under them (4).

(4) Baudrand Dictionar. sub. voc. La Martiniere, & al.

<sup>a</sup> THE Portuguese have a great many noble seats and villas in the neighbourhood of this capital, all of them richly furnished, and adorned with gardens, orchards, and other embellishments, and some of them with very handsome chapels, in which the divine service is performed by priests, to whom they allow a sufficient salary for that purpose. About three miles from the city is the seat of an Angolan nobleman, in which are to be seen two very singular rarities. The one is a fountain of sweet water, which issues out at the bottom of a rock that is compassed round with the sea. In the other for above 50 yards around that fountain, there are found great quantities of serpents eyes, tongues, &c. petrified, like those that are dug in several parts of the island of Malta, and which are said to have the same virtue: infomuch, that the Portuguese and other Europeans wear them about them chased in silver and gold, and export vast quantities of them *. They use no coin in their traffick, but substitute instead of it the zimbis, or shells, lately mentioned <sup>b</sup>, or a kind of Venice bead, the largest of the bigness of a nut, but others smaller, and all of them of divers colours and fashions, on which account they also wear them for ornaments about their necks, arms, and wrists; the one they call anzolos, and the other mizangas <sup>c</sup>. Greater payments are frequently made with pieces of cloth of their own manufacture, of a stated breadth and length, and the largest of all with slaves <sup>d</sup>.

BUT it is time now to take a view of the six remaining provinces, on the north-side of the Coanza. The first in course is that of, 12. Benga, or Bengo, situate along the river of its name, but more commonly known by that of Zenza. It hath the sea on the west, and the province of Mofeche on the east. The Portuguese have grubbed and cultivated vast tracts of lands in it, which now abound with maize or Turkey wheat, and the maniock root, with which they make their bread. It produces also plenty of banana and bacova trees. The province is divided into a great number of districts, of which the chiefs are natives, though tributary to Portugal, and obliged to till their lands by way of average. They are all Christians, and have eight churches; three of which are stiled parishes, and one belongs to the Jesuits, who officiate in it with great pomp on all festivals, and preach to the people. 13. On the north of Bengo is the province of Danda, situate on the south of the river of that name, which divides Angola from the kingdom of Kongo. It is very well watered by that and others that fall into it, and is very fertile in grain and fruits of all kinds, but is much infested with crocodiles, and monstrous serpents, which swarm in those rivers. The people are, for the most part, Christians, and have several churches, regularly served by secular priests, the most considerable of which is situate on the mouth of the Danda. About eighteen miles higher up is another, besides several chapels and oratories, all which belong likewise to the Jesuits.

13th. Danda.

14. THE province of Mofeche, which extends itself along the northern banks of the Coanza, is very fertile, and sends no less than between 3 and 400,000 sacks of maniock meal to the city of Loanda yearly, for the use of the garrison. It hath two considerable fortresses, called Massangano and Cambamba, distant between six or seven leagues from each other, and each under its particular commander. Those two have twelve Sowi, or native chiefs, under them, who are obliged to maintain a numerous militia for the defence of the kingdom, at their own charge, though chiefly for the service of their Portuguese masters. In this province are mines of several metals, particularly in the government of Cambamba; and, if our author's observations be true, each mine rings the complexion of the inhabitants who live in that territory; for though they be all of a black hue, yet those who live near the silver mines differ in their complexion from those that live near those of gold or lead. This he ascribes to the effluvia which exhale from those different mines, and tan the inhabitants, each of a different tinge; and assures us farther, that he never was once mistaken in his judgment on any of them <sup>e</sup>.

14th. Mofeche.

Its mines tinge the skins of the negroes.

THE king of Portugal maintains a good number of churches and chapels in this province; the two most considerable of which are those of Massangano and Cambamba, which bear the title of royal chapels, and the priests which belong to them are endowed with considerable privileges. The territory of Cubocco produces zimbis, or shell-money, of such exquisite beauty, that the Kongoese will give a slave for a collar of them; and persons of the highest rank, especially the ladies, look upon them as their principal ornament about their necks, arms, and legs, and about their middle <sup>f</sup>.

Fine zimbis used for ornament.

15. THE province of Ilamba is divided into Higher and Lower, which are situate, the latter between the Danda on the north, and the Bengo on the south; and the former between the Bengo and the Calucata. They are both very fertile, and tributary to the Portuguese. Tho' they be both Christians, yet, thro' the knavery or indolence of the officers, they have great numbers of idolatrous priests, and pretended conjurers, who live unmolested among

Mines of iron. them. The Higher Illamba hath mines of excellent iron, and is covered almost all over a with little hills, in the midst of which is a vast high mountain, from the summit and sides of which flow a prodigious number of springs and rivulets of fresh water, clear and light, and wholesome to drink, and communicate a most delightful coolness, verdure, and fertility to all that quarter. This province pays a considerable tribute to the king of Portugal, and is obliged to maintain a numerous militia for his service. The principal governor of it, in our author's time, was called Mubanga, and was lineally descended from the antient monarchs of Kongo, of whom we have given an account in a former section<sup>2</sup>.

16th. Oarii. 16. THE province of Oarii, situate on the northern banks of the Coanza, and contiguous to that of Moseche, is well watered by a good number of small rivers which fall into that great one, but which, in the time of the great rains, become large, rapid, and dangerous. b In this province is the Libatto (D), called Maopongo, which was once the residence of the prince, whom the Portuguese permit to stile himself still the king of Angola Oarii, though he enjoyed little else than an empty title, being tributary to Portugal, and having only a few Sovi, or Sovas, or governors, under him. This Libatto, which we may however stile his metropolis, or regal residence, was situate on the top of a high rock, or mountain, of near thirty miles in circuit, of such a prodigious height, that its top seems to be above the clouds, and so rugged and steep, that it is accessible only on one side; so that he had little to fear from any enemy. The prince, however, kept a kind of mock court in this place; and, in imitation of the Kongoesse monarchs, breeds a vast number of peacocks, a privilege which he reserved to himself; it being no less than capital, or, at least, loss of liberty, for a subject to do the c like, or even to pluck a feather from off one of these birds. This rocky situation of his dismal residence, as it is in other respects, hath, however, one considerable advantage, that it is surrounded with a spacious and fertile plain, watered by a vast quantity of springs and rivulets of excellent water*.

Seized by the Portuguese. THE Portuguese have since made themselves masters of it, in their war with Zingha, queen of Angola, and gave it the name of the Stony Fortrefs. They lost it not long after; but having recovered it a second time, have kept it ever since, as we shall see in the sequel. This stupendous group of rocks, which, at a distance, appears only as a huge d city, surrounded with high walls, and variegated with steeples, turrets, pyramids, obelisks, triumphal arches, and other eminent structures; at a nearer approach shews itself to be no other than a heap of gigantic rocks, parted from each by intervals of a vast depth, and several fathoms wide; and the summit of it appears to be a vast barren and uncultivated plain. The reader may see a fuller account of it in our author<sup>b</sup>, who took a particular view of it: all that we shall add is, that tho' it be near 100 leagues from the sea, yet it abounds with variety of springs of brackish water, very proper to make salt of, and which, rising and falling with the tide, mount up at high water, in large streams, sixty or seventy fathoms above the level of the plain. And what adds to the wonder, these salt e springs are mostly intermixed with an equal number of fresh ones, of clear and excellent water. About five or six miles from this place are still to be seen the sepulchres of the antient monarchs of Kongo, called by the Portuguese Las Pubuillas de Cabazzo. They have two fortresses in this province, in each of which they keep a stout garrison; the one is built at Maopongo above mentioned, and the other at Quitongo, an island of great importance, on the Coanza. The natives are most of them good Christians, and remarkable for their zeal for the propagation of the gospel among them.

17th. Embacca. 17. THE last province, called Embacca, or Membacca, is situate on the north side of the river Lucala, and between that and the higher Illamba. It is wholly subject to the Portuguese; for the Giaga Calanda, who governs it under them, assumes a claim to a kind of independency, yet it is granted to him only on condition that he shall maintain, at his own charge, a numerous militia for their service; those troops, tho' idolaters, being more warlike, stout, and better disciplined, than any in the kingdom; and never betraying any fear f of death when they engage an enemy; upon which account the Portuguese prefer them to all the rest†. And thus much may suffice for the seventeen provinces which composed the antient Angolic kingdom, before the Portuguese made themselves masters of the greatest part of them. We say the greatest part, because there are still some of them which neither pay tribute to, nor acknowledge any dependence on, them, except when they stand in need of

(D) A Libatto, in the Angolic language, signifies a parcel of houses, or rather poor and low huts, built of earth, or mud, and thatched with straw or reeds, and surrounded about with a thick thorn hedge, of a sufficient height to keep out the beasts of prey, with which this kingdom swarms. This fence, which surrounds the whole hamlet, hath but one door, which is carefully fastened every night; without which precaution the inhabitants would be in danger of being all devoured by them in a very little time (5).

a their assistance. Those that own a real subjection to the king of Portugal are the eleven following; viz. 1. Danda. 2. Moseche. 3. Bengo. 4. The Higher and Lower Illamba. 5. Oarii. Provinces subject to Portugal. 6. Embacca. 7. Benguela, in the capital of which the Portuguese have a stout and large fortress, and maintain a garrison of about 200 white men, and a much greater number of blacks, the whole under a capitano *. 8. Scella. 9. Cabezze. 10. Lubolo. And, 11. Oacco <sup>b</sup>.

FROM the brief survey we have taken of the seventeen provinces of this kingdom, our reader will easily form a judgment of its government, religion, strength, wealth, and fruitfulness. We observed in the foregoing chapter that it was originally a part of that of Kongo, The antient and present government of it. and was governed by a deputy under those monarchs; since which those deputies, or governors, had made themselves so far free and independent from them, and had so far enlarged their conquests, as to reduce all those provinces under their subjection, and to be powerful enough to oblige those princes to live in friendship with them, without paying them either tribute or allegiance. They sent their governors into every province, and obliged them to maintain a sufficient number of forces in each to keep the antient Sowi or lords under tribute and subjection, and, on that condition, permitted them to live according to their old laws and form of government. These chiefs had a tribute imposed upon them by the governors, Tribute paid by the chiefs. in proportion to the extent, wealth, fertility, and populousness of their respective districts; and, provided they punctually discharged it, were permitted to exercise the same authority over their respective vassals, as they did before their reduction. Among that great variety of lordships which were in every province, some were hereditary, and others elective, and Some hereditary and others elective. allowed to continue in statu quo; the subjects of the former were kept under better regulations, and stricter discipline; whereas those of the latter were headstrong and ungovernable, and scorned to submit, not only to the slightest punishments, but even to the justest and mildest reproofs of those who owed their rank and authority to their choice.

SUCH was the state of the Angolic government, and the power and authority of their monarchs, at the time in which the Portuguese first came amongst them. They paid a kind of small tribute to those of Kongo, or for the most part rather interchanged amicable presents and embassies with them, without troubling themselves much about the right of sovereignty which they claimed over them; their subjects carried on a peaceable traffick with each other, and both monarchs were ready to send each other mutual assistance, upon all emergencies, Amity and commerce between Kongo and Angola. whether it were against the inroads of an enemy, or to suppress a revolt in any of their provinces: so that, upon the whole, the Angolic kings were little inferior to those of Kongo, when they first admitted the Portuguese adventurers into their territories. How much these have abridged them of their wealth and power, as well as of their dominions, the reader may judge from what hath been lately hinted of the number of provinces they have since stripped them of, but will be still more fully shewn when we come to give the history of those monarchs in the next section.

IN the mean time, as we confined ourselves in the beginning of this, to mention only such articles as are peculiar to this kingdom, it will not be amiss to say something of their commerce with the Europeans, and more particularly of that of slaves, in which it is so well known to have exceeded all other countries on the African coast, and hath furnished the American plantations with so many millions, besides the myriads it constantly maintains at home. It was this inhuman commerce that first invited the proud and lazy Portuguese and Spaniards The Portuguese and Spaniards chief promoters of it. hither for hands to cultivate their lands in their American plantations; to which both the king of Kongo and Angola, especially the latter, gave them such encouragement, that St. Paulo de Loando became quickly the principal mart, and the Portuguese the chief merchants and brokers of that unnatural bartery and traffick <sup>i</sup>. It was with the same view that the politic Hollanders wrenched that emporium out of their hands, though they were forced soon after to relinquish it to its old masters. And here we cannot but observe, that, even according to a Dutch author's confession <sup>k</sup>, the Portuguese treated those slaves which they thus bought and sold, whether from a principle of humanity or self-interest, we will not decide, with much greater care and tenderness than the Hollanders did theirs. For as the greater part of them were brought thither some hundreds of leagues by land, and suffered very much by the way, they never put them on ship-board, till they had rested themselves a considerable time in large houses, built for that purpose. There they plied them with good food and physic, with palm oil to anoint, and wine to cheer themselves up with. If any of them were sick, they were kept in a separate chamber, and carefully attended; and if the transport ships were not ready to sail, they set those that were in health on some kind of work, such as grubbing and tilling some fresh parcel of land, in planting, sowing, reaping, and such-like labours. When they embark them, they take care to provide them with a sufficient quantity of limons, ceruse, and other drugs, to preserve, or cure, them from diseases, and particularly the dangerous one called Bittios de Cu, which is very rife in, and in some measure peculiar to, that kingdom (E); and seldom fails of seizing on those slaves that are brought thither for sale, especially if they stay any time in it before they are shipped off. On board, besides good wholesome food, they are allowed a fresh mat every ten days to lie upon, and room enough to rest easily. And it is for want of such precautions that the English and Dutch commonly lose such vast numbers of them before they can reach the American colonies.

exchanged for them.

THE commodities which these dealers in human flesh exchange for them with the natives are broad-cloths, crimson and other coloured silks, velvet, cambrics and hollands of all sorts, gold and silver lace, broad and narrow striped tickings, black serges, Turkey carpets, threads of all sorts and colours, sewing silks of all colours, Canary and other wines, brandy and other spirituous liquors, oil, spices of all sorts, loaf sugar, knives, large fishing-hooks, large pins three or four inches long, others of the common size, needles of all sorts, little bells, variety of other trinkets and baubles, glass beads of all sizes and colours, rings of the same or other materials, fire-arms, swords, cutlasses, and other warlike weapons<sup>k</sup>.

discipline of the Angolans.

WE observed a little higher, that the Angolic monarchs obliged all the lords under their dominions to maintain a certain number of troops for the common service of the realm; but our readers must not suppose them from thence to be worth much either for their discipline or bravery, their arms or accoutrements. With regard to the first, they are even worse disciplined than those of the king of Kongo, who commonly musters them all at least once a year, on the green before his palace, and sees them make some kind of exercise and evolutions, tho' they are such as would sooner excite laughter than terror in an enemy, or courage in the soldiery. Those of Angola, which are all infantry (for they use no cavalry in their wars) are only a kind of national militia, in which every man that is able to bear arms is obliged to be inrolled; and these seldom or never appear before their commanders, but when summoned upon any expedition, and where the best appearance they make consists chiefly in their prodigious multitude. Neither are those who are kept up for the Portuguese service in any respect better than the rest. So that, tho' their kings could heretofore, and the Portuguese since, raise an army of 100,000 men, or even of three or four times that number, yet it would be no other than an unwieldy corps of arrant cowards, easily broken and discomfited by a few hundreds of regular troops; two eminent proofs of which they gave in the years 1584 and 1585, in the former of which 120,000 were routed by 500 Portuguese, and about twice that number of Kongoese; and in the latter, 10,000 were defeated by 200 Portuguese, as we shall see more fully in its proper place<sup>l</sup>.

fighting.

THOSE over-grown bodies commonly divide themselves, against an engagement, into three or more, for the conveniency of the ground, as the general, who is always in the center, thinks best. He likewise directs all their motions, when they engage, by the sound of several warlike instruments, which the reader will find described in the margin (F). They move

(E) This is a kind of violent dysentery which often rages in this unhealthy country, and is very fatal to its inhabitants, as well as to strangers, who live among them, over and above a great number of others, which they have in common with the kingdom of Kongo, and of which we have given an account in the foregoing section (1). They call it Bittio de Cu, from the inflammation and violent pain it causes in the rectum, which is one of its first prognostics, and is accompanied with a kind of deep melancholy, pain in the head and eyes, and, if not timely remedied by proper suppositories, made of lemon-peel, and thrust as far as can be done into the part affected, is quickly succeeded by a violent discharge of a greyish acrimonious matter, which excoriates the bowels, and causes the most exquisite pains.

In this case they have recourse to clysters of tobacco leaves, steeped for some hours in vinegar and salt, or bruised in it; which, being more painful than the disease itself, the patient must be held by some strong persons to prevent their putting an end to their misery by some speedy death.

The wiser sort of physicians have however found out a milder one, which is compounded of the juice, or infusion, of an herb which they call Orore de Bittios, and rose-leaves, mixed with two yolks of eggs, and some oil of roses; and this they commonly try before they venture upon the other.

They have, however, an easy method of preventing if used upon the first preception of the above-mentioned symptoms; viz. by a timely application of one or more suppositories, made up of lint, dipped in a new-laid egg, well beaten with rose-water, white sugar candy, and a small quantity of ceruse. But as to the poor slaves, they only ply them with the rind of new lemons, pounded with a small quantity of ceruse, or white lead, made into suppositories (2).

(F) One of the loudest of them is not unlike the dull ill-contrived Kongoese drum, with one skin, formerly described, but is beaten with ivory sticks, which makes it give a greater, and, if managed by a skilful hand, a more warlike sound.

The next resembles an inverted pyramid, with the point fixed on the ground, and consists of a certain quantity of pieces of metal, thin and round, like bells turned upside down. This instrument is of such signifiçancy in an engagement, that the persons who touch it with wooden sticks often crack the metal by striving to make it give a louder and more dreadful sound.

The third sort is made of elephants teeth, and not unlike our German flutes, and of variety of sizes. This is much more musical and warlike than either of the other two, and gives a sound like that of the cornet, and with a greater variety of notes; for which reason it is supposed to have been at first brought in, or at least much improved, by the Portuguese, who have likewise introduced the use of drums, kettle-drums, trumpets, haut-boys, and other European instruments, both in the war and in the churches. The kings likewise had them a move forwards, retire, or wheel about, as those direct, and fall on with horrid shouts, and seeming great fury. But if any accident or panic once chance to disconcert them, neither general nor all his warlike instruments can rally them again, nor all the drums and cornets of Africa be sufficient to drown the hideous outcries of one of their flying hosts.

(1) See before, p. 465, & seq.

The military dress of the Angolic officers is much the same with that of the Kongoese, only they endeavour to appear taller and more terrible, by the length and variety of ostrich, peacock, and other feathers, with which they embellish their caps. They fight naked down to the girdle, but hang about their necks, both on the right and left side, several links of iron chain, to which are fastened some rings, of the thickness of a man's little finger, which make a loud jingle at every motion they make, and, for the same end, they hang a parcel of bells about their middle, which they think inspires the soldiers to fight with more ardour, and at the same time gives those commanders an air of pomp and grandeur. They wear buskins on their legs after the Portuguese manner. Their weapons are the bow, sword, target, and dagger; but they that carry the bow are not allowed to wear the target, but only the sword and the dagger<sup>m</sup>. The common soldiery go naked from the waist upwards, and fight with bow and dagger. These are they which fall out promiscuously at first against the enemy, accompanied with a number of stout nimble fellows, who spirit them up with the ringing of their bells to provoke the fight; but both take care to avoid the enemy's arrows, by leaping and winding about, either till they are tired and recalled, or till the general onset begins. In other respects their way of fighting is much like that of the Kongoese, mentioned in the last chapter, to which the reader is referred<sup>n</sup>.

WITH respect to the religion of this kingdom, we have formerly observed that it was over-run with the same deplorable idolatry and superstition with that of Kongo*: but when this last had been in part converted by the missionaries whom the kings of Portugal had sent thither, the king of Angola, then in amity with that of Kongo, sent several pressing messages to desire him to spare some of those missionaries to come and preach the gospel in his own dominions; designing himself to be baptized one of the first, as soon as he could be sufficiently instructed in the principles of it. The king of Kongo would, in all probability, have been glad to second so laudable a design, had it been in his power; but the misfortune was, that he had not a sufficient number of them to supply the tenth part of his own; the court of Portugal sending them to him but sparingly, and the greatest part of them dying after their arrival, through their fatigue and change of climate and diet; and so was forced to excuse himself, and put off the complying with his request till the long-promised supply of a good number of new ones arrived, which did not happen during either of their lives; so that the king and his subjects continued in their idolatry a considerable number of years, that is, till the Portuguese had fixed themselves in several parts of the kingdom.

It was then they began to solicit the courts of Rome and Madrid for fresh supplies of missionaries and other priests, over and above those they had brought with them, and that the prospect of so plentiful a harvest induced great numbers of all religious orders, especially of that of the Jesuits, then lately founded, to offer themselves volunteers to go and labour in this vineyard. Upon their arrival, they all dispersed themselves into the several provinces where the Portuguese were already settled, and thence went to preach to the idolatrous natives with such emulous zeal and success, that between the years 1580 and 1590, they had made above 20,000 converts, who all made public profession of Christianity. Since that time their number hath gone on still increasing, and the kings of Portugal, as well as the popes, have kept sending new missionaries, especially capuchins; new churches have been built in the several provinces subject to that crown, and are maintained out of the royal treasury. Many more, as well as chapels of ease, have been built, and are maintained, at the public charge; besides which the governors of those provinces oblige every Sova, or lord, that is under him, to have a chapel and a chaplain in his lordship, to baptize and say mass. All this appears very considerable at first sight; but when we compare the extent of those provinces, and the length and difficulty of the way, not only between one church, but even between one chapel and another, with the natural indolence and superstition of the natives, who, tho' converts, are more inclined to consult the idolatrous priests and conjurers near at to play before them where-ever they went, and the nobles entertained a number of them in their houses. But the three first sorts are those which the natives chiefly use in their wars (3).

We observed above, that they were of different sizes, those of the largest are appropriated to the head general, whose orders are to be heard by the whole army; the next size is used by those who command the several bodies into which it is divided; and the inferior sizes are for the use of the colonels and captains; so that the sound of the larger instrument is no sooner heard, than all the inferior ones answer in the same concert, and by this method the general's orders are communicated to the whole army (4).

hand, than to go so far to mass or confession, we shall be forced to doubt, whether we have a most reason to deplore or congratulate the state of Christianity in that kingdom. However that be, it hath been long since erected into a bishopric, suffragan to that of St. Thomas, mentioned in the foregoing chapter°. It may be from that see that the first missionaries were sent who brought the gospel into Angola, and began their preaching at San Paulo de Loanda above-mentioned, which was by that time a considerable settlement of the Portuguese, and became soon after the metropolis of this kingdom, and of course was made the residence of their new prelate.

which was the capital of the kingdom.

WHAT was the capital of the kingdom is hard to guess; Pigafet, after Lopez, calls it Cabazzo<sup>p</sup>, about 150 miles from the sea. Jarric likewise calls it Cabazzo in one place, but in another tells us, that the royal residence was at Dongo<sup>q</sup>, which last was the antient name of the kingdom. On the other hand, neither Father Cavazzi nor Labat mention any thing of the latter, nor of the former as a capital, but only as a province of the kingdom<sup>r</sup>; nor do either of these authors take any notice of any royal residence except that on the monstrous rock of Maopongo, lately described, of which the Portuguese have since got the possession. And as they have found means to make themselves masters of the best provinces, is it not as likely that they left free the best cities of the kingdom, and, by degrees, drove its poor monarchs from one residence to another, till they were glad to refuge themselves on one of the ruggedest and most inaccessible rocks in their dominions? Dongo might formerly have been the metropolis, and either have taken its name from, or given it to, the whole kingdom, which is no unusual thing; the Portuguese might have stripped the king of it, and obliged him to exchange his residence for that of Cabazzo in Pigafet's time, and, after a number of years, have driven him and his successors out of all, even from his last refuge, the Maopongian rock.

The kings forced to shift their residence.

The language of Angola.

THE Angolic language is almost the same with the Kongoese, and differs only from it in the terminations and pronunciation of the same original words, in the accent, and some few other accidental changes occasioned by the length of time and distance of places; which difference increases still more, as the provinces are more remote from the fountain-head. This is no more than may be observed among us in every kingdom and state in Europe, where, tho' every province speaks the same language, yet, by reason either of their distance, or other causes, they differ so much in the above-mentioned particulars, that they can hardly understand one another<sup>s</sup>.

obsequies.

SOME other customs they have in this kingdom which are peculiar to them, and which we shall just mention in few words. In their funeral obsequies their first care is to wash and comb the deceased with great nicety; after which they deck them with collars and bracelets of glass beads of divers colours, and then wrap the body in a white sheet. The friends then carry it on a kind of bier upon their shoulders to the burying place, where they place it, in a sitting posture, on a seat of turf, raised for that purpose, in a vault arched over their heads. They then throw some of his household goods, weapons, and utensils into it, concluding the ceremony with killing of some victims, the blood of which, together with the wine of their offerings, they pour plentifully upon the ground both above and below<sup>t</sup>. This we suppose to be only practised among the idolaters, and those perhaps also that were but half-Christians, of which there are still vast numbers. As for those who are thoroughly converted, they bury their dead after the rites of the church of Rome. We are, moreover, told, that some of the idolatrous provinces are so inhuman still as to feed on human flesh, and prefer it to any other; insomuch, that a dead slave shall sell for more at the public market than a live one<sup>u</sup>. These cannibals are, in all probability, of the barbarous race of the Giagas, of whom we have given an account in the foregoing chapter<sup>v</sup>, and by whom the far greater part of the eastern and southern provinces are still inhabited.

Some inhuman laws and customs.

The traffick of slaves the cause of much cruelty.

NOR are the western and northern ones, even those who make profession of the Christian religion, exempt from laws and customs, which, though of a different nature, are no less cruel and inhuman. The abominable commerce of slaves, which they drive on by myriads, seems wholly to have divested them of their very humanity, and driven all social affection out of their families. Parents readily selling their children, or even their wives, tho' pregnant, to purchase a Portuguese commodity, or even a gewgaw; and, for a little wine or brandy, will betray or kidnap their neighbours and relations, and sell them for slaves. The Sovi, or Sovas, or lords, will sell a vassal, and perhaps his whole family, in the same manner, for a small arrear or trespass; and as the Angolans are very quarrelsome and vindictive, they will frequently, out of spite or revenge, accuse one another falsely before the Sova, merely to get their antagonist sold for a slave; whence it frequently happens, that the voracious chief will find out some plausible pretence to condemn both the accuser and accused to a the same punishment *. It fares still worse with those provinces which are become tributary to the Portuguese, whom their greedy governors and their harpies oppress with the utmost tyranny, not only in the heavy tribute they levy upon, and the rapacious manner in which they exact it from, them, but much more in the barbarous punishments which they inflict on all delinquents of what rank soever, not only confiscating all their effects, but even condemning whole noble families to be sold for slaves, for arrears or debts vastly less considerable than what they raise out of their estates and the sale of their families; so extensive is the power which these governors exercise upon them, and so little redress is there to be had from those who are set over them. The Portuguese tyranny over their vassals.

EVERY province, or, as they are there called, Mirindo, is divided into four different ranks. The first is that of the Macotas, who are a kind of noblemen, or gentlemen, of the realm. The second consists of those who are stiled children of the Mirindo, who are the original natives of the country, of either sex, whether merchants, artificers, or husbandmen, who are all esteemed free. The third is that of the Quisicos, who are properly the slaves belonging to the Mirindo, and are the property and inheritance of the lords of that province, which devolve, like all other real estates, to their heirs and successors. The last is that of the Mabicas, who are slaves, either taken in war, bought with money, or condemned to forfeit their freedom for some crime or misdemeanour; and of that the Sova, or lord, is the sole judge, and, we may add, the only evidence, the accusers seldom appearing, and the Sova's word being reckoned sufficient to vouch for the validity of the witnesses. This is no small inducement to a rapacious Sova to condemn persons to this deplorable doom, not only for inconsiderable faults, but, as is often the case, for no fault at all. The Angolans divided into four ranks.

To that we may add another most inhuman custom, which, tho' abolished among the Christian converts, is still but too much in vogue among the rest, and was formerly practised thro' the whole kingdom, as a mark of the greatest respect to the deceased; we mean the butchering a vast number of human victims at the funeral obsequies of their relations, which is greater or smaller according to the rank or wealth of the deceased, and whose carcases are piled on an heap over their tombs. Another inhuman custom.

THERE is still another particularity relating to the morals even of those who make open profession of Christianity; viz. their allowing themselves the same shameful plurality of women that the idolaters do, and with this difference only, that the latter call them all wives alike, whilst they give that title to the first, and that of concubines, or wives of the second rank, to the rest; which is done rather to avoid the censures of the missionaries, than out of any notion that can be preached into them of the unlawfulness of polygamy. In other cases they all live promiscuously within the same inclosure; neither do they stint themselves in the number of them, unless they be so in their circumstances; and this is another melancholy proof of what we hinted a little higher, of the small effects the gospel hath had upon their minds, notwithstanding the boasted myriads that are pretended to have embraced it. Polygamy in great vogue among them.

THE last particular we shall mention concerning this kingdom is their mountains, of which there is a remarkable ridge extending itself north-eastward from Cape Negro, some of which, on account of their vast height and coldness, are called by the Portuguese Monti Freddi, and some others, still higher, Monti Nevosi, by reason of their snowy tops, the waters of which falling in great plenty, during the summer season, form a considerable lake below. Such snowy tops are justly looked upon as a great rarity in so burning a climate, especially as these last draw still nearer the equinoxial line*. But the most considerable one of all is that called Cambamba, about seven leagues east of Mefingon, on which is a mine of excellent silver. The Portuguese have long since made themselves masters of it, and have built a stout fortress and settled a capitaneria upon it, which, by reason of its vicinity to the great river Coanza, carries on a great commerce of slaves†. Cold and snowy mountains.

S E C T. II.

The origin and foundation of the kingdom of Angola, and history of its monarchs; their reduction by the Portuguese; particularly the reign and surprising history of their queen Zingha, or Xingha, and her long and bloody wars against them.

f WE have already observed that this kingdom, or at least that part of it which was called Dongo, and inclosed between the rivers of Danda and Coanza, if not farther, was subject to the kings of Kongo, and governed by a deputy or Sova; but how long it had been so before the arrival of the Portuguese thither, would be labour lost to enquire after; there being nothing satisfactory to be met with concerning their history before that epocha, The foundation of the Angollic kingdom.

and their tradition being too fabulous and absurd to give us any light whereby to disentangle what is truth from what is not. All that can be depended upon concerning the first of those deputies, or governors, who shook off the Kongoese yoke, and erected this province off Dongo into an independent kingdom, is, that he was called Ngola, or, as the Portuguese write it, Angola, who, being an ambitious person, and become wealthy and powerful by the reduction of sundry neighbouring states under his dominion, was easily induced, soon after, with the assistance, or, as other say, by the instigation, of the Portuguese, who were become very numerous there, and with whom he entered into an alliance, to make himself independent, and to assume the title of Jneve or Great <sup>a</sup>. Nevertheless, to prevent his being suspected by the king of Kongo, and bringing a war upon himself from that quarter, which might have disconcerted all his views, he chose to send him the usual tribute annually, accompanied with other presents; and this he continued doing till he had settled himself sufficiently on his new throne, and had secured it to his descendants; by which time he was become so potent, by the conquests he had made of several other provinces, that he looked upon himself as on a level with that monarch; after which he made no scruple to take off the mask, and assume the royal title. What greatly contributed to facilitate his measures were the wars which the king of Kongo had then upon his hands, not only against some revolted provinces, but against the barbarous Giagas <sup>b</sup>, who had made a powerful inroad into his dominions, and against whom he was glad to beg Ngola's assistance, not now as from his subject, but as from a friend and ally. And such they continued ever since, sending presents and assistance to each other, and encouraging a mutual commerce between their subjects (A). <sup>c</sup>

NGOLA lived to a very great age, highly respected by his subjects, and in friendship and alliance with the king of Kongo and the Portuguese; but in what year he began or ended his reign, no author hath been able as yet to inform us; the Angolans, and in general all the Ethiopians, being such bad chronologers for want of the use of letters, that, instead of aiming to preserve a traditional account of the years of their kings reigns, they could only point out the epocha of any material transaction by saying that it happened in such a king's reign <sup>c</sup>. The most that we can say of it is, that it must have been a considerable time after the first discovery of this coast by Diego Cam, an. 1484, seeing the Portuguese were become powerful and numerous enough to assist, if not instigate, the new monarch in his rebellion. However that be, Ngola had got great numbers of wives and concubines, after the manner of the country, but had made one of them his chief queen, and gave her the title of Erganna Eniene, or the Great Lady, on account of her singular prudence and oeconomy, and her particular affection to him. He had three daughters by her, Zunda Riangola, Tumba Riangola, and a third, whose name is forgot, but he had no son by her; and it was his chief care, towards the latter end of his life, to secure the succession to his eldest daughter, and, to that end, he often consulted his beloved queen about the most proper means of effecting his design, which she failed not to encourage with all her power and eloquence. <sup>d</sup>

NGOLA being by this time grown extremely old and infirm, agreed with her that he should send for his lieutenant-general, a favourite slave, whom he had gradually raised to that dignity for his signal services and other good qualities, and since created him his viceroy over his whole realm, to apprise him of his resolution. The artful minister failed not to approve and applaud it, tho' his chief design was to supplant the young princess, and to seize upon the throne. He took accordingly the opportunity, one day, when that princess and the whole court were employed in sowing their lands, with the usual superstitious ceremonies, to spread a rumour that some of their enemies had penetrated into the Angolic dominions, and were putting all to fire and sword where-ever they came. He took care to have the false alarm so well confirmed by several of his partisans, that it had spread itself all over that whole canton, and every one was consulting whither to flee for safety. <sup>e</sup>

(A) The Angolic tradition (probably to take off the odium of their monarchy being founded on rebellion) gives it a much softer and more laudable origin. It tells us that Ngola, its founder, whom it surnames Muffari, was originally an iron smith, and the first inventor of that manufacture; in the improvement of which he had been instructed by the idols or demons of the country. That having, by their assistance, found out the way of forging and working that metal into all manner of tools for husbandry, weapons for war, and other utensils, he became exceeding rich, not only by the use he made of them himself, but by letting them out to hire at certain prices, not of gold, silver, or shell money, which were not then in use, but of corn, fruits, cattle, and other commodities, which were then exchanged in traffick. The country being not long after visited with a grievous famine, Ngola generously opened his store-houses, and assisted his poor famished countrymen with provisions, and, by his charitable distribution of them, saved the lives of some thousands of them, who must have inevitably perished without it. In gratitude for which generosity, and as the only acknowledgement they could make him for it, they all unanimously chose him for their king. His fame and merit soon increased the number of his subjects, and he became the first Ngola of the whole province of Dongo. And hence it is, that the iron manufacture and smith's trade are reckoned among the royal arts by the Angolans; and hence it is also that the Portuguese have given this new kingdom the name of its first monarch, and called it Angola (1).

(1) Pigafet, Labat, & al.

- a In this confusion, the treacherous viceroy conducts the three princesses to the royal palace, and acquaints the king, who was then bedridden, with the pretended danger, and urges him to betake himself to a speedy flight. The frightened monarch, unable to stir, desires him to consult for his safety; whereupon, being a stout young fellow, he takes his royal master upon his shoulders, and conveys him into a neighbouring wood, with the utmost speed and precipitation, under pretence of saving him from the fury of the enemy. But he no sooner saw himself out of sight of those that accompanied him than he set him down, and plunged his dagger into his heart. This was the fatal end of the brave Ngola, whose treacherous murderer did not long go undiscovered. Many of the nobles of the kingdom quickly appeared in arms against the traitor, but soon found his party too powerful to be opposed, and were at length obliged to submit, and suffer him to ascend the throne, without any farther opposition, upon his publicly declaring that he had not seized upon it but with a full design to secure it for the young princess Zunda Riangola.

- b In the mean time, as such a step was the farthest from his thoughts, and he had great cause to fear lest she should, sooner or later, find friends enough in the realm to force him out of it, as she was no less respected both on account of her father and of her own amiable qualities, than he was detested for his horrid treason, he thought it his safest way to wait upon her, and try to extenuate the heinousness of his crime, by representing to her that what he had done was merely to free her aged father and herself from becoming a prey to the enemies of the state, who he knew, better than any one (having governed it during such a number of years) were just ready to take the advantage of the king's imbecility to cause a total subversion in the realm. And that, tho' the method he had taken was indeed a violent one, yet that it was the only one that could enable him to secure the crown to her, which was his whole and sole aim in all the steps he had taken, in order to set it more firmly upon her head, as soon as she should be of age sufficient to take the reins into her hands.

- c THE princess, young as she was, could easily see thro' the whole meaning of his artful and specious speech, but being taught to dissemble by her too just fears and imminent danger, seemed so wholly to acquiesce with all his measures, that nothing escaped from her that might alarm his jealousy; and in the conclusion assured him that she wholly relied on his faithfulness and generosity, being fully satisfied that he could never forget that she was the daughter of a prince who had so affectionately loved and distinguished him. So that several years elapsed without performance of promise on his part, or attempt on hers to dethrone him. At length a sudden death carried him off, and opened to her a more easy way to the throne, and she was universally acknowledged and crowned queen of Angola, and behaved with such surprising moderation and prudence, even in the first years of her reign, as gained her the admiration and affection of all her subjects.

- d BUT her repose was much disturbed towards the latter end of her reign, thro' her giving too great a way to her jealous temper. It was that which prevented her marrying, because she would not have any rival or controuler; and the same mistrust inspired her by degrees with a growing envy against her sister Tumba, who had two charming sons by her husband, that were become the hopes and darlings of the realm, as being the presumptive heirs to the crown. The thoughts lest her subjects, grown weary of being governed by a woman, should set the crown upon one of their heads, gave her such continual apprehensions, that she resolved to take them both off; but how to effect it, was equally difficult and dangerous, whether she did it by private means or by open force. She at length ordered them to be brought to court, under pretence of having them educated under her eye, as her children, and heirs to the crown. But this her sister and her husband Chilvagni Quisama, a wise and politic nobleman, judiciously declined for some time, under one pretence or other; till at length the artful and mistrustful queen found means to prevail upon them to send their eldest son to her; who was scarcely arrived at her court, before, like a second Megara, she caused the illustrious youth to be sacrificed to her jealousy, together with all the numerous attendance that had accompanied him thither, one only excepted, who, tho' covered with wounds, happily escaped, and brought the dreadful news to the princess and her husband.

- e THE horror which seized the noble parents at this report was too excessive to suffer them to express their grief in helpless lamentations. They both sallied out of their palace, at the head of all their vassals, and made the utmost haste to surprize the bloody queen, and found her ready to receive them at the head of a numerous force; but which, at the first sight of the dead prince's parents, quickly abandoned her to their resentment. These did not suffer her to wait long for her just doom; the afflicted mother was the first that rushed upon her unnatural sister, and, having plunged her dagger in her heart, ordered her entrails to be taken out and flung into the hole into which she had caused her nephew's body to be cast. The deed, inhuman as it was, was yet highly applauded by the Angolic states, who immediately conferred the crown upon her, and she, with their consent, as readily invited her husband to share it with her, alleging, that the management of public affairs was more suitable to to one of his than of her sex. Chilvagni, however, had his reasons for declining her generous offers; and, in the most affectionate and polite terms, begged to be excused from accepting of them, to the great admiration of the whole court. At last the tender conflict between them was happily compromised by their mutual consent to cause their surviving son to be forthwith crowned, and to take the reins of government into his hands.

His vast conquests;
and numerous
issue.

THIS young prince, who was named after his father Angola Chilvagni, proved a warrior of the first rank, and quickly enlarged the Angolic dominions, by the conquest of several considerable provinces on the east and south sides. His fame gradually grew so great and dreaded, that powerful nations submitted to him even before his approach, and were proud to fight under his banners. He had a vast number of wives and concubines, and by them a great number of children, and dispersed his sons into sundry governments among his conquered provinces, where their descendants still make a considerable figure, and enjoy the many lordships and governments which he had distributed among them. The reader may see the names of some of the chief of those families in the margin (B). He lived to a good old age, and died highly regretted and honoured, and was buried with great pomp amongst his ancestors. He was succeeded by one of his younger sons, whom he particularly loved above all the rest, and had named his successor before his death †.

VI.
Dambi Angola crowned.

His vile character; and short reign.

DAMBI ANGOLA, that was the prince's name, had no sooner ascended the throne, than the fear of his brethren uniting themselves against him in favour of the eldest, put him upon the inhuman, tho' but too frequent, expedient of putting them all to death. He could not, however, carry on his bloody design with such secrecy but two of them had some notice, or at least pre-sentiment of it, and happily escaped, the one into the province of Lubolo, and the other into some of the most remote parts of the kingdom of Metamba, which joins to that of Angola on the east. Dambi was indeed a monster of cruelty, avarice, lewdness, and faithlessness; and it was no small happiness to his subjects that his reign proved but of short duration; so that he died detested by all, and regretted by none. Notwithstanding which, his funeral obsequies were performed with as great magnificence as if he had been one of the best and happiest of monarchs; and a mount was erected over his grave, which, according to the inhuman custom of the country, consisted of a prodigious number of human victims, which had been sacrificed to his ghost.

VII.
Ngola Chil-vagni crowned.

His cruel ravages and con-
quests.

His liberalities and success.

Fancies himself a god.

Dies childless.

HE was succeeded by Ngola Chilvagni, a warlike prince, but who was ambitious of glory, and would purchase it at any price. He made the most dreadful inroads into the frontiers of Kongo, along the rivers of Danda, Lucalla, Zanda, and Coanza, whose waters were tinged with the blood of myriads, whom he massacred in his excursions. He carried his conquests within eight leagues of Loanda San Paulo, where he caused a tree to be planted, to be, as it were, a boundary of his ravages, near to which, on the banks of the Coanza, the Portuguese afterwards erected a fortress, and called the tree above mentioned Ifanda, or Ifandaura. NOTWITHSTANDING all those dreadful invasions and horrid butcheries, Ngola Chilvagni shewed such generosity towards all that readily submitted to him, as made him as much beloved by them, as he was detested by those who had felt the effects of his cruelty, by which means he was sure to conquer, not only where-ever he came, but even where he seemed to direct his forces; insomuch that, whether thro' fear or hope, where-ever he was apprehended to steer his course, they did not wait till he had entered their territories, but sent deputies to acknowledge him their sovereign, and to implore his favour. His surprising success, joined to the extravagant praises which his parasites every where published of him, had at length such an effect upon him, that he began to fancy himself one of the deities of the country, and to exact the same honours and worship as were paid to the rest, which his subjects were slavish enough to comply with. And we are told that the sect of Singhillos, which is still extant, pretend that his soul, or ghost, is placed amongst their most considerable deities, and sends, or with-holds, the usual rains as he sees fit. He was, however, forced to submit to the common fate of other mortals, and with the additional mortification of dying childless, and leaving no successor behind him.

† CAVAZ. ubi sup. vol. ii. c. 14.

(B) The most considerable branch of his descendants was the Aarian family, surnamed Chilvagni, eldest son of king Angola Aarii, one of whose descendants, named Dom-Juan, was chosen king of Angola Aarii, by the assistance of the Portuguese, and was reigning in Angola at the time that our capuchin resided there, and who gained that election by force, and in prejudice of the princess Zingba, who was the immediate heiress to that crown, and who dearly revenged that wrong both on him and the Portuguese, as we shall see in the sequel.

The next branch of Angola Chilvagni was that of Ngola Canini, whom he had by a favourite concubine, named Canina, and who became sovereign of the province of

Embacca, where the Portuguese built a fortress of the same name, to which they have tacked 50 leagues of land, and left the remainder to Ngola Canini, but on condition that they continue firm to the interest of the church, on which account they honoured them with the title of Lords of the church; and, to that end, have erected the above-mentioned fortress, within two miles of the usual residence, on the river Lucalla.

The last branch worth mentioning is that of Muengha Chilvagni, so called from another concubine, by whom that prince had a son, who took her name, and whose descendants enjoy a territory about two days journey from Embacca (2).

- a THE states elected the young prince Ngingha-Angola-Chilombo Kiekasanda for his successor, great nephew to Angola Chibvagni Quiafama, who proved a prince of such a cruel and tyrannic disposition, that, under pretence of justice, he allowed himself in the most barbarous severities towards his subjects. His extreme rigour in some of his revolted provinces, particularly that of Oarii, so far alarmed not only his whole realm, but all the neighbouring states, that several of them submitted to him to avoid the effects of his cruelty. They were all, however, soon delivered from their fears; and death having put a speedy period to his reign, he was buried with the usual pomp and solemnities, particularly that of having a whole hecatomb of human victims slain and heaped upon his grave (C) †.
- b His successor, Bandi Angola, proved more cruel than his father, and carried his inhumanity so far, that he became odious to all his subjects. A general revolt ensued, in which they called some of the neighbouring Giagas from the south to their assistance, who, like a band of famished canibals, hastened to them as to a delicious banquet, and besieged the tyrant upon an inaccessible mountain; where, being unable to come at him, they resolved to reduce him by famine. This gave him an opportunity of applying to the king of Kongo for succour, whose interest it equally was to prevent these ravenous barbarians from entering the Angolic dominions, from which they could so easily pass into his own, and put all to fire and sword. That prince, therefore, hesitated not to send him a speedy succour; and casting his eyes on the Portuguese, whose valour he had so often experienced, and of whom he entertained a great number at his court, he ordered a strong reinforcement of them to march to his assistance, and gave the command of them, as well as of the Kongoese forces which he sent with them, to one of their bravest and most experienced officers, who, tho' vastly inferior in number to the revolters, and their auxiliaries, yet, depending on the bravery of his handful of Europeans more than on the Kongoese under his command, attacked them with such surprising fury, that he quickly routed them, and made a horrid slaughter amongst the Giagas, and reduced the rebels to their obedience.
- c THE king, seeing himself so happily delivered from his danger, and peace and tranquility restored to his dominions, was so deeply affected with this signal service, as well as with the bravery and conduct of the Portuguese, that he took them into his service, and even into his council, and put such confidence in them, that he did nothing without their advice.
- d Their brave general, especially, became one of his greatest favourites and confidants; but much more so of that prince's daughter, who shewed herself no less taken with his person, when she came to see him, than she had been with his valour and gallantry against her father's combined enemies. She had conceived a strong affection for him, and took all opportunities she could to make him sensible of it; but unfortunately for them both, she did it with so little precaution, that it was quickly perceived by the king, and awaked his jealousy to such a height, that he dreamed of nothing but of her going to throw herself into the arms of the brave stranger, and joining with him and his countrymen to drive him out of his dominions, and seize upon his crown and kingdom. He communicated his fears to some of his most trusty counsellors, who, as is usual in such cases, were but too ready to confirm him in his suspicions; so that, forgetting now all his obligations to those noble Portuguese, as well as to those of their nation that had been so long settled amongst them, a bloody resolution was

(C) Our good capuchin, who is the only one, who by his long stay among them had a frequent opportunity of observing, and preaching against, those inhuman customs, as well as of informing himself about the reigns of the above mentioned monarchs, doth not acquaint us, whence these unhappy victims were taken, whether among the domestics or slaves of the deceased, or whether they were prisoners of war. Neither doth he tell us in what manner they were sacrificed to the manes of the dead, or how their bodies were disposed of, farther than that they were raised up in heaps or mounds over the grave, but whether their flesh was burnt, or covered over with earth, or left to rot above-ground, he doth not inform us (3).

But, in another place, speaking of the neighbouring Giagas, a barbarous race of canibals, he tells us, that they observed the same bloody rite over their dead, and sacrificed more or fewer of those unhappy victims, according to their rank; and that they procured them by making excursions into other provinces, and carrying off all they could lay hands on, for the inhuman purpose above-mentioned; he adds, that whilst the priests were butchering them, the relations of the deceased, and the rest of the company danced round the dead corpse; and that, as soon as that was laid in the grave, they fell to feasting on the flesh of the victims as long as it lasted; after which they reared the bones into a pile, and covered it with earth, and stuck the skulls upon poles, at proper distances, upon the pile, which served instead of a monument (4). Whether the Angolans, who were not yet converted to Christianity, might not raise their mounds over the graves of their monarchs and other great men in some such manner (excepting, in all probability, the eating the flesh of the victims, for which those canibals were abhorred by the more civilized Ethiopians) we will not pretend to affirm, yet are far from thinking it improbable; there being nothing so shocking in the rest of the ceremony, as that of sacrificing so many victims in honour of the dead; which was yet practised through the whole kingdom, till they embraced Christianity, and is still so among the unconverted, where ever they can do it, without danger of being punished for it by their new masters the Portuguese.

agreed on, at all events, to extirpate them all to the last man, as the surest way to prevent a their dethroning him, and bringing his whole realm under a foreign yoke.

They withdraw and retire to Kongo.

THESE violent measures, however, could not be concerted with such secrecy but the princes got some information of them, and apprised the Portuguese general, with all possible speed, who seeing himself unable, with that handful of his countrymen that were with him, to make head against the whole force of the kingdom, thought it most expedient to make the best retreat he could, and with as many of his countrymen as could conveniently join him, into the kingdom of Kongo, whither they arrived, all safe, in a short time, none of the Angolans daring to oppose or molest them through their whole march, though they followed them at a distance all the way. When the king of Kongo came to be informed of the perfidious and ungrateful behaviour of that of Angola, he expressed his resentment against b him to the Portuguese officers in the strongest terms, and in all probability would have taken some severe revenge on him, had he not been obliged to lead his forces, with all possible speed, to the assistance of one of his southern provinces, which was then invaded by some neighbouring prince, and forced him to suspend his resentment, lest that should induce the Angolic king to join forces with the enemy.

The king of

THIS, however, afforded the Portuguese general a fair pretence for desiring the king of Kongo to permit him to sail into Portugal, whence he engaged to bring back with him such a powerful reinforcement, as should put him in a condition of revenging the affront offered to him by that perfidious monarch; though at the bottom, his real aim was to give his master the king of Portugal a plausible handle for seizing on some of his Angolic provinces, c by way of reprisal. But this he so artfully concealed from the Kongoese monarch, that he readily agreed to his proposal, and gave him leave to sail away with all convenient speed.

Obtains an armament from his court.

UPON his arrival at Lisbon, he gave a full account to the king of what had been done at Angola, of the plan he had been there consulting for reducing the most considerable part of the kingdom, and of the specious pretence which the black treachery of that prince to him and his Portuguese would afford for invading his dominions. All which were so well relished and approved by the king and council, that an armament was ordered to be fitted out with all speed, of which he was to have the chief command. A sufficient number of men were put on board, with all other proper materials for building of fortresses, garrisoning and providing them with all necessaries offensive and defensive. The wind favouring him all the d way back to Angola, he arrived safe with his squadron at Loanda San Paulo, whence he immediately dispatched an express to give the king of Kongo notice of his arrival and success. The messenger was likewise charged to deliver to him the noble presents which he had brought to him from the court of Lisbon, together with some others for his principal ministers, to a considerable value. These were no sooner gone, but the admiral sailed at the head of his squadron up the river Coanza, and, without meeting with the least opposition, landed his forces upon a convenient spot of ground, about two leagues off Massingano, a city situate on the banks of the Coanza, near the place where the Lucalla falls into it, and where they immediately set about erecting a fortress, for a place of safety, which they completed in a few e days. It was, however, removed afterwards higher up the river, and had several new fortifications added to it, which brought it almost contiguous to the city of Massingano above-mentioned.

IT was not long before the Angolic king was informed of the Portuguese return, and of their fortifying themselves on so advantageous a ground. He made all the speed he could to get his forces together, and sent them against them. They came soon after to a fierce engagement; but as his troops were such dastardly militia as we have lately described, they were soon routed and dispersed by the enemy's fire, and a vast number of them were pursued and killed, and a much greater made prisoners and sent into slavery. The admiral, following his blow, they ravaged the whole country, put all to fire and sword that came in their f way, and made themselves masters of every place and spot of ground which suited their conveniency; but the king had the good luck to escape out of their hands, and to avoid the dire effects of their resentment; which, by the pains they took, and various stratagems they used, to get him into their power, we may reasonably judge would have been of the severest kind. But what they could not have an opportunity to do themselves, his more than ever exasperated subjects did soon after for them.

Horrid extortions of the king's favourites.

IT is hardly to be doubted but after the defeat and dispersion which followed the late revolt, a prince of his cruel and vindictive temper treated them with greater rigour than ever.
But what heightened their resentment even to despair, was the horrid extortions and barbarities which he suffered the three brothers of one of his favourite concubines to commit every where, not only with impunity, but with such open audaciousness, as gave them cause to believe that he approved of, and upheld them in, their tyranny. How far the Portuguese g might have contributed in blowing the flame of sedition, at such a juncture, we can only guess; but it grew in a short time to such a height, that they came to a general resolution to assassinate

a assassinate him; and, in order to draw him out of his inaccessible retreat, where he wallowed in all manner of debaucheries, they bethought themselves of the following stratagem, which had the desired effect.

THEY sent deputies to him, to acquaint him with the revolt of one Cuculo Cabazzo, who, at the head of a numerous band, committed the cruellest ravages, and to beseech his majesty to levy a sufficient number of his troops to suppress him, or else to give them leave to arm themselves against him. The king, highly pleased to find them so ready to take the trouble off his hands, readily granted them leave to raise what forces they thought necessary, which they did accordingly with all possible dispatch. Four days after they sent again to inform him that they had attacked the rebels (though they had not made one step towards it), and b that they had been repulsed with loss; but that, if his majesty would but condescend to animate them with his presence, the very sight of him would inspire them with such fresh courage, that he should soon see the revolted totally reduced, and himself crowned with victory.

THE bait had the desired effect; and the king, without any other precaution or reliance than his own guards, set out a few days after to go and head his troops, which were encamped on the banks of the Lucalla. He no sooner came in sight of them, but all the chief officers went forth to meet him, and, with seeming joy and emulation, to pay their respects to him, by which means they gradually parted him from his guards, till having surrounded him on every side, they at once fell upon and cut him in pieces. He left five children behind him, the one an infant by his favourite concubine Aongoa-kikilo, lately mentioned, and four others, c a son and three daughters, by one of his slaves. The son of the former was judged incapable of succeeding him, because his mother had been found guilty of breach of fidelity; so that they could not be sure of his being really the king's son. The children of the slave were excluded, by the laws of the realm, from inheriting their father's throne, merely on account of their mother being a slave, for otherwise, both the son, whose name was Ngola-Mbandi, and his three sisters, Zingha, or, as others write it, Xinga, Bandi-Angola, Cambi, and Fungi, had already displayed such amiable qualities, by their well-timed liberalities, that they had gained the affection of the whole nation. And it was by their means that the son gained such a powerful party on his side, as in some measure forced the electors to raise him to the throne, notwithstanding the slavish condition of his mother. Ngola Bandi chosen king.

d THE crown was hardly well settled upon his head, before he began to wreak his resentment upon all that had opposed his election. He began with the Tendula, or commander of the king's rear-guard, who, by his office, is the chief of the electors, and the person who governs the realm during the interregnum, whom he ordered to be put to death with his whole family. These were followed by the principal officers of his father's court; all his concubines, together with their parents and near relations, whom he caused to be cruelly butchered, together with his half-brother, his father's son by a favourite concubine, and then but an infant. He did not even spare his own nephew, the son of his sister Zingha-Bandi, whom she had by one of her paramours; at which she was so highly exasperated, that she swore to be revenged on him in the same kind, as she actually was not long after. So afraid e was he of every one even of his own family, that might one day lay claim to the crown.

THE next objects of his hatred and jealousy were the Portuguese. These he so much dreaded on account of their valour and singular policy, that he resolved to declare war against them, and not to lay down his arms till he had exterminated or driven them out of his dominions. But he paid dear for his rashness; and the confidence he put in his myriads of undisciplined poltroons, against such old experienced warriors, who, notwithstanding their vast inferiority in number, gained a most complete victory over him, and obliged him to save his life by flight, and to retire first into the island of Chiconda, in the river Coanza, and thence into one the neighbouring deserts of Oacco, where, out of their singular tenderness and compassion, they suffered him to live amongst the wild beasts, destitute of kingdom or subjects, or other sustenance than that afforded to him, without, however, losing one grain of his fierce hatred and thirst of blood. He had moreover the mortification to lose his queen and his two sisters Cambi and Fungi, who were taken prisoners, and carried to Loanda San Paulo, where they were however honourably treated by the Portuguese viceroy. As for Zingha, she was not at that fight. Defeated by the Portuguese. His fight and dreadful condition. His queen and sisters taken prisoners.

BEING afterwards informed of the generous treatment of these three princesses, he bethought himself of sending an embassy to that governor, to treat about their redemption, and an exchange of prisoners; which was readily concluded on both sides, and the princesses were sent back, laden with civilities and presents; but the treacherous king found means to evade the execution of his part of the contract, and, by that impolitic step, plunged himself into greater difficulties. At length a new viceroy arrived at Loanda, Don John de Correa de Sousa, a nobleman of great merit, but vain, and ambitious of glory. Ngola-Bandi [who by that time had got possession of the kingdom of Metamba, situated on the east of that of Angola, and formerly tributary to the king of Kongo, and was supported in his new acquisition tion by the barbarous Giagas, for whose abominable rites he shewed a more than ordinary zeal<sup>w</sup>,] was in no small perplexity how to appease the new governor for the breach of articles which he never designed to execute, if he could possibly avoid it.

Sends his sister Zingha on an embassy to him.

He had at length recourse to his exasperated sister Zingha; and, having excused as well as he could the murder of her son to her, proposed the sending her on a most splendid embassy to the viceroy, in order to procure a peace with him upon any terms; and added, that as her embracing the Portuguese religion might prove a means of facilitating her negotiations, he advised her to consent to it for the present, which would intitle her the more to their favour and confidence. The artful sister, without forgetting the revenge she had sworn against him, accepted of the proposal, and was sent, with a magnificent retinue, as a plenipotentiary to the viceroy, and was received with all the honours due to her character, and lodged in a splendid palace prepared for her.

At the first audience she had of Don John, she was not a little surprised to find a stately elbow-chair prepared for him to sit upon, and for her only a rich tapestry spread on the floor, with a velvet cushion embroidered with gold, and placed over-against the chair of state. She concealed her displeasure, however, with great presence of mind; and beckoning to one of the ladies of her retinue, she ordered her to lay herself down on the carpet, upon her elbows and knees, and sat herself on her back, during the whole time of the audience. She acquitted herself of her commission with such address and majesty, and palliated her brother's fault with so much nobleness, that she gained the admiration of the whole council. When they proposed entering into a treaty of alliance offensive and defensive, with her brother, upon condition that he should own himself a vassal, and pay a certain tribute to the king of Portugal, she as frankly told them that such conditions were indeed fit to be imposed on those who had been conquered by the sword, but not on a powerful monarch, who only sought their friendship and alliance: upon which the treaty was concluded on both sides, without any other conditions than the exchange of prisoners. The audience being over, Don John took notice to her, as he was conducting her out of the hall, that the lady who had served her instead of a seat continued still in the same posture. She told him that it did not become the ambassadress of a great monarch to make use twice of the same chair, and so she looked upon her as a piece of cast-off goods not worth her notice.

The princess was so taken with the Portuguese politeness, with the honours done to her, and particularly with observing the order, dress, arms, exercise, and various evolutions of their troops, that it induced her to stay the longer at Loando San Paulo; during which time she consented to be instructed in the principles of Christianity, and shewed such liking to it, whether real or out of policy, that she was baptized with great solemnity on that very year, which was the fortieth of her age. Don John and his spouse were her sponsors, who dismissed her soon after, with all possible honours, loaden with the richest presents, and highly satisfied with her reception and success. At her return she took care to have the articles ratified by her brother, who on his part expressed his approbation of them, and his great obligations to her in the most obliging terms. He went so far as to desire the viceroy to send him some proper persons to instruct him in the Christian religion, which, he said, he was extremely desirous to embrace, and Don John immediately dispatched Don Denis de Faria, a person in priest's orders, but a Negro, and native of Metamba, together with an officer of distinction to be his god father. These met at first with a most gracious reception, and the king seemed to relish the Christian doctrines which the good priest was explaining unto him; but when he came to talk to him of baptism, he altered his tone, and told him and his sponsor, that it was too much beneath his dignity to receive it from a man who was the son of one of his slaves; and sent them both back. His sister Zingha tried all possible means to dissuade him from a step which, she told him, could not fail of affronting the viceroy, and draw the resentment of his nation upon him, but all in vain; whilst all his courtiers cried it up as a princely act. However, that he might not too far exasperate the Portuguese, he consented that his two other sisters Cambi and Fungi should be sent to Angola, in order to be instructed and baptized; which was accordingly done with a suitable splendor, and the former was named Donna Barbara, and the latter Donna Garzia. There was a debate in the Portuguese council whether these two princesses should not be detained as hostages for the performance of the treaty lately concluded, which that monarch still endeavoured to elude; but that being looked upon by Don John as dishonourable, they were sent back with rich presents, and arrived safe at their brother's court.

Renews the war.

NGOLA-BANDI, instead of executing the stipulated articles, followed his own ill genius, and took it into his head to renew the war against the Portuguese, and invade some of their territories; and this last action proved his ruin: for his troops were all cut off, and himself forced to swim for his life into a little island in the Coanza, about a mile long and two bow-

a shots in breadth, whither the Portuguese pursued and furrounded him, and where he had no other chance but either to fall into their hands, or be devoured by the wild beasts with which the place swarmed. But he was speedily relieved from both by a dose of poison, which some of his attendants gave him, and, as was supposed, by order of his sister Zingha. However, he had taken care to send his eldest son to one of the chiefs of the Giagas, called Giaga Caza, beseeching him to take him under his care and protection, and to bring him up to the exercise of arms, and to defend him against his sister Zingha, who, tho' the boy's aunt, would not fail of attempting his life, in order to secure herself on the throne.

He judged rightly enough; for that princess was no sooner in possession of it, than she tried all the stratagems her policy could invent to corrupt the Giaga Caza to deliver him up to her, that she, as she pretended, might give him an education suitable to his birth, and the dignity she designed to raise him up to; protesting, at the same time, in the most solemn manner, and with the most dreadful oaths, that she accepted of the Angolic crown with no other view than to place it upon his head, as soon as she found him capable of assuming the reins of government. She was, it seems, a very wise and artful princess, endowed with a great presence of mind, firm in her resolutions, and of an intrepid courage, crafty to the highest degree, and a perfect mistress in the art of dissembling: above all, she inherited her brother's jealous and cruel temper, and was ready to sacrifice to that the nearest persons to her, who gave her the least umbrage. All this the Giaga was fully apprised of; and this made him give the less heed to her fair pretences and protestations, or, rather, they only served to increase his mistrust of her; so that he held out a considerable time against all her repeated solicitations.

His firm attachment to a nephew, who, she was conscious, had a better title to the throne, joined to the fickleness of the Angolic and Metambic nations, who, she feared, would quickly be tired of her female government, and join forces with the Giaga to dethrone her in his favour, gave her the most sensible uneasiness; but she had still another cause of discontent and dread, the power and valour of the Portuguese, who had, by this time, made themselves masters of the greatest part of her kingdom, and engrossed all the commerce, and had built fortresses on every convenient spot that suited them, and especially near her principal towns, which they could batter in pieces upon the least dislike. This, together with the dreadful apprehensions she was in lest her rival nephew should make such overtures to them, as might bring them over to his interest, kept her mind upon such a continual rack, that she resolved at last to rid herself, at any price, of so dangerous a competitor.

The method she had recourse to to over-reach his trusty guardian, was to renew all her former protestations of affection and zeal for his pupil, and of her sincere intentions of placing the crown upon his head, the weight of which she had long since found too heavy for one of her sex to bear; especially under all the other various difficulties which the realm then laboured under, to say nothing of the remorse she felt for withholding it from the lawful and only male heir; for such, she said, she should always deem him, if she was once convinced that he was, in other respects, fit and worthy to wield the Angolic sceptre. This, she added, was the only thing that prevented her resigning it to him; and therefore it was that she now so earnestly intreated his faithful guardian to consent that she might have an interview with his ward, tho' ever so short; protesting, at the same time, that she would detain him no longer than he should himself assign.

By these hellish pretences the crafty queen at length gained her end; the credulous Giaga was easily persuaded that there could be no great danger in consenting to so short an interview, and sent the unfortunate prince to her, attended with a suitable retinue. She seemed at first to receive him with such affectionate tenderness, as removed all cause of suspicion: but no sooner had she got him securely in her power, than she stabbed him with her own hand, and ordered his body to be thrown into the Coanza, and, by that inhuman act, did rid herself of that dangerous rival.

The next effort, and what she had now most at heart, was to deliver her realm from the incroaching and hated Portuguese, who were now become so numerous, wealthy, and powerful, that they were dreaded by all her subjects. As she was naturally of a martial temper, she did not hesitate long in her resolution of entering into a war against them. She only delayed the declaring it, till she had made all the necessary provisions, and strengthened herself by alliances with the Giagas and other idolatrous powers, who hated those strangers no less than she, and who all readily came into her measures. Besides these, she had got the Hollanders into a private league with her, and the king of Kongo to assist her with a good number of his troops. With all this combined force she attacked the Portuguese so suddenly and unexpectedly, that she gained some slight advantages over them, and the Hollanders much greater, who made themselves masters of San Paulo de Loanda, and soon after of some of the principal provinces of the kingdom, whilst the Portuguese forces were employed against her, as will be seen in the sequel.

Recovered by
guese.

THIS great loss was however recovered about seven years after by their brave captain-general, Don Salvadore Correa, an officer of great experience. He was then at Fernambuco, making all the necessary preparations for that expedition, according to the orders he had received from Lisbon, and set sail on the 12th of June, at the head of eleven men of war, and other transports, and, with a fair wind, arrived on the African coasts, about 16 leagues short of Loanda. Here, whilst he was waiting for some men, whom he had sent on shore, he was overtaken by a violent storm, which scattered his fleet, and damaged some of his best ships; but that did not hinder his making a regular descent, in spite of the stout opposition of the Dutch, tho' not without a deal of bloodshed on both sides. The siege of Loanda was formed presently after, and carried on with such vigour, that the besieged were forced to demand a truce for three days, and to engage to surrender the place, in case no succour appeared by that time. It was well they granted them no longer respite, for the Dutch fleet appeared seven days after the signing of the articles; but the place had been surrendered, the Portuguese been four days in possession of it by that time; the recovery of which was quickly followed by that of all their other Angolic conquests *.

The Kongoesse abandon her.

THE successes which queen Zingha had gained against them proved still more short-lived.
Her allies the Kongoesse were soon after so completely overthrown, that they were forced to sue for peace, which the Portuguese did not grant to them till they had given them a sufficient number of hostages, and yielded to them some considerable posts that lay convenient for them, and which they immediately took care to secure to themselves by building of fortresses upon them. So that being now entirely free from all danger on that side, and having no other enemies but her and her idolatrous allies, they found no great difficulty to reduce her to the last extremity; every battle fought against her was doubly successful, and forced some of her allies to withdraw their forces from her, whilst her own daily lessened, by the great numbers that were either slain or taken prisoners.

Is reduced to the last extremity.

Yet refuses the proposals of the Portuguese.

THESE defeats followed one another so close, that she found herself abandoned not only by all her allies, but by her own forces. She was constrained to abandon her dominions, and to retire into some of the eastern deserts, where the Portuguese did not think it worth their while to molest her. They contented themselves with leaving her for some time to ruminate upon her desperate circumstances, after which they sent her some pacific proposals, wherein they engaged to re-enthronize her upon certain conditions, but such as it was not likely a princess of her high spirit would ever agree to, seeing they would have reduced her to the degree not only of a tributary vassal to the king of Portugal, but of an humble dependent upon his rapacious governors, and their underlings, whilst they left her to enjoy only the bare shadow of royalty. She therefore rejected them with a becoming scorn, and let them know, that however her dastardly subjects might submissively and shamefully behave against them, their queen disdained the thought of submitting to any foreign power. This answer was no other than what they might, and, in all probability, did, expect from a princess of her haughty and martial spirit; and, to mortify her the more, and to render her condition still more desperate, they set up another king of Angola in her stead, to amuse the people with a mock shew of royalty, and to prevent the states of the kingdom electing one from among the princes of the blood, who might prove less affected to their nation than one of their own chusing.

They set up a king in her stead.

John, the first Christian king.

THE person they pitched upon was a young prince descended from the royal family, named Angola Oarii, or Aarü*, who was the son of the old Gingha-Bandi-Angola. But the first thing they did was to oblige him to turn Christian, before they crowned him; and he was accordingly baptized, and had the name of John given to him, which was that of the king of Portugal, to whom he was now to be a mere vassal, with little more than the name of king. For by this time they were masters of the greatest part of his provinces, and had assigned him only so much land in them as would serve him to keep up a kind of mock royalty, and as many subjects as were necessary to cultivate them; and if they allowed him any towns, they were only such as were within cannon-shot of their fortresses, and consequently could not give them the least umbrage; especially as they obliged the inhabitants to become Christians, in order to make themselves still surer of their fidelity to them. John I.
and the first Christian king, did not long enjoy his imaginary and mock dignity, before he was taken off by an unexpected death, occasioned most probably by the grief he conceived at the hard treatment which he met with from his masters the Portuguese, who did not let the throne continue long vacant, before they substituted another of the same stamp upon it.

His death.

Philip, the second Christian king.

THIS new king was named Philip at his baptism, and was obliged to accept of the titulary crown upon the same hard terms that had been imposed upon his predecessor, and proved very complying and submissive to them. He shewed himself more particularly zealous for the maintaining and propagating of Christianity, and encouraging the missionaries and other preachers of it, during his whole reign, which proved a long and happy one, as far as his subjection to a foreign yoke could permit it to be, for he lived to the year 1660.

- a In the mean while the vindictive queen Zingha, exasperated even to fury to see herself stripped of eleven of her best provinces<sup>γ</sup>, and almost of her authority and tribute in the remaining five, which obeyed her no farther than she saw it suitable to their interest, whilst those interlopers, as she might well stile them, ruled paramount in Angola, and had, in some measure, confined her to her Metamban dominions, conceived such an invincible aversion against them and their religion, that she gave herself up wholly not only to all the idolatrous superstitions, but to all the horrid and inhuman rites of the Giagas, and even strove to out-do them in those actions which are the most shocking to human nature (D), and to the most diabolical ceremonies of their Singhillos, or priests. She even took that office upon herself, and became not only one of them, but the very chief of that abominable rank and sect, as the reader may see by what we have related of her in the preceding note. Such was her authority and influence over that vast mixture of them, of which she had composed her monarchy, that they were ready, at the very first indication of her will, to face the most dreadful dangers, and to follow her through the most hazardous enterprises. We have already observed, that the Giagas were, of all the Ethiopians, the most furious and intrepid, and that the thirst of an enemy's blood and plunder made them rush unconcerned into the very face of death. How much more, when headed by such an heroic queen, who shewed

(D) To give our readers some idea of this inhuman and hellish virago, (as she became thenceforwards, if the Portuguese and other monkish authors have not represented her in a worse light than she deserved, on account of her mortal hatred to a nation, who, under the specious pretence of religion, had stripped her and so many other monarchs of their dominions) she was a complete monster of impiety and inhumanity. Her desire to secure the affections of her new idolatrous subjects, especially the Giagas, of whom she invited an infinite multitude, who lived dispersed in other parts of Ethiopia, as well as those of Metamba, to her assistance, in order to drive the Portuguese, and exterminate Christianity, out of her kingdom of Angola; and, the more effectually to gain their affection and confidence, she declared herself one of their sect, and became the head of it, and the most zealous observer of all their impious, superstitious, and inhuman customs.

Her fury and resentment made her so far forget her regard not only to the Christian religion, into which she had been instructed and baptized, but what she owed to reason, humanity, and to her own sex; insomuch, that, during the 28 years she continued chief of that accursed and abominable sect, that is, till she was happily converted, and became a sincere Christian, and deep penitent, she ceased not to sacrifice the lives of innumerable victims to glut herself and her subjects with human flesh and blood. She owned herself, after her conversion, that, tho' she had the utmost natural aversion to that detestable food, yet, in order to draw the admiration of her worse than brutal subjects, she took a singular pride in devouring the one, whether raw or boiled, and in quaffing whole bowls of the other, both at her sacrifices and public meals.

From the same motives she affected a martial and heroic spirit, and an utter aversion to all converse with the male sex, but maintained a great number of the handfomest and lustiest youths, in whose embraces she privately gave a full scope to her vicious inclinations, till, glutted with their enjoyment, she sacrificed them to her mistrust, to avoid discovery. She had the art to carry on these amorous intrigues with such surprising secrecy, that she never could be charged with incontinence; and yet condemned many of her sex to be publicly ripped open, when their pregnancy accused them of it, and ordered their bodies, and those of the infants, to be cast to wild beasts.

But what made her most admired as well as dreaded, was the notion which she had, by sundry arts and stratagems, strongly inculcated into the minds of her subjects, that she knew every thing that was done, and could even penetrate into the very inmost thoughts; insomuch, that those who knew themselves conscious of any crime, obloquy, or misdemeanour towards her, shunned her presence as they would that of a basilisk, or the most dreadful creature. To keep up this apprehension in them, she had ordered the bones of her deceased brother, whom she had caused, as was lately hinted, to be poisoned in a small island of the Coanza, to be brought away from thence, and locked up in a chest, covered with coarse plates of silver, and to be laid on a fine carpet upon a pedestal. She ordered a number of Singhillos, or priests, to burn incense and offer sacrifices to, and to keep lamps always burning before, it; and she herself frequently repaired thither, to assist at those rites, which, as she gave out, and every one believed, engaged the spirit of the defunct, now one of the chief deities, to come and inform her of every thing that was done, said, hatched, or even designed, both in her kingdom and out of it.

To this stratagem she added another, no less artful, and conducive to confirm the people in that notion; which was, to keep a vast number of spies, not only in her capital, but in other parts of the kingdom, who still gave a constant information of what happened within their respective circles, and which she so cunningly improved to her own ends, that they imagined her to be not only vastly superior in power and skill to all the other Singhillos, or pretended conjurers, but even a kind of deity, from whom nothing could be concealed.

What is still more surprising was, that this notion was still rife amongst them, even after she was re-converted to Christianity, and became a most exemplary penitent; insomuch, that, being come one day to the convent of capuchins, which she caused to be built, and being just going to enter the garden, to take a walk in it with one of the fathers, the fellow who took care of it no sooner perceived her than he left his digging, and ran to hide himself till she was gone away. Being asked, at his return, by the father, the reason of his sudden flight, he answered, That having been guilty, some years ago, of a theft, which he knew she would have infallibly discovered in his face, he fled in the greatest fright, to avoid the punishment she would of course have inflicted upon him.

She pretended, in imitation of Tem-ban-dumba, the bloody foundress of the Giaga sect, an extraordinary aversion against male children; and yet would have been glad of one of her own to have sacrificed and bruised in a mortar, in order to make an ointment peculiar to that sect. But as she was past that age, she was forced to adopt one to perform that cursed ceremony upon. It would be endless, as well as shocking, to mention all her horrid cruelties, the many mothers she has forced to murder their male children; the many amorous couples she forced to plunge their daggers into each other's breasts, for what she stiled their incontinency, and other most unnatural barbarities, which are recorded of her (1), if, as we have hinted above, they have not been exaggerated, either out of hatred, or to heighten the miracle of her conversion and penitence, of which we shall have occasion to speak in the sequel.

Her excessive cruelty. herself no less insatiable of her enemy's blood than the fiercest of her canibals, nor less eager <sup>a</sup> to lead them on than they to follow her, especially after they had once imbibed a notion of her being endowed with a superior power and skill above all other mortals.

Hatred against the Portuguese. In this mutual confidence she made many strenuous and daring attempts to dislodge the Portuguese out of their fortresses; but what could myriads of such naked and undisciplined troops do against the ramparts and artillery, the great and small fire of an enemy intrenched or immured up to the very ears? As she found, therefore, so little encouragement to go on with attempts of that kind, she bent her whole force in annoying them in another way, in

Carries fire and sword into their dominions. making continual inroads into some one or other of their ill-gotten dominions, carrying off all the captives, cattle, and other plunder that came in her way, and destroying all they could not take away with them. Dreadful was the case of those, Europeans especially, that <sup>b</sup> fell into her's, or any of her subjects hands, who were sure to be either immediately sacrificed to their fury, and to be devoured by them; or, which was still more tremendous, were doomed to be roasted by a slow fire, or even to have their flesh cut off and eaten before their faces, and themselves to be kept alive, that the extremity of their misery might give the greater relish to their barbarous feast; till loss of blood, and excess of torment put an end to their lives. In this inhuman way did she continue to gall and annoy, during the space of 28 years, the unhappy inhabitants, natives as well as Europeans, that lived dispersed in the country, in villages, hamlets, and other defenceless places, to cultivate the lands; whilst those that lived in cities and fortresses reigned over the poor natives with such a tyrannic sway, and oppressed them with such heavy duties and taxes, that their condition was no <sup>c</sup> better than a downright slavery; and well may we suppose that to have been the unhappy case of the subjects, seeing their princes were, by this time, reduced to such a miserable state of dependency.

The low condition of the Angolic kings. We have already taken notice of two of them, who were set up by the Portuguese, in opposition to the princess Zingha, above-mentioned, but who had little else left them than the specious title of first and second kings of Angola, together with a faint shadow of authority, and a scanty pittance to support their dignity. The last of the two, we observed, is affirmed to have enjoyed a long and peaceable reign (if such a state of subjection can deserve that name), till the year 1660, in which he died <sup>1</sup>. But this is neither consistent with what we have elsewhere hinted, that these monarchs were obliged to refuge themselves on the <sup>d</sup> dreadful inaccessible rock of Maopongo, which we have there described <sup>2</sup>, in order to secure themselves from the attempts of the princess Zingha, their mortal enemy; nor what we are told in another place, that the Portuguese had made themselves masters of it, lost, and recovered it again; all which was done during the reign of Philip above-mentioned, and several years before his death. Whether, therefore, it was that princess that took it from them for a short time, or, which is more likely, the Dutch, about which we are left in the dark, it is plain the Portuguese, who have kept their possession ever since their retaking of it, had no reason to call that king's reign a peaceable one.

The Portuguese sadly harassed by Zingha. NEITHER could they themselves hope to enjoy any great share of peace in their newly recovered conquests, so long as they had such an implacable enemy both to them and their <sup>e</sup> religion, who neither wanted wit or malice to contrive, nor power and courage to execute, the most vindictive stratagems against their mock monarch and them. They had, in vain, exhausted all their politics, either to reduce her by force, or soften her by presents and fair offers. She still rejected the one with disdain, and found means to baffle the other, and would not be brought to any terms, unless they submitted to resign all their Angolic conquests to her. Their refusal, which was the natural consequence of a demand of that nature, was so commonly followed by some marks of her resentment, that it was with the greatest difficulty they could get any person that would venture to carry propositions from them to her; and as for her, she disdained to offer any to them, but those of the hostile kind, and that at the head of her armed Giagas. She had already advanced so far into their territories, that <sup>f</sup> the terror of her arms procured her a kind of free passage where-ever she steered; the people, old and young, making no less haste to abandon their habitations at her approach, than she did to invade them.

Raise sundry reports against her. THIS general dread had been in a great measure owing to the reports which the Portuguese had designedly spread through all those parts, of her apostacy, and her being become the chief of the Giagan sect, of her horrid butcheries, her living upon human flesh, drinking human blood, of her being a forcerefs, and a mortal enemy to all Christians, in order to render her the more odious, and unfit to wield the Angolic sceptre, to which she laid claim. But besides that this artifice only served to inflame her resentment the more against them, it <sup>g</sup> intimidated the natives to such a degree, that they all chose rather to flee from her resentment than oppose her progress, or make head against her; insomuch, that she was so far advanced towards them, as to be encamped in the small island of Dangii, in the river Coanza. This

- a obliged them to alter their measures, and to raise an army of Negroes to join with their own forces to drive her out of it. They accordingly surrounded the island, and intrenched themselves along the banks on both sides of the river; but as these took up a great deal of room, it gave her an opportunity of attacking them with such advantage, that she killed and wounded many hundreds of their blacks, and some of their white men. Elated with her success, she was preparing to repeat her blow, when, to her surprise, she found that they had drawn their lines so close, and raised them to such a height, as to overlook her whole camp, and could, with their fire-arms, let fly upon her naked troops, as if they had been shooting at a mark, and killed a vast number of them, especially of her chief officers. is terribly harassed by them.
- b Zingha finding her situation too hot for her, and her men ready to murmur, agreed with them to retire into some distant province; but the difficulty was, how to cross the river with her forces, whilst the enemy lay intrenched along the coast on each side. But as her wit never used to fail on such emergencies, she had recourse to that, and, under pretence of treating with them about an accommodation, obtained a truce of three days, during which she found means, in the dead of night, to cross the river at a convenient place, and to lead her troops to the province of Oacco, unperceived and unmolested; inasmuch, that when the sun arose, they could not see one human creature upon the island. They apprehended at first some ambush or decoy from the crafty queen; but, upon their landing some of their troops in it, they found it wholly evacuated, and themselves shamefully over-reached, and deprived of the fairest opportunity they could wish for of forcing her to surrender at discretion, and putting an effectual end to that destructive war. Impolitically force her out of it.

- c SHE staid no longer in that province, than till she was assured that the Portuguese were retired from the Coanza; and then crossing that river once more, marched directly towards the kingdom of Metamba, a considerable part of which had been invaded by some neighbouring princes. The speed with which she led her forces thither, and recruited her army with myriads of Giagas, who were all emulous of fighting under her banner, quickly enabled her to recover some of her territories in that kingdom. So that she now began to think herself successful, and powerful enough to make a fresh attempt on the Angolic frontiers. She found herself, however, greatly mistaken, and met with such a stout repulse, as obliged her to send for fresh troops to make up the great loss she had sustained in this last expedition. What was still worse, was the news that she received that the Giaga Cassangi had taken the advantage of her absence to enter Metamba with a numerous army, and had carried off the greatest part of its inhabitants, destroyed all the fruits of the earth, plundered the towns of all that was valuable, and set fire to the rest, and left that kingdom in some measure desolate. She goes to save her own dominions of Metamba.

- d THIS last disaster quickly put a stop to all her ambitious views, and obliged her to lead her forces thither again, and to endeavour for the future to secure her real dominions, instead of going in pursuit of imaginary ones, in which she had met with such ill success. But how dreadfully was she mortified to find her troops, whom she endeavoured to lead back by long marches, in hopes of defeating the enemy, almost ready to revolt, thro' vexation, for the loss of their wives, children, cattle, &c. which had been conveyed far enough, and secured beyond their power of recovering them, even to the farthest part of the adjoining kingdom of Benguela *. Her dominions laid waste.

- e WHETHER the Portuguese had any hand in instigating the Giaga Cassangi to make that dreadful irruption into her dominions, by way of diversion, or no, they have not thought fit to acquaint us; tho' there is nothing in such a supposition that is either improbable or inconsistent with their usual conduct and policy. However that be, the apprehensions they were in, lest that artful princess should find out some stratagem to induce that Giaga to join forces with her against them, put them upon thinking of some effectual expedient to prevent it. To which end, the council dispatched one Anthony Coglio, a learned priest, and excellent negotiator, and Don Gaspar Borgia, an eminent officer, under pretence of negotiating a peace between them, first to the Giaga Cassangi, and afterwards to the queen. They met with a very civil reception from the first, who told them that he was very willing to live at peace with that princess, and even to let her enjoy the kingdom of Metamba, tho' he was the rightful heir to it, provided she would lay down her arms. This answer, which plainly indicated his friendship for the Portuguese, encouraged the priest, who was an excellent speaker, to try whether he could prevail upon him to embrace their religion, which would have bound him still faster to their interest; but he declined it in such strong terms, that he was forced to desist; upon which they took the road to Umba, a province of Metamba, where the queen lay encamped. Two deputies sent to her by the Portuguese; and to Giaga Cassangi.
- f AT their arrival they met with such a polite reception, as gave them hopes of success; but after she had heard their proposals, she assumed a haughty threatening tone, which soon cooled their sanguine expectations; and told them, in the conclusion of her speech, that it Their reception from the queen.

Her answer to their proposals. did not become her dignity to lay down her arms, till she had brought the war she had begun to an honourable conclusion : that as to the Giagas, whose sect she had embraced many years before, and which had furnished her with such a prodigious number of forces to fight in her defence, her honour and interest required that she should still keep them in her service, and under her protection : and lastly, that as to herself, she remembered, indeed, that she had formerly embraced Christianity, and been baptized, but that it was not now a proper season to propose her returning to it, and they ought to remember, that they themselves were the cause of her abandoning it.

Coglio tries to convert her in her sickness. BORGIA easily perceived by her words and behaviour that she was not to be wrought upon in point of religion ; and, shifting the topic, told her in a polite manner, that she had already gained honour enough in war, and that it was now high time she should think of granting peace and tranquility to her subjects of two such powerful kingdoms, and accept of the favour and friendship of the king of Portugal, which were offered to her by his viceroy. To this the artful princess replied, that she was perfectly well apprised of the strength and valour of the Portuguese, and should esteem it an honour to be allied to their monarch ; but that she thought it just that their respective pretensions to the dominions which she justly claimed from her ancestors, and of which he had unjustly deprived her, should first of all be decided, either by some equitable judges, or with the sword in hand. Borgia vainly imagining that he had obtained enough, took his leave without farther reply, and departed soon after for Loanda San Paulo : but left the priest Coglio, upon some pretence or other, to stay behind, but in reality to wait for some favourable opportunity to reduce the queen, who then laboured under some lingering disease, from her apostacy. Her distemper increasing, he took the liberty to visit her, and to tell her he doubted not but that it was sent her by the divine providence, either as a punishment or a gracious invitation to repentance ; to which she seemed to acquiesce, in such manner as gave him some hopes of her ; but these were soon quashed again by her recovery, when she not only relapsed into all her former hellish practices, but obliged him to leave the court, and to return to Loanda, after a six months abode with her to no effect.

The war renewed against the Portuguese. Her defeat and narrow escape. SHE then rekindled the war with fresh vigour against the Portuguese, and carried it on with various success, being sometimes victorious, and at others defeated. In one attempt of the latter kind, before the fortress of Massangano, she not only lost a great number of her men, but had her two sisters Cambi and Fungi taken prisoners, she herself escaping with great difficulty out of their hands. This loss, instead of discouraging, exasperated her the more. She led the residue of her troops, which were still very considerable, into some of the best cultivated provinces of the Portuguese, and abandoned them to the fury of her Giagas, who quickly put them all to fire and sword, and reduced them into a mere wilderness. But still, upon weighing her gains against her losses, she had the mortification to find the balance vastly to her disadvantage, in spite of all the private intelligence she still kept among all their conquests, and even in the fortress of Massangano, where her sister Fungi was kept prisoner.

Her sister Fungi's treachery and death. THIS princess, abusing the liberty which was granted her, out of regard to her rank, of walking about the town, had taken that opportunity to corrupt a great number of malecontents, both Negroes and Portuguese, to seize upon one of the gates of the place, and to open it to the forces of her sister Zingha, who was in full march thither, with a new raised army for that purpose ; but her treason was happily discovered before the day appointed ; upon which she was condemned to be strangled, and her body cast into the river, which was executed accordingly. The queen was sensibly affected with the discovery and disappointment, especially with the death of her sister, which being presently after followed by the defeat of her allies the Dutch, and their total expulsion out of Angola, mentioned a little higher, she began now to look upon herself as completely unfortunate, and to enter into a stricter enquiry than ever with herself, whether those sad and repeated disasters were not the effects of the divine displeasure against her.

Zingha's resentment. She was then with her army laying waste the province of Omanda, according to her custom, when she received these complicated ill news, which awoke all the gnawing remorse she had felt during the twenty-eight years of her impious reign and apostacy, and forced her against her will to recollect with horror all the blood she had shed, and all the dreadful impieties she had committed, in compliance to the abominable Giagan sect. The first signs she gave of her remorse were a visible abatement of the cruelties she used to exercise against the Christians that fell into her hands, and especially against the priests and monks, whom she now ordered, under the severest penalties, to be treated thenceforth with humanity and respect, and to whom she began now to listen with greater attention and regard than usual, tho' without losing one grain of her mortal aversion against those who had stripped her of what she styled her hereditary dominions in Angola, or of her resolution not to sheath her sword till she had wrested them out of their hands.

Her grief and remorse. By this time the noble viceroy Don Salvador Correa, who had wrested the kingdom out of the hands of the Hollanders, and re-established the Portuguese government in it, being apprised of the late regard the queen had expressed towards the clergy, thought it a proper time a to send some capuchins to her, in hopes they would now find her more tractable. She appeared so accordingly, gave them a generous reception, and complied with several of their requests at their first audience; but when they took occasion, at their second, to lay before her the extreme guilt and danger of her persevering in her apostacy, after a deep sigh, which shewed that she was not insensible of it, she expressed herself in words to this effect.

“MAY God be merciful to a princess, who is injured in what she holds most dear. It is <sup>Her artful answer to them.</sup> not my fault that I am reduced to the condition you find me in. I had neither sunk into, nor continued so long in it, under the most poignant stings of remorse that tongue can express, had I not been unjustly deprived of my right: pity my case! If I am driven into utter perdition, it is by those who have driven me out of my dominions. I am but too sensible of my having gone out of the right way; but I must either become the contempt and scorn of my subjects, or still go on in this dangerous path, till those usurpers have restored to me what they have robbed me of. What an unhappy life is mine, to be forced to live thus in blood and slaughter, to get rid of the fetters which they have laid on me? and since I am not strong enough to break them, do you pray to God to do it for me. In that case I will not only engage to return to the true religion I have been so unhappily forced to renounce, but to give you all the encouragement and assistance to propagate and establish it thro’ all my dominions.” These last words, tho’ accompanied with some few seemingly penitential tears, did but too easily convince the good fathers of their lost labour; and so, with her <sup>They return home without success.</sup> leave, they left her court, and returned to their convent at St. Salvador. She offered, indeed, to make them some considerable presents, but these they absolutely declined, as inconsistent with their function.

In the mean time the viceroy, being resolved to secure the king of Kongo to his interest, and prevent his allying again with the queen Zingha, first raised a powerful army, and then sent him word, that if he desired to prevent the total ruin of his dominions, he must immediately make reparation for all the damages he had caused to the Portuguese by his allying with the Hollanders. The reputation which the Portuguese arms had gained during their late wars against that queen, and the dread which they had spread in all the adjacent kingdoms, quickly induced that monarch to comply, and, without any delay, to send some ambassadors to Angola, to regulate and adjust their differences, which was accordingly done, and, in a great measure, upon the viceroy’s own terms. These were, that the king their master should enter into a strict alliance with the Portuguese, and renounce all his other alliances that were prejudicial to their interests. 2dly, That he should engage to supply them with good slaves, in compensation for the damage they had sustained from him. 3dly, That he should discover the rich mines of gold and silver in his dominions, and perform his engagements by a former treaty, of giving leave to have them examined and wrought. 4thly, That all the fathers capuchins should have full permission to preach the gospel in all the provinces of his dominions. And, lastly, That he should give hostages for the execution of every article of the present treaty. All which the Kongoese monarch readily ratified, and performed as well as could be expected from a prince of his fickle character <sup>a</sup>.

c As soon as this treaty was ratified, the viceroy dispatched Don Ruy Pegado, an old experienced officer, remarkable for his wisdom, politeness, and zeal for religion, to the court of <sup>Embassy to queen Zingha.</sup> queen Zingha, with a noble retinue and magnificent presents for that princess, together with two letters to her, the one from the king his master, and the other with full powers to conclude a firm and lasting alliance with her, provided she consented to renounce the sect of the Giagas, and to return to the church. Don Ruy was received with the utmost politeness, and the queen acknowledged, in the most grateful terms, the regard paid her by his Portuguese majesty; but laid the blame of all the hostilities that had passed on the late viceroy, Don Fernando de Souza’s cruel treatment of her, who had not only stripped her of her best Angolic provinces, but had even dared to proclaim one of her vassals, Ngola Oarii, king of Dongo. She added that, provided his Portuguese majesty would assist her in the recovery of her hereditary dominions, she would readily engage to enter into an alliance with him, and to return into the bosom of the church, from which she had apostatized. <sup>Her answer to it.</sup>

f ZINGHA had too much policy to think her terms would ever be complied with, unless it were by main force; and therefore kept her army still on foot, and went on with her usual hostilities and ravages, notwithstanding several other letters which the viceroy sent to her, relating to the old topic, and his remonstrances against the injury she did to Christianity, by supporting so detestable a sect, and hindering the Christian priests from performing the least function of their office, even that of baptizing infants. He had already spent near three years in these epistolary negotiations, without any success, each having their reasons for proceeding no farther in them (E). And as there could be no hopes of inducing her to an alliance, as long long as she insisted on the restitution of her provinces which the court of Portugal never designed to consent to, so he contented himself with plying her with religious motives, as the most likely, if they took effect, to detach her barbarian troops from her interest; in which case she might be more easily induced, if not forced, to court their friendship and protection, and, in order to obtain it, to forego her pretensions to Angola <sup>b</sup>.

Receives a new embassy, and fresh directions.

Her conduct represented as miraculous.

It plainly appeared by the sequel, that he was not mistaken in his politics; for his last letter had such an effect upon her, that her chief officers soon perceived such a visible change in her, as raised a general murmur thro' her army; insomuch, that, to avoid a total defection, she was forced to have recourse to her old diabolical expedient, of sacrificing a number of male infants, to convince them of her steady adherence to their sect. The viceroy was quickly informed of it, but wisely concealed his resentment, and continued, without taking the least notice of it, to ply her with his religious expostulations, and at last sent her a solemn embassy, accompanied with the richest presents, and a proposal for entering into a joint war, in which both their states were mutually concerned. He acquainted her at the same time, with the plan he had concerted for carrying it on; at which she was so satisfied, that she readily consented to it, and honoured him, from that time, with her esteem and confidence. She had by this time reigned queen and chief of the sect of the Giagas almost 30 years, when an accident, or rather occurrence, which happened at the conclusion of that successful war, paved the way to her conversion. The circumstances which attended and promoted this surprising change in her, are, by the monkish writers of her reign, represented, after their usual custom, as altogether miraculous, or rather as such a series of miracles, as we should hardly have thought worthy of being mentioned in this history, were we not well satisfied how easily every judicious reader may account for every one, without having recourse to that long exploded pretence; as any one may be able to judge from their own narrative, stripped of all their glosses, and which we shall subjoin in the margin, as succinctly as we can, for the sake of our curious readers (F). We are more desirous to set this matter in a true light, because 1650, and the last which the viceroy sent to her was dated April 13th, 1651. But as on the one hand it was not her interest to make any steps or concessions that should alarm her Giagas, on whom her whole dependence lay, so neither did the no less politic viceroy think fit to appear too pressing for an alliance, lest it should be interpreted by that princess as the effect of fear, necessity, or any other motive she might take an advantage of (1).

(F) In this war, which was undertaken against some revolted princes that were tributary to the king of Kongo, probably in virtue of the last treaty lately mentioned, among other plunder that was brought away from those provinces, by the queen's forces, a soldier had got a crucifix, of the length of five or six spans, which he presented to her captain-general, and great favourite. This officer, who was a professed Giaga, refused it with scorn, and bid the soldier carry it into an adjacent wood, and throw it into the thickest part of it, where it might not be found any more. The soldier obeyed; but the general, whether in a dream or vision, was stung with the deepest remorse and reproaches, for having thus contemptuously treated the God whom the Christians adored. The dread he was in made him wish earnestly for the day; which no sooner appeared, than he arose, and ordered one of his head officers to fetch it from the wood, to wrap it decently in a clean linen cloth, and to bring it away with all possible care and respect.

His orders were obeyed, and the crucifix was brought away, decently covered, and laid on a cushion; and as soon as the general was apprised of its approach, he ordered his whole army to stand in battle array to receive it, and shew it all the marks of honour as it passed thro' their ranks. He ordered likewise some soldiers to walk before it, and to proclaim aloud to the army, that it was the Zambi, or God, of the queen; and at his arrival at her court, went immediately to inform her, that he brought her, among other spoils of war, the image of her late Zambi, in great pomp, which he had taken prisoner.

At these words the queen found her heart affected with a strange mixture of emotions, which forced a flood of tears from her eyes; and she resolved to receive the captive crucifix, with all imaginable honours, but concealed her motives for it under the colour of complimenting the Christians, who, as she gave out, were very numerous in her dominions. Accordingly, on the day of its arrival, her whole army was drawn up in arms, on each side of the way, quite to the chapel which she had erected and richly adorned for its reception, whilst she, accompanied by her court, and amongst them a good number of Christians, went and stood on an eminence to see the holy relick pass by, which she caused to be saluted with the fire of her artillery, and the sound of all her warlike music. When it was come to the place designed for it, she was there ready to receive it, and, with great devotion, embraced and kissed it, with tears, and set it upon an altar erected for that purpose. After which she bound herself by an oath before the whole concourse, that she would punish with the utmost severity any affront or disrespect that should be offered to the Zambi which she had formerly worshipped.

All these various marks of respect, joined to her frequent and long visits to the place, soon convinced her Giagas that she was become a Christian again; which so enraged them, that they were ready to deprive her of her crown and life: to avoid which, she had recourse to a vile stratagem, which was to have the chest in which she kept her brother's bones, placed on the side of the crucifix, and then to pretend that she went to consult his ghost, as she had been used to do.

This artifice, indeed, calmed the minds of her mistrusting Giagas; but the just cause of offence it gave the Christians, and the severe reproofs she received from them, soon brought her to repent, and to be ashamed of so low a piece of dissimulation. She tried, indeed, at first, by some specious pretences, and fine promises, to induce them to follow her example; telling them at the same time, that it would prove an effectual means to reconcile, by degrees, her idolatrous subjects to the worship of Christ. Their stiff and universal protestations that they would sooner forego her friendship than comply with such an impious piece of hypocrisy, determined her, at last, to have recourse to other measures.

a cause Dapper and other writers, not being able to give credit to all the miraculous apparatus which those popish historians tell us preceded that princess's conversion, nor to account for it in any other way, have given us a very lame and imperfect account of that princess's surprising life and reign. We are therefore to hope that this latter and most shining part of it will not be displeasing to our readers, now we have so effectually divested it of its fabulous monkish embellishments.

WHILST her two councils were taken up in acting the part we have spoken of in the last note, in order to induce her subjects the more readily to come into her measures, she had taken care to have her army drawn up, and prepared to expect some extraordinary result from their present consultations. As soon, therefore, as they were ended, she went out to them, and, with a majestic, yet seemingly joyful, aspect, let fly an arrow from her bow with her usual strength and vigour, and then addressing herself to them, Who is there that is strong enough to stand against my arms, or resist the force of this arm? Upon which they all fell a clapping their hands, and crying out three times successively, O glorious and mighty queen, none, none, will ever be able to conquer you. Upon which she made them the following speech, from the eminence on which she stood: and from which she could be easily heard: "If my enemies have always dreaded me in war; if you have lavished your lives to support me in my most dangerous enterprizes, and given me the greatest proofs of your fidelity, what can hinder you from following me in my peaceful ones? I have often beheld, after the victories

She had two councils, over which she presided as chief; the one for affairs of state and war, and the other for what they stiled religious concerns. This last consisted only of five Singhillos, or priests, of their sect, and the other only of four of her officers; and these nine counsellors she resolved to convoke upon this important point, whether she had best embrace the law of the true God, or continue in the old Giagan sect. She accordingly convened them, and told them that she designed to consult the spirits of her ancestors how to act in that extreme perplexity she found herself in, and ordered them to set instantly about the ceremony, which consisted in certain sacrifices and libations; after which they usually fell into a kind of enthusiasm, and delivered their answers in such a manner and stile as if they had been possessed by those spirits. The ceremony ended, they gave their answers one after another, with their usual hideous outcries and strange contortions, and all of them agreed in their advice to her, to renounce the Giagan sect, and return to the worship of the true God. We shall content ourselves with giving our readers a specimen of the stile of those answers, in that of the oldest Singhilllo, which is the most emphatical, and as dictated by the spirit of her deceased brother in words to this effect.

As soon as he had done speaking, the queen asked the four officers of her other council their opinion upon what they had heard and seen, and their advice how she ought to act. To which they answered unanimously, that the matter wholly depended upon her will; that let her act in it as she pleased, she should always find her subjects ready to approve of, and conform to, it; and think it most for their honour and advantage to follow her example (1).

Here it is that our monkish writers triumph: they not only look upon the remorse and uneasiness of the general for his ill treatment of the crucifix, as miraculous, but much more so upon the forced confession of the five priests: for what less than a divine power, say they, could force the devil, who spoke thro' them, to declare himself in a manner so contrary to the interest of his infernal kingdom? What else but a consciousness of this could have extorted such an assent from the other four counsellors, all alike mortal enemies to Christianity?

But, after all, might not both the general above-mentioned, the Singhillos, or pretended conjurers, and those other counsellors, have been prevailed upon by the artful queen to act the parts they did, by her authority, persuasions, promises, and large gifts? Might not all this whole scene have been contrived between her and the viceroy during their long epistolary intercourse, which, as we observed in the last note, had been carried on ever since the year 1648 to this time 1655? Might not the best part of the rich presents which he continued sending to her with his embassies, be designed, and may they not be supposed sufficient, to bribe those ten creatures of hers to act the farce they did? Was it not the interest of the Portuguese, setting even religion aside, at any rate to gain over to their interest a princess, that had such an absolute sway over the nation of Giagas, their most irreconcilable and inhuman enemies, and to contrive the properest means to enable her to do it with safety? And, in such a case, can it be supposed that a princess, who had been converted to Christianity, could be otherwise than extremely desirous, especially in the decline of her life, and the dangers she was in, to abandon a sect in which she had lived 28 years, in a manner which could not but be, and she herself owned was, abhorrent to her nature? Upon the whole, we can see nothing in this whole transaction, but an artful stratagem of that politic princess, to extricate herself out of the danger and uneasiness she was in; nor is there any thing either surprising or extraordinary in the readiness with which her ten mercenary ministers, allured by her rich presents and promises, undertook, and the exactness with which they performed, a part in which so much was to be gained, and no hazard to be run.

"What advantage is it to me that thou continuest in the Giagan sect, whilst the sacrifices which thou offerest to me do but augment the intolerable torments which I endure in flames that will never be quenched? Why dost thou ask my advice, whilst thou art conscious that thou hast a more faithful judge and counsellor within thee, and one who directs thee to the truth? Thou canst be no longer mine, seeing there is another who calls thee to him, and whom thou abandonest me to follow; neither shall I be any longer thine to answer thee, since thou, from thenceforth, wilt abominate me for ever. Drive me therefore far from thee, and know that I can be no longer serviceable to thee, by my continuing here among these bones; cast them far from thee, together with the sad remembrance of thy having worshipped me before them." At these last words he gave a furious kick with his foot against the chest that held her brother's bones, and fell down half dead upon the floor.

The other four having acted much the same farce, and added several hints in commendation of the Portuguese, and their religion, the first Singhilllo assuming, as before, the spirit of her brother, after some grievous reproofs for her apostacy, closed the whole, with these words, in a much milder tone. Oh my dear sister! since thou canst not now be ignorant of the deplorable state I am eternally doomed to, be warned by it to repent and reform. O Zingha, my dear sister! take the noble resolution this day to accept of the peace which is offered to thee by the Por-

" I have hitherto gained; the field of battle covered with a greater number of my slain subjects, than of the enemy; so that I never gained a battle but what cost the lives of myriads of my faithful troops. Hurried by my blind passion, I shut my eyes against that truth, which I ought rather to have sought. But thanks to the true God, they are open now; and I return to him that heart and affection which I have hitherto so impiously withheld from him; and I now beg of his infinite goodness a firm and inviolable peace, in order to make those partakers of it, who have followed me through all the past tumults of war.

Owns her apostasy and re-conversion to Christianity.

" I do now freely and sincerely return to that faith and religion which I have so unhappily abandoned, to my inexpressible hurt, and that of those who have followed my example. I do, and shall ever henceforth, detest the impious Giagan sect, totally proscribe it from my presence and dominions; and if I have shewed myself exact in the observance of its horrid rites, much more so do I design to be in the observance of those of the holy gospel, to the end that my example may excite you to the same amendment of your lives. As you have, therefore, been the slaves of my capricious will, and have so often hazarded your lives, out of an immoderate desire of pleasing me, I now invite you, and shew you the way, to an eternal rest, and the blessings of an endless peace. Who is there that can reject the offers I make to you? though if there be any among you that dislikes or abhors me for what I have said, I am content that he should henceforth avoid and abandon me."

Perplexity about the success of it,

Thus spoke the intrepid queen to her whole army; tho', notwithstanding her last words, she was not without some great perplexity about the issue of so unexpected a declaration. Nor could she well hope that the proposals of an endless rest and peace should be easily relished by a nation nurtured in all the licentiousness of war and slaughter. Yet so strong and firm did their attachment to her shew itself upon this occasion, that she quickly found all her fears dispelled by their universal acclamations, which she could not but look upon as dispipated by their joyful shouts.

Embassy to the viceroy.

a happy omen of their speedy conversion. She lost no time to communicate the joyful news to the viceroy of Angola, by a particular express, and not long after by a solemn and pompous embassy, in which she intreated him to pass an act of oblivion on all her former misbehaviour, to restore her to the good graces of the king his master, to send her back her sister Donna Barbara (seeing her sister Fungi had been so justly taken off for her crime), and with her some capuchins, to complete the good work she had begun with such unexpected success.

THE eagerness she expressed in her request, joined to the surprising news of her subjects readiness to join in with, and approve of, all her measures, failed not to cause some diffidence in such of the viceroy's council, to whom her former artful behaviour and fickle temper gave but too much occasion for it. But the generous viceroy, disdaining to entertain any mistrust of her, readily complied with all her requests, exhorting her to continue steadfast in her good resolutions, and, upon that condition, assuring her of his Portuguese majesty's inviolable friendship and alliance. And as to Donna Barbara, he only insisted upon 200 slaves for her ransom, 120 of whom should be for the king, and the other 80 for himself and the officers under him; or, if she chose it rather, an equivalent in money. The fathers capuchins, so earnestly desired by her, were sent with all possible diligence, with father Antony de Gaeta at their head, a person of great piety and merit, and highly respected by the queen, and who was now constituted prefect of the Metambic mission, by a charter, dated April 8, 1656, and arrived quickly after at the fortress of Massangano, where the princess Barbara was kept prisoner till the ransom was paid, and the treaty signed by her sister<sup>d</sup>.

Her tardiness to comply.

THE queen had, it seems, been more tardy than was expected in the performance of those articles; and it is hardly to be doubted but she shewed a great reluctance against giving up her rich Angolic dominions to the Portuguese, and confining herself to the wild and barren ones of Metamba; and yet she was to expect neither favour nor alliance from them on any other terms. They held her sister still prisoner, tho' they paid her all the outward respect due to her quality, and had removed her from Massangano to Embacca, their remotest frontier on the river Lucalla, there to be detained till the arrival of her ransom, at which she expressed no small displeasure; but they excused themselves by throwing the blame on her sister's neglect of performing her engagements. She had, indeed, so little stomach to do it, that when captain Emanuel Flois arrived at her court from the viceroy, to press her upon that head, she loudly complained of their diffidence, and the detention of her sister, and, on his second audience, threatened them with a more dreadful war than any she had yet waged against them<sup>e</sup>.

And reasons for it.

Flois sent ambassador to her, and is dreadfully menaced.

THIS strange behaviour the ambassador imagined to have been forced upon her by her ministers, who were utterly averse to the new treaty she had made with Portugal; and well they might, if the cession of the Angolic provinces was to be an indispensable condition of it; in

He endeavours to pacify her.

- a some of the richest of which they would have gladly followed her, could she have obtained the restitution of them. But had not the queen much greater reason to resent the refusal, and to avoid the cession of them, than any of her ministers? She gave him accordingly such sensible tokens of her displeasure and dissatisfaction, as left him no room to doubt of their being real; so that dreading now more than ever the effects of them, he was obliged to alter his tone, and instead of pressing her upon that sensible article, he tried all possible means to soothe her, and to excuse the viceroy's detaining of her sister, not as a prisoner, but as an hostage; a method practised by all European princes. However, as she gave no answer to all his plausible palliatives, but a very deep sigh, he immediately dispatched a courier, with the news, to the viceroy, who being no less alarmed at them, sent express orders to the good father Antony above mentioned, who was then at Embacca with Donna Barbara, to hasten to the queen, and to use his utmost endeavours to bring her into a better mind <sup>f</sup>.

THE good man, tho' at that time very ill by the change of climate, delayed not to obey; and as he had sent an express to the queen to apprise her of his coming, she received him with all the marks of honour, and went, at the head of a numerous court, out of Chilombo, where she then resided, to receive him. She likewise ordered all the people to come out and line the way from the eminence, where she met him, and to kneel down to him as he passed by them. She herself, as soon as she perceived him near enough to hear her, bowed herself lowly to him, and cried, Blessed and welcome be the minister of the true God: you have my hearty thanks, my good father, for coming to me, which gives me an assurance that I shall, by your means, be reconciled to my God, and restored to the peace of conscience which I had lost. And so saying, she tenderly kissed the crucifix which he held to her, and, after several other acts of devotion, took him by the hand, and conducted him to her palace. There, being seated on a throne erected for that purpose, she caused him to sit down close to her on her right hand, and the ambassador Flois at some distance on her left, whilst the rest of the court stood up at a still greater distance from her.

- WE should not dwell so long on these instances of female zeal, were it not that they plainly shew that she was under no restraint from her ministry, nor afraid of testifying the deepest regard to Christianity and the preachers of it, before her whole court and army, as the Portuguese would insinuate; but that the true obstacle to her ratifying the treaty was her extreme aversion to the article above mentioned; she judging it, as she explained herself once before, unworthy of her dignity and character, tamely to resign her right to an usurper, whilst she had it in her power to wrench it from him by force of arms <sup>g</sup>. Accordingly, when the good old father came to try his Christian eloquence, in order to induce her to it, by religious motives, that is, as may be reasonably supposed, to persuade her to forego a temporal kingdom, for the sake of an eternal one, she answered him only by her sighs and tears. However, if we may believe our author <sup>h</sup>, his discourse had such an effect upon her, that she found her mind quite eased from the worldly considerations which her ambition and false politics had crowded into it, so that she immediately set about dispatching her sister's ransom to the viceroy. How the grand article about the Angolic provinces was settled upon this occasion, we are not told: each party had their pretensions, and those of the queen were certainly the justest; but her antagonists were the most powerful, as well as most tenacious; so that not being able to conclude a firm and lasting peace with her, they contented themselves, for the present, to strike up a short truce, till their differences could be adjusted. But even in this we may reasonably suppose that she was forced to submit to their terms, partly thro' necessity, and partly from the religious motives which her capuchin father had inspired her with.

- AND now it was that matters began to assume a new face. The princess Barbara, after a long and tedious detention, was released and sent home with all the marks of honour, and very valuable presents. Upon her entrance into her sister's dominions, she was received with extraordinary magnificence; all her subjects expressing their excessive joy by music, dancing, and panegyric sonnets; they had provided a stately palanquin to convey her in, and persons of all ranks were contending all the way, with the utmost eagerness, for the honour of carrying her. Her shortest way to court being thro' the province of Souva, where the roads are extremely difficult, and, in some parts, almost impassable, care had been taken to have them made as convenient as possibly they could. At her arrival at court, she was received by all the queen's officers, civil and military, and with the loudest shouts of the people. As soon as she came in sight of her sister, she alighted out of her palanquin, and threw herself prostrate on the ground; after which she arose, and marched directly to her, and, on her knees, kissed her hands, and thanked her for all her favours; whilst she, throwing her arms about her, held her for some time, without being able to speak or move, they not having seen one another during the space of nine years. The rejoicings which were made upon that

As soon as the festivity was ended, the queen, who had now lost all hopes, and, in all appearance, even the desire, of recovering her Angolic provinces, began to bend her whole mind to propagating the gospel among her subjects. The capuchins, who were now become her chief counsellors, especially father Antony, had so effectually alienated her heart from all her ambitious and warlike projects, that she seemed wholly to have devoted the short remainder of her life to the solid establishment of Christianity within her own dominions, and to illustrate it by her own example. Her sister, Donna Barbara, who had been likewise converted to Christianity, as we have elsewhere hinted, during her first five years captivity, and had spent nine more in her second among the Portuguese, expressed no less zeal towards that good and glorious work. So that all her tumultuous thoughts and views seemed wholly swallowed up in religion, and she was now more than ever at leisure to listen to the instructions of her spiritual guides; and these had so perfectly reconciled her to the Portuguese, that she looked upon them as her best friends (G), whom before she abhorred as the usurpers of her hereditary dominions, and there reigned a perfect harmony between her and them.

SHE was very desirous to have a church built in her capital; but as it would have taken up too much time to procure proper workmen and materials from Portugal, her impatience induced her to take up with one of timber, the direction of which she committed to the care of father Antony, and granted him a sufficient number of slaves to assist him and his workmen in it, and an absolute power over both, that they might obey him in every thing. But as none of them had been used to any other building than to erect a few strait posts in the ground, lay cross beams over them, and some coarse kind of timber roof over the whole, covered either with straw or palm leaves, the edifice came vastly short of what the good father designed it. It was 70 palms in length, 29 in breadth, and 25 in height (H); the walls were of mud, white-washed within and without, and the floor covered with curious mats, woven with white and black chequer work, and some other neat ornaments. The chancel, where the great altar stood, was covered with rich tapestry, which the queen gave out of her own wardrobe. The altar, on which was to be placed the crucifix lately mentioned<sup>1</sup>, (to which one of the capuchins had made a handsome new cross) was also covered with some rich tapestry. A beautiful painting of the Virgin Mary, drawn after that of St. Maria Maggiore at Rome, was the altar-piece, and highly admired by the natives, who came in crouds to see it; which gave the fathers an opportunity of explaining some articles of Christianity to them. All things being got ready with all possible dispatch, both the church and city were dedicated to the Virgin Mary; and after the consecration of the former, the latter took the name of St. Mary of Metamba.

THE ceremony having been performed with all possible pomp, amidst a vast concourse of people, great numbers, after the example of their queen, came voluntarily to the church, and begged to be instructed and baptized; but were obliged, before their admission, to promise never to converse, after baptism, with any idolaters; and had, accordingly, a certain canton of the city assigned to them by that cautious princess. Soon after this she caused an edict to be published thro' the kingdom, expressly forbidding the following pieces of heathenism, then in vogue, under the severest penalties.

1st. THE invocation and consultation of dæmons, and offering sacrifices to them or their idols.

2dly. THE pregnant women going out of the cities, camps, or villages, to expose their infants in the fields.

3dly. THAT they should not use any of their old superstitious rites upon their new-born infants, but bring them to church to be baptized.

4thly. THAT female children should not be excluded from baptism, or other benefits of the church; but that they, as well as the males, should enjoy them alike; and that the adult of both sexes should be instructed and baptized.

(G) This, however strange it may seem, all things duly weighed, is what our good capuchin assures us of, both from her letters to the viceroy, and her behaviour towards all of that nation who came to her court. He adds, that, in her more facetious entertainments with them, she used to say, that the family of Souza, whose surname was given to her at her baptism, had first given her a spiritual life, and next to that a civil death, and, last of all, a resurrection. By which she meant, that Don John Correa de Souza had persuaded her, by his pious eloquence, to embrace the Christian religion, when she was at Loanda: that Don John Ferdinand de Souza had doomed her to death in stripping her of her dominions, and obliging her to seek for shelter among the sect of Giagas; but that Don Salvador Correa de Souza had now raised her again to life, by restoring her dear sister to her, which had proved a powerful motive to her to renounce the Giagan sect, and return into the pale of the church (2).

(H) The Portuguese palm is about eight inches and a quarter.

a 5thly. THAT none of her subjects, whether male or female, should eat any human flesh of any kind.

6thly. THAT none should keep any of their old images and other idolatrous utensils by them, but either burn them, or deliver them up to the missionaries.

7thly. THAT none should from thenceforth use any of the old methods and abominable rites in their oaths or forms of swearing<sup>k</sup>.

THE severity she used in punishing all delinquents, and those that winked at them, joined to the facility with which she discovered them by the numerous spies she had every where, of which we have formerly given some hints*, quickly enforced a strict obedience to this edict. But there were two other enormous abuses still to be reformed, which did not meet with the b like ready compliance, because they were most in vogue among the great ones. The one was the enormous plurality of women, in which they indulged themselves, and the other the tyranny of the lords, who did not allow their vassals to marry without their licence, for which they made them pay very dear. The abolishing of the first was the depriving them of a pleasure, and that of the second, of an income, which they were not likely to forego without great murmuring and discontent, if it did not stir them up to a revolt.

THE first of these, however, she easily brought about by her condescending, though with great difficulty, at the earnest persuasion of father Anthony, to shew an example to the rest in her own person, and consenting to marry a young handsome courtier, named Don Salvador, but of mean birth, being no more than the son of a slave, who had fled from Loanda, and had lifted himself in her service, in which he had raised himself to a considerable rank by this time. The handsomeness of his person, however, was thought to make sufficient amends for the lowness of his birth, and she disdained not to be married to him, in the most public manner, in her new church, and with great pomp and solemnity; and, after the ceremony was over, to declare him her lawful husband, in the presence of her whole court. And this was looked upon so much the more extraordinary, as she was then in the 75th year of her age, and consequently past the want of a husband. And not content with shewing a good example in her own person, she likewise obliged her beloved sister to do the like, and, much against her inclination, to take up with the old general, who had acted a part in the stratagem of the pretended miracle of the crucifix (I). This old warrior, naturally haughty, cruel, and peevish, no sooner saw himself master of a princess who was to be heiress to the crown, than he suffered his arrogance to swell to a degree not of contempt only, but of cruelty towards her; insomuch, that she was forced to acquaint her sister with it, telling her, that the captivity she had suffered under the Portuguese was a heaven to what she did under him. But what was the most surprising to the whole court was, that the vindictive queen, who, some months before, would have sent for him at the first complaint of that nature, and ordered him to be cut in pieces before her, did not so much as show the least resentment against him, lest he should occasion some revolt; and contented herself with declaring, that, for the future, she would never concern herself in matrimonial affairs, but let every one marry according to their own liking (K). This was, indeed, a very likely means to induce her

(I) It will be proper, for the better understanding of what is to follow, to acquaint the reader that she had at first pitched upon a young nobleman of the royal blood for her husband, with whom she was so well pleased, that she consented to be conveyed to his house, and bedded with him before the marriage ceremony; the consummation of which was prevented by a sudden fit of sickness, during which he was found to have another wife still alive. This obliged the queen to break off the match by her absolute authority, though much against their wills, and to look out for another husband for her.

In the mean time, her old general, who had been concerned in the ill treatment of the crucifix, mentioned in a former note, but was since retired upon some discontent, being informed of the matter, made no scruple to offer himself to the queen as a fit husband for her sister, in consideration of his former services; to which she, with great reluctance, consented (1).

(K) This strange behaviour, in so haughty and vindictive a queen, our author ascribes to the good effects which religion had wrought on her mind. But if we examine every circumstance more nearly, we shall soon find that there was some other powerful motive that obliged her to suppress her resentment.

First, We find him withdrawn from the court and army, under some discontent, soon after his part in the matter of the crucifix: and what can we ascribe it to, but to the displeasure which that old idolater conceived at the ill use he found her make of it, contrary to what he had expected; and that she made it a handle for abandoning of the Giagan sect, and introducing of the Portuguese religion, which was equally hated by him as the nation that professed it.

2dly. Whence could his extreme boldness arise, in not only offering himself a candidate for the princess, but in demanding her as a due reward for his former services? A boldness against which the queen, at first, expressed the utmost indignation, not only on account of his old age, and his ill qualities, but likewise of his low birth, from which her favour had raised him, to a height which did more than amply reward all his former services.

3dly. What could induce that otherwise intrepid and haughty queen to consent to a match which was so dishonourable to her, and so professedly abhorred by her sister? And what could induce her to force a person whom she so tenderly loved into the embraces of an old weather-beaten, ambitious, and ill-natured malecontent? But if the part she had induced him and the other memmale subjects to be contented with one wife, whilst her female ones would be no less pleased to enjoy each her own husband wholly to themselves; so that, partly by her persuasions and example, and partly by the pious endeavours of her capuchins, she had the pleasure to see her edict against polygamy generally complied with, and those persons severely punished who did not conform to it.

SHE expected to meet with much greater opposition in suppressing the other, and did so accordingly: and it was not without great difficulty and heart-burning that those lords, or petty tyrants, were brought to forego so great and profitable a privilege over their vassals. But her address, authority, and steady resolution, at length got the better of their averseness; and she was the less apprehensive of any insurrection, such as they seemed to threaten, as she was sure it was the interest of all her inferior subjects to support her in the abolition of an old custom, which had been so burthensome and grievous to them.

The great progress of the gospel.

A large comet appears, which is followed by a plague, earthquakes,
and famine.

THUS far every thing succeeded to her wish; and what seemed to give her the greatest pleasure, she beheld the visible progress which Christianity had made, within less than two years, among her subjects, and the zeal they shewed in conforming to it, notwithstanding their innate barbarity, which gave her hopes that she might live to see it happily spread thro' all her dominions. This hopeful calm was, however, strangely troubled by several dreadful calamities, which succeeded each other quickly after. A threatening comet, of an extraordinary bigness, and a fiery aspect, ushered in a most dreadful storm, accompanied by thunder and lightening from the four quarters of the atmosphere, which overturned all that opposed its way, tore up the largest trees by the roots, and did a considerable deal of damage. This was followed by violent and repeated shocks of earthquakes, which tore up the rocks, and left hideous large chasms, in several parts of the kingdom, of unfathomable depth. These were followed by a general famine and contagion, which carried off myriads of the poor people, and made the rest surmise that the short truce which they had enjoyed, the fruits of which they began to relish, would quickly be succeeded by some bloody war, especially as the peace that had been negotiating with the Portuguese was still unsigned and unconcluded; and, what was still worse, in no likelihood of being so: the reader will easily see where the fault lay, when he is told, that the terms upon which the Portuguese offered to grant it to the queen, were those that follow <sup>m</sup>.

Portuguese
articles offered to the queen.

1st. THAT as soon as they were well assured of the sincerity of her conversion, they would yield to her, as a present, some of those countries in the kingdom of Dongo, or Angola, which they were in possession of.

2<sup>dly</sup>. THAT, in consideration of the said present, which should in no-wise be interpreted as an investiture, the queen should pay yearly a certain acknowledgement to the king of Portugal, who should be at liberty to withdraw the said present whenever she failed of making the said acknowledgement.

3<sup>dly</sup>. THAT a free commerce should be opened between those two states, as well for slaves as for other merchandizes.

4<sup>thly</sup>. THAT the queen should molest none of the lords that were feudatory to his majesty, whatever damages and ravages they might have committed in her dominions of Metamba, during the late wars between them.

5<sup>thly</sup>. THAT she should restore all the Portuguese slaves that had refuged themselves within her dominions.

6<sup>thly</sup>. THAT she should deliver up the Giaga Colanda, who had revolted from the Portuguese, to the viceroy of Angola, upon assurance being given her that his crime should go unpunished (L).

Her displeasure at them.
Falls sick.

THE queen, as well she might, conceived such displeasure at these conditions, so opposite to what she had been made to expect from the generosity of the Portuguese, that she relapsed into her old distemper, which was a violent fever attended with an inflammation; during which father Anthony, her chief confidant, and a creature of the viceroy, never left off sol-

bers of her two councils to act, was, instead of a miracle, only a mere farce and stratagem to allure her subjects into her new measures, what cause had she not to dread that her refusal would exasperate him into a full discovery of the whole artifice, and afford him a sufficient pretence for raising a general revolt (3)?

(L) This Giagan chief, weary of the Portuguese yoke, had retired from them at the head of 1000 stout soldiers, and a much greater number of slaves, some leagues beyond the river Lucalla, and put himself under the queen's protection; which she had the more readily granted to him, as he was able to be very serviceable to her, by his incursions on the Portuguese, in case their ungenerous treatment of her should oblige her to renew the war against them.

She therefore could not but look upon it as a hard, unjust, and dishonourable act, to deliver up a brave chief, who had devoted himself to her service, and whom she had taken under her special protection, to the mercy of a nation, whose honour and faith all their former behaviour to her, and especially these last six articles, had given her so much cause to mistrust (4). The sequel will shew how much more nobly that prince acted than they upon this juncture.

(3) De his, vid. Cuvaz. ap. Labat, lib. iv. p. 146, & seq. (4) Iidem ibid. p. 165.

a liciting her, in the strongest terms, to make her peace with God, and to accept of that which was offered to her by the Portuguese. The former, we are told, was complied with in a manner that was greatly edifying to all her court; and to the latter she gave an answer no less worthy of so great a princess; it was to the following purpose.

1st, "THAT as to her conversion, as it was neither owing to any design of obtaining a peace, or other worldly motives, but the divine grace that recalled her, she was resolved to persevere in it to her last breath." Noble answer to the articles.

2dly. "THAT as to her going over to the Giagan sect, she had, in a great measure, been forced to it, by the ill treatment she had received from the then viceroy."

b 3dly. "THAT the king of Portugal would do a generous act in restoring some of her Angolic dominions; but it would be still a more noble and royal one, if he restored them all to her."

c 4thly. "THAT as to her paying homage to him, neither her mind nor heart were base enough to submit to it; and that, as she had refused the proposal whilst she lived amongst the Giagas, much more did she think herself above it now she was a Christian queen, and owed neither tribute nor homage to any but to the Supreme Power, from whom she had received both her being and her kingdom. That nevertheless, if she could be convinced that there was any thing in her dominions that would be acceptable to his Portuguese majesty, she would readily make a voluntary offer of it to him, being fully persuaded of his generosity and gratitude. And as to the rest of the articles, such was her desire of making a firm and lasting peace with him, that she would not make any difficulty of consenting to them."

THIS answer was not thought altogether satisfactory by the council of Loanda, who would gladly have obliged her to acknowledge herself tributary to their monarch; but father Antony, who was perfectly well acquainted with her disposition, and kept a constant correspondence with the viceroy, had so far assured him that she would never consent to it, that he easily prevailed upon them to give it up, and a peace was quickly after concluded upon the following terms: Treaty of peace concluded, 1657.

1st. THAT the river Lucalla should be thenceforth the boundary of the two kingdoms of Metamba and Angola.

d 2dly. THAT neither side should thenceforth give any reception to the fugitive slaves of the other, but send them back without any delay, together with the prisoners that had been taken during the last war.

3dly. THAT the queen should remain wholly free and exempt from all tribute and homage whatsoever, provided she agreed and subscribed to all the other articles formerly stipulated from her.

c THIS treaty was signed by the queen and the viceroy in the month of April 1657; immediately after which, the prisoners were conveyed to the frontiers, and exchanged, and the contents of the treaty were dispatched to the court of Lisbon, to be ratified by the king, who accordingly sent a letter to the viceroy and council, dated November 24, of the same year, in which he approves and confirms every thing that had been concluded in that treaty, and acquaints them that he had wrote likewise to queen Zingha; but this letter has not yet been made public that we know of. and ratified.

d DURING these transactions, the queen had prudently bethought herself of an expedient to save her honour with respect to the Giaga Colanda; and, some time before the ratification of the treaty, had privately sent for and acquainted him with the viceroy's demand, telling him at the same time, that tho' she doubted not of his keeping his word, and forgiving him, yet she advised him to go out of her dominions, and settle himself and his men in some distant country from the Portuguese frontiers; but forbade him, on pain of her highest resentment, to commit the least outrage or hostility within their conquests, in his retreat. He thanked her majesty, and seemed to acquiesce with her advice: but as soon as he had reached his strong-hold, he set himself about fortifying it, and putting himself rather in a state of defiance than defence, he having got, by that time, a considerable army on foot, which quickly spread a general dread all round him. The Portuguese failed not of complaining of it to her as a breach of her word; to whom she answered, that they should soon see how faithfully she was resolved to stand to it. Expedient to save her honour. The Giaga breaks his word with her.

g BEING, by this time, recovered from her late illness, she ordered her whole army to be drawn up in arms, on the great square before St. Mary's church, where she likewise appeared in an elegant martial dress, and made them perform their exercises, and a kind of mock-fight, in which they shewed an uncommon dexterity, not only in the handling of their weapons, but in their great variety of evolutions. She entered herself into the lists, and, after a short but enlivening speech, she began to wield her arms with such surprising agility and vigour, considering her years and revalescence, that the good father Antony, who followed her every where, could not forbear complimenting her upon it. The mock-fight was no sooner ended, than she began her march at the head of her troops, having taken care beforehand a to get all the passes and defiles shut up, to prevent the Giaga's escape; and early on the next morning, being the sixteenth of December, she caused his camp to be surrounded on every side, and then ordered her royal standard to be displayed.

THE Giaga, in despair to see himself environed by the forces of the exasperated queen, could think of no other way to escape her resentment than that of the deepest submission, and the most solemn promises of being thenceforth entirely devoted to her service. But whilst his deputies were soliciting his pardon with the queen, some of his chief officers, who suspected his base design, raised up the whole army, and fell so furiously on that of the queen, that they had already forced their way through, and thrown them into great disorder. This obliged her immediately to order her men to attack them in flank and rear; b which was done with such bravery and success, that they made a horrid slaughter amongst them, none hardly escaping their fury, but such as were too nimble to be overtaken in their flight; who having swam across the river Lucalla, fled to the Portuguese garrison of Embacca, where they hoped to meet with better quarter. All the rest were massacred without mercy, except 1500, whom they took prisoners. The Giaga was found among the slain, and his head was brought to the queen, who ordered it to be sent to the viceroy of Loanda, to let him see how well she knew how to keep her word, as well as to punish those that broke theirs with her.<sup>p</sup>

A. D. 1658. SHE returned in triumph to her capital of St. Mary Metamba, towards the end of the month of March following; when finding herself too old and fatigued to lead her forces e against the king of Ajacca, who had invaded some of her dominions during her absence, she committed that expedition to an old experienced general of hers, named Barian-gonga, who proved no less successful than she had been, and quickly obliged the aggressor to submit to her terms.

AN accident happens at her court, which makes her relapse into her impiety; THERE happened, not long after, an accident during Father Antony's absence, who was gone to preach the gospel in other provinces, which was likely to have proved fatal to Christianity, through the remissness, or rather the fickleness, of the queen. An ancient officer in high esteem with her, and who had been formerly baptized, but had since degenerated into libertinism, was taken ill and died, before the good father could come to reconcile him to the church, but her regard for him induced her to send orders to Father Bennet, d the only Capuchin, except a lay-brother, that was then in the monastery, to give him Christian burial, which he stiffly refused to comply with. This she resented to such a degree, that she immediately gave leave that he should be buried after the Giagan manner; upon which a place was quickly prepared, and the number of human victims, suitable to his quality<sup>q</sup>, conveyed with his corpse to a neighbouring wood, to be interred. What was still more strange, the queen, at the head of a numerous court, assisted at the diabolical ceremony, though not without feeling, as she afterwards pretended, some violent checks of conscience. She had already gone so far as to inspire and comfort those unhappy victims which were designed to accompany the deceased into the other world, and would in all likelihood have sent some of them thither with her own hand, had not an unexpected accident e put a stop to the hellish solemnity.

THIS was brother Ignatio, the lay Capuchin above-mentioned, who, after having tried in vain to persuade Father Bennet to comply with the queen's orders, to avoid worse consequences, had, in a fit of zeal, taken the crucifix off the altar, and running with it in his arms to the burying-place, cried out all the way he went, He that is for God, let him follow the image of his crucified Son. As he was going still forward, he was met by the secretary and another minister of state, who were going to the convent to consult with Father Bennet about some proper means to prevent the horrid scene; who asked him whither he was going with the holy image? but could get no other answer than the words above-mentioned; upon which they, turning back, accompanied him, one on each side of him. At their arrival f at the burying-place, they saw vast crowds of people, who were come thither to see the ceremony, to whom he cried aloud, in their native language, Fugam-mema, that is, Down on your knees. They were all thunderstruck at his words, and kneeled down on each side for him to proceed on; which he did, till the queen's guards, who were placed at the entrance of the inclosure, stopped him from going farther. This, however, did not hinder him from repeating the same words, as loud as he could speak; till the queen, who stood under a portico, heard them, and knowing his voice, came and fell before the image, without uttering a word, but with her eyes gushing out plenty of tears. The good brother took the advantage of her silence and confusion, to make her a pathetic reprimand for her impiety; and, at the same time, to oblige her to swear at the foot of the crucifix, that she would g never more permit any such diabolical ceremonies to be performed within her realm, be the persons or occasion what they would. She not only swore it in the most solemn manner, but a ordered the unhappy victims to be set at liberty, and the tomb, with its whole apparatus, to be demolished; after which she followed him to the convent, carrying the crucifix, and attended by numberless crouds of people, expressing their joy by their loud acclamations; and, being arrived at the church, she once more prostrated herself to the crucifix, begging pardon for her crime, and renewing her vow to abolish that inhuman ceremony through all her dominions, which she faithfully performed accordingly *.

There was now nothing wanting to complete the progress of Christianity but a new supply of missionaries from Europe; to obtain which, nothing, she thought, could contribute more effectually than the sending a solemn embassy to Rome, to pay homage to the pope in her name, and acquainting him with the hopeful prospect there now was of planting the Christian faith through all her dominions. The persons she chose for this important service, were her chief secretary of state, the person mentioned a little higher for his laudable zeal, and the good Father Antony; who having by this time resided there near a year and a half, could give an exact account to his holiness of the state of Christianity, and of what was most expedient to settle it among those barbarians upon a solid foundation. Those two worthy persons gladly accepted of the office; and Father Antony assured her majesty, that his commission once happily ended, he would return and end his days among her subjects.

They set out accordingly for Massangano, where they learned that the present pope [Alexander VII.] had desired the superiors of that mission to chuse Father Seraphin de Cortona, for whom he had a particular esteem, to succeed our Father Antony in his commission from the queen of Metamba; which he having yielded to him, Father Seraphin and the secretary sailed for Loanda, in order to sail for Europe. But here they found their voyage stopped by the prohibition which the viceroy had received from his court, not to suffer any ministers of the princes of Ethiopia to embark for any place, or upon any commission, without an express order from his Portuguese majesty. Father Seraphin thereupon having prevailed upon the queen's ambassador to deliver his mistress's letter to the pope, and his other instructions to him, and to return to Metamba, set sail for Rome by the first opportunity, and the ambassador for Metamba. At the same time, Father John Antony Cavazzi de Monte Cucullo was sent to the queen's court, to supply the place of her favourite Father Antony de Gaeta, and to acquaint her majesty with the reasons of this exchange, which he told her was intended for the advantage of her majesty and her subjects'. This new capuchin was constituted prefect of the Metambic mission, and was to have his residence at Massangano; for which place he took his journey in the rainy season, and in such a bad state of health, as was like to have deprived him of his life, and the world of his curious and valuable history; it being chiefly to his memoirs, as we observed at the threshold of this history of Western Ethiopia*, that we owe the greatest, as well as most interesting, part of it.

The gracious reception he met with from the queen, some agreeable parts of his function which she requested of him (M), and the joy which appeared in the looks of the numberless crouds that came to pay their respects to him in the way to Massangano, would have made him forget the fatigues and dangers of his journey', had he not been so frequently attacked with his old disease, partly through the fatigues of his function, and partly through the excessive heat of the climate, which obliged the queen, for fear of losing him, tho' much against her inclination, to send him to Embacca for change of air. She requested of him, among other things, to send her a priest, immediately after his arrival thither, seeing she had none to officiate in her court and capital, but the good brother Ignatio, who was not in priest's orders, and could only catechize and baptize the moribunds; and he accordingly dispatched Father Bennet to her from Massangano, with all possible diligence.

(M) She went, we are told, attended by her numerous court, to meet him at some distance, and had put herself at the head of a number of women lately brought to bed in her capital, who held their babes in their arms. After the first compliments of welcome, she addressed herself to him in these words, "You see now, father, that we do not kill our infants, as we formerly did, but bring them up to be Christians; and these are brought to you to be baptized accordingly."

The good father, who was no stranger to the country and its old barbarous rites, could hardly refrain from tears; and was not a little surprized at the respectful silence which both the court and the vast multitude that followed him kept all the way till they were come to the church; where, after the usual prayers, he baptized the infants above-mentioned, together with some adults; but as soon as the ceremony was over, their silence was changed into joyful shouts and acclamations, accompanied with the sound of their musical instruments (5).

At his first audience, the queen having earnestly recommended to him the interest of Christianity, with promises to assist him with all her power, as soon as he was recovered from a dangerous relapse, he set about building a number of oratories, where the people might go to perform their devotions and be instructed by the catechists: quickly after which he procured, by the assistance of the great ones of the court, four other churches to be erected in that capital, one of which was built at the charge of the princess Barbara and her spouse, and was dedicated to the saint of her name, on the 4th of December, her festival day, at which solemnity 114 infants were likewise baptized (6).

THIS last had been hardly a year at her court, before they were alarmed with the news a of a powerful army being raised by the viceroy of Loanda, and the report he had caused to be spread that it was designed against the kingdom of Metamba. The affrighted queen had immediate recourse to her good old friend Father Antony Gaeta, who now resided at Massangano, as prefect of the mission, and, in the strongest terms, entreated him, by an express dispatched to him for that end, to hasten to her without delay. The good old father obeyed with his wonted zeal, and, without taking leave of any one, or even a companion with him, began his journey, and in about six days arrived at her court, acquainted her majesty that he had taken care to go to the Portuguese army, and had been assured by them that they had not the least design against her, but were fully resolved to live in the strictest peace and amity with her, according to the tenor of the late treaty: he added, that the contrary report had b been raised to conceal their real design, which was to surprize and punish some revolted people; all which dissipated her jealousies; so that, having nothing to apprehend from that quarter, they had the more leisure to vacate at their religious functions, it being now the holy week, and the city filled with a vast concourse of Christians, who came to assist at the solemnity of the season *.

HE staid with her about four months, and then, tho' much against the queen's liking, returned to his residence of Massangano, where he had not been long, before the viceroy of Angola invited him to come and attempt a mission in some of the unconverted provinces of that kingdom, in order to open a commerce with them. But as neither of them succeeded, he returned back to Metamba, at the queen's request, to assist her in building a new city, c palace, and church, upon a convenient and airy spot of ground she had pitched upon, on the banks of the river Wamba. He arrived at her court in the month of May, and saw the vast preparations she had already made, and a prodigious number of stones broke from the rock, which she had caused to be brought to the place, upon the shoulders of several thousands of slaves, which were employed in that work, over which Brother Ignatio was appointed to preside. It will be hardly expected we should trouble our readers with a description of those structures, which, for want of proper workmen, were very rude, and inferior to those she had seen at Loanda. The reader will find what is most worthy his notice in the following note (N), to which we will only add, that what they wanted in the beauty and symmetry of the work, she endeavoured to compensate by the richness of the d ornaments within; in which she was so lavish, that even in the laying of the first stone of her new church, having dismissed all the workmen, and her own retinue, excepting Father Antony and Brother Ignatio, she buried a diamond of immense value under it.

(N) The church was situate in the most eminent part of the city. Its length was 129 spans, its breadth 42, its height in proportion, the first seven of which were all built of large stones, and the rest of wood; and adjoining to it was a convenient apartment for the missionaries.

Her palace was built on a flat plain, of about a league in circuit. Instead of a wall, the first cincture was made of matting of palm leaves, curiously woven, and supported by posts at proper distances, the whole high enough not to be leaped over by wild beasts. It had but one entrance, which was opened and shut with a stout wooden gate, like those of our turnpikes, but of the same height with the cincture. Within this, at about 30 yards, was a second cincture, or thorny hedge, of a considerable thickness, guarded likewise by one single gate, opposite to the first. Within this second was a third inclosure of quickset, still stronger than the second, and between these two last ran a hedge with windings and turnings, like a labyrinth, not easily permeated but by those who are acquainted with its contrivance.

Within this last is a vast spacious green, large enough to draw up a whole army; and around it, almost adjoining to the inner inclosure, are the Casas, or houses, huts they should be rather called, belonging to the queen and court. These are all of a round figure, the summit or thatching pointed on the top, and without windows, or any light but what comes in at a single low door.

These Casas are larger or smaller, according to the rank of the persons that inhabit them, and none of them above seven feet high. Those of the queen, tho' built much after the same manner, are more spacious, and some of them have cloisters within them, and a large court; and it is in these that she and her ladies and maids of honour live. These have likewise their separate inclosures and gates, and look like a small hamlet within a larger, and in them are kept her magazines of corn and other provisions, her wardrobes, kitchen, pantry, and other offices. Fronting these large apartments she caused two spacious saloons, or halls, open on three sides like porticoes, to be built; the one where she gave audience to ambassadors, and the other for her principal ministers to keep their assemblies in. All these were completed with surprising dispatch, through the vast number of hands that were employed in the work. The father prefect reckoned, at the first visit he made to it, no less than 11,000, and, in his second, 17,000 persons employed in it, including the women, but exclusive of the slaves that assisted them.

When they came to measure out the ground designed for the city, the queen proposed to the prefect to admit of none to live in it but Christians, and to assign the old city, which stood about six miles from it, for the unconverted; but the old father rightly observed to her, that this might in time occasion that old city to become a receptacle and den of all her libertine and wicked subjects, and, at the same time, encourage numbers of others to turn Christians, merely for the privilege of living in the new; whereas, if she permitted both Christians and idolaters to live promiscuously in both, the former would be a curb to the latter, and prevent their attempting any thing against her, or acting contrary to her edicts. The queen approved his advice, and ordered that the assignment of the ground should be made according to it (7).

<sup>a</sup> THE church being designed to be dedicated to St. Anne, whose name she bore, she had likewise procured an eminent painter, at a vast price, to paint that saint in the most elegant taste, to serve for an altar-piece. She presented it with some of her richest tapestry, and other ornaments, particularly with a fine lamp, made of the silver that had till then plated the chest that contained her brother's bones; both which, though with no small reluctance, she was obliged to deliver up to the prefect, without which he refused to admit her to the holy communion, which she was earnest to receive, for the first time, at the approaching festival. The father caused the chest and bones to be burnt; and the plate to be sent to Loanda, and to be wrought into the said curious lamp, to burn continually before the miraculous crucifix, in her new-built church. He likewise obliged her to give up sundry other superstitious trinkets, as rings, ear-rings, &c. of gold and silver, which she wore as amulets. To this she not only complied with singular readiness, but obliged all the ladies of her court and capital to do the same. After so many signal tokens of her sincere conversion, the good father set about instructing and preparing her for the next grand festival, which was that of Pentecost, on which she received the sacrament from his hands with the utmost reverence, and, from that time, never gave any other but marks of the most exemplary piety <sup>w</sup>.

THE two following years were chiefly spent in the conversion of the rest of her subjects, and particularly those that inhabited the islands of the Coanza that were under her dominion; in which work Father John Antony did not meet with a success answerable to his zeal and labour. He returned to court on the news of the prefect being fallen dangerously ill; but at his arrival thither, on the last day of March, found him happily recovered. He had not been there many days, before the queen was seized with her old disease, with such violence, as made them fear, considering her extreme old age, that she could not outlive it; but, to their joyful surprize, her strong constitution soon got the better of it. Theirs and her joy were, not long after augmented by an express they received from Loando, with the news of the arrival of several Capuchins, designed for the kingdom of Metamba. The same express brought likewise two letters, one from the pope to the queen, and the other from the congregation de propaganda fide, directed to the prefect and the rest of the missionaries, importing, that the pope had appointed Father Antony de Gaeta prefect not only of Metamba but of Angola, which would oblige him to reside for the future at S. John de Loanda. The queen received the pontif's letter from his hands with tears of joy, and a pleasure, she owned, she had never felt before, and which, she hoped, would complete her recovery, as it actually did. The departure of the good old prefect, who had been so long the director of her conscience, did indeed deeply afflict her, and she left no means untried to retard it; but duty pleading against her, she insisted upon his granting her two favours, before he left her, viz. to consecrate her new church to St. Ann, and to leave with her an old left-off capuchin habit, to cover her body after her death, in order, as she said, to obliterate the fantastic notion she had formerly endeavoured to inspire her subjects with, of her being a goddess, or something more than human. The prefect readily complied; and when the habit was brought to her, she ordered her old general, and brother-in law, to wrap it up in a cloth of gold, and lay it up in her wardrobe. The new church was consecrated on the 24th of April, with great solemnity, and, after mass, he preached his farewell sermon, before her, to a numerous audience; and, leaving Father John Antony and Brother Ignatio to be with her, he took his leave, and set out for Loanda <sup>x</sup>.

Soon after his departure, she resolved to receive the pope's letter, lately mentioned, from the hands of Father John Antony in the most public and solemn manner; and that it should be read by him, in her new church, before her and her whole court, after the divine service. The day appointed for it was the 15th of July following, on which she repaired to the place, at the head of a numerous and brilliant retinue, and wearing the letter hanging about her neck in a rich golden purse. The concourse was so great that the church could not contain one half of them; so that none were admitted but persons of rank. The Father, having finished the mass, read it at the altar, in the Portuguese language, and the secretary interpreted it in that of the country. The queen, who had stood up all the while it was reading, went towards the altar, and, on her knees, received it from the Father; and having kissed it, and sworn afresh upon the gospel to continue obedient to the holy see, kissed it again, put it into the bag, and returned to her palace among the shouts and acclamations of many thousands of her subjects. She gave, on that occasion, a magnificent treat to the Portuguese resident, and to all her court, in the two great porticos she had lately built, whilst herself vouchsafed to eat and be served on that day after the European manner, that is, sitting on a stately elbow-chair, with a high table before her, covered with the finest linen, and with dishes, plates, knives, and forks, all of silver gilt (O). She bestowed some largesses upon her chief officers, released

(O) This must, doubtless, have appeared strange to her, as well as to her whole court, who never saw her sit upon any thing but a cushion laid on a mat or carpet upon the ground, with her legs across, and her viſuals before her, without either table, napkin, plate, knife, or fork, but taking them up with her hands, and tearing them with her teeth, even when she eat publicly, and before all her whole court, which, we are told, a good number of slaves, and at night she appeared at the head of her ladies of honour, she and they all dressed and armed in the Amazonian style, and performed a kind of combat, in which that princess, tho' now above fourscore years of age, behaved with as great vigour and activity as any woman of thirty could have done<sup>y</sup>.

Pious diligence and severity.

HER life, however, did not prove so long as those fair appearances seemed to promise; tho' she had the satisfaction to think that she had finished what she had most at heart, and had now nothing left to do but to watch over the execution of her former edicts in favour of Christianity, and against the abominable superstitions of the Giagas, and their Singhillos. And to this she was not only very attentive, but very severe in punishing all delinquents. One of these pretended conjurers, having been caught in some of his impious rites, she had condemned to be burned alive; and when the good Father interceded for his pardon, in hopes of converting him, she readily granted it at his request, but at the same time assured him, that his charitable compassion and endeavours would be ill bestowed; and that she knew the temper of those wretches too well, to think that any thing but the severest punishments could deter them from their impieties. The event did but too plainly convince him of the truth of it; he not only tried all the arguments which his zeal could inspire him with, tho' without success, to turn him, but, some time after, four or five more of the same cursed fraternity being likewise surprised at their diabolical ceremonies, chose expiring in the flames rather than purchase their pardon at the expence of renouncing their sect; so that the old Capuchin was obliged, notwithstanding her great reluctance to such cruel punishments, to permit, and even approve, of them (P).

Her last illnesses.

WHILST the queen was taken up with promoting the conversion of her subjects in her new capital, the old Father obtained leave to go and pursue the same good work with his catechists, in the provinces of her dominions; but before he had gone through many of them, he received expresses upon expresses from her to return, with all speed, to court; so that he was obliged to abandon what he called a hopeful harvest of converts, to come and assist her in her last sickness. He had left Metamba on the 2d of September, and made such haste back, that he arrived thither on the 14th of October, and found her labouring under a violent inflammation in her throat, which hardly permitted her to speak. His presence so far revived her spirits, that she returned his first salutation with some severe reflections on her ambition of being thought a goddess, who now found herself, indeed, a mere sink of filth and corruption. She earnestly entreated him not to forsake her in her extremity, but to continue his charitable offices to her whilst she lived, and, after her death, to see her corpse interred in the garb which the prefect had left with her, and, by all means, not to suffer any of the detestable Giagan rites to be performed at her funeral<sup>z</sup>. She repeated the same injunctions told, was as numerous as that of any European monarch.

Among these she had 300 women attending her alternately, ten every ten days. These either sat cross-legged, or upon their heels, behind her, while she ate: and as she had great variety of dishes at her table, she commonly tore a piece off, and flung the rest to one or other of them, which they greedily caught and ate, as a singular favour from her. When she drank, all that were present fell a clapping their hands; and her chief minister, who was the general that had married her sister Barbara, kneeled on her side, pressed the great toe of her left foot, wishing that what she eat and drank might nourish every part of her, from the crown of her head to the extremity of that toe.

As soon as she had finished her meal, she caused all the relics and fragments to be distributed among the attendants, which was esteemed as a very great favour. All the while, the general above-mentioned was very curious in picking up every bit and bone that she had thrown on the carpet, which he immediately took away, and deposited in a safe place, to prevent their being made use of for any magical spell against her person. This was her way of eating in public; and she never affected the European manner, except when she had some ambassador or foreign minister to be present at it. As for the nature of her food, and way of dressing it, it would be so little inviting to our English readers, that we forbear expatiating upon it (7).

(P) The misfortune was, that many of her officers connived at and even privately encouraged those jugglers; to convince her of which, the Father having seized upon a parcel of tools which they used in their pretended conjurations, sent them bundled up to the queen. The queen, not comprehending the meaning of it, sent for him, in all haste, to explain it to her; upon which he told her, that it behoved her majesty to send the bundle back to the owner, seeing her officers suffered such fellows to play their conjuring tricks so near her court, notwithstanding her edicts against them, and the danger of her majesty being suspected of winking at them.

The queen, who felt the full force of the reproof, sent immediate orders to the officers to secure the Singhillos, and send him to her before sunset, under pain of being made to undergo a more severe punishment by the next morning. They, knowing the danger of delaying to obey, sent him accordingly, loaden with chains; whom she condemned to be severely whipped through her capital, and afterwards to be sold away for the American plantations (8).

What is still worse was, that many of those officers and ministers, tho' they had embraced the Christian faith out of complaisance to her, preserved the utmost aversion to it in their hearts, and have renounced it at their death. An instance of this happened in two of them, on the eve of the assumption of the foregoing year. The missionary above mentioned being apprised of their sickness, came immediately to their assistance, but found them both proof against all his exhortations, and fully determined to die in that they called their antient religion; alleging, that their being forcibly baptized was in obedience to the queen. Their relations, notwithstanding this, insisted upon their having Christian burial; which the Father absolutely refusing, they determined to bury them after the Giagan manner. They were, however, prevented from doing it, by the express orders of the queen, who then publicly declared, that if any such attempts were made for the future, she would order the dead bodies to be thrown into the river, or to the wild beasts (9).

a to her first minister of state, named Teudela, who governed the realm during the interregnum, and before the other officers of her court, declaring to them that she appointed the said father John Antony the sole director of her funeral obsequies; and that it was her will, as well as last request, that they should strictly conform to every thing that he should prescribe concerning her interment. The next thing she recommended to them, was the propagation of Christianity, and their protecting and encouraging the missionaries and their catechists with all their power, and the enforcement of all her edicts against the Giagan impious rites.

THE inflammation having seized her breast and lungs, and some wrong medicine having been applied to it, which made her feel her end approaching, she confessed herself to the father, who went immediately to say mass for her, and returned with the viaticum, which

b she received with fervent devotion, and soon after the extreme unction, still retaining the perfect use of her senses till the 17th of December, on which she expired, about break of day, in the eighty-second year of her age.

DURING the latter part of her illness, the prime ministers had ordered all the militia to be in arms, to suppress any tumult or revolt that might be raised, and more especially to prevent the slaves running away, as was usual at such junctures (Q), and, immediately after her death, caused the palace guard to be doubled, and the gates to be kept shut, that none might go in or out till the council had taken proper measures for proclaiming her successor. They were not long, however, deliberating about it; but early in the morning, on the 19th day, assembled the people at the great piazza before the palace, and there declared in form that they had elected Donna Barbara, sister to the deceased queen, her successor to the Metambic crown<sup>a</sup>.

SHE being then present at the assembly of the grandees, was raised at a convenient height above them, to be beheld by all the people, and had the royal bow and arrow, which are the ensigns of royalty, delivered into her hands, with the usual solemnity; yet such was the people's love and affection for the deceased Zingha, that, instead of the usual joyful acclamations to their new queen, there could be nothing heard but the most doleful and hideous outcries for the loss of the old one<sup>b</sup>.

WHILST this ceremony was performing in the piazza, father Antony went to the palace in order to array the deceased in the capuchin's dress she had so earnestly desired to be interred in, but, to his great surprize, found her already laid out in the great porch, and arrayed in all her regalia, which were of the richest kind, and sparkling all over with most costly jewels. He was, however, permitted to order her ladies to cloath her with the monkish frock, and to put her crucifix and beads into her hands. In this manner he hoped she would have lain in state for some days, but, to his farther surprize, she was conveyed to the church that very evening to be interred, under pretence that her funeral retarded the joy of the court for the new queen. She was accordingly conveyed thither on a stately chest, richly covered, in which her corpse was afterwards to be deposited. Her legs and thighs were extended at full length, but the rest of her body was placed in a kind of sitting posture, with her back resting against a favourite page's breast, who continued several hours, motionless, in that situation.

(Q) The meaning of this is the barbarous custom in vogue among all the idolatrous nations of sacrificing whole hecatombs of human victims, at the funeral obsequies of a monarch or great man, of which we have given sundry instances, particularly in those of the Angolic kings, before their conversion (10). For at such times, the poor slaves, dreading to be taken into the unhappy number, used to flee into some other state, or into impenetrable woods, or on inaccessible mountains, where they frequently met with a worse fate, and were either devoured by wild beasts, or died of hunger and misery.

Even the ladies of honour belonging to the queen were in no small dread upon this occasion, as was the antient custom, fearing they should be forced to follow her into the other world; and those who had access to the good Capuchin, had made no scruple to discover their fears to him about it, which were greatly increased at the doubling of the guards, and shutting up the gates of the palace; for this their alarm made them interpret as done to prevent their making their escape (11).

That princess had, indeed, sufficiently expressed her utter abhorrence of that inhuman custom upon all proper occasions, and particularly once upon her being recovered a year or two before from a dangerous fever, when her sycophant general and brother-in-law told her, that if it had been their misfortune to lose her at that time, all her subjects would have strove for the honour of being sacrificed at her funeral obsequies. To which she answered, with an angry look, "If you speak your real sentiments, you will have cause to repent it; for I will take such precaution, that if, contrary to my express will, any such inhuman rite should be performed at my funeral, the butchery shall begin with the chief officers of my kingdom, and you will prove the very first victim, as a due punishment for your having dared to make any such proposal to me." And we are told, that she actually gave some private directions to some of her ministers, in order to deter him from such a design (12).

But, after all, the ladies had still great reason to be alarmed, considering the little dependance there could be, from what we observed in the last note, on the fairest pretences of her grandees to Christianity, or rather considering the danger there seemed to be of their relapsing into their old detestable rites after her decease.

THE procession to the church was pompous and suitable to her dignity, but after the Romish fashion, with crosses, and wax tapers, &c. the good father John Antony walking before the body, which was carried on a bier by twelve of the noblest persons belonging to the fraternity of the rosary, lately set up in that metropolis. A hundred soldiers attended the corpse, not with their arms, but with their martial music, which was of the most doleful and dissonant kind that could be imagined, and these were followed by the militia, with their weapons inverted. The streets were so crowded with people, that the procession had much-ado to pass thro' them. What added to that mournful tumult was, at their first perceiving the corpse in a sitting posture, they imagined their queen was risen from the dead, which raised the loudest acclamations of joy; but when, upon a nearer approach, they perceived she was really dead, their shouts were turned into the bitterest outcries, lamentations, and gestures of the deepest despair <sup>a</sup>.

WHEN the corpse was arrived at the church gate, where the lieutenant-general, whose office it was, stood ready to receive it, in order to deliver it up into the hands of her ladies of honour, to be put in the coffer on which it lay, another and a more strange uproar arose; for instead of striving amongst them for the honour of performing this last service to their mistress, the notion of being buried alive with her came so strongly into their minds, especially as the grave in which it was to be deposited was 12 spans deep, and 18 square, and consequently big enough to contain, as they imagined, a good number of them, that they all fled in a fright, and went to hide themselves where they could, in spite of all the good father and the general could say to undeceive them. Neither could all their eloquence nor authority prevail upon any of them to go down in the frightful cave; and the two lay brothers Ignatio and Gabriel were ordered to convey the chest into it in their stead, and place it on the altar tomb that had been reared for it. These two were no sooner come up out of the cave, than the pages, officers, and courtiers, that had accompanied the funeral, fled out of the church with all possible speed, the same phrenzy having now taken hold of the men, as it had before of the women, so that there were none left but the fathers and lay brothers to fill the grave with earth, which they accordingly did; and, as soon as that was done, they all crowded again into the church, and spent the night in it, in deep mourning and lamentations, for the loss of their much-loved sovereign <sup>c</sup>.

with her.

OUR author, who was an eye-witness, and, for the most part, the chief director of all this funeral pomp, tells us, that the rich things which were buried with her in that grave, amounted at least to the value of 16,000 Roman crowns; a monstrous as well as superstitious profuseness, considering that the chief riches of that country, even of crowned heads, chiefly consisted in their number of slaves, and the tyrannic property they claim over the lives and fortunes of their vassals <sup>d</sup>.

ON the next morning the whole militia was again drawn up, and the new queen assisted at the funeral high mass which was sung for the deceased; immediately after which the martial officers came and told the good old father, that it would be very proper to have a Tomba (R) performed in honour of so great and so beloved a sovereign, as was the late queen; that the

(R) That is the name by which they called the old inhuman obsequies to their princes and great men, and in which, as hath been formerly hinted, they were wont to sacrifice a vast number of human and other victims, with which they feasted the relations and friends of the deceased (13). But these, as well as their lascivious dances, and other heathenish ceremonies, having been expressly forbid by the late queen, were wholly excluded upon this occasion. The rest of the funeral scene was performed in the presence of the new one, and the Tendela, and other officers of state and war, in the manner following.

Eight thousand soldiers were drawn up in arms on one side of the great piazza, or green, facing the palace, and about the same number of women and children on the other side, over-against them; immediately after which a proportionable number of Cafas were reared up with surprising quickness; and then, at the first signal given by the general, the soldiers began to perform a mock engagement, in which every part of the fight was managed and acted, as near as could be, in the same manner as they did when the queen was at the head of her troops.

The two councils were likewise assembled in the space between the men and the women, and acted their respective parts, as debating, deliberating, receiving and dispatching of couriers, messengers, &c. &c.

The women and children were, in like manner, employed in their respective callings, and those who belonged to her late majesty, in performing their respective services to her; all which was done with the most surprising dexterity and exactness.

Whilst they were in the height each of their several parts, the same general proclaimed aloud the queen's death, in words to this import, "Be it known to all the subjects of this kingdom of Metamba, that queen Zingha, your most pious and most Christian sovereign is taken from you by the irrevocable decree of heaven."

At this doleful news a general stop was put to every one's employment; instead of which nothing was seen but the most lively tokens of grief and despair, nor any thing heard but the most dreadful cries and complaints on all sides, the men beating their foreheads and breasts, the women wringing their hands, tearing their hair, and all other actions and gestures used on such occasions; the martial instruments heightening the mournful solemnity with their variety of shrill and doleful sounds.

There was still wanting one thing to complete the Tomba, or funeral scene, and without which the coma the soldiery were fully set upon it, and that it would be dangerous to exasperate them by his denial. His surprize made him hesitate a while; but when he found them determined upon it, he gave his consent to it, upon condition, that the ceremony should be performed without the shedding of either human or any other blood, and without those immodest dances which were wont to make the most diverting part of the solemnity, to which they agreed; and the soldiers were obliged to be contented with it, and performed their several parts with great exactness, in the manner we have described in the foregoing note <sup>f</sup>.

MANY more extraordinary honours were paid by the subjects to that great queen, which we omit for brevity sake; tho' less we could not excuse ourselves from saying concerning that excellent princess, and great promoter and patron of Christianity. It was out of respect to her memory that the nobles and people expressed the same high regard and zeal to her sister Barbara, now upon the throne, whom they caused to be inaugurated a second and a third time, with the greatest pomp, and joyful acclamations; viz. at the great hall of audience, and at the new church of St. Ann. She was, indeed, a very zealous Christian, endowed with very amiable qualities, tho' short of her sister's martial spirit and intrepid courage. The misfortune was, that she was in the decline of her life, and almost blind, and incapable of giving strict attention to the concerns of religion and the state; and, what was still worse, had been married to a proud and ill-natured husband, who had dared, even in the late queen's time, to treat her, not with bare contempt only, but with brutish cruelty, tho' he owed all his fortune and advancement to that generous princess; but now much more, when he was pushed by his ambition to grasp at the sole government of affairs, and to deprive her at once of the regal power and dignity, by the most violent and inhuman means, and then to use all his power and authority to extirpate the Christian religion out of the kingdom, against which he had ever borne an irreconcilable tho' concealed antipathy; in both which he succeeded but too well, as the sequel will quickly shew.

THIS ungrateful wretch was of no higher extract than the son of a slave; the late queen, Mona Zingha, who, from their very infancy, had conceived such a friendship for him, that she honoured him with her own name Mona Zingha, and when she came to be in possession of the throne, raised him, by degrees, to the dignity of her chief general. We have lately seen how she had prevailed upon him to join with her in the stratagem of the pretended miraculous crucifix, tho' a staunch zealot of the Giagan sect; but he left the court soon after, and had retired to some distance from it, when he perceived that artifice was to be a prelude to her returning to the Christian religion, and establishing it in her dominions<sup>g</sup>; but upon hearing that the marriage of the princess Barbara with Don John, formerly mentioned, a prince of the blood, was annulled on account of his bigamy, he demanded her for himself in such a haughty manner, as gives one reason to suspect, that her fear of his betraying the secret above mentioned, and raising some revolt upon it, was the only motive which had forced her to consent. His barbarous usage of that princess, after his marriage to her, had obliged her, as was lately hinted, to refuge herself in the royal palace, whence he had the insolence to fetch her quickly after; for which the exasperated queen had well-nigh ordered him to be cut in pieces before her face, but that the good father, in hopes of making a convert of him, had, with some difficulty, obtained his pardon and antient post, tho' without being able to inspire him with the least favourable sentiments towards Christianity. On the contrary, he invented one of the most hellish accusations against him, in order to destroy both him and his religion. He gave out that the late queen had been poisoned by some favourite European dishes, with which brother Ignatio used to regale her during her last sickness; and attributed his wife's blindness and lameness to some sortilege, or charm, which the convent had made use of against her. He had even persuaded, or rather forced, his queen to consent that some of his Singhillos should be sent for, and obliged her to submit to their conjuring arts, to countercharm her distemper.

THE good father, instead of being intimidated at these false accusations, as was expected, came boldly to the palace, and publicly blamed her majesty for suffering herself to be seduced by those jugglers; and, with no less zeal than strength of argument, convinced her, before the whole court, both of the folly and guilt of giving way to such impious superstitions; threatening, moreover, to leave her dominions, and carry off all the crosses and other religious utensils, from which alone she could receive any help, and abandon her and her subjects to the still worse fate she had reason to expect her apostacy would soon draw upon her and them. To this severe and threatening reproof, the affrighted queen, who had then upon pany would have gone away beyond measure dissatisfied; we mean a plentiful profusion of victuals and drink for that whole multitude; but these the queen had taken care to provide in great abundance, so that tho' they were not allowed to glut themselves with human flesh and blood, as formerly, yet they all expressed themselves so highly satisfied with the plenty and variety that was prepared for them, during the whole six days, (for so long these obsequies usually lasted) that not one of them could be persuaded by the good missionaries to leave the place to go to church, and pray for the queen's repose, during all that time (14).

her the countercharms which the Singhillos had caused to be made (S), after a very deep a sigh, excused herself, with great vehemence, in terms to this effect: "That she was a wo" man, and consequently a weak creature; seated on a tottering throne, deprived of her " sight, and loaden with age and diseases, and tyrannized by the man who owed all his for" tune to her. All which, duly weighed, she hoped would in some measure extenuate her " fault. That as to the charms they had forced her to put on, she detested them from her " heart, and to convince him of it, she assured him they should be taken off before sun set,
" and delivered into his hands to do with them as he should think fit<sup>b</sup>."

Her husband enraged at it, and against the Christians.

SHE did so accordingly, and sent them to the convent by the hands of her secretary; which so far exasperated her husband and all the Giagan sect, that they resolved to massacre all the b capuchins and Europeans, and even the queen herself, rather than suffer them to have such an ascendant over her. They did not, however, proceed to such an open violence, but contented themselves with interdicting them the use of their churches, appearing at court, and performing any of their ecclesiastical functions. Mona Zingha was by this time become so powerful, and had the address to gain so many of the Christian officers, both of the court and army, to his interest, by his extraordinary presents, that he made no scruple to propose to the council the destroying of the new city of St. Mary Metamba, built by the late queen, and, according to the usual practice of antient times, to build another in its stead, on some other spot. But he had the mortification to hear his proposal rejected by those worthy counsellors, who easily perceived, thro' that artifice, his real design of destroying all the churches, and of reviving the old Giagan idolatry, at which he was so highly exasperated, that he im- c mediately retired to his own estate, under a pretence of never more meddling with state affairs, but in reality with full design to concert measures for engrossing the whole management of them, by depriving his wife of her life and crown, and seizing upon the throne.

His design against them and the queen, disconcerted by the father.

HE sent a messenger to her accordingly, desiring her to repair to his house, where he had some important business to communicate to her; of which she sent notice to the council, and to the father capuchin, who advised her to decline the invitation, on pretext of her illness, and the inclemency of the season. At the same time the old father proposed, that, in order to make the old general sensible how little they feared either his power or artifices, that the queen should repair the next day, attended by a strong guard, to the church, to hear mass, and to continue doing so for some time. This had the desired effect; and Mona d Zingha, finding all his measures disconcerted, begged leave to retire to a neighbouring province, under his government, for the recovery of his health; but here he was again disconcerted; and the council having deliberated upon it, sent him an express prohibition to stir out of Metamba<sup>i</sup>.

He is sent to suppress a revolt.

THEY were, not long after, however, guilty of a fatal error, in sending him, at the head of an army, to suppress a revolt in one of the frontiers; whence being returned victorious, and laden with spoil, and a vast number of slaves, he thought himself strong enough to revive the Giagan rites, and sacrifice a hecatomb to the manes of the late queen. The good father was quickly apprised of it, and lost no time to inform the council of the preparations that were making for that hellish ceremony. The queen being present at it, he expressed himself e in such zealous and pathetic terms, about the impiety and dangerous consequences of suffering such impious rites, as drew tears from them all; and an express messenger was dispatched with all speed, to be more fully informed of the truth. The general easily guessed at the meaning of his errand; and fearing the resentment of the queen and council, as well as the severe edicts of the late queen, which were still in force, immediately dispatched another to Metamba, to acquaint the board, that he had no other view in bringing these slaves with him, than to send them over to the Portuguese, to whom the realm was in arrears for a great number of them. This he accompanied with a great many solemn protestations, which would have stood him in little stead, had he not sent with them some considerable presents, and, in particular, a good quantity of European wine, to give a sanction to his excuse, and f stop the mouths of those mercenary counsellors; which it did so effectually, that not a word more was said about his impious design<sup>k</sup>.

(S) The queen's most painful ailment being caused by a swelling in her legs, one of those jugglers had the assurance to say, that the soul of the late queen had inflicted it upon her, for neglecting to order such a Tomba as was used to crown heads after their decease; and advised her to quit the royal palace, and retire to her own, which would put her out of the power of the resenting spirit.

She consented to it, but without success; upon which they advised her to cause all the iron implements which had been used in digging and filling up her sister's grave, to be forged into rings of different sizes, and applied to her legs and toes; and these were the charms which she had on when the good father came to her; and which the pretended conjurers had promised her would disable the spirit from doing her any farther hurt (15).

(15) Labat ex Cavaz. ubi sup. p. 313, & seq.

a He did not forget to send some of it to the good capuchin, but with a much more villainous view, as he knew him to be the chief person who had informed the council against him; but, to prevent suspicion, presented him only with a small quantity, to be used at the mass; adding, however, that if it proved acceptable to him, he would supply him with a larger. The good father, little suspecting his design, was weak enough to drink about two glasses of it; and, in less than a quarter of an hour, felt himself seized with the most violent convulsions in his bowels, and all other dreadful symptoms of his being poisoned. A strong antidote was immediately administered to him, which helped him to discharge a great part of the poison; notwithstanding which, he continued several days in such a dismal state, that they did not expect his life. He recovered, however, with great difficulty; but the poison left such a torpor and lowness of spirits upon him, as quite disabled him from his usual functions, and obliged him, tho' not without extreme regret, to abandon his beloved mission, and to retire to Loanda (T), leaving only the good old Gabriel, a lay brother, to take care of the convent; for the other missionaries were all dead. But, upon his arrival at Loanda, he dispatched father Bernard de Catiliano; who dying soon after, was succeeded by father John Baptist Salisano. whom he poisoned in a present of wine; 1665.

b In the mean time, the queen's distemper daily increasing, her husband gave the father leave not only to attend her, but to perform the divine service at church as usual; and would even sometimes assist at it. For as he aimed at nothing less than the crown, it was not his interest to betray his aversion to Christianity, lest that should obstruct his elevation to it, especially as he had reason to think it could not be long before her death opened the way to him to the succession. He was not mistaken in his reckoning, that princess dying soon after, quite worn out with age, diseases, and grief, after a short reign, or rather miserable slavery, of about two years and a half, on the 24th of March of the following year<sup>1</sup>, after having given to father Salisano, who had been permitted to attend her all this while, the most lively tokens of repentance for her late apostacy. She was, according to her desire, buried like her sister, in a capuchin dress, and deposited by her in the church of St. Ann, with suitable ceremony; after which her husband lost no time to get himself elected, and had so well concerted his measures, that he gained it without difficulty or opposition. The queen's distemper augments. Her death and burial. 1666.

c THE ceremony was scarcely over, before he publicly pulled off the mask; and began to give the most pregnant as well as mortifying marks both of his abhorrence of Christianity, and of the most confirmed attachment to all the abominable rites of the Giagan sect. The first which he set on foot was to cause five young ladies of the first rank to be buried alive in his wife's grave. He did not dare to venture on a greater number; tho', according to the ritual of that accursed sect, her rank would have required, at least, 70. But his thirst of blood did not long suffer him to stop there, before he sacrificed 43 of the most considerable persons of the realm, for no other crime than their warm and exemplary zeal for Christianity, and their having been, on that account, very great favourites of the late queen Zingha; particularly one of her bravest generals, whom he caused to be burned by a slow fire<sup>m</sup>. some others he caused to be tortured to death, in order to extort from them some accusation against the missionaries, which might afford him a pretence to exterminate them and their disciples. Succeeded by Mona Zingha, who apostatizes. Five virgins buried alive, and others sacrificed.

He had the boldness, sometime after these dreadful persecutions, to write to the viceroy of Loanda, to notify his election, and at the same time to acquaint him, that he had for-

(T) As we formerly apprised the reader * that this is the good Capuchin so often quoted in the margin, and from whom alone we have received all the surprising particulars of the life and reign of that extraordinary princess queen Zingha, as well as the melancholy ones of her unhappy sister, now on the throne, he doubtless will not be displeased to know what became of this zealous and pious father, after his departure from her court.

He arrived safe at Loanda, where, notwithstanding his ill state of health, he still applied himself to the service of his mission, and making excursions into the neighbouring provinces, confirming the old, and still making new converts to Christianity, till the year 1666, when a more important commission, the procuring a new supply of missionaries for those parts, called him back into Europe, and particularly to the court of Rome. to lay before the pope and congregation de propaganda fide, the true state of the Angolic and Metambic missions.

He arrived there an. 1668, and the reception he met from both was such as his piety, zeal, and exemplary merit might justly challenge from them. The account he gave of them of his travels, labours, and success, afforded them all possible satisfaction, and the success of his negotiation proved such as he wished. A number of fresh volunteers of his order were appointed to accompany him back to the kingdom of Loanda, in order to be dispersed thence into such provinces as stood most in need of them, whilst he was constituted prefect and chief director of that mission.

He set sail with them accordingly for Angola, an. 1670, and arrived safely there, on the same year; but what their success was, what new conversions and discoveries he made there, and what became of him at last, we have not been able to learn. The few remains we have of the reigns of queen Barbara and her tyrannic husband, were since conveyed by him to his successor Father John Baptist Salisano, and added to his own relation (16).

faken the Christian religion, which he had formerly embraced, merely out of complaisance a to the queen; and that he was now returned to the antient one of the Giagas; and, to confirm the truth of it beyond all doubt, ordered all the children that could be found under six years of age, to be inhumanly massacred to their infernal deities. He recalled all the Singhillos, and was liberal to them to such a profuse degree, that they became wholly devoted to him, would act any part he set them upon, and were ever promising him a happy issue to all his most bloody enterprises against the Christians. He caused many of the middling sort to be privately poisoned, and then gave out that their unaccountable deaths were sent as a punishment for having abandoned the antient religion of their country, to embrace that of a parcel of indigent and famished strangers, who were forced, by their extreme misery, to forsake their native country, in quest of a livelihood in the richest provinces of Africa; all which his hired Singhillos took particular care to confirm and propagate wherever they came<sup>n</sup>. b

By these and the like impious stratagems and bloody measures, he gained such an absolute sway over his Giagan canibals, that he had well-nigh extirpated Christianity out of his dominions. He had totally ruined the new city of S. Maria de Metamba, together with all its chapels, oratories, and places of devotion, not sparing even the great church of St. Ann, where the late queen, his benefactress, and the princess his wife, lay buried, but reduced it all alike into a ruinous heap. He had done the same execution through other parts of the kingdom, not only on the staunch Christians, but upon every thing that bore any relation to Christianity; insomuch, that he had hardly left a cross standing any-where, when Providence was pleased to put a stop to his career, by the means of Don John, lately mentioned, who being now the only lawful, as well as Christian heir to the crown, was the properest person for them to have recourse to in their present desperate state. He readily put himself at their head, and, with what other forces he could procure, attacked the tyrant, who trusted more in his Singhillos predictions and conjuring superstitions than in his army; and fell on him with such bravery and success, that he forced him to flee, and refuge himself in an island in the Coanza, and then caused himself to be proclaimed, and acknowledged king<sup>o</sup>. c

He behaved with such prudence and moderation during the few months of his reign, that he gained the hearts not only of all the Christians, who now expected nothing less from him than the restoration of their religion, but of the more civilized part of the Metambans, to whom the tyrant had rendered himself odious, on account of the late cruelties he had exercised against them. One of his first cares, after his late success, should have been to have pursued and blocked him up closely in the island in which he had intrenched himself, where he might have easily starved him and his few troops; had he not withdrawn too soon away, and, by that wrong step, afforded him an opportunity of scraping up again his scattered Giagas, and tried his fortune once more against him. In this second fight Don John was unfortunately defeated and killed, and Mona Zingha had no sooner recovered his dominions, than he began to pursue his butcheries with more fury than ever, when, on a sudden, heaven declared itself once more against him, and the brave Don Francisco, the son of the deceased Don John, having raised some fresh forces against him, put an end to his life and tyranny in the very next engagement he had with him. This young prince, who had been a Christian from his infancy, and brought up under the care of the missionaries, being now the only surviving male heir to the throne, was quickly raised to it by the general choice of the council and nobility, and applied his utmost care to the revival of Christianity, and to the repairing of those grievous breaches which the late usurper had caused in it; but with what success our author doth not inform us, who closes up his history with the beginning of that monarch's reign<sup>p</sup>. d

WHETHER, therefore, that king hath kept the peace which was concluded between queen Zingha, and the Portuguese, or revived his title to that of Angola, we are no-where told, but only that these last have maintained themselves in their new conquests to this day, f and are still in possession of the most fertile and richest provinces in that kingdom. We observed before, that they had, for form sake, set up a prince of the blood upon the Angolic throne, in opposition to queen Zingha, who was the immediate heiress to it, which gave occasion to all the bloody wars which she waged against them, with various success, till she was prevailed upon, from religious motives, to desist from her claim, and to live at peace with them.

As for the titular king, whose name was Aarii, or Oarii, and who kept his residence upon the craggy rocks of Maopongo<sup>q</sup>, they had taken care so to curtail both his power and dominions, that he was no better than an indigent vassal to them. His chief grandeur and authority consisted chiefly in breeding up peacocks, adorning himself with their feathers, g and in his being the sole person who had that privilege; it being forbidden to all his subjects, a under pain of perpetual slavery, to do the like, or even to pluck a feather from them'. However, as they found him to be a martial and enterprising prince, who would not be long without making some noble attempt to enlarge his scanty boundaries, if not to recover his dominions, they thought fit to engage him in a war against queen Zingha, which would at once remove the scene of operation from their new conquests, and keep him employed against their enemy, instead of enterprising any thing for himself.

He accordingly acquitted himself with honour and success in this war, so long as they continued supporting him in it, that is, till jealousy made them slacken their succours, through an ill-judged policy, which, as we have seen a little higher, they quickly after found cause to repent. However, he did not long survive his disappointment; upon which they cast their eyes upon another prince of the same family, named N-gola Sedesio; and having confined him to the same restrictions, and obliged him to become a Christian, caused him to be proclaimed his successor, and to be invested with the same mock royalty.

He is succeeded by N-gola Sedesio.

The new king, who liked the Portuguese and their hard terms no better than his predecessor, made it his first and chiefest care to keep himself in the good graces and protection of queen Zingha, by such valuable yearly presents as he was able to send to her. He stood, indeed, in great need of it, as he was no less out of favour with the Portuguese, who, from several of his actions, had reason to suppose that he had apostatized, and was become a private enemy both to the Portuguese and their religion, though he still made outward profession of Christianity. This dissimulation, which might probably be owing to his fear of disobliging that princess, who was, as we have shewn in the latter part of her life, a most zealous patroness of Christianity, rather than to any danger of the Portuguese dethroning him during her life, or her sister's. But after her husband Mona Zingha, who succeeded her, had declared himself a public enemy to that religion and nation, it is not unlikely that he might be induced to pull off the mask, and not only to return to his old idolatry, but make some brave attempt to recover his dominions from them. This brought a grievous war upon him by the next year, in which he had the ill fortune to be defeated and taken prisoner. The loss of this battle was soon followed by that of his head, which was put in salt pickle, and sent from Loanda to Lisbon by the next fleet, which sailed thence on the following year.

With his death ended the small remains, or rather the mere shew and shadow, of the Angolic liberty, and with it we are obliged to end the history of it. The Portuguese being now become absolute masters of the whole, or at least of the best provinces of the kingdom, had now nothing left to do but to keep them under their subjection, by the most arbitrary imposts and exactions on the antient native lords, and to rule over those tributary rulers with a tyrannic sway, and by such other politic means as we are not likely to be informed of in haste by any of their writers. Those who have hitherto mentioned these their conquests in Ethiopia, and other parts of Africa, have endeavoured to palliate the seeming injustice of them, by representing the planting of Christianity amongst them as a more than sufficient amends for the loss of their liberty.

We will not take upon us to examine into the merits of that plea, nor enquire how far the religion they have planted among them deserves the name of Christianity, much less whether the propagating of it, which is pretended to be the chief motive of their subduing so many countries, were either really such, or, if so, whether it be justifiable before God. The Apostles and primitive preachers of the gospel never countenanced it; and, tho' frequently loaden with fetters, never imposed any on their converts, as an excellent bishop of their church justly urged, before the emperor Charles and his council. All that we think ourselves bound to say as impartial historians, is, that that plea might have been insisted on with a better grace, if the conversion, perseverance, and compliance, so far as relates to the morals of those subdued neophytes, did not so plainly appear, even from their own writings, to have been, like their submissive slavery, more the effect of a superior force in the conquerors, than of either conviction or choice in the conquered: which gives us but too much cause to suspect that they have represented the state of Christianity in those parts in an advantageous rather than in a true and genuine light.

However that be, we do not read that the Portuguese government have thought it proper, or perhaps safe, to amuse their Angolic subjects with the specious shew of a mock monarch of their nation, since the death of the revolted N-gola Sedesio above-mentioned, but have committed the sole command of the kingdom to the viceroy of Angola and his council; who, whatever decay or disaster may have attended the state of Christianity, for want of a sufficient number of missionaries, or sincerity in their new converts, have taken all due care, we may reasonably suppose, to secure their dominions, and the advantages of their extensive and beneficial commerce in all these parts.

Loango dis-

Whence so called.

THE kingdom of Loango, or, as others write it, Loanga and Looango, is the third and <sup>a</sup> last which, we observed before <sup>a</sup>, was a part of the great kingdom of Kongo, when in its utmost extent, but was afterwards dismembered from it, and, like that of Angola, spoken of in the foregoing chapter, erected itself into a separate and independent kingdom, under princes of their own. They had enjoyed their own monarchs long enough before these African parts were visited by the Europeans, though it is probable that they did not shake off the Kongoese yoke, nor coalesced into one government, all at once, but gradually, and at some distance of time, under their respective chiefs, under which they formed a number of small estates, till some one of them grew powerful enough to subdue all the rest <sup>b</sup>. It was formerly called The Land of the Oramas, who were the antient inhabitants of it; they are now called Lovangas, and Loangas, from the metropolis of the kingdom Lovango, of which we <sup>b</sup> shall speak in its proper place.

S E C T. I.

Its extent
from N. to S.

THIS kingdom extends itself along the African coast from the cape of St. Catherine, <sup>c</sup> under the 2d degree of south latitude, southwards, to the small river of Lovanda Louisa, on the 5th degree of the same, that is the length of three degrees, or 180 miles, from north to south, according to the generality of our modern geographers <sup>c</sup>; though some have stretched it to a much greater length; viz. from the cape of Lobo Gonzales on the north, quite to the river Zaire on the south, where, according to Bruno, that river divides it from the kingdom of Kongo proper <sup>d</sup>, according to which, it would extend itself above five degrees and a half, or 350 miles; but this extravagant extent is justly rejected, and the boundaries agreed by the latest writers <sup>e</sup>, to be the cape of St. Catherine and the river Lovanda above-mentioned, and the true extent of the whole kingdom from north to south to be only from the 2d to the 5th degree of south latitude abovesaid (A). <sup>d</sup>

From W. to E.

It stretches itself from west to east, or from Cape Negro on the Ethiopic coast to the inland, towards the Buchumelean mountains, (so called from their vast quantity of ivory, and droves of elephants) about 300 miles. It hath on the north the countries of the Ambous, on the east the territories of Pembo Sundi, from the last of which it is parted by the Zaire, and on the south the kingdoms of Cacongo and Angoy, and farther eastwards the country of the Pangecanguas <sup>f</sup>.

Division.

THE kingdom is divided into four principal provinces; viz. Lovangiri, Lovango-mongo, Chilongo, and Piri.

Lovangiri.

LOVANGIRI is mostly watered by abundance of small rivers, very fertile and well inhabited. The natives apply themselves chiefly to the cultivating of their grounds, except a small part, <sup>e</sup> which are employed in the weaving of cloths and linen; notwithstanding which, they are reckoned better soldiers than those of the other three provinces. They live mostly upon fish, though their country produces much the same variety of grain, fruits, and other provisions,

(A) It is very probable that Odoardo Lopez, from whose memoirs Pigafet settled these limits, might suppose all the territories lying between the capes of St. Catherine and Gonzales, concerning which we to this day know so little, except the sea-coasts, to belong to the kings of Loango on that side; and that Bruno might, in the like manner, imagine the two inconsiderable kingdoms of Cacongo and Angoy, which part those of Loango and Kongo on that side, to be only provinces of the former, as lying on the same side of the Zaire, and so concluded that that river was the southern boundary of it. But whatever was the cause of their mistake, experience hath long since convinced the world that it was a very considerable one (1).

(1) Vide La Croix, vol. iii. lib. ii. c. 1. Davity, Dapper, Labat, & al. ubi supra.

a and breeds much the same sorts of tame and wild beasts, fowls, &c. that have been described in the two foregoing chapters, and on which we need not therefore dwell any longer. This is the most southern province in the kingdom, and borders upon that of Cacongo.

LOANGO-MONGO lieth north-east of that of Loangiri, and is spacious and fertile, particularly in palm-trees, the oil of which is extracted here in great quantities, and excellent in its kind. The inhabitants are employed in weaving of variety of linen and cloths peculiar to those parts<sup>2</sup>. And though this is an inland province, many of them are addicted to commerce, which may be chiefly owing to the metropolis of the kingdom, and residence of its monarchs, being fixed in one of the pleasantest parts of it, and at no great distance from the sea-coast (B), as we shall shew in the sequel.

b CYLONGO, or, as others call it, Chylongo, is a maritime province, and the largest and most populous of all the four. It is situate between the rivers of Quila on the south, and Combi on the north, which last divides it from Majumba, once a small kingdom of itself, but now a conquered province of this. Its plains are spacious and fertile, and sheltered at a distance by ridges of high mountains, and its inhabitants carry on a very considerable commerce, especially of elephants teeth, though in other respects they are extremely rude and unpolished. On the coast stands the Cabo Negro, or black cape, so called by the Portuguese, on account of its dark appearance at a distance, the whole promontory being covered with trees. Within-side of it the sea forms a kind of semicircle, or haven, called by the inhabitants The Road of Majumba, and is about half a league long from the promontory above-mentioned, to the opposite or southern shore, which last lies as low as the other is high. The misfortune is, that the sea, in blustering weather, throws such vast heaps of sand into the haven, as quite choak up the mouth of the river Combi<sup>3</sup>.

THE last province is that of Piri, which lies north of those of Cylongo and Loango-mongo. It is low and flat, yet abounds with variety of fruit and other trees, and is well peopled and cultivated. The inhabitants are naturally peaceable, and scarcely know what war is. They have plenty of cattle and fowl both wild and tame, and delight much in hunting, by which, joined to the milk of their cattle, they get their chief food; on which account they are said to tenant more land than those of the other three provinces, and to be the most valued and favoured by their monarchs.

d THERE are abundance of towns and villages in all those provinces, concerning most of which we know little else but their names, and have, indeed, little worth our notice, either for their populousness, commerce, manufactures, or elegance of building, as the reader will easily judge by the short description we shall now give him of the metropolis of all; which, though mean in all other respects to an European, doth yet by far exceed all the rest.

It is situate, as we hinted a little higher, in the province of Loango-mongo, under the latitude of four degrees and a half south, and about five or six miles from the sea-coast. It is called Loango, or Lovango, and Banza Loangiri, but by the natives Boari, or Boori, and is very airy and spacious, as the houses are not contiguous to each other. The streets are wide, and kept very clean, and the sides are lined with palm-trees, bananas, and bacavas, which are a grateful shelter to the houses; before and most of those of the better sort have the same behind, or even quite round, by way of ornament. In the center of the city, facing the royal palace, is a great square, of a prodigious largeness, and the palace itself, which forms another square of a mile and a half in compass, is surrounded with a palisado of stately palm-trees. It consists of a number of houses, among which are those of his women, which are large enough to lodge seven or eight of them together, and are about ten in number. These are strictly guarded, none of them being permitted to stir out without express leave, either of the king or one of his chief ministers. These women, we are told, amount to about 150, and are easily distinguished by their ivory bracelets; and if any of them are found faithless, both they and their paramours are sure to be thrown down from the top of an high adjacent mountain, very steep and craggy, so that their bodies are dashed in pieces, before they have reached half-way to the bottom; and this severe punishment is inflicted without mercy<sup>4</sup>.

THE houses of the king, his halls of audience, and other offices, are on the west side, facing the plain area above-mentioned, in which last he holds his councils of war, in the same manner for the sake of living a more tranquil and retired life. But he grew quickly tired of his new abode, and removed it nearer to the sea-side, to the place we are now speaking of, which hath continued ever since to be the Bowza, or royal residence, of his successors, and not only so, but their birth-place likewise (2).

as is done by the kings of Kongo *; and there also feasts his prime officers, and sometimes his whole army. From this plain likewise there runs a great wide street, some musket-shots from the place, where there is a considerable market kept every day, which begins at ten o'clock, and where there are sold great quantities and variety of palm cloths, as also provisions for the mouth, as meal, poultry, fish, wine, corn, oil, &c. great quantities of elephants teeth were formerly sold likewise at this place, which are since removed to the port of Kanga. In this market-place is also a famous temple and Mokisso, or idol, called Mokisso a Loango, which was held in great veneration both by the kings and people; and Battel tells us, that, when he was there, the prince who was then reigning was himself one of the conjurers, or, as he elsewhere explains that word, a priest to that deity †.

As to the other houses of this metropolis, they are for the most part oblong, and covered in such a manner, as that the middle part of the top is flat, much after the Italian form, and the rest of the covering comes down with a slope. The whole is supported by stout wooden pillars and cross beams; those that sustain the highest part are ten or twelve feet higher than the side ones; which last are of a height proportionable to the largeness of the building.

THE common houses have also much the same symmetry, and are higher or lower according to their length and breadth. They have usually three or four rooms, as with us in Europe, but no stories upon one another. The rooms in which they deposit their money and other valuables, have commonly a back door, which they fasten with a padlock. Every house is fenced round with a hedge of palm-twigs, canes, bulrushes, and such-like materials. Some of those hedges inclose seven, or eight, or more houses. The families that dwell in them commonly live very peaceably and friendly together, are faithful to, and ready to assist each other, upon all occasions, except when they suspect any one of magic or sorcery. The chief furniture of their houses consists in variety of pots and kettles, calabashes, baskets, mats, and benches, where they lay their clothes, weapons, and other utensils ‡.

THE bay of Loango, though reckoned pretty good, hath, nevertheless, a bank on the north side of its mouth or entrance, which runs about half a league along the coast, and hath not above two fathoms and a half of water. But when one hath got over it, one comes to five fathoms and a half, which continues so till within a small cannon-shot of the land, where one meets but with three fathoms, and a reddish bottom, and that is the place where the vessels commonly anchor. The bay is easily known by the high reddish mountains which shew themselves on the sea-side, and are different from all others on that coast. The many large rivers that come down from the continent cause the currents to be so strong and rapid towards the north, during almost the whole year, that it is very difficult to weather them, and gain a southern course. The only months in which this may be done with somewhat greater safety and ease, are those of January, February, March, and April; all the rest of the year the currents flow so strong, that even coasters must keep at least ten or twelve leagues off the land †.

THE port, or landing place of Loango, is at the small village of Kanga, two leagues north of the Angra, or bay of Almadias. This port is particularly famous for a Mokisso, or idol, of the feminine kind, as its name Gomberi implies. These Mokissos are very common all over these parts, though most of them of the male kind. This female one is placed in a house, or temple, called Munsa Gomberi, and is attended by an old priestess, who, whenever any of her festivals are celebrated, which are commonly done with the music of drums and hard drinking, hath an art to speak from under-ground, and convey her voice in such a manner, that the people verily believe it is the statue that speaks ‡.

ABOUT two leagues to the east of Loango is the town of Longeri, where all the kings are interred; the place, which is ten roods, or two acres and a half, in compass, is surrounded with a kind of palisade of elephants teeth. The other towns and places of note in this kingdom have hardly any thing worth mentioning, except that they are commonly the largest which are nearest the capital, and grow smaller and less populous the farther they spread into the inlands. Among the former are that of Makondo, the usual residence of the queen mother, Sekie, and Kate, which is that of his sisters, and Caja, or Kaye, which is the residence of the heir apparent to the crown, which last is situate on the river Kaye, more properly known by the name of Loangolowise, and Cholongo, or Kilongo, the capital of the province of its name, and the residence of its Manibloor, or governor, who is, in some measure, absolute in it, and after whose death the people may choose another without the king of Loango's leave. It is situate near the cape of Kilongo, about thirty miles south of Majumba, and is, by some authors, called Salage, and Salasy §; and thus much may suffice for the description of the four provinces of Loango proper, as we may rightly stile it.

<sup>a</sup> BUT as we lately observed that some authors have stretched its limits both on the north and south, and have included into them on the south the kingdoms of Cacongo and Angoy, and on the north side the other four provinces of Majumba, Sette, Camma, and Gobbi, quite up to the cape Lobo Gonzales; all which, perhaps, may have been formerly part of Loango, either by conquest or alliance, though now dismembered from it, our readers will not be displeased if we here insert the little we know concerning them, that may be worth their notice, though not to be made a separate article of <sup>Other states of more along the coast.</sup> <sup>c</sup>.

WE begin with Majumba, or, as others write it, Mayomba, which is not only dependent upon, but contiguous to, the kingdom of Loango, being severed from it by the river Combi, which forms its bay and that of Loango, already described, and lies in three degrees and a half of south latitude. The territory extends itself considerably eastwards towards the inland, and hath a salt lake above five leagues in compass, which empties itself into the sea, by some rivulets, about half a league northward of Cape Negro. The town, or rather village, of Majumba, extends itself a considerable length along the coast, but lies so low, that the inhabitants are frequently obliged to remove their habitations at high water, to some of the neighbouring high lands. The river Banna, which runs on the back of the town, is saltish; towards the mouth it affords a good fishery for oysters, and, though shallow there, by reason of the sands thrown into it by the tide, yet is deep and wide enough to carry a great number of canoes, which bring the red or logwood in great quantities into the port, from the province of Sette, where it grows in abundance, and makes the carriage of it from one to the other much easier and cheaper for the Portuguese and others, who export it from thence <sup>Town and port.</sup> <sup>River Banna.</sup> <sup>Logwood traffick.</sup> <sup>d</sup>; especially as the river extends itself above 50 leagues into the inland.

THE territory of Majumba is dry and sandy, and produces little or no grain, but affords plenty of bananas and palm-trees, of the latter of which they make great quantities of excellent wine; and roots of maxondo, which they use instead of bread. The lakes and rivers abound with fish, which is their chief food. The women fetch the oysters out of the Banna above-mentioned in large trays, which, being opened and smoked, will, like other fish dressed in the same way, continue good for several months. The people are very rude and savage, much given to heathenish and idolatrous superstitions; they use circumcision like the Abissinians, Angolans, &c. <sup>Soil and produce.</sup> <sup>e</sup> They have plenty of game, both small and great, and hunt with their country dogs, about whose necks they are obliged to hang wooden clappers, in order to follow them by the noise, they not being able to bark. This defect makes the Portuguese and other European dogs be so much esteemed, that one of our authors tells us he saw one of them sold for thirty pounds. The government of this province is commonly given to a counsellor of state, called Manihomba, or homma, who is also prince of Loangiri, and gives no other account to the king of Loango but of the logwood, which is ten per cent. In other cases, he is in some measure absolute, and a tyrant over the people. Here was likewise formerly a great commerce for elephants teeth, which also brought in a considerable income, but which is now dwindled to little or nothing. <sup>Game. Their dogs do not bark.</sup> <sup>Government.</sup>

THE people call themselves Marambas, from a Fetisso, or idol of that name, which is worshipped all over the country, and to which they are all, males and females, dedicated, from the twelfth year of their age (C). This idol is always carried before the Mani-hamma, or governor, where-ever he goes; and whenever he eats and drinks, the first bit of meat, and the first cup of wine, are always offered to it. The superstitious people likewise consult it upon all occasions, such as about the success of their hunting, fishery, sickness, journies, and the like; and if any person is supposed to have been taken off by witchcraft, which is, it seems, a thing very common amongst them, the person or persons suspected, if ever so many, as it often happens when a great man dies, are obliged to come and clear themselves before the idol. <sup>Religion. Idol Maramba.</sup> <sup>How consulted.</sup>

(C) This ceremony is performed by their Gangas, or priests, a set of pretended wizards and conjurers, who attend on the idol and all its superstitious rites. When those candidates are of a fit age to be consecrated to that pretended deity, they apply to the Gangas, who immediately shut them up in a dark room, and confine them to a low diet; how long we are not told. After which they are let out, and permitted to go abroad, but under a strict prohibition, not to speak to any person, upon any occasion, how urgent soever, during a certain number of days. Dreadful confinements both these! but which must be undergone, or else they are sure to be denied admission to the idol of Maramba. But when duly performed, they are brought before it, where the Ganga makes a couple of incisions, in the form of a half-moon, upon the fore-part of their shoulders, and they are sworn by the blood that issues out of them, to be true to Maramba. Those initiated persons are forbidden afterwards the eating of some kinds of flesh or fish, and are enjoined some other penances; the omission of which, they are made to believe, would be attended with sickness, death, or other misfortunes. They have then a relic of their deity given to them, which they wear about their necks, and hanging under their left arm (3).

(3) Battel in Purchas, vol. ii. p. 982.

The ceremony is performed by kneeling and embracing the statue in their arms, and crying out aloud, "I come to be tried before thee of Maramba;" and if the person is guilty, though the fact was committed 20 years before, the criminal falls down dead upon the spot; if innocent, escapes harmless, and is absolved; and this superstition, we are told by an eye-witness, prevails from Majumba quite to the cape Gonzales *.

Traffick.

Kingdom of Cacongo convenient for traffick.

ADJOINING to the province of Majumba runs from west to east the extensive country of Sette, divided from it only by the river of its name. It was once a kingdom of itself, but hath been reduced under that of Loango. It is chiefly remarkable for the vast quantity of logwood which it produces, and which the inhabitants call Tacool, and traffick in all over the coasts of Angola, Kongo, and Loango, but chiefly with the natives, from whom the Portuguese and Europeans buy it. They have two sorts of it, the one called Quines, which is chiefly bought up by the Portuguese, but is reckoned of no value in any of those African countries; the other, which is called Bisseffe, and is heavier, firmer, and of a deeper red, is that which is most in use among all the blacks along these coasts. The root of it, which they call Angansi Bisseffe, is still harder, and of a deeper tinge, and more esteemed among them (D). This country produces likewise variety of fruit and other trees; and their woods, which are of vast extent, do swarm with wild beasts, which, with their millet and bananas, is the chief food of the inhabitants; they breed likewise some goats, and tame poultry, but in no great quantity †.

BETWEEN the province of Sette and the cape of Lobo Gonzales, are those of Camma and Gobbi, whose inhabitants are perpetually at war with each other, and whose country is intersected with lakes and rivers, which afford plenty of fish, but are infested with sea horses, which do great mischief both on land and water ‡, and particularly to the canoes and other vessels which are continually plying to and fro upon those rivers and marshes. The language, manners, and customs of both these nations, are almost the same with those of Loango. They both allow of polygamy, and are so little tainted with jealousy, that they will compliment their friends, or even strangers that come to them, with the company of one or two of their own wives; which among these is so far from being looked upon as a reproach, that they are as much esteemed and regarded for it by the rest, as if the husband had given them a severe drubbing; which, it seems, is here looked upon as one of the most undoubted marks of conjugal affection ¶. The weapons they use in their wars, one province against another, are the short pike, bow and arrows, sword and dagger; but since the Europeans, especially the Dutch, have been acquainted with these coasts, they have furnished them with fire-arms, gun-powder, and balls, besides utensils for the kitchen, as variety of brass pots and kettles, and several sorts of coarse cloths. The chief town of Gobbi lies about a day's journey from the sea. Their rivers abound with water-elephants and variety of other fish; but the land breeds little else but beasts of prey *. The principal commerce with the natives, besides the logwood already mentioned, consists chiefly in elephants teeth and tails (E), the hair of which is highly valued, and used for several curious purposes, elsewhere mentioned †. And thus much may suffice for those coasts and countries which lie on the north side of the kingdom of Loango, to the cape Gonzales.

THOSE on the south, situate between the Loanga-lowisa and the Zaire, are the kingdoms of Cacongo and Angoy; to the former of them Father Morella, a Capuchin missionary, who had seen most of the countries along these coasts, makes no scruple to give by far the preference, whether for commodiousness or profit ‡. It is situate between three considerable sea

(D) This wood the inhabitants of Loango go into the Settean province to buy, and carry on a large traffick of it, not only with the European merchants, but likewise with the kingdoms of Kongo, Angola, &c. Their first care, after the trees are cut down and lopped, is to convey them to the river Banna, whence they are brought down in floats to Majumba. There they cause them to be sawn into billets of about five or six feet in length, nine inches in breadth, and three in thickness. The Portuguese and other Europeans come and purchase the first sort called Quines above-mentioned; after which the rest is dispersed by the Loangans all along the coasts, down to the kingdom of Benguela, and thence into the inlands of Angola, Kongo, &c. (4).

(E) It was in a neighbouring principality to this, on the same coasts, that our countryman Andrew Battel, often quoted in this chapter from Purchas, came with his negro slaves, to traffick for elephants teeth and tails. The country lies about eight days journey north of Majumba, and a little to the eastward of Cabo Negro, and is called Mani-Kesek. Here he had not been above a month, before he had purchased 20,000 of them, which he soon exchanged with the Portuguese for 30 slaves, all his other charges deducted.

During his stay he sent a present of a looking glass, by one of his negroes, to the Mani, or prince; who was so highly delighted with it, that he sent him, in return, four large elephants teeth, by his own servant, with an invitation for any Portuguese or European ship to come into his territory, a little north of Cape Negro, promising to cause fires to be made to direct them to the landing-place, no European nation having as yet frequented those parts (5).

- a ports, much frequented by foreigners; viz. that of Loango, lately described, and by far the best; that of Cobinda, and that of Cacongo; though this last is not quite so safe. The territory of this kingdom is mostly flat, the air wholsomer than that of Kongo or Angola, and the soil more fertile too, by reason of its frequent showers, and fatness of its black mould, which, in the other kingdoms lately described, is either chalky or sandy. The inhabitants are likewise more polite and civilized, though no less superstitiously addicted to the same heathenish rites than all their neighbours; yet, when they lately laboured, says our Capuchin, under a grievous pestilence, which carried off myriads of them, they made no scruple to bury all the idols of their gods, saying, If they cannot assist us under such grievous calamities as this, it is in vain to expect any help from them. Its ports, rivers, and soil.
- b THE chief rivers of this kingdom are Cacongo, the Kaja, and the Cobinda. The first of which runs four leagues south of the Kaja, and seven to the north of the Cabinda, and is, according to Battel, navigable by boats of ten tons carriage. This river runs almost the whole length of the kingdom from east to west, and, after a course of about 80 or 90 miles, falls into the sea, under the fifth degree of south latitude. About four miles south of its mouth is the town, or rather village, of Malemba, where the sea makes a kind of semicircular bay, which affords a convenient road for the vessels that traffick thither, all the coast, between the Cacongo and Zaire, as is that of the kingdom of Angoy, being extremely dangerous, and full of rocks and shelves. The lands on each side are fertile and delightful, and abound with elephants teeth. Those the Membates, who are situate on the other side of the Zaire, come and fetch, and carry them to the port of Pinda, where the Portuguese, or any other Europeans, buy and export them<sup>b</sup>. This country is governed by its own hereditary princes, but is, we are told, under the protection of, if not tributary to, the kings of Loango<sup>c</sup>. They were formerly vassals to them, but shook off the yoke soon after those princes had shook off that of the kings of Kongo; but are still under their protection, on account of their frequent wars with their neighbours the Mani, or princes of Angoy<sup>d</sup>. Dapper, who gives the natives of Cacongo, upon what authority he doth not tell us, no better character than that of cheats, treacherous, forsworn, turbulent, yet base and cowardly, adds, that they would stand an indifferent chance from their Angoyan neighbours, if the king of Loango did not protect them against them. Fertility.
- c THEY are, however, much addicted to traffick with the Europeans, especially with the Dutch, from whom they purchase a great variety of European goods, as coarse cloths, knit caps, hatchets, and other iron tools, linen, and other commodities, which they go and exchange for slaves at Kongo, Angola, and other African states. The Europeans that traffick with them, do it with more ease, and without being obliged to make such exorbitant presents to the prince of Cacongo as they do in other countries; he being under a sort of restriction, by virtue of some peculiar law, not to meddle with any of their effects; whereas other neighbouring kings on each side keep a constant guard at the mouth of the Sonbo, to oblige passengers to pay the usual imposts, and to secure their respective realms from foreign invaders<sup>e</sup>. Government.
- d THE last kingdom upon the Loango coast is Angoy, called by some Goy, and lies between that of Cacongo, last mentioned, on the north, and that of Kongo on the south, being severed from the former by the river Cabinda, and from the latter by the Zaire. It is but of small extent either way, as it was formerly only a vassal province of Cacongo, till the Mani, or prince, of it, who had married a Portuguese's daughter, was persuaded by his father-in-law to erect it into an independent kingdom. The juncture was altogether favourable, as the king of Loango had but just before revolted from that of Kongo, and that of Cacongo from him; so that whilst they were debating the controversy with each other, he, without declaring himself on any side, set up for a king<sup>f</sup>. The country, we are told, is full of woods and thickets, and hath no towns of note except Bomangoy, situate on the north banks of the Zaire, and not far above the mouth of it<sup>g</sup>. Its chief port is Cabinda, called by others Kabenda and Cubenda, situate on the mouth of the river of its name, about five leagues north of the cape Palmerino, on the north side of the Zaire's mouth<sup>h</sup>. The bay lies very commodious for trade, wooding and watering on the sea-shore. It is flat and marshy in some places, but ascends gradually about three miles into the inland, and then forms itself into a ridge of hills, which spread themselves lengthwise; on the ascent of which is situate the king's father's town, where he constantly keeps a stock of wood ready cut, to sell to foreign ships at an easy rate, and hath it carried to the beach, in order to be shipped off. From these wood-piles, south-west along the bay, lie scattered a number of fishermen's huts, on each side a small fresh-water river, which falls into the bay; and thence it is they bring all their water in casks, which they roll along the beach to the mouth of the river, which is so shallow, that, even at full flood, it can only be entered with a yawl, carrying a cask or two. The town, or rather village, of Cabinda, stands on the round point of the bay, looking Their traffick with the Europeans.
- e THE king touches none of their effects.
- f The kingdom of Angoy;
- g The king made independent.
- h Its bay.
- i Wood reserved for sale.
- j The port very shallow.

ing to the westward, and the English factory on the south-west of the road, at some distance, a north-east, from the town. But the Portuguese, Dutch, and other Europeans, do likewise come to this port for water and provisions<sup>1</sup>.

Mean houses.

THE houses, or rather huts, make a wretched appearance, being built of dirt and reeds, and fitter to lodge insects, such as this country swarms with, than human creatures. Those which belong to the Mani, or prince, and to the Maffukka, or receiver of the whites, though built of the same materials, make a somewhat better figure, yet such as would hardly be worth describing but for their peculiar oddness, as the reader may see by the sketch in the margin, which our author hath given us of both (F). The country round the bay is mostly barren, which is chiefly owing to the native laziness of the inhabitants, which often occasions a dear-
Soil about the bay. ness of provisions, tho' they sell them reasonable enough, when there are but few ships in the
Plenty of provisions. road. They breed no cattle here except some hogs, but have plenty of poultry, both which Various animals. are sold pretty cheap. The wild beasts swarm so in their woods, that they destroy all the tame
Birds. kind. Some monkeys have been brought away from thence, which in features and stature
Oysters. much resembled the human species<sup>k</sup>. Civet-cats are here in great plenty, and parrots may be bought here for three or four ordinary knives<sup>l</sup>. The inhabitants follow the fishing trade more than any other, both at sea and in their rivers; and the coasts abound so with oysters, that the sailors quickly load their boats with them, they being found lying in great heaps like small rocks. The natives fish both on the beach and in the bay with drag-nets, which have long canes, fixed at equal distances, instead of corks, to shew when any fish is caught. These nets are made of a peculiar root, which being beaten, becomes spinable like hemp<sup>m</sup>.

THEIR dress is much the same with that of the Kongoese, Angolans, &c.; that of the better sort is only a piece of cotton thrown over their shoulders, and another girt about their loins, which comes down below the knee, more or less, as they can afford; whilst the meaner sort content themselves with a short apron; and these clothes they purchase in exchange for slaves and elephants teeth. They wear their hair in various forms, according to their quality. The queen, whom our author was admitted to see, had hers shaved close on the crown, and little tufts left all around on the sides. Others wear it plaited in different tresses; all of them are fond of adorning their heads, necks, arms, and legs, with variety of trinkets, and some of them of the superstitious kind, as amulets and charms, which they purchase from their juggling priests; and none of them worth any farther notice. They allow of polygamy, as most of Ornaments. these countries do; and she that is the most beloved hath the rest under her command, but is herself no less liable to be turned out if she be found disloyal. The ladies of the royal blood have the peculiar privilege of chusing their husbands out of any, even of the meanest rank, and have power of life and death over them; and, if caught tripping, over their paramours. Our author, during his abode at Cabinda, saw a young woman sold for a slave to the Portuguese, merely on a bare suspicion of her having been too free with one of those husbands; tho' these last are far enough from being intitled to expect the same fidelity from their royal dames. Women of the lower rank are obliged, when they receive a stranger, to admit them for a night or two into their embraces; though their husbands are, by that means, deprived of them all that time. This obliged the missionaries, whenever they came into their houses, to order their Polygamy. interpreters to give immediate notice, that none of that sex might enter within their doors.

THEIR religion chiefly consists in a variety of superstitious customs, such as anointing their public and domestic idols with a kind of red wood, powdered, on the first day of the moon; and on its first appearance to pay a kind of worship to it. Thus, if it happens to shine clear and bright, they cry out, Thus may I renew my life as thou dost; but if the air is cloudy, they imagine she hath lost her virtue, and forbear their address to her; and this sort of devotion is more peculiarly observed by the women. On the full moon they all anoint their amulets, which is a little horn, worn pendent on their neck, with some oil, which their juggling

(F) "I was not a little surprised, says our Capuchin, at the first sight of the Mani or governor's house, which, at a distance, appeared to me as a well fortified citadel, encompassed about with walls, and not at all resembling the workmanship of the negroes. But as you approach it nearer, you find those walls to be no other than rows of thick pallisades, stuck into the ground five thick, and ruddled up to the top with others of the same thickness. Within there were two broad paths, which split themselves into several lesser ones. The rooms are all hung within with a curious sort of mats, made of osiers of different colours. It seemed therefore ridiculous to me," continues he,

"that their houses should be built of nothing but straw, osiers, and slates, and yet be defended with brass cannon."

That of the Maffukka, he describes as follows, "It was built of the same materials, but very large, and well contrived; it had several arched rooms, and within each of them two small brass cannon, which, together with two larger ones at the gate, made in all 18. These guns they had purchased from the whites, in exchange for slaves, elephants teeth, &c. and the king's palace seemed to me to be not unlike this last (6)."

<sup>a</sup> priests give, or rather sell them. We do not read of any victims they sacrifice to their idols, though they consult them commonly about the success of a journey, war, thefts, and such-like; and persons suspected or accused of any crime, are obliged to come and clear themselves before them in the manner we have already hinted. Almost all the natives have one of these idols before their doors, some about five or six feet high, and others shorter, but all of them clumsily carved<sup>n</sup>. And thus much may suffice, with respect to the adjacent countries to the kingdom of Loango. We shall only add, that the king of Kongo styles himself still king and lord of all those petty kingdoms, as well as of that of Loango; though neither this, nor any of the rest, either acknowledge him, or pay any tribute to him.

In the year 1631 the count of Sonho entered this of Angoy with a vast army, and having driven the king out of it, settled his son upon the throne. This son, being no less warlike than his father, endeavoured to do the same by that of Cacongo, entered his dominions, plundered his capital, and gained several advantages over him, but without being able to drive him out<sup>o</sup>. And hence the wars we have taken notice of, which those two rival kings frequently waged against each other, that of Cacongo being still assisted by his ally of Loango, and that of Angoy by the counts of Sonho.

S E C T. II.

<sup>c</sup> WE have already hinted that this kingdom extends itself from three degrees and a half to five degrees of south latitude, and consequently is nearly as hot as any under the torrid zone, and much hotter than those of Kongo and Angola; nevertheless, we do not find but that it is as healthy and pleasant, and its soil as fertile and capable of improvement, as any of them, were not the natives, like all the rest along these coasts, naturally lazy, and too averse to the fatigues of agriculture to plant or sow more than will barely suffice the current wants of each year. Whence it frequently happens, that a bad season is usually followed by a famine, for want of laying up a proper store against such times. They commonly content themselves with bread and fish, and such fruits, greens, and pulse, as the ground naturally produces, and which being the same as grow in Kongo, and other parts above-mentioned, need not be here repeated. They have several sorts of pease and beans, large and small millet, of all which the ground yields them three crops in the year<sup>a</sup>.

<sup>d</sup> THEIR palm, banana, and other trees, produce excellent fruits, of which they make like-wise excellent wines, which they prefer to those that come from Europe. The cotton and pimento trees grow wild, as well as the paradise grain, tho' the last not in such quantities. The Enzanda, Alicandi, and Metamba, afford them plenty of materials for cloathing and other uses, as building and covering their houses (G), and making their ships and smaller vessels, &c. Sugar-canes, cassia, and tobacco, grow here plentifully; not so the cocoas, oranges, and limons, which are not so regarded and cultivated by the indolent inhabitants. We say nothing of a great variety of roots, herbs, fruits, grain, and other vegetables, which they

(G) The Metamba above-mentioned, for instance, which grows every-where in this country, not only affords a very pleasant wine, though not so strong as that of the palm-tree, but likewise timber for rafters, laths, and seats for their houses, and leaves for covering them, which fence them from wind and rain as well as any tiling; to which we may add, that most of the cloth which is used in this kingdom, both for cloathing and current money, is made of those leaves (6).

The Alicondi, or Alecunde, grows to such a vast bulk, that twelve men can hardly fathom the trunks of some of them, and spreads itself out like our largest oaks. Some of them are hollow, and retain great quantities of water; one of our authors believes near 40 tons, which, in this dry and hot clime, is no small relief to vast numbers of its natives (7). Another author observes, that this tree, which is immeasurably large, and commonly hollow at the bottom, affords a comfortable shelter to hogs; the fruit, which is much like our pumpions, hangs by a stalk, about the bigness of a man's finger, and is from two to three feet in length. The shell, when dried and cleared within, serves for vessels to keep or carry wine, oil, and other liquors in.

And the inner rind of the tree, when soaked and well beat, yields a kind of spinable stuff, much stronger and durable than hemp (8).

The natives usually fix some hollow pieces of wood, like trunks, upon the branches of the trees, which they never fail, at the end of the year, to find full of honey, which they turn to their use, after they have smoaked the bees to death (9).

bread of, or use for food, which, with a little more industry, might be produced in such abundance, that they need not be under that frequent danger they are in of being almost depopulated by their grievous famines. But besides their aversion to cultivate more ground than serves them from hand to mouth, and which they commit the care of to their wives and slaves, they seem to be naturally made for abstinence; and an European can hardly forbear wondering to see them so contented and merry, singing, smoking, and dancing, under the most pinching scarcity <sup>b</sup>.

THEY have but little cattle of any sort except goats, and that which hath been brought hither from other parts hath died so fast, that it hath discouraged all farther attempts of that kind; hogs they have in great plenty, and poultry is so very cheap, that six penny-worth of beads will purchase 30 of them. Pheasants, partridges, and other wild-fowl are still in greater abundance, and hardly bear any price. They have a land bird bigger than a swan, and shaped like the hern, whose plume is white and black, with a bare place on the breast, made so with its bill. This bids fairer to be the true pelican, than that which the Portuguese call by that name, which is white, and of the bigness of a goose, which last is very common in this kingdom <sup>c</sup>. Among wild beasts, they have the fine zebra, and multitudes of elephants, whose teeth they exchange with the Europeans for iron to make warlike and other tools with <sup>d</sup>.

THEY catch great quantities of fish on their coast: one way of taking them is by carping irons. To this purpose they daily watch a large fish of the bigness of a grampus, which comes constantly to feed along the shore, and drives whole shoals of the smaller kind before him, which are then easily caught. If a great one chanceth to run himself on the shore, the natives immediately set about freeing him again, which is as much as four or five stout men can do. They call those creatures Emboaks, or dogs, and will not suffer any man to scare them <sup>e</sup>. In bays, rivers, and shallow water, they have another odd way of catching them, by mats made of rushes, some of them 300 yards long, which they set afloat on the surface, with pendant rushes on the sides, which frighten the fish, and make them leap upon the mat, where the men, drawing it into a narrow compass, as they do their nets, do easily catch them.

THE natives, who are called Bramas, are tall, stout, well-shaped, and well-behaved, though formerly wild and inhuman cannibals. They use circumcision, and trade chiefly among themselves. They are industrious and vigilant, where gain is to be got, yet friendly and generous to one another; very fond of their palm-wine, yet despising that of the grape. They are libidinous to a high degree, and very jealous of their wives. They carry on variety of trades and handicrafts, as weavers, smiths, carpenters, bed-makers, potters, canoe-makers, fishermen, besides traders and merchants: the misfortune is, that the handicraftsmen are so fond of their old ways, and their tools so clumsy and ill contrived, that, like those of Kongo, formerly described <sup>f</sup>, it takes them up ten times more time and pains to bring out an imperfect piece of work in their way, than it would if they were better provided with tools for their purpose. This is in nothing so visible as in their weaving, where, for want of a proper loom, a workman shall be as long in finishing one piece for a suit, as might have completed twelve or fifteen.

THEIR dress is most commonly of their own manufacture, being chiefly of cloth, made either of the leaves of the palm or some other tree of the like nature; but the better sort are made of the former, and with no small time and pains. The young palm-shoots are first carefully cropt and dried, and then soaked and softened in palm-wine, and well rubbed with the hand. These, being spun and woven, are made into suits for the better sort, which hang round the body, from the girdle down to the feet. They have four sorts of these woven suits; the richest, which is flowered with divers colours, and with various other figures, are peculiar to their monarchs, and such of his nobles as have his express leave to wear them. The second sort is not half so finely spun and wrought as the first, yet doth, at a small distance, make almost as fine a shew, being figured and contrived much after the same manner, that it will require a nice eye to distinguish them, unless by examining them on the wrong side, where the difference is more visible. The two other sorts, which are woven plain, or, at most, only pinked like some of our European stuffs, are still much coarser, and only worn by the plebeians and slaves. These, like the former, come down only from the girdle to the ankles, and those of the slaves only to the knee. The rest of the body, from the waist to the head, is naked, and only ornamented with bracelets of various sorts and materials, according to the rank of the wearers; some are of gold, silver, brass, or other coarser metals, made like a chain, others of ivory, glass beads of several colours, and such-like.

THE men are obliged, moreover, to wear the skin of a wild or tame cat; the better sort have them of martin, otter, civet, or other valuable fur: some of them, called enkinie, are beautifully spotted, but these are only worn by the king, and such of his court as are authorised

- a by him. Both he and they affect frequently to wear five or six sorts of them, nicely sown together, and stuck with parrot's and other birds fine feathers, of various colours, disposed in form of a rose, and hanging just before their privities, the skirts of the furs being hemmed about with a kind of nice string of elephants hair, to which they hang a number of little bells, which make a strange tinkling at every motion of the body, and at every step they take. All these various garments are tied about the middle with a rich girdle going several times about the body, and some of them curiously wrought, of the same materials with their richest clothes.<sup>Fine girdles.</sup> Those of the better sort wear two of those girdles, one above the other, and richly adorned and variegated. They wear about their necks, wrists, and legs, several rounds of beads of coral, ivory, round shells of a beautiful hue, chains of copper, tin, or iron, of a triangular fashion, and brought from Europe.<sup>Various ornaments.</sup> Over their shoulders they wear a kind of sack knotted, about three-fourths of a yard long, and with a small hole just big enough to put their hand in; and this serves to carry their calabash, pipes, tobacco, and other provisions. Their heads are covered with a knit cap, which fits close upon them; and, as they never go without arms, they commonly hold a cutlass, sword, or bow, in their hand.

- THE women's dress is much like that of the men, excepting that they wear no girdle, and that their petticoats hang no lower than the knee: those of the richer sort, will throw over it a piece of some fine European stuff or linen. The head and upper parts of the body are naked, as well as their legs, except that they have collars, bracelets of coral, and other trinkets, about their necks, arms, and legs. Both sexes wear rings of richer or baser metal, according to their rank, which they look upon as amulets and preservatives; and both colour their bodies all over with a red wood called Takeel, and ground upon a stone.<sup>Dress of the women.</sup>

THEY allow polygamy: the richer sort have ten, twelve, or more, wives, and the poorer seldom less than two or three. The consent of the parents, and the paying down the price agreed on for the wife, is all the formality and courtship that is used in their marriages. Some are so curious as to buy them at the age of six or seven years, and breed them up to their hand; but the wiser sort of parents will not part with them till they become marriageable; at which time they set a mark upon them, to testify that they are so (H), which seldom fails of bringing scores of young gallants to them, especially if they are handsome.<sup>Their marriages.</sup>

- BUT the young females have but little encouragement to the matrimonial state, which, besides the mortifying reflection of meeting so many rivals in it, and the violent jealousy of the husband, reduces them to the most melancholy servitude and slavery. We have already hinted that it is they alone that till and manure the ground, and reap and gather in the harvest. They are likewise the only ones that grind the millet, and other grain; that make and bake the bread; that dress their victuals, and make their wines and other liquors, and take care of all the household affairs. They must stand at a due distance whilst their husbands eat their meals, and pick up their leavings when they are risen. They must approach him when he comes in with words and gestures expressive of their joy and respect, and speak to him and receive his commands upon their bended knees. They must never appear before him, nor touch any of his victuals all the time their courses continue upon them, nor be seen by the rest of the family without a string or fillet tied round their head. They are liable to be turned out of doors even upon the least suspicion of infidelity; and, if proved guilty, undergo a severer punishment, though the paramour himself commonly gets off with only some pecuniary fine. Whosoever takes in a woman whom the husband hath turned away from him, is obliged to pay the like fine, or another woman in exchange for her. But though this be the slavish state of the Loangoese wives, there is a particular law that submits the children to follow the condition of their mothers; that is, of continuing slaves, if the wife is such, though the father be free; and of being free-born, if the mother be so, though the husband be a slave.<sup>Slavery of the wives.</sup>

NONE of the children are allowed to inherit the father's substance, but the whole goes to his eldest brother or sister, who are obliged to take care of the rest till they are able to provide for them.<sup>Children not allowed to inherit.</sup>

(H) That is, they cause their heads to be shaved close, and only a crown, or garland, of hair to be left around it. As for the token of their nubility, it is taken from the first time of their having their natural courses; before which it is reckoned a very high crime for a man to have any connubial commerce with them; insomuch, that whenever such an irregular intercourse hath happened, the offenders are obliged to appear before the king, who alone hath the power to absolve them, and confess their fault publicly before him, with antic and ridiculous dances and gestures, expressive of their shame and sorrow.

Without such a public confession and royal pardon, they are made to believe the greatest misfortunes would fall not upon them alone, but on the whole realm (10). But though this notion is little regarded but by the weaker part, yet there might be a very good reason for propagating it, in order to deter their libidinous youth of both sexes from beginning their intercourses before nature had opened such an easy way to it, as might preserve the young females from receiving any damage that might endanger their future fecundity, by the untimely violence offered to those tender parts.

for themselves, by going into some of the trades lately mentioned, or other suitable employ-White Moors, ments. We hardly need tell our readers that the children of the natives are born white, but in who. two days time become as black as their parents. This change often deceived the Portuguese, who settled at first in those parts; and having had commerce with the negro women, vainly imagined the children to be theirs. But here are another sort of white children, who, though born of negro parents, appear, at first sight, as white as ours in Europe, have grey eyes, red or yellow hair, and a complexion not unlike some of our northern people; but when these come to be more closely examined, their white colour proves to be no better than that of a dead corpse; whilst their eyes, instead of a vivid sparkling, seem to be fixed in their sockets, and hardly appear to have any light, except by moon or owl light. These the natives look upon as monstrous, and will hardly allow them to propagate; and the children that are born with this infirmity are presented to the king, who causes them to be educated for his purpose in all manner of forcery, and uses them as his wizards and conjurers, so that he is never without some of them about his person, and in his court. They are called Dondos by the natives, and Albinos, or White Moors, by the Portuguese. The learned have exercised their talents in accounting for this strange and unnatural whiteness; our curious readers may see what hath been conjectured to be the cause of it in the following note (I). All that we shall say here is, that there is a kind of continual war between the negroes and them, in which the former always attack them in the day-time, when their sight is at the worst, and these take their revenge of them in the night, when it is at the best<sup>1</sup>.

THESE mongrels not only make part of the king's council, but are the chief persons employed in all religious affairs and superstitious ceremonies. Neither they, nor any of the Loangoese, have any tolerable notion of a supreme Being. They seem, indeed, to acknowledge one, under the name of Sambian pongo; but neither pay any adoration to him, nor appear to have any idea of his nature or attributes, and consequently neither love, nor fear, nor pray to him. All their worship and invocations are directed to their demons, both domestic and rural, to whom they ascribe the sole power of blessing or of cursing them, of directing the winds, rains, storms, or fine weather, fruitful or unfruitful, healthy or sickly seasons. Some of them preside over the air, others over the earth, a third sort over the sea. Some are of a benevolent, others of a malevolent nature: some their friends and protectors, others their enemies and destroyers; some they consult about future contingencies, as the success of a journey, hunting, fishing, sowing, reaping, war, and the like; others about past transactions, as who hath stolen a lost thing? whether such a deceased friend died of some accidental disease, or was dispatched by some charm? and, if the latter, who is the author of it? These pretended deities they represent in various forms of men, women, or other living creatures; some coarsely carved, others modelled with clay or dirt; some of the small sort they wear in a little wooden box pen-dent about their necks, or only tied to a string; those of the larger sort they set up in their

(I) That this strange whiteness does not proceed from a promiscuous coition of the white men with the black women is plain, and allowed by all, seeing the offspring of such are of a mulatto, or tawny colour. Besides, the Albinos are known to be born of parents of the same hue and nature with themselves: and this doth likewise confute another conjecture, that this difference of their colour is owing to some strong imagination, or inclination of a black woman for a white man, in the same manner that some fair women in Europe are said to have been delivered of black children.

A learned modern assures us, there are great numbers of these Albinos in other parts of Africa as well as this (11) (and indeed our European travellers tell us that they have seen the same sort of men in several parts of India, in the island of Borneo, and in New Guinea, or Papua Land) (12). He conjectures it to be no other than an inveterate leprosy, which disease is known to be a great drier of the skin; he supposes, moreover, that all the blacks would be affected with it, if they did not take such constant care to anoint their bodies with oil, or other unctuous ingredients, in order to prevent it. But this supposition doth not suit with what we read of their being naturally robust and strong, which lepers seldom or never are; and on that account the Portuguese have tried to convey some of them to America, in order to make them work in their mines; but have found them so stubborn and untractable, that they have chosen to starve themselves to death, rather than submit to that slavery.

We have hinted above, that the Loangoese detest these white Moors, and would gladly eradicate them. They call them in their tongue Mokiffes, that is, rural, or wood Demons; and some are of opinion, that though they have their males and females, like the rest of mankind, they are incapable of procreating, some say, of coition (13). If this should be fact, though it contradicts what is hinted at the beginning of this note, it would incline one to believe them to be the unhappy offspring of some unnatural coition with those large baboons, which, we are told, have much of the human form, and are pretty numerous in their forests, and so lascivious, that they frequently ravish the women that come in their way; or at least that the native Loangoese deem them to be such. Sure it is, that some of those wild creatures that have been brought from thence into Europe, if we except the length and shape of their fingers and toes, and their being hairy behind, did, in all other respects, resemble the human species, and were very near as tall, especially those they call Quoja mooroos, from the neighbouring kingdom of Quoja, from which they are usually brought (14). Whatever they be, we are assured by all hands, that the king chiefly employs them in all his religious and superstitious ceremonies, and that they have the privilege of sitting before him (15).

THE persons that are consecrated to the service of those deities, are usually well advanced in years, and chosen by the Enganga Mokisso, or chief of the magicians; and the ceremonies of their admission being somewhat ridiculous, the reader may see them in the margin (K). They are performed, however, before a numerous assembly, and by that time they are ended, the candidate begins to look wild, to make ugly wry faces, and to stretch his body into several indecent attitudes, with loud and terrible shrieks, and other frantic actions of a man possessed. He takes fire in his hands, and bites it without burning himself. Some of them are seen to run with desperate swiftness into some desert place, whither he must be sought out by beat of drum, and is found out with his body covered over with various leaves and other sorts of verdure, and brought home by his relations, with dances; and, if not really possessed by some demon, acts the part of one so well, that the people really believe him to be so. At his return he is asked by them, to what demon, law, and particular observation, he designs to bind himself (L); and as soon as he hath named one, a buckle, or ring, is fastened round his arm, which he must always wear, to put him in mind of his promise. By this time the spirit or demon, which they suppose to have caused all those various agitations, and to have given the answer above-mentioned by the mouth of the possessed, departs out of him, leaving him half dead. After he is come to himself, that ring becomes a warrant of his sincerity, and he swears by no other thing but the ring and the demon to which he hath dedicated himself; and so fearful are they of forswearing themselves, that they will dextrously avoid taking that oath, whenever they have no mind to speak the truth, or to perform their promise<sup>l</sup>. How consecrated. Their strange gambols and delusions.

(K) The candidate for the Mokissohip is obliged to confine himself alone in a tent of palm leaves during the short time of his noviciate, which lasts only fifteen days; he must not speak one word to any one during the first nine days, nor salute any person even with the motion of his hands; to keep him in mind of it, he hath a parrot's feather stuck into each side of his mouth, and holds a stick in his hand, with a busto, or a man's head, carved on the upper end, which is one of the figures of their idols.

When the time is expired, he and his whole company, which chiefly consists of his relations, remove to some level ground, where neither tree nor shrub grows, where a drum is placed at the center, and the assembly form themselves into a large ring about it, and dance round at the sound of it; whilst the Enganga, or chief conjurer, who leads the dance, sings the praises of the Mokisso, or rural demon, and begs his assistance. The novice, if he be not sick, which is often the case of the candidates for this office, joins likewise in the dance, not in the ring, but around the drummer. This dancing continues about three days, after which the Enganga comes unperceived behind the novice, and scares him with his frightful outcries; upon which the drum immediately ceases, which had continued beating ever since four of the clock the evening before. The Enganga begins then to shew some of his phrenetic tricks, striking the idols with his stick, muttering some unintelligible words, and marking his own and the novice's body with little red and white spots, especially on the temples, eyebrows, and pit of the stomach, in a greater or smaller number, according to the height and violence of his phrensy. He howls hideously, stretches and distorts his whole body into various unseemly postures, takes burning coals in his hands, claps them to his mouth, without receiving any harm, and mimics all the extravagancies of a possessed person, which his pupil soon after (if we understand our authors, or they understood their inform-ers aright, for they are very different and obscure in their accounts) strives to imitate as well as he can: and this is the ceremony that dubs him a Mokisso priest (16).

(L) These obligations are commonly of the negative kind, and consist in abstaining from some one single kind of meat, as the flesh of one kind of beast, fowl, or fish, some kinds of roots, pulse, fruits and herbs, going upon or over any water, and such-like; every tribe or family having some such obligatory ties, according to the demon peculiar to them.

As soon, therefore, as a child is born, the Fetissero, or priest, is sent for, who first interrogates the father and mother separately, wherein their peculiar vow, or obligation, and that of their ancestors, consists; and, being informed of it, he mutters something to himself, and then declares that the demon, or deity, enjoins the child to such or such observance and abstinence; that is, to one or two, or sometimes three of them, to which the mother takes special care to accustom them betimes.

Accordingly some of them will not allow themselves to go over the least puddle of water; others will cross a river over a bridge, though not in a boat, or any other way. Some will not suffer a razor nor scissars to go over their heads or faces; others will shave both; some will wear their hair long, and shave their beards; others will wear their beards, and shave their heads: and likewise with regard to their dress, the men are not allowed to go with their heads uncovered, but are obliged to wear some kind of cap or fillet about them. The women, on the contrary, are forbidden to wear any thing on their heads. The former are obliged to wear some furs over their privities: and the women, instead of them, are obliged to wear four or five pieces of Libongos, a sort of cloth, about two feet square, of the manufacture of the country (17), and which passes for current coin in it, as we shall see in the sequel.

THE common people have also one or more of these Mokissos, or small idols; those of a higher rank wear them in greater numbers; and the king wears such quantities and variety of them, as would tire the reader with the bare mention. Whenever any one is sick, especially the king, or some great man, his friends and domestics will spend some days in getting his demon to enter into his body, and tell them, by the mouth of the patient, why, or for what crime or neglect, he suffers a person dedicated to him to be so punished; and, as soon as he hath acquainted them with the cause, then they try to pacify and bribe him, by fresh gifts and promises, to restore him to his health. And as they cannot be persuaded that any one can die a natural death, so, if the patient chance to die, they will spare neither time, cost, nor pains, in running from one of these conjurers to another, and from one province to another, sometimes during the space of two or three months, till they have found out one that can tell them both the cause and author of his death. Nothing can be more senseless than the implicit faith with which they receive the news, the notions they entertain concerning these feigned murders, and the method they take to retaliate them upon the pretended offender. They imagine, that the supposed murdered person is, by the same witchcraft, brought to life again, and spirited away into some desert place, where he is made to work hard to enrich his murderer, and is fed with meat without salt, because one single grain would enable him to take the most severe revenge on him. The folly of some goes so far as to imagine that souls may, by the same kind of witchcraft, be transported from one country to another, for the same ends; and that the natives of Gibbi, lately described, were much addicted to that diabolical commerce<sup>m</sup>.

THE Loangoese entertain various notions concerning the nature of the human soul, but all of them very extravagant and stupid. Those of the royal family imagine that the souls of their deceased relations transmigrate into the bodies of those that are afterwards born in the same family. Others think that the departed souls become demons, heroes, household gods, and guardian spirits, and make them little niches under the roof of the house, where they place their idols, which are commonly about a span long, and offer them some portion of their meat and drink, before they venture to taste a bit. Others assign them a place of resort under the earth, where they enjoy a new kind of life, in a higher or lower rank, according to their merits whilst embodied. A third sort think souls die with the bodies, unless they be kept alive by the witchcraft of an enemy, in order to render them serviceable to his avarice and interest. They all believe that their Mokissos, or, as the Portuguese call them, Fetissos, that is, the demon to whom they have been dedicated at their birth, have power to inflict punishments, or even death, on those who neglect or break any of those observances to which they have bound themselves. Accordingly, when a man enjoys a good degree of health, and other worldly prosperity, he naturally flatters himself that his Mokisso is well satisfied with his service and comportment; but, when matters go otherwise with him, he then thinks it high time to look about him, and to examine in what he hath displeased him, and what may be the properest means to regain his favour, or, at least, to ward off the deadly blow. But if one were to ask them what notion they have of the nature and power of those Mokissos, or what they mean by that word, they will answer that they understand by it that secret and incomprehensible energy or virtue, which they conceive and find to be lodged in some beings or things, of doing good and evil, and of communicating the knowledge of things past, present, and to come<sup>n</sup>. This, our author tells us, cannot be termed idolatry, seeing they neither attribute his power to the deity, of which they have scarcely any knowledge, nor to any evil spirit or devil, for which they have not so much as a name; so that they give the name of Mokisso to every thing in which they observe or suppose this extraordinary power. So that according to these authors, if they rightly understand, or have had this part of the Loangoese belief rightly explained to them, they, through mistake, ascribe those events to some extraordinary power and virtue of the Mokisso, which are either the effect of their imagination, or of natural means and the course of things. Thus if a man hath a good constitution, and lives chaste and regular, they attribute his health to the Mokisso, and to the salubrious rules and injunctions prescribed by it, instead of ascribing it to those virtues, which of themselves were capable of producing those effects (M). Whereas, did they look upon them to be more than the occult cause

(M) We have great reason to question whether our authors above quoted were rightly instructed by their informers in all the particulars they have given us upon this head. If the Loangoese have no notion of a supreme deity, nor of any evil spirits, nor even a name in their language for the devil; if they stile every thing Mokisso, where they observe or suppose an over-ruling power; whence can they imagine such an intelligent and over-ruling power can proceed? If they have no name for the devil, nor any notion of evil spirits, how came those authors to stile their Mokissos by that name? and their superstitious rites, conjuring and diabolical trade?

But it is plain, as we shall hereafter shew, from several

- a cause of some effect which is above their comprehension, did they imagine them to have a divine benevolent power, to be the disposers of good and evil, happiness and misery, rewards and punishments, both in this and a future life, which last they make a mere jest of, this would induce them to pay a suitable kind of worship to them, which yet they do not; and they would apply to them in a proper manner, instead of using such fortileges, and pretended conjuring tricks, which their juggling priests injoin them. Antient tradition and customs, and the example and practice of their princes and great men, whose interest it is to connive at and encourage such superstitions, all contribute to make them lay the whole stress of their good or ill fortune on the efficacy of such extravagant means, as conjuring songs, dances, drummings, and other preposterous ceremonies <sup>o</sup>.
- b BUT such is their extreme ignorance, it seems, that though their monarchs only stile themselves Mani, or lords of Loango, their subjects not only give them the title of Mokissos, but imagine them to be endowed with a kind of supernatural and unlimited power. He can, according to them, not only enrich and impoverish his subjects by one single word, raise destructive wars in the provinces, and send myriads of people to their graves; and, what is still more extraordinary, he can bring down, or withhold rains and storms at his pleasure. He can transform himself into a wild beast, and bend an elephant's tooth, so as to tie it in a knot. His nobles have likewise something of the same extraordinary power in a greater or lesser degree, according as their dignity is nearer or farther from the regal; according to which they are likewise tied to a greater or lesser number of rules and abstinences, but the king to the greatest number of all (N). <sup>Supernatural power attributed to their princes and nobles.</sup>
- c THE Engangas, or priests of this country, do all take the title of Mokisso; but are distinguished by the names of Mokisso, altar, or temple, which they serve, or, more properly, from the village in which they stand; as Ganga-Therico, Ganga-Baesi-batta, Ganga-Kikokoo, &c. There is a very great number of them in the kingdom, but neither temples, idols, nor ceremonies used in any of them, have any thing worth mentioning. We shall, however, describe one of them, and that, in every respect, the most remarkable of all, by which the reader may form a judgment of the rest. <sup>Variety of Mokissos.</sup>
- It is that of Therico, a great village about four leagues northward of Boarye, or Boarg, the antient name of the capital Loango <sup>p</sup>. The temple, which makes a considerable part of the place, is a large building, the pillars of which, as well as the Mokisso, have the figure of a man. The Enganga, who is lord of the village, performs the service every morning, by striking a fleece of wool with his staff, and muttering some conjuring words, to which a youth, who assists him, makes regular responses. After which he addresses his petition to the Mokisso, in which he recommends to his care the health and prosperity of the king, the welfare of the country, the fertility of the land, the good success of their traffick, and their fishery. At the mention of the king's name, all the people clap their hands aloud, in token of assent and affection. This is all we are told concerning the worship of this Mokisso, in which there is little or nothing extravagant, or to be found fault with. But that of some others, especially of that of Boesi-batta, which is the next in dignity and rank, is performed with a greater and more noisy train of ceremonies, and pretended conjuring tricks, with the music of little bells, <sup>That of Therico.</sup> <sup>Aburdity of their worship of others.</sup>

several ceremonies they observe towards their deceased friends, and the various wild ideas they entertain of their state and condition after death, that they entertain a kind of imperfect belief of a future life, of rewards and punishments, as well as of some deity that is the dispenser of them.

We are, indeed, told by Odoard Lopez, that they worship the sun as the greater or male, and the moon as the lesser or female, deity *; and, next to them, they are affirmed to acknowledge malevolent spirits, whom they call Sagufchi, or Magussi, or according to Battel, Mobissos, to whom they pay an intire obedience, offer human and other sacrifices, according as their priests, who pretend a familiar converse with them, are pleased to prescribe †. From all which we may conclude, that they look upon the two luminaries to be the deities who dispense the good, and the Mokissos to be the inflictors of the evil, that happens to them both in this and the next life. And this may be probably the motive that induces them to stand in greater awe and to be more obedient to the latter than to the former.

(N) Thus, to give our readers an instance of this progression; when the first son of the king's sister, who is the presumptive heir, is born, he is conveyed to the village of Kina, where he is interdicted the eating of swine's flesh, all the time he sucks at the breast. As soon as he is weaned, he is removed to Moanza, where he is further interdicted the eating of a fruit called Cola. As soon as they perceive the down upon his cheeks, the care of him is committed to a celebrated priest, who is to instruct him how to abstain from all kind of fowl, except what he kills with his own hand, and directs the dressing of. As he draws nearer to the crown, he removes to Salassi, or, perhaps, Salig, Bocko, and Caja; in all which he binds himself in a still greater number of observances and abstinences of the like trifling nature, till he comes at length to mount the throne, where he plunges himself into an ocean of Mokissoish ceremonies, power, wisdom, and active intelligence of the Mokissate (19).

drums, and other harsh instruments, but so ridiculous and void of sense or meaning, that we shall gladly forbear disgusting our readers with them. Those who are curious in such insignificant oddities, may see a fuller detail in the authors mentioned in the margin <sup>a</sup>.

As they have no notion of a future life, except what the soul is forced to by enchantment; for the ill purposes lately hinted <sup>r</sup>, so all their mourning and funeral obsequies are calculated merely to express their respect for, and grief for the loss of, their deceased friends. Accordingly they hardly express any token of concern till the moribund is quite expired; and then it is that every one begins to howl and cry at a dreadful rate, croud about the dead body, bring it out of the house, and ask what was the cause of his death? whether want of food or other necessaries, or any enchantments, and the like? This loud hurly-burly lasts commonly about two or three hours; during which time some of the relations are busy in washing, combing, shaving, and anointing the deceased with red wood, paring his nails, and getting ready such of his goods as are to be cast into his grave, and others in digging it of a sufficient bigness to contain both it and them. As soon as all is thus far ready, they snatch up the corpse, and run away with it with all possible speed and hurry, the company following at the same furious rate; and, when they come to the place, throw the body and goods into the grave with the like precipitation. These are commonly some of the deceased's clothes, tools, weapons, &c. and, when they are too many for the grave to contain, they hang them upon short posts, stuck into the ground, after having first torn and mangled them, to prevent their being stolen. The mourning lasts six weeks; during which the relations of the deceased meet at the place morning and evening to bewail his death <sup>c</sup>.

ing;*

for persons of rank.

*Other cere-

If the deceased be a person of rank, they begin, even from the time of his falling sick, to make the strictest enquiries whether his disease be not caused by some enchantment. The Engangas, or juggling priests, are consulted about it, and give what answer and advice suit most to their interest or credit; and, if they pronounce him bewitched, all sorts of counter-charms are used for his cure. If none of them avail, and the patient die, they use much the same ceremonies with him as they do with those of meaner rank, but with this difference, that they extend the dead body on the floor, in some large chamber, instead of the street; and spend three days, instead of three hours, in lamenting his death, trimming his body, and making other preparations for his interment. All this time his male relations continue crying and howling about his corpse; whilst the female ones keep dancing in another apartment, and singing his panegyrics, setting forth the nobility of his lineage, the greatness of his estate, the number of his friends and enemies, and the state and grandeur in which he lived. The mention of his enemies by name seldom failing of creating a suspicion that some of them may have caused his death by witchcraft, especially if the Engangas have given their verdict in that sense, new and stricter enquiries are made; and if no certainty can be got out by that means, they unanimously resolve to consult one of the Mokissos, and every one contributes some clothes and other things to defray the expence of the enquiry. On the third day the corpse, with all the other goods that are to accompany it, are hurried away, with the same speed and precipitation lately mentioned, to the burying place, which is either in the fields, or at Kienga, where divers Engangas, or wizards, belonging to the Mokisso of Kikokoo, reside. There they throw the body and other utensils, such as an earthen pot, a wooden shovel, an arrow, a calabash, a drinking cup, a pipe, a tobacco-box, a staff, a lance, and others of the like nature. What is not thrown into the grave, is suspended on posts set around it; after which the mourning lasts two or three months, the friends and relations repairing to the place morning and evening, and making the usual howlings and lamentations over it, and the scrutiny after the cause of the person's death is carried on with the usual formality, by the near relation appointed by the rest for that purpose. The ceremony being only a mere juggle of the pretended conjurers, and having nothing either satisfactory or rational, the reader may see a short account of it in the margin (O), whilst we close up this of the funeral obsequies, with reminding

(O) It consists chiefly in consulting the Enganga about the reality of the person's being dispatched out of this world by some enchantment, and then in finding the inchanter out, and bringing him to condign punishment.

The first is done by consulting the Enganga about it, who, upon these occasions, commonly sits upon the ground, behind his house, with a large knife laid before him, which he often presses with his fingers, asking his pretended spirit, whether such a one, who is dead and buried, was killed by his Mokisso, for infringing some of his injunctions? or whether any of his enemies caused him to be bewitched to death? He then begins to rub his hands one against another; and if he quickly after claps them one against the other, and leaves off rubbing, they take it for granted that the person was killed by his Mokisso, and not by enchantment; but if he continues rubbing and clapping alternately, they conclude that some witchcraft was used; and then the Enganga asks again, if he was bewitched to death? by whom was it done? an acquaintance or stranger? man or woman? where dwells the bewitcher?

- a reminding the reader of what we touched upon on another account, concerning the right of inheritance; viz. that they are not the children, but the eldest brother or sister of the deceased that claim it<sup>1</sup>.

THEY suffer no strangers to be buried in this country, but oblige them to be conveyed in a boat two miles from the shore, and to be flung into the sea. The occasion of this inhospitable custom, we are told, was this<sup>2</sup>. A certain Portuguese gentleman chanced to die and to be buried there. He had not lain above four months in the ground, before a threatening famine, occasioned by want of rain, obliged the inhabitants to consult the Mokissos about the cause of it, who were answered, that a christian had been interred among them, and must be removed, and thrown into the sea, before they could obtain any rain. The people obeyed, and were blest with a plentiful rain within three days; and ever since that time they have not permitted any of them to be put into the ground. The commerce of this country consists chiefly in slaves, which are esteemed the greatest riches of it: we shall, however, forbear repeating what we have said of it in some foregoing chapters, particularly in the history of Angola<sup>3</sup>, it being nearly the same, and carried on in the same manner along all these coasts. The Loangoese sell likewise great quantities of ivory, tin, lead, iron, and copper, which they fetch as far as from the mines of Sundi, which lie on the road to Pombo, which last almost adjoins to the Abissinian empire<sup>4</sup>. The smiths and artists in mines go hence in the month of September for the kingdom of Sundi, and being arrived at the mountains where the copper mines are, set their slaves to work in them. They melt the ore on the spot; but as they have not the art of purifying it from other metals, which will intermix themselves with it, even within the bowels of the earth, their copper is neither so pure nor so valuable. The Europeans have, since the last century, sent some good artists to teach them how to refine it, but the natives are either so indocile or indolent, that they have not reaped any great advantage from their instructions. They are employed at that work until the month of May following, at which time they bring with their copper great quantities of elephants teeth, but of a smaller size, and of elephant's tails, which the Portuguese convey to Loanda San Paulo, where the negroes of that town have the art of weaving that hair into bracelets, collars, girdles, and other ornaments, exceedingly neat and beautiful.

THESE two last commodities the Loangoese bring from Buka Maela, al. Boekamela; in exchange for which they carry thither salt, palm-oil, Silesia tickings, cutlasses, looking-glasses, beads, and other such trifling rarities. This traffick might be made much more advantageous, witcher? what Mokisso did he apply to to do the jobb?

If the Enganga can give them no satisfactory answer to those questions, which he seldom ventures to do, they will pursue their enquiry, and ramble from one end of the kingdom to the other, two or three months successively, consulting every Enganga and Mokisso, till they can, by some means or conjecture, pitch upon some body for the supposed offender, or at least upon some village where he lives. Having gone so far as they think fit in their enquiry, they apply to the king, or to the chief of the Bandas, for leave to summon the village to undergo the trial of the Bandas-cup. The king commonly appoints nine or ten persons to try the cause. These go and sit on the highway, on the ground, in the form of a half moon, and summon the whole hamlet to appear. Whoever neglects the summons; man or woman, are of course deemed guilty; for which reason they dare not absent themselves.

Accusers and accused being heard, a cup of the Bandas liquor is offered to every one of the latter; which while they drink, the judges beat their drums with small sticks, and afterwards cut them into little pieces, and throw them on the ground, and bid the accused to walk one after another upon them, and to fall down if they are guilty, and if innocent, to stand and piss upon them. If any of them trip or stumble, they are so overwhelmed with the hideous din of the by-standers, that they have no power to rise, and are therefore cast as guilty. But those that can keep upon their legs, and piss upon some of the chips of the sticks, are carried off in triumph to the village.

If none of the men are so unhappy as to fall, the women must come next and drink one after another out of the same cup; and if any of them fall, they are hurried away to death without mercy, as well as the men. And it often happens that these unhappy victims of superstition and jugglery are half or three parts martyred before they come to the place of execution, by the haling and blows of the spectators, who, old and young, men and women, in this country, take an inhuman delight in tormenting them.

Our authors do not tell us exactly what liquor it is that the Bandas give them to drink, only Dapper, who calls it Imbonda, says, it is made from the root of a tree, or shrub, of that name, about six inches long, and resembling a white carrot. He adds, that the liquor brewed from it is excessively bitter, and so strong, that one root would serve to try an hundred people; and that by its astringency, which is attended with a suppression of urine, it is apter to fly up into the head; though he seems to allow, that, by the enchantment of the Enganga, or conjurer, it acquires a still greater strength and virtue. If that were the case, what need would there be to give it in such a large dose as a pint and a half to each person; which, nauseous as he describes it, and he tells us he tasted of it, one would think impossible for any one, especially of the female kind, to swallow down. However that be, we may reasonably conclude it, from the whole process, to be intoxicating to a high degree; and that those jugglers make it more or less so, according as they are bribed, or inclined to save or sacrifice a person. It is, however, seldom seen that the rich submit to this trial; so that the whole burden falls only on the poor, who are not in a condition to buy it off (20).

Obstructed by the Giagas. and be extended as far as Pombo, Monzo, and the kingdom of Micocco, but for the plundering Giagas that swarm along these parts, and infest all the roads between Loango and Pombo; inasmuch, that the masters, not daring to hazard their persons, are obliged to carry it on by their slaves. The Portuguese export likewise from Loango several sorts of cloths, the manufacture of the country, some of which pass for money both there and in other neighbouring kingdoms. Ivory traffick As for the ivory trade, it hath been found long since to dwindle every year why dwindled. more, whether it be that the elephants are almost exhausted, or that the natives think it too far to fetch it, the journey to and fro taking them full three months, there being no other way of bringing those elephants teeth but on the heads of their slaves.

THOSE Europeans that design to trade to Loango, are obliged to obtain a licence for it from the king, by dint of rich presents, not only to him, but to his mother, to his queen, to the two intendants of the finances, and to the governor of Majumba, which makes it very chargeable and difficult. Add to this, that the Loangoese, not understanding any language but their own, one is obliged to hire some of their fishermen, who have commonly a smattering of the Portuguese, to serve for interpreters and brokers<sup>v</sup>.

Their money. THEIR money is no other than a slight piece of cloth of their own weaving, of which we have spoken a little higher; and four of which being sown together, each of the breadth and width of a span and a half, are worth about a penny. These pieces, which the Portuguese call Pannos sambes, were in great vogue before the establishing of the East-India companies, when all the provinces of Holland exchanged them for the copper and elephants teeth which they purchased. But from that time their value is greatly lessened; and seventeen of those Libongos, as they are called, are given for a Silesia ticking, and five for a pound of ivory<sup>z</sup>.

Government. WE have already hinted that Loango was part of the kingdom of Kongo, and that the Mani, or governors, of its several provinces, revolted from it, and erected themselves into independent principalities, till one of them grew rich and powerful enough to subdue all the rest, and not only to assume the royal title and dignity, but to strip his old master of several other of his provinces, and to make himself so absolute in his new kingdom, as to be in some measure worshipped as a god by his subjects<sup>a</sup>. They give him the name, or title, of Sambapongo, which is that of the deity, and ascribe almost as extensive a power to him, and address him either for rain or fruitful seasons, and temporal blessings, with even greater solemnity than other nations do their gods (P).

The kingdom how founded. Most of the king's chief ministers are likewise appointed Mani, or governors of provinces, the revenues of which enable them to live with greater splendor, and to make a greater figure at court, than they could do with the bare salaries of their respective posts. The Mani figure at court, for instance, is both high admiral and governor of Lovangiri. The Mani-mambo, or head general, hath the government of Loango Mongo, but commonly with two others joined in the same commission, as that province is thought too large, and of too great consequence, to be entrusted to one person. The Mani-boloor hath that of Chilongo, together with the superintendency of the Dakkins, or conjurers, and the Bandas. Mani-belullo hath a kind of sovereignty over the province of Kilongatiamo Congo, without paying any tribute or homage to the king. Mani-canga, or kinga, is lord lieutenant of Piri, and superintendant over the Cangas, or priests; and Mani-matta, which last word signifies a bow, is the commanding officer over the king's guards, or, according to others, is the intendant of the artillery<sup>b</sup>. The Moeton-ambomba, or vice-admiral, hath the province of Polovey, and so of the rest. Besides these, the king appoints several inferior ministers for the management of his other affairs; among whom his cup-bearer, butler, and high steward, are the most in favour, and have the greatest sway with him. To all which we may add a great number of others,

(P) Battel, who was present at one of these grand ceremonies, when they addressed that prince for a supply of rain, tells us, that every one of the supplicants brought him a present; after which he appointed a day for the solemnity; which when come, all his grandees and chief officers assembled themselves, with their men all armed as for war. They presented themselves before him in their proper turns, with their bows and arrows, which they variously handled with great dexterity, kneeling at his feet. He sat in an open place, where there was a carpet spread on the ground, about fifteen fathoms in length, and as many in breadth, of a rich stuff they call Enjak, and is wrought in the manner of our velvets.

On this carpet was his throne, raised about two yards from the ground, on which he sat; and having thanked his nobles for their duty, commanded the Dembis, a large kind of kettle-drum, to strike up, and his eight Pongos (or large trumpets, made of elephants teeth) to sound. In the height of this music, or rather horrid noise, the king stood up, took his bow in his hand, and shot an arrow upwards towards the sky, which was accompanied with the loudest shoutings of the whole assembly. The ceremony was succeeded by a plentiful rain, and the day concluded with the greatest rejoicings (21).

a mostly nobles, who have their several districts assigned by the king, and over which they preside as inferior judges, particularly in his capital of Loango, where they act as inferior magistrates <sup>d</sup>.

THESE monarchs are reckoned very powerful, and capable of bringing vast armies into the field. Their country is, indeed, very narrow towards the sea, but spreads itself wider in the inland, and extends itself very far towards the east. All his subjects that are able bear arms, being like so many inrolled soldiers, and obliged to appear in arms at the usual musters, to perform their respective exercises before him, and to follow him or his generals to the wars, where-ever he commands them; yet they live in peace with their neighbours, especially with the kings of Cacongo and Angoy. Their troops are armed with darts, which have pretty large heads of iron, like our halberds, or the antient Roman javelins. They have a handle about the middle of the staff, by means of which they throw them with great force and justness. They carry also a kind of dagger, resembling in some measure the heads of their darts <sup>e</sup>. Their targets are big enough to cover almost the whole body, and strong enough to repel an arrow or dart, being made of the hard and thick hides of an empacha, a creature somewhat less than an ox, which the Germans call dante <sup>f</sup>, and whose hides are transported from their country into the kingdoms of Kongo, Angola and Loango, by the Portuguese, as we have elsewhere hinted, and there made into jerkins, corselets, and breast-plates. His strength. Forces. Weapons. Long targets.

THEIR laws, whether they have any compiled body of them, or which is much more likely, whether they immediately depend upon the king's will, are much more gentle than in other neighbouring states, except in crimes committed against the king's person, dignity, or honour. They never condemn a man to death for theft, but content themselves with obliging the offender to restore either the theft or equivalent to it, and exposing him, with his hands tied behind him to a tree or a post, to the sport and laughter of the spectators. If a bankrupt who hath wronged whole families by borrowing, afterwards absconds or runs away, the creditors have a right to seize on one or more of his near relations, and hold him or them in confinement till the debt is satisfied; but we do not find that any other punishment is provided against the capital debtor, or run-away. Laws.

WE have observed, under a foregoing article, that adultery is only punished with a fine; but this indulgence is so far from extending to the king's wives and concubines, that, if any of them be debauched or suspected to be so, both she and her paramour are condemned to the flames, and burnt alive, without remission, in sight of each other. Those monarchs have commonly a vast number of wives, because they are obliged to keep those of their predecessors as well as their own, inasmuch, that they amount sometimes to six or seven thousand. These he keeps confined in his seraglio, and only singles out some of them for his pleasures, and obliges the rest to employ themselves in some sorts of useful work. Should any of these be found pregnant, the crime of incontinence is too fully proved for her to escape the punishment of it, but she must moreover confess her partner in it, which they seldom are prevailed upon to do but by dint of torture, and will sometimes cause an innocent person to share in their dreadful fate, in order to save the beloved paramour. But if they are even barely suspected of inconstancy, both she and her pretended gallant are doomed to the Banda's bitter cup, lately mentioned; and, if found guilty by that fallacious ordeal (Q), both are immediately executed <sup>h</sup>. Against adultery. The king's concubines how punished for it. How tried for it.

BESIDES the crimes of rebellion, revolt, high treason, all which are punished with the most severe deaths and confiscation, at the king's pleasure, it is reckoned here a capital and unpardonable crime.

(Q) Battel, who saw this detestable ceremony often performed at the capital of Loango, informs us, that those Bandas are arrant jugglers and knaves, who could so qualify the dose, as to make an innocent person fall, or a guilty one escape; so that, in fact, the poor were commonly the only sufferers, whilst the rich got themselves acquitted by dint of bribery. He adds, that there passes not a week in which there is not some persons brought to this dreadful ordeal, and that great numbers are destroyed by it, through the knavery of the Bandas; who are yet so dextrous in acting their parts, that the cheat is never perceived (22).

The same author tells us in one place, that the spectators dispatch the pretended criminal with their knives, as soon as they perceive him to turn giddy and stagger; and in another, that they cry out, undoke, undoke, that is, wicked wizard, or witch, and knock him or her on the head, and, dragging the body away, cast it headlong down some precipice (23). But this must be understood only of those who are tried and found guilty of bewitching any one to death; against whom the relations of the deceased let themselves loose with the utmost fury (24). For as to the women of the king's seraglio, who are found guilty of unfaithfulness or incontinence, both they and their supposed gallants are condemned to the flames, and executed in full sight of one another (25).

donable offence to see him either eat or drink (R), though he generally dines and sups in a public, and in the presence of a great number of his nobles and attendants. He commonly contents himself with two meals a day, and hath two houses appropriated to that purpose, the one for eating, and the other for drinking. To the first he repairs commonly about ten of the clock, which is his dinner hour, and there finds his victuals ready brought in some sort of baskets, a servant going before them with a little bell, to give notice that the king's table is going to be covered. The high steward hath no sooner laid his meat before him, but he immediately retires, and locks the door after him, leaving neither man nor beast in it to see him eat; his numerous court being waiting all the while in an antichamber, in order to follow him to his drinking-house, to which he usually adjourns as soon as he hath dined<sup>i</sup>.

feet high; and on the farther end of it is the Tial, or royal throne, which is made of fine palmetto pillars, white and black, and curiously wrought and interwoven in the manner of basket work. The front of the apartment is wide open, to let in the fresh air; and about twenty feet beyond it stands a screen, or partition, quite across, to keep the palm wine which he drinks from being seen. On each side of the throne stand two large osier baskets of black and red palmetto, in which the natives tell you the king keeps his lares, or familiar spirits, who guard and preserve his person; and other conjuring charms to prolong his life. of him stand his two cup-bearers, one of whom reaches him the cup, when he beckons for it, and the other, who holds two iron rods, not unlike two drum-sticks, strikes them together, to give notice that he is going to drink. Upon which, all the nobles, both in the hall and out of it, fall down with their faces to the ground, and the cup-bearer, who presents the wine to him, turns his back. In this posture they all continue till notice is given, by the ceasing of the signal, that he hath drank his wine; upon which they immediately get up, and by their loud clapping of hands, express their joy and good wishes for him. It is likewise another mark of respect, whenever any one is allowed to drink in his presence, to turn his back towards him. No one is permitted to drink out of his cup, or to eat of the victuals which he leaves after dinner or supper; but the remainder is carefully gathered up, and buried in the earth<sup>k</sup>.

As this drinking-hall is likewise the place where he hears causes, and where matters of the greatest importance are discussed, it often happens that he stays in it till about an hour after sunset; but, if there be nothing of that nature upon the tapis, he commonly retires to his seraglio, and passes the rest of the afternoon with some of his wives. About seven, or soon after, he repairs to his eating-house, where he eats his supper, with the same ceremonies used at dinner, and then adjourns to the banquetting-house, and stays there usually till bed-time, that is, till about nine or ten of the clock, and then retires to his rest, being usually attended by two or three torches, to light him from one apartment to another (S).

(R) The reason of this custom is founded, if Battel was rightly informed (26), on a superstitious notion which reigns among them, that it would endanger his life if he was seen eating or drinking. And this ridiculous whim is so strongly impressed on those monarchs, that they will cause even their own children to be put to immediate death; of which we have the two following remarkable instances, related by two authors who were then at court when they happened.

The first is of a nobleman's child, about seven or eight years old, who having been accidentally left asleep in the banquetting house, awaked just as the king was drinking; for which he was condemned to die. All that his father could obtain was a reprieve of seven days; which being expired, the child was brought and struck on the nose with a hammer, and his blood dropped upon the king's Mokisso; after which, a halter being tied about his neck, he was dragged to the broad way, where the malefactors are commonly executed who are found guilty by means of the Bandas crench (27).

The other, still more remarkable, is one of the king's sons, about twelve years old, who unfortunately coming in when his father was drinking, was by him condemned to be quartered, and carried about the city, and a proclamation was made, that it was for seeing the king drink (28).

Much the same misfortune happened in Bruno's time, to another young prince, about nine years of age, who rising and running to his father's embraces, whilst he was drinking, the chief priest cried out that he must be put to death. Immediately after which his head was cleft with a hatchet by an unknown hand, and the priest took some of the blood and rubbed it upon the king's arm, to avert the evil omen (29).

This law extends even to brute animals; insomuch, that a favourite dog, presented to the king by a Portuguese, chancing to come into the room when he was at dinner, was ordered to be immediately killed (30).

(S) We must not, however, suppose that these monarchs are so tenacious of those rules, as if they were observed alike by all. So far from that, Battel tells us, that though the then reigning one was never to be found in the audience hall but in the afternoon, yet his predecessor, whom he calls Tomba, would never give audience to any except in the night; so that the

<sup>a</sup> HE seldom or never stirs out of his palace, but on some grand festival, or upon some solemn occasion, such as receiving of an embassy, hunting of some mischievous leopard that lurks about his capital, or quelling of some revolt. He likewise shews himself abroad on the day in which they begin to plough and sow his own lands, or when his vassals come to pay their usual homage, and yearly tribute. Upon these occasions he publicly repairs to a spacious green that faces his palace, in the center of the city, where is erected a throne of white and black wickers of palm-tree, curiously interwoven, and raised upon a foot-pace, and adorned with other curious embellishments.

CLOSE to the back of the throne, is spread a kind of escutcheon, or shield, pendent on a pole, and made up of various pieces of European stuffs, curiously joined, and of different colours. On each side the throne are set about eight umbrellas, or fans, curiously wrought with the finest of their country thread, and fixed at the ends of long sticks, which run through the center of them. These umbrellas, which the natives call Pos and Mani, or, according to Battel, Pongos, have the form of a hemisphere inverted, and about two yards in diameter; and the staff to which they are fixed is about the thickness of a man's arm, and the length of two or three yards, with a large tassel, or bushy tuft above, and several others under the half-concave. All these, and several other pensile ornaments, of different materials, being whirled about horizontally with great vehemence by proper persons appointed for that office, raise a kind of artificial breeze, very refreshing and delightful to all that are near them <sup>1</sup>.

THE ground before the throne is covered with a large carpet, or cloth of quilted leaves, neatly sewed, about forty yards long, and twenty broad, on which none but the king or his children may set their foot, but, round about it, there is room enough left for two or three persons to pass; and beyond that all the nobles and officers of the household are seated cross-legged around, some on the ground, and others on cushions, or carpets, each holding in their hand, and waving about, a buffalo's tail. The servants in great numbers surround their masters on the outside, all seated in the same posture; and, at proper places and distances, are placed the musicians, or players upon various instruments, such as the reader may see described in the margin (T), which not only give a very agreeable sound, but add likewise an air of grandeur to the solemnity. Before the king's carpet above-mentioned sit a number of dwarfs, with their backs towards the throne. These are by the natives called Bakke, and white Moors. <sup>d</sup> Bakke, by some Mimos, and by others European Pigmies <sup>m</sup>, and are said to be but half a man's stature, but thick and squat, and to be chiefly employed in killing of elephants, which are in great plenty in their territories, which lie near a month's journey north-east of Loango, on the road to Micocco. Those that are brought from thence are generally chosen for their deformity, especially the disproportionate largeness of their heads <sup>n</sup>. Their cloathing is suited to their appearance, being no other than the skins of beasts tied about their middle. These the king causes to be intermixed, by way of contrast, with a number of white Moors we have described in a former note <sup>o</sup>, and both together make a very grotesque figure, in their antic gestures and in their motions.

BEFORE the running passage that leads to the royal throne, stand three or four officers, with iron instruments in their hands, not unlike in shape and sound to those bells which our country people hang about cows and sheeps necks, the noise of which is to command silence; and in the city, where the same men likewise officiate as criers, they proclaim the king's orders, and notify things either lost or found, by the sound of the same instruments <sup>p</sup> (U).

place was often crowded with people till midnight (31). In like manner some spend great part of the day with their wives, and visit them only in the night; so that their will or humour seems to be their only rule.

(T) These are of three sorts, the one made of ivory, like our hunting horns, but of different sizes and bores, but which, joined together, yield a loud yet pleasant sound (32).

The second sort is the drum, which they have of various sizes, and is made and beat much after the same manner as those of Kongo and Angola formerly described (33).

The third is like a Biscayan tabor, that is shaped like our large sieves, with a drum skin, instead of a lawn or wire grate. The hoop about it hath holes of about one inch and a half, or two inches, in which are fastened flat pieces of tin or brass through a wire, which make a kind of jingle every time the tabor is moved, or beat with the hand (34).

(U) Battel tells us, that the king himself hath one of these bells; which is such a terror to all thieves in his capital, that none of them dare keep any thing stolen, after they have heard the sound of it; of which he gives a signal instance which happened to him during his stay in it. He lived in a mean slight house, built after the manner of the country, and had a fowl-ing piece hanging against the wall in a cloth case, which were stolen from him. But upon complaint, the bell was ordered to be rung through the city, and both gun and case were found by the next morning lying Manner of taking and killing it.

As soon as the king is seated on his throne, the music playing all the while, a set of officers, <sup>a</sup> or gentlemen, begin a brawl, or round dance, called Kilomba, around the royal carpet, in which they toss their arms about backwards and forwards, and show all possible activity with their bodies; and when any of them hath been so happy as to please his majesty by his performance, of which notice is given to him by his opening arms, he immediately draws nearer to the throne, and after rolling himself several times on the sand, to testify his gratitude and subjection, some of them are allowed to clap their hands upon his kners, and their heads into his bosom; and others to express their joy in some more humble guise<sup>a</sup>. The nobles have the privilege of saluting the king in the former manner, and in approaching nearer and nearer to his person, taking several large steps, or bounds in the air, backwards and forwards; and as these have their separate seats on each side of the throne, they cause their own vassals, who <sup>b</sup> attend them on these occasions, to perform the ceremony to them; and this is called the Kilombo, or leaping salute, and is always used upon the grand occasions above-mentioned, and particularly when the king's vassals come to pay their homage and tribute to him<sup>c</sup>.

THE next grand solemnity is called the Seeding-time, and falls always on the 4th of January, when men and their wives appear before him in the same state, in order to till and sow his lands. The men appear in arms, whilst the women are busied in breaking the ground, not, indeed, to assist them in, but to see that they go through with the slavery, to protect them from insults, and to prevent their quarrelling one with another. This is a service to which they must all submit, and from which none can absent themselves without incurring some pecuniary penalty, and to which the king himself repairs in person about three in the <sup>c</sup> afternoon, to encourage them, and see that his work is well done. In the evening they are all invited to sup at his charge; and this is esteemed a grand festival among them. In the like manner is every vassal obliged to send his wives to till the land of his respective lord; and when they have performed this last service, they are at liberty to go and work for themselves on what waste piece of ground they like best; for all the rest of the lands are held in common: and when any one hath begun to cultivate one spot, it is not lawful for another to interfere with him in it<sup>d</sup>.

WHEN an ambassador is admitted to audience, or a nobleman or gentleman comes to present a suit or complaint, they must open the ceremony with the clapping of their hands two or three times; and when answered in the same manner, they cry aloud, Empo lausan bian <sup>d</sup> Pongo; that is, Hearken for God's sake, or, in God's name: to which he is answered, Tie-sambie Zingha; that is, Long live God; which is as much as to say, that they are permitted to speak, and do so accordingly, beginning their speech, or request, with the word Wag, and ending with In mama wag, or, I here conclude. If any person present hath aught to object against it, he is allowed to do it, but must begin and end with the same words; which, we are told, are used in all their pleadings, warrants, and orders from the king<sup>e</sup>.

THE last occasion on which the king shews himself in public, is on the hunting of some leopard within the neighbourhood of his capital. These creatures being numerous and very hurtful in these parts, the noblemen are allowed to summon all their vassals to hunt and destroy them; and when any of them hath destroyed one of those animals, he gives notice of it to <sup>e</sup> the king, by bringing the tail of it to Loango, and hanging it on a palmetto pole before the royal palace. But if any of those vermin are discovered within the neighbourhood of that capital, the king, upon the first notice of it, orders all the inhabitants, by beat of drum and sound of the trumpet, to appear in arms, and to accompany him to the place where the creature is lodged. If it be too far for him to walk to it, he is carried thither in his wicker chair (W), borne upon four mens shoulders. When they are come to the leopard's den, or to the wood where his haunt is, the people set themselves about, some to surround and beset the avenues, armed with their bows and javelins, whilst others lay their traps, or spread their nets, to catch it alive. A third sort fall on beating the wood, sounding their trumpets, beating their drums, and making a most hideous din to dislodge it, till the affrighted creature, <sup>f</sup> unable to break its way thro' volleys of darts and arrows, is forced into the net or trap, where, in the presence of the prince, every one strives to dispatch it. He then orders it to be flayed before his door. He adds another instance of a person who recovered a bag of beads, of an hundred pound weight, by the same method (35).

(W) This is no better than a plain ordinary square seat, made of palmetto or other twigs, neatly woven, and about two feet deep. It is commonly covered with blue cloth, and hath two staves, one on each side, by which the porters carry it like those we have described at Angoia and Kongo, with this difference, that the latter are laid upon their head, and the former upon their shoulders (36).

a by one of his officers, and the skin to be carried to his palace, the body being opened, and the gall taken out; the former is buried very deep in a hole dug for that purpose, upon the spot; and the latter, which is reckoned among them one of the strongest poisons, is cut up and flung into the next river, to prevent an ill use being made of it. The skin is carried in triumph by the huntsmen to the palace, where the ceremony is closed with singing, dancing, and variety of other pastimes <sup>u</sup>.

THEIR funeral obsequies are performed with great pomp, and much after the same manner we have observed among those neighbouring kingdoms that have not been converted to christianity; but with this manifest difference, however, at least of later years, that they have left off that inhuman custom, so much in vogue in these African parts, of burying wives, relations, domestics, and slaves, alive with them; instead of which, they surround the funeral seat, on which the corpse is placed, with little pictures of clay, wood, wax, and other materials, to serve them as their attendants into the other world; yet some slaves, we are told, they still slaughter, and bury in the same or some adjacent vault. These vaults are made large enough to contain, besides the corpse, which is always arrayed in the most pompous manner, and with all the regalia, a great number of other utensils and household lumber, as pots, kettles, pans, pitchers, cups, clothes, linen, &c. These slaves, we are told, are buried with their masters, not only to attend them in the other life, but likewise to bear witness, when they come to appear before the great monarch, or God, of the other world, how they have lived and behaved in this <sup>w</sup>; which, if true, though it confirms what we have before observed of their obscure and imperfect idea of the Supreme Being, yet plainly confutes what some authors have affirmed of their disbelief of a future state *.

WE have already observed, that the inheritance goes not to the children, but to the elder brother or elder sister's children; and the same rule is observed in the succession to the crown; and, to prevent confusion and disputes about it, those who claim a pretension to it, have particular towns or villages assigned for them to live in, nearer or farther from that of Loango, according to their being further from, or nearer to, the succession: they have likewise their titles from those towns; thus the next heir to the crown is called Mani-kay, from the town of that name, about five or six miles north-west of that capital. The next to him is called Mani-bokke, and lives at that town, which is between fifteen and sixteen miles farther up the country. Mani-sallaga, or Salag, the third in rank, lives at Salag, thirty-five miles from Loango. Mani-kat, the fourth in course, lives at Kat, a village about fifty miles. And Mani-inyami, the fifth and last, at a hamlet southwards of that capital, and near the kingdom of Cacongo. So that when the prince on the throne dies, Mani-kay, who succeeds him, removes to Loango, and the other four remove one stage nearer to it, according to their rank, and a new one is nominated to succeed Mani-inyami. But though Mani-kay enters into his government immediately after the demise of his predecessor, he commonly stays in his old residence about six months longer, that is, till the funeral ceremonies of his interment and mourning are ended, before he makes his public appearance at court <sup>x</sup>.

WE know little more of the history of those monarchs, than what hath been already said, either in this section, or in the two preceding chapters, relating to those of Kongo and Angola, against whom, especially the former, they continued for some time in a state of war, after they had shaken off their yoke, and made themselves absolutely independent, in the manner we have already related <sup>y</sup>. It was not long, however, before they found means to reconcile them to that brave though mortifying step, and to prevail on them (other circumstances concurring) to live in peace and amity with them; and in that friendly state they were in, when our Portuguese historian landed first in these parts <sup>z</sup>. Since which time we do not meet with any hostile transactions that have passed between them, but, on the contrary, have frequently found them strictly allied against some other neighbouring princes to the eastward of their dominions, and oftener still in suppressing the Giagas, those constant pests of their mutual traffick, and common invaders, and perpetual terror of every realm along these coasts.

THIS beneficial commerce, which hath been still carried on between the subjects of these two crowns, notwithstanding their above-mentioned rupture, and might have been made more extensive and gainful to both, but for the frequent inroads of these plundering canibals, who infest every road, and never could be totally suppressed, with their united forces, hath however so closely combined the inhabitants of both, that it was once firmly hoped that the conversion of the one to christianity, would be soon followed by that of the other. This may appear ill-grounded, considering the ignorance and strange superstition of the Loangoese; and yet we are told by several hands, that in their conversing with the Kongoese converts, they had expressed an earnest desire for some proper missionaries, who might come and instruct them in that faith, for which they professed a much greater liking, by what they had observed in their neighbours. than they now had for their old idolatrous and heathenish worship. What a is still more surprising, their own monarchs, respected and idolized as they are by their subjects, and conceited as they are of their imaginary power, wisdom, and greatness, did yet condescend to make several pressing instances to the kings of Kongo and Angola, as well as to the Portuguese viceroy at Loanda, to the same intent, and to promise the greatest encouragement to any missionaries that should come to preach the gospel in his dominions<sup>a</sup>. They even offered a free and advantageous trade into their country, not to the Portuguese only, but to any European nation that would send them christian preachers of any order or denomination, yet never could obtain the satisfaction of entertaining any of those so much longed-for and desired guests; which was owing to the great scarcity there was of such holy men in both these kingdoms, the occasion of which we have already sufficiently hinted*; viz. the b small number of them that are sent thither from Europe, and the terrible havock which the inclemency of the weather, change of diet and climate, and constant fatigues, make among those few that arrive safe thither; insomuch, that we are told by one of the latest writers that came from thence, that throughout the whole kingdom of Kongo, which is mostly christian, and in alliance with the Portuguese, and which one would expect to be better supplied with them, there were not above six Capuchins, exclusive of those that are settled at the cathedral of St. Salvadore, to perform the priestly functions through that vast extent of ground†. If to this we add the vast fatigues which their long and painful marches through sultry climes and barren deserts, in pursuit of their ministry, exposes them to, without, perhaps, any proper sustenance or refreshment to support them under it, and the great difficulty there is to supply c their place, when any sink under the arduous task, we shall cease wondering to find that kingdom continuing still destitute of the light of the gospel, notwithstanding the earnest longings which those monarchs and their subjects have expressed after it.

APPENDIX to the Western Ethiopic History, being an account of the dreadful incursions of a new tribe of Giagas into the kingdoms of Kongo, Loango, &c. thence, through the heart of Africa; quite to the eastern coast; together with their particular laws, government, strange and bloody customs, &c.

HAVING had frequent occasion to mention this new and strange set of canibals in some d of the foregoing chapters*, as not only different from, but as much more inhuman and destructive than those there described; it might be looked upon as a considerable omission, if we did not here subjoin a more full account of that infernal race, of their laws and customs, and especially of their horrid butcheries and devastations, than could be possibly done hitherto, without too great a deviation from, and interruption of, the thread of the history we were then upon†; for we must here observe, that these are not only in many respects different from the former, (not to mention their vast and extensive ravages through the southern parts of Africa) but boast themselves to be of a more antient and noble extract, that is, according to their own estimation, of a more savage, intrepid, and merciless nature than any other of the Giagan tribes, and, in fact, they have spread the terror of their name and horrid devastations not only much farther, but to a much higher degree of cruelty, than any other of that name that we can read of, as the sequel will easily shew; but more particularly in that long and extensive, as well as dreadful incursion they made towards the east, when having reduced the greatest part of Western Ethiopia into a desolate wilderness (by which time they were become so numerous and terrible, that they carried all before them, and put all that came in their way to fire and sword) they led their furious hosts, in separate columns, across the heart of that vast continent, till the eastern ocean put a stop to their further progress eastwards, though not to their horrid ravages and butcheries, which they then began to spread on their right and left hand, along the eastern coast, as far northward as the kingdoms of Melinda and Magadoxo, and southwards quite to the country of the Hottentots. These and other particulars relating to their return, new government, strange laws, female lawgivers and viragos, and other no less strange customs, we hope our readers will not think unworthy a place in f a this Ethiopic history, and shall therefore close it with as succinct an account of them as the subject will permit.

WHAT part of Africa this strange and barbarous nation came originally from, is variously conjectured. The most probable opinion is that which brings them down from the empire of Monoemugi, and more particularly from the neighbourhood of the famed springs of two great rivers which have been vulgarly mistaken for the Nile and Zaire, though more probably, perhaps, near that of the latter (A). This opinion is founded on the etymology of their antient names Giakasi, and Engaggiagbi, which implies people that live near some spring heads<sup>a</sup>. Their uncertain origin.

BUT whatever part of Africa they originally came from, which is neither certain nor material, they seem to have settled at first about the kingdom of Anfiko, which lies many days journey north from that of Loango, and to have spread themselves along those spacious wastes that lie between them. For there we find them still joined and intermixed with the Anfikans, and subject to the same monarch, though they differ greatly from them in their manners, customs, religion, &c. From thence they are supposed to have spread themselves, by degrees, along the eastern frontiers of Loango, Kongo, and Angola, which, as was formerly observed, were heretofore all under one prince<sup>b</sup>, thence eastward unto the kingdom of Metamba, of their own erecting, of which they made themselves masters, and southward as far as that of Benguela, if not greatly beyond it; and from all these new settlements have perpetually harrassed their neighbours on all sides with their inroads and ravages ever since<sup>c</sup>. Their irruption into Kongo and other parts.

THEY have neither towns nor houses, nor any settled habitation, but, like the wild Arabs we have formerly described<sup>d</sup>, roam from place to place in tents, and change their dwelling as their fancy or occasions lead them. They neither sow nor plant, but fall foul on every thing that comes in their way, and live altogether upon plunder and robbery. They are tall, lusty, and strong, yet nimble and swift of foot, and climb up the steep mountains, and craggy rocks, like the wild goats. Their women are stout, well-shaped, fertile, warlike, and active; and both sexes are so stout and intrepid, that no enterprize is thought too hard or dangerous for them to venture upon; and whenever any plunder or prey comes in their way, they rush upon it at all hazards, and with a fearless unconcern for their lives. They look upon it as the greatest mark of bravery to attack the fiercest and strongest creatures; and as a still greater one to be more fierce and inhuman than they: and this extends not only to the nations they invade, but to those of their own, and even to their relations and children, whom they make no scruple to butcher and eat, for want of other food; though, for the most part, they take such care in this particular, that it must be owing to some great misfortune or unforeseen accident, if their *Their wandering and plundering life. (A) Odoard Lopez is the first European writer who hath mentioned these Giagas, and tells us that they had that name given to them by the Kongose; but that they, in their own language, call themselves Agag, and Agagi (1). But our countryman Battel, who had a much better opportunity to inform himself of their original name, as he had lived and carried a musket under them about sixteen months, tells us that they call themselves Imbangolas (2); which is the name, in all probability, of the Imbii and Gallas, two nations, or perhaps tribes, equally barbarous in their manners, and infamous all over these parts of Africa, for their ravages and eating the flesh of their captives, and whom we have shewn in a former chapter to have been long before settled in that part of Abissinia, near the heads of the Nile (3), whence they made frequent incursions into that empire, and committed the most dreadful ravages.

This is a more probable opinion, than that which brings them down from the high mountains of Sierra Leone, and to have spread themselves, like a vast torrent, southward as far as the kingdom of Benguela; that is, between six and seven hundred leagues; it being scarcely credible that those barren mountains, chiefly inhabited by lions and wild beasts, from which they had that name given them by the Portuguese, should be able to furnish so many myriads of those plunderers, as such an expedition and extensive conquest do suppose (4). But let them come from what part of Africa they will, seeing we find them so early settled near the head, and on each side of the Upper Nile, under the names of Agas and Gallas, where they often (5) met with a powerful repulse from the Abissinians, on account of their barbarous customs and horrid ravages, may we not reasonably conclude, that it was from thence that they spread themselves all over the Western Ethiopia? Some suppose these Gallas to be descended from the Jews dispersed either at the captivity of the ten tribes, or those that followed under Nebuchadnezzar or Titus; for which they can have no other foundation than their use of circumcision, and the kind reception which the Abissinian emperors gave them in their dominions upon that account, as they imagine; but neither their religion, if they can be said to have any, nor their laws, bloody customs, nor any thing else belonging to them, countenances that supposition; and the Jews who were permitted to settle there some ages ago, were as different from the Gallas, who over-ran the empire, in every respect, as any two nations could be (6): whereas the Giagas we are now upon, differ in nothing from these Gallas, excepting that they exceed them in their barbarity; which the reader will have the less reason to wonder at, if he supposes them, with us, to have been expelled Abissinia upon that very account, and for refusing to turn Christians; and especially when he sees, in the sequel of this appendix, by what means they came gradually to degenerate into that excess of inhumanity.

shambles are not stored with variety of flesh, and especially with that of their unhappy captives<sup>a</sup>. The first chief under whom they invaded and made themselves masters of a great part of the vast empire of Kongo, was called Zimbo, who was afterwards succeeded by a virago, no less warlike and cruel, named Tem-ban-dumba, who gave them a set of the most inhuman and execrable laws, which are still extant amongst them. And from these two sprung those famous leaders Kassanghi and Kalanga, mentioned in a former chapter<sup>c</sup>, and several other Giagan princes, of whom we shall have occasion to speak in the sequel.

Increase in number and cruelty.

Divide themselves into separate bodies.

Defeated by the Portuguese.

Zimbo's revenge on them.

ZIMBO first appeared in those parts, at the head of a numerous body of Musimbi, who were either his subjects, or had been raked by him from other wilds of Africa, to attend him on his expedition, in hopes of meeting with better fare, and enriching themselves by the plunder of those nations through which he engaged to lead them, as to certain victory and wealth. They readily accepted his offers; and, inticed by such attractive prospects, they flocked to him in such numbers, that he soon saw himself at the head of a numerous army, who all promised to obey him in every thing, and follow him where-ever he led them. He brought likewise with him a favourite heroine, of the same name with the virago above-mentioned, who served him at once as a concubine and a counsellor; and with these penetrated, without any considerable opposition, almost to the very center of the Kongoesse empire, committing the most dreadful ravages and butcheries where-ever they came, leaving nothing behind but desolation and ruin. What was still more dreadful, these hungry vermin, who were accustomed to feed on human flesh, made no less horrid havock among the unhappy Ethiopians who fell into their hands, and whom they wantonly put to the most excruciating deaths, merely to give a higher relish to their flesh; though they were naturally such monsters of beastliness, that when that failed them, they as greedily fell foul upon the most loathsome creatures, reptiles, insects of all kinds, and even any stinking and half-corrupted carrion, that fell in their way. Whenever these failed, they made no difficulty to attack the most fierce and cruel wild beast for their food, such as lions, tygers, leopards, &c. but as these creatures are naturally affrighted at multitudes, and will convey themselves into the thickest forests for safety, whence there is no possibility of driving them out, they had recourse to setting the whole wood on fire, and waiting for their coming out, in order either to dispatch them with their weapons, or to penetrate into it, and feed upon their half-roasted carcases. So that they seldom left any territory, before they had utterly reduced it to a mere barren wilderness<sup>d</sup>.

THESE horrid devastations brought daily new recruits to his army; the unhappy Kongoesse flocking to him in shoals, in hopes to preserve themselves from the famine which that spread where-ever it passed; and Zimbo grew every day more powerful, till having one day mustered up all his forces, and finding them too numerous and unwieldy to continue longer in one body, he thought proper to divide them into several corps; and having set some of his most intrepid officers over them, dispersed them into several parts of Ethiopia, to spread fire and sword, and desolation, where-ever they came. One of them, named Quizzuva, a man no less brutish than martial, and so elated with his success, that he embellished the floor, walls, and cincture of his house and Tomba, or temple of his idols, with the craniums and bones of the human bodies which had been served at his table, and had the insolence to go and attack the Portuguese at one of their fortresses named Teto, in the kingdom of Monoemugi: but he there met with the fortune he had justly deserved, being totally defeated and killed, with a vast number of his Mombi, and the rest either put to flight or taken prisoners.

ZIMBO did not let this loss go long unrevenged; he marched with all possible speed to the fort, with a fresh supply of forces, engaged the Portuguese commander again, and, after an obstinate struggle on both sides, defeated and killed him, and made a dreadful slaughter among the rest of his forces. Those whom he took prisoners underwent a much crueller fate; for these he caused to be put to the most torturing deaths, particularly their chaplain, a Dominican friar, whom he had observed to be more than commonly busy in encouraging the soldiers to fight. All their heads were ordered to be stuck upon lances, and carried away as trophies, together with all the church vestments, Zimbo himself marching at their head, arrayed in a priestly habit, and carrying a chalice in his hand, in derision to their religion<sup>e</sup>.

FLUSHED with this success, he made a descent upon the island of Quiloa (B), formerly in the hands of the Portuguese, but now of the Mohammedan Moors, and made himself master of some part

(B) This island is situate on the eastern side of Africa, on the coast of Zanguebar, near the mouths of the rivers Cuabo and Kifima, under the eighth degree and a half of south latitude. The Portuguese, who first discovered it, built a strong fortress upon it, and had settled a considerable factory in it, but abandoned the one, and razed the other, by order of their king, and settled themselves at Melinda and Mosambico, on the same coast, which were more convenient for their commerce.

The island, however, is well inhabited, being very fertile a part of it, in which he put 3000 inhabitants to the sword, whose bodies he gave to his troops to glut themselves with, together with the plunder, and took the rest prisoners, made slaves of some of them, and the others he ordered to be sacrificed to his idols, and among these last the traitor who had assisted him to surprize the island, of which he himself was an inhabitant. But first, to shew his abhorrence to his treachery, he caused him to be tortured in the most exquisite manner; after which he appointed him to be the first victim to be offered to his gods.

He made much the same successful attempt upon that of Mosambico, on the south of Quiloo; Descent on Mosambico. where both the inhabitants and Portuguese that were settled among them, being alarmed at his approach, and much more at his horrid cruelties, had unanimously resolved to oppose his descent at the hazard of their lives. They were moreover encouraged to this brave resolution by the expectation they were in of the European fleet, which was coming to their relief; but had the misfortune to see it dispersed by a dreadful storm which intervened, and themselves, as it were, abandoned by Providence to that inexorable monster of cruelty, who quickly landed with his canibals, and did not stir from it till they had stripped it of every thing that was valuable, and of every living, especially human, creature, that could glut their ravenous jaws<sup>1</sup>.

His next attempt was upon the kingdom of Melinda (C). At the first news of his approach, the inhabitants, as they did every-where, were consulting how to save their lives and valuable effects, by betaking themselves to their woods and deserts. They were, however, dissuaded from it by their generous monarch, who represented to them, in the strongest terms, how shameful a thing it would be for so brave a nation to abandon their country to a set of banditti and robbers, who had neither religion, honour, nor humanity; protesting at the same time, that whatever they might resolve upon, with regard to their own safety, he was fully determined to meet and engage them, and to defend his country and subjects to the last drop of his blood, against those barbarians and inhuman invaders, and trust to the divine Providence for his assistance in so just a cause. By these words his people were so effectually encouraged, that they resolved, one and all, to stand by him to the last man; and the king, having prepared every thing for an obstinate fight, set out with them to meet the enemy at some distance from his capital. Attempt upon Melinda.

d ZIMBO advanced at the head of his victorious canibals, all richly laden with the spoil of Quiloo, Mosambico, and other places, and engaged the Melindans, with his usual fierceness and assurance of success. The engagement was obstinate and bloody, and lasted several hours. At length the savages began to give way, and betake themselves to flight, in spite of their general's endeavours to rally them; and the king rightly deeming such a pest of human kind unworthy of any mercy, ordered his men to pursue and slay all they could come at; which they did with such readiness and bravery, that very few, except some of the most nimble-footed, escaped their fury. A dreadful massacre was made of all the rest, and an immense spoil found in their camp. The king's noble defence of it. Zimbo had the good fortune to escape with a small number of his bravest troops, with which he retired to the woods, till he could get together the poor remains of his other fugitives<sup>k</sup>. A horrid slaughter of his Giagas.

c THIS dreadful and unexpected blow, the loss of so many thousands of his men, and of such immense riches, the desolations which he had left behind where he had passed, and where he could now expect nothing but famine and misery, should he attempt to return to his old settlements either of Kongo or Ansiko, with his shattered and disheartened remains, made him resolve upon a new project, which might be executed with more safety and ease, which was to make a tour round the coasts of Africa, in which there was a prospect of daily increasing his army with new volunteers amongst those savages, and enriching himself with such new spoils as should fall in his way. He accordingly set out, and steered his course southwards, along the eastern coasts, till he came to the Cape of Good Hope, without meeting with any opposition or disaster; He marches round to the Cape of Good Hope;

fertile and healthy for the climate, and carries on a considerable traffick (1); all which might easily tempt Zimbo to make a descent upon it. But as our author doth not tell us of his having any navy or vessels to transport his men thither (2), it is more likely that he mistook the island for the kingdom of Quiloo, which last is upon Terra firma, and near the same coast with Mosambico and Melinda, where that Giagan chief made his two next attempts.

(C) This kingdom, as we hinted in the last note, lies on the same coast of Zanguebar, but nearer the equinox; its capital Melinda lying under the second degree and half of south latitude, and on an island at the mouth of the river of its name. It was once the residence of its monarchs, who were opulent and powerful, but is now become the capital of the Portuguese conquests on this coast; since which time the king's residence hath been removed to the city of Mombaso, where most of the governors of this coast, we are told (3), do likewise reside.

and, as he found his army to augment, he divided them, for the better conveniency of living and plundering, into several columns, which he however forbade to separate themselves so far, but that they might, upon any emergency, be able to rejoin the rest.

FROM the Cape of Good Hope above-mentioned he began to wheel about to the northward, till he came to the great river Cuneva, which flows southwards from the Sallan mountains, in Upper Bemba, and discharges itself into the Ethiopic sea, about the 17th degree of south latitude, where he settled himself between that river and the sea-coasts. Here he began to fix his resting place, and to build some few wretched huts for his men, in form of a camp, or large village, which he called, in their language, Kilombo, distributing them into several bodies, under proper commanders, and reserving to himself the supreme command over the whole. He was, however, of too restless a temper to continue long in that quiet situation ; his ambitious mind was ever hatching some new exploit ; to complete which he soon set about increasing his army to a much higher degree, and to make other preparations for a favourite expedition he had been projecting, when death put an unexpected end to all his designs, how, and by what means, we are not told, and carried off soon after likewise his favourite concubine Tem-ban-dumba, the faithful companion of all his travels. After their death, the surviving commanders, not caring to submit, or become dependant on any other chief, quickly agreed to break off their community, and each of them went and took upon him the chief command of his own troops. Some of them moved off in quest of new settlements ; and the rest staid in the old ones, which had been assigned to them, and from thence sprang their several tribes, and diversity of governments we meet with in most parts of Africa.

AMONG their chiefs that separated themselves from the rest, was one named Dongii, who is particularly famed among the Giagas for being the father of that infernal virago, hinted at in the beginning of this appendix ; who gave them a new set of the most inhuman, or rather diabolical, laws, by which they became more known by the name of a sect, than of a nation, and she the most absolute and inhuman legislatrix and tyranness over them, and more particularly over her own sex. As there is, therefore, so little to be met with worth notice in any of the other tribes, except their frequent inroads and horrid ravages, of which we have seen so many instances in the foregoing chapters, we shall confine ourselves to the history, reign, religion, and other curious particulars only, which are related of that surprising woman, if such a monster could deserve that name ; all whose principles and actions rather demonstrate her to have been some fury broke out of hell, to be a curse not only to all her subjects, but to all the Ethiopians that had the ill luck to be situated near her dominions<sup>1</sup>.

TEM-BAN-DUMBA was born at Kilombo, the camp which Zimbo chose for his last retreat, and had that name given her in compliment to his favourite concubine. After their deaths, Dongii her father removed with his small army to the province of Ganghella, or Ganguella, situate on the south side of the kingdom of Metamba, where dying soon after, his wife Mussaza, a bold masculine woman, took the command of it into her hands ; and having been brought up in the martial, or rather plundering trade, from her youth, quickly gave them such proofs of her intrepid courage, and bloody disposition, that they readily submitted themselves to her conduct, and followed her in her most dangerous expeditions, in which they were sure to see her the foremost in every engagement, and hindermost in retreating. She affected to appear upon all occasions armed and dressed like a male warrior ; and clad her daughter, in whom she observed the same martial and intrepid courage, in the same dress, taking the young virago with her in all her expeditions, in order to train her up in the same trade.

TEM-BAN-DUMBA, though then but young and tender, made such proficiency under her mother, and discovered such prudence and presence of mind on the greatest emergencies and difficulties, that Mussaza made no scruple to intrust her with the command of some of her forces, whilst she led the rest on to some important exploits ; at which the young amazon was so elated, that she could hardly brook to be any longer in subjection to her<sup>m</sup>.

WHAT added to the uneasiness of her restraint was, that, being of a no less amorous than warlike temper, she used to indulge herself in the embraces of several gallant youths of her army, of whom she, through the fickleness of her sex and younger years, became no sooner tired, than she caused them to be privately put to death, to make way for new ones. For this her mother had often reprimanded her so severely, that, being no longer able to bear her constraint, she broke out into an open rebellion against her. She had already displayed such an intrepid bravery on so many occasions, that this bold action of hers, instead of disgracing, made her the more admired as well as dreaded by the whole savage army, who began to think her something more than human, and expressed the utmost eagerness to come and fight under her banner ; so that the greater part of her mother's forces came gradually over to her, and she quickly saw herself at the head of a numerous army, by whom she was more punctually obeyed a than any general of the other sex could have been, as they imagined her indeed to excel them all in courage, prudence, and every other martial qualification.

As soon as she found that her exploits and behaviour had raised in their minds such an extraordinary idea in her favour, her ambition, which, by that time, was swelled to an unmeasurable height, inspired her with a new project to improve them to the greatest advantage, though by such means as must have filled any, but such an army of savage monsters, with horror, instead of regard, for her; but which, she too well knew, would inspire them with veneration and dread, and enable her to enlarge her dominions beyond their present scanty limits.

b To execute her ambitious project the more effectually, she ordered her whole army to be drawn up in arms before her, and appearing before them in her masculine military dress, prepared them, by a proper preface, in which she acquainted them with her sanguine views of making them victorious and happy under her conduct, and, by their valour and assistance, to lay the foundation of a powerful and glorious kingdom and government, which should eternise her memory, and make them dreaded by all the Ethiopic realms around them.<sup>Speech to her army.</sup>

c But first of all she told them, that she must and would instruct and initiate them in the laws and rites of the antient Giagas, their ancestors (D), as the most infallible means to make them as successful and opulent as the late Zimbo their leader, without the danger of exposing themselves to the same disasters and misfortunes. To convince them how much she was in earnest, and expected to be obeyed, she told them she would herself forthwith set them an example worthy of their imitation and valour; unless they were greatly degenerated from the courage and intrepidity of their celebrated race; and, if they were, would infallibly revive it in them. Having thus far raised their expectations, and fixed their attentive eyes and ears on her, she ordered an only son, which she had by one of her paramours, to be brought to her, together with a large pestle and mortar, in which, instead of overwhelming him with the caresses of a young and tender mother, as they might reasonably expect, she, to their great surprize, and without the least shew of remorse, pounded the innocent babe alive, till she had reduced the bones, flesh, &c. into a pulp, among which she brayed several kinds of powders, herbs, roots, oil, and other drugs; and having mixed the whole in a kettle over a slow fire, into an ointment, she stripped herself, and ordered some of her maids to anoint her with it from head to foot, before them all. This done, she resumed her martial dress, and told them, that that was the sovereign balsam which would render them not only strong and robust, and fit for martial exploits, but invulnerable and invincible, and a terror to all other nations.<sup>Horrid murder of her son.</sup>

d It is hardly to be conceived, says our author, how that unnatural action was admired, and how speedily and universally it was followed, by her barbarian subjects; much less to reckon the many thousands of male infants that were butchered in the same horrid manner, and for the same hellish purposes.<sup>Detestable superstition.</sup>

She presently after made it a law, that none of her subjects should undertake any thing of consequence, or even consult about any enterprize, till they had previously anointed themselves with that detestable ointment, which, she told them, would inspire them with wisdom to chuse, and courage and resolution to execute, all their projects with undoubted success: and, that there never might be wanting a supply of it, she enacted some other edicts, by which several sorts of male children were excluded from being admitted into the Kilombo, or camp; or even from being brought up; some of which were ordered to be pounded and boiled for the use above-mentioned, and others, that were either deformed or defective, to be thrown to the dogs; to all which she added those infants which the chiefs and persons of rank should voluntarily offer for the common benefit of the whole, and which, she said, had by far greater virtue and efficacy, when made into ointment, than those of the meaner sort. Neither did she suffer any woman to be brought to-bed in,<sup>Followed by her army.</sup>

(D) Our author (4), who had not only conversed some time amongst them, and had converted many of them to the Christian faith, from whom he learned all these particulars, seems to make a doubt, whether there had indeed been any such diabolical laws among the antient Giagas, or whether she only pretended it, in order to reconcile them the more easily to, and induce them the more effectually to observe, them, and, at the same time, to throw off the odium of whatever might appear shocking and unnatural from herself.

It is hard, indeed, on the one hand, to conceive how so young a female warrior, cruel as she might be in her natural disposition, and ambitious as she was to be looked upon as something not only above herself, but above human nature, could devise such a body of laws, and introduce a set of customs, so opposite and shocking to it: and, on the other, it is no less unlikely that her subjects would have so readily subscribed or adhered to either, if they had not been already inured to the practice of, at least, the far greater part of them, by the example of their forefathers; so that, upon the whole, she seems to us to have only given the sanction of a law to a set of inhuman customs, which had gradually introduced themselves amongst those barbarians, in order to render them more fierce, intrepid, and dreadful to their neighbours; and if we suppose her to have made any addition to their barbarity, it might be only with a view of shewing herself more hardened in the butchering trade, and consequently more fit to command over them.

the camp ; which, she affirmed, polluted it to such a degree, as nothing could expiate but the death both of the mother and child ° ; so that, to deter pregnant women from it, she condemned them, whether the mischance was voluntary or no, to kill their offspring with their own hand, or to be themselves put to death (E).

THESE laws, which she styled Quixillas, and pretended to have been derived from time immemorial from the antient Giagas, are still, for the most part, religiously observed by that barbarous nation ; though she was forced herself to abate of the severity of such of them as were either detrimental to the increase of the male kind, or too shocking against the natural affection of parents, and might at length terminate in a general discontent, or perhaps in an open rebellion ; especially as she had introduced others more agreeable to their natural barbarity, and equally capable of inuring them to it ; and among these, that of feeding upon human flesh, preferably to any other food. But here she had, out of regard to her own sex, made an exception against killing any of them for any such purpose, or even to eat them, whether they either died a natural, or were put to a violent, death. These last are by their law reserved for another kind of sacrifice ; viz. to be butchered at the tomb of some noble or favourite person that chances to die, in order to be interred with and attend him into the next world <sup>p</sup>. But this prohibition, which excepts the females from becoming a dainty dish to the cannibal tribe, hath rather served to whet their appetite after it, especially among the great, who, in spite of the penalties it subjects them to, run the hazard of glutting themselves with it, as being by far the most delicious to their taste. And our author mentions one of their chiefs, named Giaga Cajsango, who seldom failed of having some young woman killed every day for his table <sup>q</sup>.

SHE had likewise expressly forbid her army to carry any women with them on any warlike expedition, as being too apt to mollify the hearts of her soldiers : but this law was as little observed as the last-mentioned, some of her chiefs making no scruple to carry them about with them by hundreds, either to satisfy their lust, or to be butchered for their table.

SEVERAL other laws she gave them, which seemed wholly calculated to extinguish not only all humanity from among them, but likewise all bashfulness and modesty in either sex : the reader may see an instance or two in the margin (F). As for those which related to their worship,

(E) The same good Capuchin above-quoted gives several pregnant proofs of the strictness with which that bloody legislatrix caused those her laws to be obeyed, from the confession of several of his female converts, and the extraordinary grief and abhorrence which they expressed at the remembrance of their having, in compliance with them, submitted to butcher, with their own hands, some two or three or more of their own children ; her edicts, dreadful and shocking as they were to nature, not being sufficient to restrain the innate incontinence of either sex from stolen embraces, much less to be delivered of their burthen when pregnant, without being discovered by some of the watchful Quixillas ; so they call their priests, or rather jugglers, whose interest it is to keep a vigilant eye over the sex, in order to extort some considerable presents from the parents, to preserve the child ; which is commonly the case with those who have wherewith to bribe them into a connivance ; or, if they are not in a condition to redeem them, to have them assigned over to death, and yield a delicious meal to those voracious cannibals (5).

(F) One of them was, that as soon as a young female perceived the usual tokens of puberty, she was to give notice of it, that all her friends and acquaintance might come to congratulate her upon the agreeable prospect of her becoming a mother of children, and an useful member of society. But if, after this, and her having been married, or enjoyed as a mistress, four or five years, she gave no signs of pregnancy, she was condemned to die, as an useless clog to the community, and either be reserved against the funeral obsequies of some great person, in order to attend him in the other world, or given up to the owner to be butchered and eat (6).

Another was, that when any of her officers was to set out upon some expedition, he was to bring his favourite wife or concubine out with him into a public place, and, in full sight of a numerous circle of spectators, go through the whole exercise of the matrimonial converse with her, without the least shew of reluctance or bashfulness. And this even the greatest commander in her army must submit to, or else run the risk of being discharged with shame and disgrace (7).

Our author, and others of his fraternity, who endeavoured to introduce Christianity among them, tell us, that their zeal hath often made them run the risk of their lives, by the opposition and remonstrances they have made against these and the like immodest and unnatural customs ; and that though they have had the good fortune to come off with some few insults or angry threats from the Quixillas, yet they could hardly ever reduce any of these barbarians either from their beastly ways, or inhuman rites. And even among those they had made converts of, and baptised, they could never abolish the custom among them of divorcing their wives for sterility, and marrying others more likely to be pregnant. All that they have been able to do was only to be more cautious in concealing their irregularities from them (8). But after all, there ever were but little hopes of bringing those inhuman cannibals to a liking of the gospel precepts ; against which almost every one of their laws and vicious inveterate customs is a kind of insuperable barrier.

We have, indeed, elsewhere seen the swift progress it made in the kingdom of Metamba, during the latter end of the surprising reign of their queen Zingha ; and how, soon after her death, it was, in a great measure, extirpated ; those barbarians having for the most part been forced, by that queen's edicts, to make outward profession of it, but preserved the same bent and affection for their diabolical rites : no wonder then that they should be so ready to return to them as soon as they could do it impunely (9). It must be owned, however, that Don Salvador, the viceroy of Angola, had much better success in causing several of these inhuman a ship, they were comprised in a few superstitious ceremonies, such as preserving the bones of their deceased friends in boxes made portable for that purpose, in order to offer human victims, and consulting them upon all emergencies, of which we have already given an account elsewhere<sup>r</sup>. The rest of them she turned over to the care or discretion of her Quixillas, or priests, who failed not to multiply them to a very great degree, and to calculate them for their own interest, insomuch that those voracious vermin became a most grievous burden to the whole people, both small and great, as they gave them a specious handle for fleecing the rich, and oppressing the poor<sup>s</sup>; all which the politic queen was obliged and glad to connive at, as these jugglers were the main supports of her authority.

But those she gave them with respect to her political government, were in much greater number, though all of the same inhuman nature, and calculated to encourage and inure her subjects to all manner of rapine, bloodshed, and remorseless cruelty; but which are indeed too shocking to deserve a further detail, especially as we have had occasion to speak of several of them which were afterwards introduced and universally practised in the kingdom of Metamba, under the reign of that no less superstitious and bloody princess queen Zingha, whilst she continued attached to that cursed sect<sup>t</sup>. Upon the whole, Tem-ban-dumba had so hardened all her forces in their destructive trade, that they spread fire and slaughter all over the Western Ethiopia, without mercy, or almost any opposition; and if at any time they met with a stout repulse, or even defeat, from some of her warlike neighbours, instead of being discouraged, she only grew more fierce and desperate, reinforced her army with all possible speed, and fell upon them with such eagerness and fury, that every thing was forced to give way to her, or flee from her victorious arms. And what still more effectually animated her troops to follow her through the most arduous and dangerous enterprizes, was the applause and recompence they were sure to find at their return to the Kilombo, especially with respect to the distribution of the plunder and slaves, and the number of these which were to be butchered at their usual festivals, after every successful expedition<sup>u</sup>.

BEFORE we come to speak of the close of her reign, it will not be displeasing to our readers, we hope, if we give them a short account of her martial discipline, court, chief officers, and other particulars, which our author observed, during his abode with them, and which, tho' taken notice of by other writers<sup>v</sup> as well as he, may well deserve some mention in this work. We have already observed that her Giagas life was a constant roaming from place to place for the sake of plunder; their Kilombos, or camps, which very much resemble the antient Roman Castra, or the present Libates, or Ethiopian villages, formerly described<sup>w</sup>, were built of such materials, and in such a manner, that they were quickly and easily reared, and all as nearly as possible in the same form. The officers, who are the chief directors of them, having pitched upon a proper spot, divide it into seven distinct quarters, each of them under the government of its own particular commander. In the center of it stands the royal pavillion, surrounded by those of the ministers, officers, and servants, belonging to the court, the whole of which composes a spacious square, which is commonly surrounded with a strong thorny hedge, but so disposed, that it is more like a labyrinth than a circular fence. Within this all that belong to the court, and chief officers of the army, have their separate habitations, in order to be always within call in case of an alarm, sudden surprize, or other disaster, under pain of death.

THE next in rank is the quarter of the Kalambolo, or general of the army under the king or queen. This officer is styled Muta-aita, or chief of the war, and is the next in authority, as being the person who orders and directs all military expeditions, encampments, engagements, and retreats, and must therefore be an experienced and intrepid warrior, cruel, and void of all compassion and humanity. He is commonly attended in all his excursions by the chief of the Singhillos, whom he consults about the plan, execution, success, and other particulars relating to them. He must likewise be a very strict observer of all the superstitious rites prescribed by the impious Quixillian laws, seeing the omission of any one of them would be sufficient to render his enterprizes abortive and unfortunate<sup>x</sup>.

rites to be abolished among them, than these good Capuchins; and that his ambassies, which he sent to queen Zingha, to the Giagan chiefs Cassange, Kalomga, and Calomba, accompanied on the one hand with rich presents and great promises, and on the other with threats of his Portuguese forces and artillery, prevailed more powerfully upon them than all the friars praying and preaching could do, to abolish those detestable practices; insomuch, that our author tells us, of his own knowledge, that Tem-ban-dumba's laws, as well as the whole Giagan sect, daily declined; but whether they have been since wholly abolished or no, is a question which it is out of our power to resolve; there having been no missionaries sent amongst them that we know of, at least during this present century (10).

- 3d. THE third quarter is that of the Tendela, or officer who commands the Ecoona, or rear-guard, and is the chief of all the electors, as well as supreme officer during an interregnum, and as such is held in the highest esteem, next to the prince. The fourth quarter is that which looks towards the Mutunda, or east, and is commanded by the Mani-lumbo, who is the chief engineer of all the fences or hedges, with which the camp is fortified, and particularly that part of it which belongs to the royal family. Upon which account he is authorized to come into the royal presence whenever he thinks fit, and this access renders him much respected at court.
- 4th. The fifth quarter is that which looks towards the west, and is commanded by an officer, who is intrusted with all private commissions, and charged with the execution of them. The sixth quarter is that which is commanded by the Illunda, or captain of the Quicumba, or baggage, in time of war; and in time of peace, whenever any such happens, which is but seldom, is intrusted with the care of filling the magazines with arms, and is to see them kept in good order, and in readiness to be distributed to the soldiery upon all emergencies. The seventh or last quarter is commanded by another Illunda, or keeper of the royal wardrobe, and baggage, &c. and seldom stirs far from it. This last is looked upon as a place of great trust, and commonly given to a prince of the blood, remarkable for his loyalty.

the provisions.

To all these great officers we may add that of the Manicurio, or superintendant of the provisions, who is usually chosen for his singular dexterity, and inexorable rapaciousness, in the art of plundering and ravaging; to this end he hath a great number of officers and slaves under him, equally qualified for the purpose; for the Giagas know not what it is to procure either victuals or other provisions but by main force, except what they sometimes purchase from the Euro-peans, in exchange for their slaves, who being mostly very nimble-footed, very often give them the slip before their new masters can chain them fast for their use. This office of purveyor relates only to the court; for as to the soldiery they are obliged to get their provisions where they can<sup>2</sup>.

Soldiery live

Weapons.

ing.

THE last office worth mentioning is that of their Piumbis, or fore-runners, who are a kind of spies, whose business it is to be in continual motion, and to endeavour to discover the situation, strength, and numbers of the enemy, to skirmish, oppose, or even attack them, as occasion offers, and to support the van in their first onset. These Piumbis are usually chosen from among the stoutest and most intrepid of the whole army, and fight accordingly the most desperately of all. The weapons in use among all the Giagas are the dart, or javelin, the bow and arrow, hatchet, dagger, and leathern shield; which last is very tough, and of sufficient length to cover the whole body. They all fight on foot, either for want of horses, or the art of using them in war. Their chief excellency consists in their strength and activity of body, in the artfully covering themselves, and the throwing of their missile weapons, by which they commonly annoy the enemy, and make them spend their shot against their shields; after which they renew the onset with such fresh vigour, as seldom fails of putting them to flight, which is always followed by a horrid slaughter, unless it be, as Lopez pleasantly hints, when they engage the Amazons (G), who are naturally more swift-footed than they, the dread of being devoured by those canibals adding speed to their heels<sup>2</sup>.

(G) We shall not here repeat what hath been already said concerning these female warriors, either ancient (11) or modern (12), in all the four parts of the world. These we are speaking of are said to be chiefly in the kingdom of Monomotapa, or, as Sanut will have it, in a canton near Damut, or Gorago, where they live independent of any other monarchs but their own female ones, on the south of that kingdom. We are even told, that those brave women compose the best part of that monarch's forces, and fight with the greatest bravery against his enemies (13); notwithstanding which, we much wonder, that neither our good Capuchin Cavazzi, nor our countryman Battel, who had sojourned amongst these Giagas sixteen months, should not only be silent about their wars against these female heroines, but absolutely deny all that Lopez, and from him Pigafet, have told us concerning them (14).

Hence Halkins, and some other modern travellers, have been inclined to believe, that whatever hath been said likewise of these Giagas and other African nations feeding upon human flesh, deserves as little credit as their pretended wars with those Amazons. But the contrary is very plain, not only from the good old friar above-mentioned, who had frequently been a melancholy witness of their inhuman feasts, during his long abode amongst them, but from several other authors we might here quote (15), and particularly Battel, who affirms that they prefer human flesh before beef and kid, although they have plenty of both (16). But we have given so many instances of this inhuman custom from undoubted authorities, in the preceding chapters, that it were needless to dwell any longer on that shocking subject. Though therefore the notion of those swarthy Amazons may be justly suspected, and may probably have taken its rise from those two Amazonian queens, or rather furies, Tem-ban-dumba and Zingha, who have rendered themselves so notorious for their warlike exploits (17), yet there can be no room to doubt of the inhuman customs above-mentioned being practised by all the Giagan tribes that infest those southern parts.

<sup>a</sup> WHEN they invade any country where they expect any considerable opposition, their way is to intrench themselves, and continue quiet a month or two, and only alarm the inhabitants with frequent skirmishes, till they think they have sufficiently harried them; or, if these assault them, by standing only on the defensive, two or three days, till they have spent their strength and fury; upon which their commanding officer sends out a large detachment in the night, to be in ambush at some distance from the enemies camp. On the morrow, the attack being renewed, the poor natives, finding themselves attacked in front and rear, are easily put to the rout, and leave their country to be ravaged at the pleasure of those bloody invaders <sup>b</sup>.

THEIR monarchs take great state upon them, none being admitted to sit before them on a chair except the Giaga Kalambolo, or head general, lately mentioned, who sitting as supreme judge, both civil and criminal, is allowed one with a back to it; which custom is thought to have been introduced at first by the Portuguese; but the Tendela, who likewise sits as judge, is only allowed a little stool about a span high. Persons of a certain high rank are qualified to sit in the presence, upon a carpet, but are obliged to spread it with their own hands. Those who are admitted to speak to them must do it with their bodies bent almost double, or, if of an inferior rank, prostrate upon the ground, and their mouths almost close to the earth. If their monarch chances to sneeze, cough, or break wind, the whole audience must wish him health and long life upon it; and those who are nearest to his person must give notice to those that stand at a distance to do the same, by the beat of a kettle-drum; upon which they all express their good wishes, by the clapping of their hands <sup>c</sup>.

THE Giagas are not over-nice in their dress, excepting those of the highest rank. The men and women of the lower class are contented to go not only bare-headed and bare-footed, but bare all over but their middle, about which they commonly wear a bit of cloth, which scarcely covers half of their thighs; and if their princes and nobles, and other persons of distinction, indulge themselves in gaudy apparel, it is rather out of pride and grandeur than from any affectation of modesty; a virtue against which their legislatrix levelled some of her laws, as was lately hinted, and for which the whole libidinous Ethiopic nation shew but little regard; so that whatever finery the richer sort may bedeck themselves with, is altogether by way of ornament. Battel, who served for some time under the Kalambolo, or, as he writes it, Kalambolo, or head general, gives us the following description of his master's dress.

<sup>d</sup> "HE wore long hair, set off with many knots of Bamba-shells. His neck was adorned with a collar of Masoes, which are another kind of shells, found along the Ethiopic coasts, and sold among them for about the value of twenty shillings. His middle was covered with a girdle of Landes, or beads made of ostrich eggs, and under it a palm cloth as fine as silk. His body was painted with various figures, and anointed every day with human fat, (or perhaps more probably with the ointment prescribed by their legislatrix) formerly mentioned. He wore across his nose a piece of copper, about two inches long, and two others of the same sort in his ears, and his body was always painted red and white." He doth not mention his wearing any thing on his hands or feet, but adds, that "He had commonly twenty or thirty wives, who carried his bows and arrows, and four others his drinking cups; and that when he drank, they all kneeled down, and clapped their hands and sung." As to the women of rank, though they wear only a cloth about their middle, they take a pride in adorning their hair, necks, arms, and legs, with shells and beads of several sorts; but have a disagreeable custom of pulling out four of their teeth, two above and two below; and those who refuse to do so are despised by the rest, and are not suffered to come amongst them (H).

(H) We have already observed, from Father Cavaz's account, that few of these wives are permitted to bring up their own children, but in several cases were obliged, by the Quixillian laws, to destroy them. Our countryman Battel agrees with him in that respect; and adds, that they supply that defect, which would otherwise depopulate their country in a little time, by bringing up the boys and girls they take in their excursions upon other nations, the boys to become soldiers, and the girls to be made either wives or drudges as they happen to please. The former, he adds, they oblige to wear a collar about their necks, as a mark of slavery, till they are grown lusty and strong, and brought up to all the hardships and fatigues of war; and that it is never taken off till they have given full proof of their courage and intrepidity, by bringing an enemy's head to the general, when the reproachful mark is removed, and they are declared Gongos, or soldiers. This encouragement, we are told, naturally inspires them with an ambition of becoming the sooner such, and to shew themselves fearless and intrepid in the greatest dangers, and even to despise and court them, for the sake of becoming free, and being enlisted in the bloody trade of war and plunder.

Our author adds, that when he was among them, there were not above twelve natural Giagas, who were all captains in an army which consisted of upwards of 16,000 men; it being then above 60 years since they had left Sierra de Leone, the country they last came from (18).

Sequel of the queen's history.

WE shall pass by several others of their detestable rites and customs, and superstitious cruelties, especially as we have already spoken of them under a former article, particularly their offering such numbers of victims at the funeral obsequies of their princes and great men, various kinds of ordeals and knavish juggles of priests, &c. <sup>f</sup>; (all or the greatest part of which owed their origin to their ambitious and inhuman queen Tem-ban-dumba), and proceed to the sequel of her life and reign, who, after she had filled the greatest part of Ethiopia with terror, blood, and slaughter, fell at length a victim to that lust and incontinency which she had so severely punished in some thousands of her own sex.

She falls in love with a soldier,

AFTER having murdered some hecatombs of her own paramours, to prevent the discovery of her private debauches, she grew at length enamoured with a fresh one, in whom, tho' then only a private soldier, she discovered such excellencies of body and mind, as made her quickly overlook the vast distance that was between her and him. He was named Kulembo, was tall, strong, and well-shaped, bold and intrepid, and in no way inferior to her in craftiness and cruelty; and as he was not ignorant of the fate which had attended so many of his predecessors, so neither did he accept of her condescending offers, but with a fixed resolution to retaliate upon her as soon as he found her affection began to cool towards him. In the mean time he strove to please her in every thing, and, in a little while, gained such an ascendant over her,

and marries

that he prevailed upon her to marry him. The nuptials were accordingly celebrated with great pomp, after their manner, that is, with the deaths of a vast number of human and other victims, for the entertainment of their numerous guests; yet neither could this, nor the many other favours she heaped upon him, prevent his keeping so watchful an eye over her, as he became more and more apprised of her fickle, inconstant, lewd, and tyrannic disposition, that he at length perceived, in spite of her female address, he was become quite indifferent, if not wholly disagreeable, to her.

tired of him,

He thought it then high time to ward off the blow that threatened him, by renewing and doubling his caresses to her, by sumptuous banquets, and such other entertainments and diversions, as he knew were most likely to suspend her treacherous intentions against him.

for which he poisons her.

He plied her in particular with variety of European wines, and with the most delightful cordial waters, till he found an opportunity of conveying a strong dose of poison into one of them, of which she had no sooner drank, than she expired, as he expected, in his arms. He had the same success in the artful part he acted of a most tender and afflicted husband, and passed altogether unsuspected of having had a hand in the death of a spouse which he so deeply lamented, even to the attempting, more than once, to sheath his sword in his own breast. This counterfeited excess of grief, joined to his known and tried valour and conduct, made so deep an impression on the minds of the Giagas, who might probably be, by this time, quite tired of her inflexible laws and government, that he was declared her successor, and proclaimed their king presently after, not only without opposition, but with all possible demonstrations of joy <sup>g</sup>.

He is elected king.

Grand funeral of the queen.

Sepulchre.

KULEMBO's next care was to order his spouse's funeral obsequies with such magnificence as should give his new subjects a fresh proof of his pretended affection for her. The place which he chose for her interment was on a distant eminence, where he caused a spacious cave to be dug, and divided into several large apartments, all hung with some of the richest cloths and stuffs from Europe, and the floors covered with the finest furs, and curious mattings. That in

But we have elsewhere observed, that their inhuman lawgiver had been obliged to relax much from the severity of that law, even during her life time, not only on account of its destructive tendency, but more on account of the discontent it created among the majority of her subjects, who could not divest themselves, like that tyrant, of their natural affection for their offspring, but would run the risk of preserving them out of the camp, in spite of her severe edicts against it.

Accordingly our missionary informs us of a concession she made for admitting now-and-then a number of them into the Kilombo, and the ceremony with which they were brought in; which was as follows.

When the parents had obtained leave, not without seeming great difficulty and many entreaties, of the chief of the Kilombo, to have them admitted; on the day appointed by him, which commonly proves a great festival, after sundry ointments and superstitious rites, the chief of the Kilombo appears with his favourite wife, accompanied with a band of music, in the great square; whilst the mothers, on the outside of the camp, take care to have their children brought and concealed under bushes, or other places out of sight, till the signal is given, and then come dancing and singing towards the place. The men appear in arms, and there is a kind of mock-fight, in which they strive to outdo each other in martial dexterity. This is followed by a tiresome dance, in which the mothers of the concealed children join, and falling out together, shew them the place where the children are concealed. Upon which each man touches his own with the point of his lance, and brings it away, not as his own offspring, but as his captive taken in war. Immediately after this the children are anointed with the same ointment lately described, on their breasts, shoulders, and right arm, by way of purification; after which their mothers are allowed to bring them home into the camp, having first of all taken care to pay the chief his perquisite dues, which, though considerable, are easily complied with by the fond and joyful parents (19). But this ceremony, odd and elusory as it is, plainly shews, that they still kept a kind of formal regard to the old ordinance of their inhuman legislatrix, and that she had really enacted such an unnatural law.

a which her corpse was to be laid was stored with the choicest meats and liquors: she was bedecked with all her costly ornaments, and seated on a throne in a commanding attitude. It was borne by the first ministers of state, guarded by the militia, and followed by the king and the whole court, who accompanied it with their most dreadful outcries, heightened by the sound of all their martial music, which of itself would have been sufficient to have drowned the loudest peals of thunder. The procession was closed by the unhappy human victims, which were to be either butchered over her grave, or buried alive with her in it, and which amounted to a prodigious number of each sex.

WHEN they were come to the place, the corpse was deposited in the apartment prepared for it, amidst the most hideous outcries of the court and soldiery, and the horrid sound of their martial instruments, the victims were slain, and part of their blood poured in abundance over her, and the rest drank in large draughts by the mourners. Those victims that were designed to attend her in the other world, went down into the grave, with seeming intrepidity, and some with marks of joy. The carcases of the slain were thrown in afterwards, and the whole place filled with earth (1). After which the funeral pomp retired to the camp, and the new monarch took the reins of the government upon him<sup>a</sup>.

By that time a number of other Giagan chiefs had separated themselves at the heads of so many flying armies, and had dispersed themselves over other parts of both Ethiopias, where they committed their usual ravages, leaving nothing behind them, where-ever they passed, but the most melancholy marks of utter desolation. The most remarkable of these destroyers were Calendo, Caottea, Caja, Cabucco, and Cajumbo, who became in time very considerable in their respective families, besides many others, of inferior note, not worth mentioning. Among all those tribes of murdering plunderers, the new monarch of the Musimbi Giagas did not neglect signalizing the beginning of his reign, by his frequent excursions and ravages, even after his heart became captivated by a beauteous slave, who quickly induced him to exchange the martial trade for the pleasures of the matrimonial life; he ceased not to send his officers and forces upon new exploits, whilst he and his beloved queen were employed in begetting a numerous female progeny, till he at length expired in her embraces, and was since honoured by her and all his subjects as an inferior deity. Her grief did not hinder her outliving him a considerable number of years, being above 100 before she followed him into the other world; and by that time became so exhausted of her natural heat, that her servants were obliged to expose her, upon a cow's hide, to the rays of the most scorching sun, to thaw her blood; a privilege, our author tells us, which is allowed amongst them to none but kings and queens<sup>b</sup>.

CALENDO was succeeded by Chingarii, who was born in the same province, and a person not only equal to him in valour, but of a more brutish and fierce disposition, answerable to his name, which, in their language, signifies a lion. There had hardly appeared amongst them a chief so cruel, ambitious, and thirsting after rapine and slaughter, or who had exceeded him in the ravaging trade. Till having ventured to try his bravery against the Portuguese of Angola, he found himself overmatched, and was defeated and slain in that country.

His successor, named Caluximbo, was a man of noble courage and conduct, and had been rather more successful in all his enterprises, though of so gentle and humane a disposition, that he could never be prevailed upon to eat any human flesh, or drink human blood amongst them, either before or after his election. For this, and no other cause, his barbarian subjects conceived an invincible aversion against him; and, under pretence that their late queen resented his open violation of her laws, a notion which the Singhillos, or priests, took care to spread about, he was assassinated to appease her anger, and three hecatombs of victims of each sex were ordered to be butchered at his funeral obsequies<sup>c</sup>.

His successors, according to our author, who places the four following at their head; Cassange, Cajombo, Cabucco, and Casa, are in all thirty, and these four above-named different from, and of a much older date than some of the same name, mentioned in this and some

(1) Much after the same manner, though in a proportionably lower degree of pomp, do those of inferior rank bury their dead. The cave is smaller, but made big enough to contain the body in a sitting posture on a chair, two of his wives, one on each side, with their arms broke, provisions for the mouth, clothes, weapons, and other utensils for table and kitchen. They likewise butcher a number of his slaves according to his rank, together with some other sorts of victims, whose blood is poured upon the dead, to allay the thirsty soul, and the flesh serves to feast the relations and attendants. When the cave is filled with earth, they raise a kind of mount over it of earth, stones, and such other materials, mingled with the bones of the victims; and upon it they fix a number of short posts, or stakes, some with little flags, others with the skulls of the human victims; all which serve to denote the rank and quality of the deceased (20).

former chapters, though probably of the same family with them<sup>1</sup>. We are neither told how a long this dynasty lasted, nor any thing particular concerning any of these thirty chiefs, till we come to the three last; the oldest of whom, named Cassange Calanga (of whom we have had occasion to speak in a former chapter) having entered into an alliance with the Portuguese viceroy of Angola, against the then bloody queen Zingba, who reigned at that time over the Metamban Giagas, was prevailed upon by that noble governor to abolish some of the Quixillian laws of the late queen Tem-ban-dumba, particularly those that related to the destroying their own children, and bringing up in their stead those which they brought away captives in their excursions. The motive of which inhuman law was to prevent that plundering nation from incumbering themselves with the care and luggage of their own children, which would have been not only a clog and retardment to their frequent ravages and inroads, b but might have proved a means of enervating them of their fierceness and remorseless cruelty.

Assassinated by his son.

Another son raised to the crown.

HOWEVER that was, Cassange, out of complaisance to the Portuguese, consented to abolish those laws among his Musimbi Giagas; for which he was soon after assassinated by one of his sons, and interred with the usual ceremonies; but the parricide did not long enjoy the crown, which he had so vilely seized on. The Giagas, according to their laws, claimed the right of election, and set up another son of the deceased upon the throne, named Cassange-Canguin-Gurii, who, to gain the friendship of the Portuguese nation, caused himself to be instructed in the principles of the Christian religion, and was baptized by the name of Don Pascale<sup>m</sup>. But whether through fear of being dethroned by his incensed subjects, or, as our author c thinks, through a too strong propensity to Giagan customs, especially an insatiable appetite after human flesh, he afterwards apostatized, and became more cruel and blood-thirsty, and committed greater ravages, than any of his predecessors, spreading death and destruction everywhere around him, and stripping all the adjacent princes of whole provinces, either reducing them under the most dreadful slavery, or abandoning them to the most desolate and deplorable condition<sup>n</sup>.

What credit ought to be given to this history;

HERE our author concludes the history of the Musimbi Giagas, and here we shall take leave of the whole detestable nation, without going farther after him through the other tribes of those barbarous canibals, among whom the difference is so small, that our readers will easily form an idea of the rest, from what we have said of this; if we have not already disgusted d them with this sketch of their inhuman laws, and almost incredible barbarity, and incurred their censure for having given too much credit to our authors, especially with respect to what they relate concerning those savages strange fondness for human flesh and blood.

WE are not insensible of what hath been said by judicious and learned men to explode the shocking notion of anthropophagi out of the world; yet do not think the whole amount to be sufficient to authorize us to pass over, much less to give the lie to, what so many otherwise credible, eye-witnesses have assured us of the truth of it, not by one or two hasty observations, but by frequent repeated instances of it, during a sufficient residence among, and acquaintance with, them, to take off all possible suspicion of a mistake. Lopez assures us, that he saw human flesh publicly sold in their shambles<sup>o</sup>. And Battel, who carried arms under e them during the space of sixteen months, and had been so often present at these inhuman banquets, can hardly be supposed to have been mistaken in the victims which were butchered and eaten before his face<sup>p</sup>.

ALL this is again confirmed by innumerable other instances by the good old Capuchin Cavazzi, who, in all probability, had never seen, nor so much as heard of, Battel's account, and who, though he did not, like him, carry arms, during his fourteen years residence in this western Ethiopia, yet was frequently engaged in spiritual combats with their chiefs and their priests, against that and others of their barbarous customs, in company with many others of his function, who were all alike eye-witnesses of them. Add to all this, that the most shocking and horrid scenes of this nature, were those which not only he and his brethren, but a number f of other laymen, had observed in the kingdom of Metamba, during the apostacy of queen Zingba, some who were deputies, and even ambassadors from the Angolic viceroy, to that then impious princess, and continued long enough at her court to be all likewise eye-witnesses of those abominable practices.

BUT if any of our readers should still think them too unnatural to be true, and rather suspect the united testimony of those writers to be one joint piece of forgery, than a real fact, we hope we shall still be acquitted of the charge of over-credulity, since it is the duty of an impartial historian, in cases of this nature, to relate facts and things as he finds them asserted by his authors, and not in the light they may appear to him or others. Had any other writers, from the same long residence in those parts, attempted to contradict or discredit what hath been so g

- a strenuously and strongly affirmed by those whom we have followed, yet would it have been incumbent upon us to have laid both relations before our readers, and left the decision to their judgment : how much more, therefore, must it be so, when nothing positive has yet been offered on one side to confute what hath been so unanimously and peremptorily affirmed by the other ? What is more shocking and unnatural than those dreadful macerations and intolerable penances which those gloomy devotees among the brahmans in India practise upon themselves, horrid funeral rites, &c. who yet believe the supreme being to be infinite in goodness ? and shall we dispute the credibility of those horrid customs, said to be practised by a barbarous nation, bred and nurtured up from their infancy in blood and slaughter, against those they are at enmity with, or even against their own relations and offspring, especially when, by the natural incentives of custom and education, wrong notions of honour and bravery, &c. they are drawn and hurried away to this excess of cruelty, and by the still more powerful motive of fear, even the worst of fear such poor ignorant creatures can be capable of, fear of the most terrible disasters and punishments, both in this and the next life, from their incensed titular gods, the only deities they know or worship, who, their Singhillos tell them, are the spirits of their deceased heroes and princes, ever thirsting after human blood, and inexorable, if not constantly supplied and satiated with it by their votaries, on account of the miseries and torments they endure in the other world for want of it ? So that, upon the whole, there is no calamity happens to them, whether famine, pestilence, earthquakes, grievous droughts, losses, sickness, death, or any other plague, which they do not imagine to be inflicted by those implacable deities for their neglect, and sent upon them as the forerunners of much worse in the other world, if they do not speedily appease them by whole hecatombs of fresh victims. Even the very usual noises caused by the winds, wild beasts, or, as is often the case, by the knavish Singhillos, are interpreted by them as the howlings of those pretended titular spirits after more bloodshed ; which, if not readily answered, will be unavoidably followed by some grievous disaster. Is it, therefore, any wonder, that a nation, fascinated by such dreadful prejudices, should so eagerly run to the slaughter of their neighbours, should fight and massacre without mercy or remorse, or make such inhuman rejoicings after a successful excursion, which at once rids them of so many fears, and yields them such joyful prospects ; and the more so, the more inhumanly, or, in their language and notion, the more bravely and intrepidly, they have executed it ?
- d But may not we add to all these incentives to their excessive inhumanity, those of resentment and revenge against a nation of invaders, who, under the specious pretence of trade, and, which is still worse, of religion, having once got footing into so many provinces, and so distant from their own, made no scruple, as soon as they had it in their power, to subdue its unwary inhabitants by the most destructive wars, and then to doom them to the most intolerable slavery under them, and to keep them under their tyrannic subjection by the most horrid cruelties and exactions ? How far might not such unjust and cruel usage contribute to confirm and harden them in, or, to speak more properly, to drive them into a greater excess of barbarity ? But, not to insist farther on this disagreeable topic, our doubtful readers need but go back to what we have formerly observed of the Scythians, Gauls, and especially our British druids <sup>u</sup>, (though, in other respects, vastly superior to these Ethiopians in learning and politeness) to be satisfied how far ambition, avarice, and superstition, are capable of driving men and whole nations into the most horrid cruelties and inhuman customs ; so that there will be less need to doubt or wonder at these we find affirmed by so many hands to be in use among the Giagas, Gallas, Imbii, and other canibal nations we have mentioned in this and some of the foregoing chapters.

C H A P. XIV.

*The history of the kingdom of Anfiko.Boundaries

THIS kingdom, bounded by the river Umbre, which runs into the Zaire, and the kingdom of Wangua, has the Amboes, who border on Loango, on the west, some deserts of Nubia on the north, and the provinces of Songo and Sonda, parts of Kongo, on the south. Anfiko, according to Jarric, who makes no mention of its eastern or western confines, extends from Coongo to Nubia. There are copper-mines, the rhinoceros, lions, and other wild beasts <sup>a</sup>.

Inhabitants.

THE Anfikans, a neat, well-proportioned, and strong people, who have no lands or inheritance, wander, like Arabs, from one place to another, regardless of life, and intrepid in their undertakings; who, neither sowing nor reaping, live upon plunder and slaughter; are dreaded for their extreme brutality, and never traded with by Europeans, although open and frank, and, in all appearance, without deceit. Their language is barbarous, and difficult to be learned, even by the inhabitants of Kongo. The most distinguished Anfikans wear red and black caps of Portuguese velvet, and the inferior sort of both sexes go bare-footed, and naked from the waist upwards; who, to preserve their health, anoint their bodies with a composition of pounded white sandal-wood and palm-oil <sup>b</sup>.

THEIR food is human flesh; and there are public markets, wherein human bodies are hung up for sale instead of beef and mutton. These people believe themselves possessed of a right to dispose arbitrarily of their slaves; the being an enemy justifies their practice; and prisoners of war are fattened, killed, and eat, or sold to butchers. Discontented slaves offer themselves for food to their masters; fathers and sons, brothers and sisters, reciprocally feed upon each other, without the least horror; and infants just born are eat by their unnatural and cruel mothers. There are no graves for the dead amongst Anfikans, but the bellies of the survivors, who eat the deceased as soon as expired <sup>c</sup>.

Cruelty.Government.Currency.Trade.

THE king of Anfiko, or the great Macoco, whose dominion extends over thirteen kingdoms, is esteemed the most powerful monarch in Africa. The zimbis, or shell, formerly mentioned *, which is fished for at Loango and Angola, is the current coin of the country, for which the natives exchange their own and slaves from Nubia, as also for salt, silk, glass, knives, and other merchandizes <sup>d</sup>.

Weapons.

THEIR arms are battle-axes, and small but very strong, bows, strengthened and adorned with serpents skins, with strings of supple and tender shoots of trees, like reeds, that never break, and short arrows of hard and light wood. The Anfikans, who kill birds flying, shoot with surprising swiftness; insomuch that they can discharge twenty-eight arrows from the bow before the first falls to the ground; and they manage the battle-ax with equal dexterity, one end of which is sharpened, and cuts like a wedge, and the other flattened like a mallet, with an handle set between, about half the length of the iron, rounded at the end like an apple, and covered with the skin of a serpent; with the flat end they screen their bodies, and ward off the darts of their enemies. They have daggers likewise in serpent skin scabbards, which they carry in ivory belts, three fingers broad, and two thick, trimmed with dante, or lante, skins <sup>e</sup>.

THEIR religion is idolatry; and they worship the sun as their chief deity, whom they represent in the figure of a man, and the moon, under that of a woman, and an infinite number of inferior deities, each man having one peculiar idol, to whom he offers sacrifices, and whom he constantly invokes in dangerous enterprizes; and it is said, that the devil gives answers, and instructions how to proceed <sup>f</sup>.

THERE are but few remains of the antient Giagas, mentioned in the foregoing appendix, whose four generals, or chiefs, Cassange, Cajombo, Cabucco, and Casa, commanded each a separate army †; the present are mostly natives of the countries they inhabit, inheriting the barbarity of their masters, and the most cruel of cannibal nations. These people, who try the courage of their prisoners of war by shooting at the youngest and best made among them as at butts, and directing the arrows above or round their heads, fall on and devour those who discover the least signs of fear; and boring the noses and ears, and drawing the two fore-teeth of the upper jaw of those who appear intrepid and resolute, bring them up to a superior degree of barbarity, by training and accustoming them to the most horrid cruelties. These Giagas are scattered throughout Africa, but their principal residence is in the kingdom of Anfiko, and on the south-east of Angola <sup>g</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> THE antient inhabitants of Angola have a tradition that the Giagas were strangers originally, who settled in this kingdom; that some ages ago they came from Sierra Leona, and over-ran, like a torrent, the whole coast, as far as Benguela, as we have shewn in a former section*: that, being weakened by victories, and disabled to force the defiles, in order to return to their own country, they arrived on the borders of Monomotapa, whose army giving them battle, conquered and routed them; and that they were forced to remain in the provinces of Anfiko, and round about Angola; though it is very surprising this conquest should take place, from the great improbability of such numbers leaving Sierra Leona together, and of over-running and subduing, in so short a time, a tract of six or seven hundred leagues, inhabited by numbers of nations, governed by powerful kings, as those of Ardra, Benin, and Loango; and surrounded by numerous rivers and mountains<sup>b</sup>.

The kingdom of Fungeno.

<sup>c</sup> FUNGENO, or Fungando, a kingdom tributary to the Great Macoco, is situate between the rivers Zaire and Coanza, to the east of Conde. Stuffs made of the bark of matamba, consisting of long strings, like hemp, are the currency of Loango and Angola; on which account the Portuguese trade with the natives for stuffs and slaves, who trade also themselves with the people of Nimeamago, a kingdom situate on the south-east of Macoco. The prince of Nimeamago living in friendship with the Great Macoco, his subjects travel without danger through his dominions, and traffick at Fungeno<sup>i</sup>.

The kingdom of Biafar, or Biafra.

<sup>d</sup> THIS kingdom, situate on the east of Benin, on the west of, and divided by a chain of mountains from, Medra, extends on the south to the 4th degree of north latitude. The natives are the most addicted of all Negroes to, and infatuated with, magic; imagining themselves capable of causing rain, thunder, and lightning; and therefore worship, with great zeal, and sacrifice their children to, the devil<sup>k</sup>.

The province of Calbaria.

<sup>e</sup> THIS country, adjoining to Rio Real, or Royal River, takes the name of Calbaria from that river. Near the coast, on the west bank of the river, which though large, is, in many places, too shallow for vessels of burden, is a town, called by the Dutch Wyndorp, and by the Negroes, from the great quantity of wine, Toke; two branches spread themselves to the east and west from the river, whose course runs constantly north. In the west branch is a road, three or four leagues in length, for trading vessels; and the town Calbaria is situate on the north side of this arm, a place of great trade with the Dutch, inclosed with pallisadoes, watered on the south by the river, and defended on the north by a boggy wood. On the south of this rivulet is an island of an oval figure, at a distance from the continent, from which it is divided only by a shallow canal, whose land is low, and covered with woods<sup>l</sup>.

<sup>f</sup> ABOUT twelve leagues westward of Calbaria lies Belli, governed by one captain; and twenty leagues above the mouth is an arm of Rio Real, running east-north-east, and many other rivers near the banks. The province of Krike, bordering on the west of Moco, lies about twenty miles from the coast, on the back of Rio Real; and going southward of Moco, towards the coast, is the province of Bani, whose principal town is Culeba, the chief of this country, which extends westward from the river Calbaria, as far as Sangma, and has ten under officers. The cannibal Negroes, inhabitants of the eastern banks of Calbaria, who, as at Ardra, circumcise the women that are marriageable with ants, eat the slain only, and sell the prisoners of war at Calbaria. In the province of Moco is a sort of iron coin, whose pieces are as large as the palm of the hand, with long tails. The canoes made use of by Calbarian Negroes are pointed at both ends, are sixty feet long, and six broad; a fire-place is in the center for dressing victuals, with planks across for rowers. On each side is a range of twenty: near each rower hangs a quiver of arrows, in case of an attack, these nations living in continual war. The canoes carry 80 persons; the slaves only are exposed to the damps of the air, the masters being sheltered in the night by reed mats, spread upon poles, and fixed up in the manner of tents.

LOITOMBA river, called by the Portuguese Rio do Santo Domingo, is three leagues from the mouth of Rio Real, at the east end of which is a large town, inhabited by Negro traders, who traffick in slaves, which they bring from distant countries. Next to Loitomba is old Calbaria, or Calborg river. The interjacent country is unprovided with water: the coast from Rio Real to antient Calborg is 24 leagues in extent, north-north-east. Rio de Rey, or King's River, is the next, extremely large and wide, with three fathoms water, upon a muddy bottom, and without sand-banks, or rocks to defend the entrance; the country round is low and marshy. There is no sweet water but from rain, which Europeans, who trade upon this coast, are obliged to purchase at a dear rate.

THE Calborgos, a wicked, deceitful, and filthy people, who go naked, the private parts excepted, which are covered with a belt round the middle, with their bodies bedaubed with various colours, and figures traced on their foreheads, inhabit the country near the source of this river, at a great distance from the coast. The Calborgos have no sincerity or natural love; parents sell their children, husbands their wives, brothers their sisters, &c. Criminals are declared innocent in this country who make an incision in, and suck the blood out of, their arms.

THE great trade of this river consists in slaves, which are exchanged for small copper bars, 13 or 14, weighing about 22 pounds, purchase a good slave. Coral grains and copper basons are likewise imported; and the Negroes, who deal in acori, arrows, knives, and ivory, have brought, for years, 400 quintals of elephants teeth, and 500 slaves to market, at a village near the coast, situate on the banks of a rivulet that runs into this river <sup>m</sup>.

S E C T. I.

Containing a geographical account of the whole coast, with all its subdivisions into distinct provinces and districts, particularly of the kingdom of Benin; the manners, laws, and religion of the natives; its cities, rivers, trade, and commodities; with many other particulars, which it would be too tedious to recite in the contents.

Introduction to the history of Guiney.

IN writing the history of Guiney, we labour under difficulties from the too great abundance of materials, which are thrown together in one rude chaos, in the undigested collection of voyages, with which this and every state in Europe is surfeited. A faithful abstract of these, reduced into historical form, will be an arduous and difficult undertaking, though not insuperable. Here is no clue to guide our steps, no plan of history to serve as a thread for our narrative. Materials are jumbled together, without regard to method or diction; the very perusal of which is more laborious and fatiguing than the whole of the execution besides. Father Cavazzi is perhaps the only author of value for stile and disposition, who has treated this subject; but he will be of little use; his description of the country being too general, often false, and the whole of his work chiefly employed in the recital of events, which will make the smallest part of our design. Bosman is indeed an author of credit; his relations are accurate, and his manner entertaining; but as he followed an epistolary stile, no plan or system of arrangement is pursued. Under these circumstances we resolved to have recourse to the original materials to form our own plan, and digest the whole in the same order we have hitherto maintained. The difficulty of the undertaking will, we hope, be compensated by the satisfaction the reader will receive in the perusal of the first, copious, clear, and authentic, annals of this coast, even if they should be deficient in some of those embellishments, the principal care of modern historians.

GUINEY, or, according to most writers, Ghinney, or Guinea, is a vast extended coast, stretching from four degrees and a half to ten degrees and a half north latitude, lying between the great river Camerone on the east, and the mouth of the river Sierra Leona on the west, comprehending 30 degrees of longitude. Other geographers confine its limits between Cape Lo-

<sup>a</sup> Lop-Gonsalvo, or Cape Negro, and the river Senegal. The appellation of Guiney is probably unknown to the natural inhabitants, and seems to be derived from the name Gbeneboa, imposed by the early Portuguese navigators on a country south of Senegal. Some writers, however, are hardy enough to derive the term Guiney from the dry nature of the soil and climate; the word, according to them, signifying as much in the language of the natives. But surely they did not reflect that no country under heaven is better watered with rivers, springs, and rain!

THE general division of this coast is into south and north. The first extends from the river Senegal to Sierra Leona. South Guiney comprehends six distinct coasts, called provinces, and known by different names; viz. the Grain Coast, by some termed the Pepper Coast, the Ivory Coast, the Gold Coast, the Slave Coast, and those of Benin and Biafara. However, the more general and common division is contained under four districts; viz. the Slave, Gold, Ivory, and Grain Coasts<sup>a</sup>. The Slave Coast, or Benin, is bounded by Nigritia on the north, by the unknown inward parts of Africa on the east, by Kongo, or that part of the Atlantic ocean called the Gulph of Guiney, on the south, and on the west by the Gold Coast; stretching along the sea-coast from the river Camerone on the east, to the Danish fort of Christianburgh, near the river Volta, on the west. The chief rivers of this division are, the great river Camerone, which bounds it to the south-east, the river Del Rey on the westward, the rivers Forcades, Formosa, and Lagos, still further west, and, lastly, the river Volta, at the extremity of the western boundary.

THE chief towns, which give name to a variety of different kingdoms within this district, are, Benin, situated on the river Formosa, in seven degrees and a half north latitude; Awerri, standing at the mouth of the river Forcades, and subject to the Portuguese; Arebo, on the east side of the river Formosa; Great Ardrab; Little Ardrab; both standing near the river Lagos; Whidab, or Fida, situated between the Lagos and the Volta; Great and Little Popo, both on the same coast, west of Whidab; Lampo, or Alampo, a little to the westward of the mouth of the river Volta. As to the country of Benin Proper, no European nation has planted settlements there, besides the Portuguese, who are in a manner the despotic sovereigns of this district. If we may credit their missionaries, they have converted the natives to christianity; however, other travellers inform us, that the inhabitants of the sea-coast are a miserable sort of profelytes, a profligate, wretched, and abandoned race, addicted to all manner of vice, and more artificial in their depravity than the original and unmixed inhabitants of remote countries.

THE Gold Coast, so called from the abundance of that metal it affords, is terminated by Nigritia, or Negroeland, on the north; by the Slave Coast on the east; the ocean on the south; and by the Tooth or Ivory Coast on the west. Its rivers are, the Rio Cobra, or Ancobar, by some termed the Gold River; with some others of less note. The capitals giving name to a number of petty kingdoms are, Aquamboe, Agona, Fantyn, Acron, Fetu, Sabo, Commami, Axim, Ante, Adom, Jabi, &c.

THE next division of Guiney is the Ivory or Tooth Coast, taking its name from the elephants' teeth found here. It is bounded likewise by Nigritia on the north; by the Gold Coast on the east; by the ocean on the south; and by the Malaguette or Grain Coast on the west. Among the most remarkable towns and places on this coast are, Jaque, Cape Laboe, Drumyn, Bot-town, Sina, Sestre, Palmas, &c. The principal rivers are those of Rio de Suero, and Rio Escravos.

THE last and most western division of Guiney is the Malaguette, Grain, or Pepper Coast, bounded by Nigritia on the north; the Ivory Coast on the east; and on the south and west by the ocean. Its chief rivers are the Rio de Sestro, the Rio de St. Paul, and the river de Sierra Leona. Its capitals of the several petty states contained under the general division are, the towns of Basso, Sanguin, Sestro, Tomba, Buga, and Gorea<sup>b</sup>.

To begin with the first of these divisions. The kingdom of Benin is a region of great extent, the limits of which are but imperfectly ascertained. We find it mentioned by writers under the names of Benin, Binnin, Binni, or Benni; the first of which, as the most common, we have retained. Most historians, however, place it between the 19th and 35th degrees of east longitude, and the 3d and 10th parallels of latitude. Hence they reckon it extends 930 miles east and west, and about 640 north and south; a prodigious tract of land to remain for so long a time imperfectly known. On this supposition, its boundaries to the west will be the Gold Coast, and the gulph of Benin, separated by the river Volta. On the north will be Nigritia, the kingdoms of Mayack and Makoko on the east, and the gulph of Kongo on the south. However, these particulars are very indistinctly marked by geographers, and with as little precision by the writers of voyages. Prevost, the most accurate compiler of voyages, greatly retrenches the above limits of the kingdom of Benin<sup>c</sup>; but we will not oppress the reader with a variety of opinions and barbarous terms, to which he can affix no determinate and clear ideas.

city.

THE first discovery of this kingdom is attributed to Juan Alfonso de Aveiro, a Portuguese, a who gave the appellation of Formosa to the river Benin, from the verdure and beauty of its banks, continually adorned with tall, strait, and spreading trees. Notwithstanding the apparent satisfaction it affords, and the pleasing scene it presents to the eye, the air is noxious and pestilential, owing to the gross vapours exhaled by the sun's heat from its marshy banks. The vermin produced by the heat is another inconvenience equally insupportable. Here are such quantities of mosquito flies as render life intolerable; their sting being poignant, and, from the effects, seemingly poisonous, producing violent heats and inflammations on the parts, with convulsions, extreme vomitings, and other dangerous symptoms<sup>d</sup>. On the banks of this river are some towns, where the Europeans, particularly the Dutch, carry on a commerce. They are called by Nyendael, Bododo, Arebo, or Arbon, Agatton, or Gatton, and Meiberg. The first contains about 50 houses, or little cabins, built of reeds, and covered with leaves. Here a viceroy has his residence, attended by a council, whose jurisdiction extends over this canton in all civil affairs, levying taxes, and rating duties and imposts on merchandize. In criminal cases of great importance, the viceroy and council are obliged to send to Benin, the capital, for the orders of the court<sup>e</sup>.

ABOUT two miles from the mouth of the river, it divides itself into two branches, distant two English miles from each other. Upon one of them stands the little town of Awerri, or Ouverne, governed by a free and independent prince. Arebo, which now is the center of commerce of Benin, is situated sixty leagues up the river. Notwithstanding the river branches out into innumerable streams, ships of burthen can go a great way higher, and anchor in fine large creeks and sandy bays. Arebo is a fine, large, and populous city, of an oval figure, the houses larger, but built with the same materials, and in the same taste, as those of Bododo. The city and adjacent country are under the government of a viceroy and council, with similar powers as those of Bododo. The Portuguese have a factory and church at Awerri, and here at Arebo the English and Dutch had a settlement, agents, and factors. The former, however, through carelessness, have suffered theirs to fall into ruin, and at present it is totally abandoned<sup>f</sup>.

AGATTON, or Gatton, has likewise been a place of consideration for its extent, commerce, and the number of its inhabitants. By the ravages of war it is now almost totally deserted. It stands on the Formosa, 24 leagues higher than Arbok, a canal separating the districts belonging to each town; and about ten leagues north of Oedo, or Benin, the capital of the empire.

THE last of the four commercial towns is Meiberg, a name given this place by the Dutch. Here the Hollanders carry on a great trade, and maintain a considerable settlement, rendered famous by a tragical event. Beeldfyder, a Dutch factor, having conceived a violent passion for one of the women belonging to the Negro governor, took the resolution of carrying her away. The governor, transported with rage, attacked the Dutch settlement with a body of troops, and forced the factor to retreat on board a vessel lying in the road, after having receiving a wound, of which he soon died. Upon this the director-general, who was ill-informed of the circumstances, imprudently determined to avenge the death of the factor. For this purpose he fitted out a brigantine, and surprized the blacks at Meiberg, massacring, without mercy, man, woman, and child, as they came in his way. The news of this event soon reaching the court at Benin, his majesty demanded an explication of the causes of this bloody execution. After being informed, instead of turning his resentment against the Dutch, who had broke through all the laws of justice, hospitality, and humanity, he exerted it, from views of policy, with the most horrible circumstances of barbarity, against the innocent governor, and his whole race; ordering them to be extirpated without exception, and their dead bodies to be given a prey to the wild beasts. The Dutch, perceiving the king so zealously attached to the interests of commerce, have ever since remained there, with a despotic and arbitrary sway over the unhappy wretches, the natural proprietors<sup>g</sup>.

BENIN, the capital, is a city of great extent. Artus of Dantzic calls it eleven miles in circumference, containing 100,000 inhabitants. You enter it by a large street, which, according to the same writer, is eight times wider than any street in Holland<sup>h</sup>. This we apprehend to be a sort of avenue or great road leading to the city, since other travellers, who have measured it, call it eight leagues in length. It passes through the city, dividing it into two equal parts, and is itself cut by innumerable other streets that traverse it. For the whole eight leagues the houses stand so close on each side the road, that it may well be mistaken for a street. After advancing twelve miles, you come to a large gate, which divides the city from the suburbs. The gate is of wood; but it is defended by a strong bastion of mud and earth, surrounded by a deep ditch forty feet wide. Here a guard is constantly kept to receive the tolls, duties, and imposts, upon merchandize. All the streets of the city are strait, long, and broad, adorned a with a variety of shops filled with European merchandize, as well as the commodities of the country. Formerly the houses stood close, the whole street appearing like one complete building, every part of it in a manner surcharged with inhabitants; at present it is broke by numberless chasms and ruins, that seem to presage its short duration. As the country affords no stone, all the houses are built with mud and clay, covered with reeds, straw, or clay, with an elegance that is astonishing. Nor is the architecture of the principal buildings altogether contemptible; many of them being not unworthy of a more civilized people<sup>1</sup>. Only natives are permitted to live here; several of whom are wealthy, and trade to a great extent. Here the women are employed in keeping the streets neat and clean; in which respect the inhabitants of Benin are not exceeded by the Hollanders themselves. A principle part of the city is taken up The royal palace.

b by the royal palace, which is rather prodigious in its dimensions than commodious or elegant in the contrivance. The eye is first met by a long gallery, sustained by fifty-eight strong planks, rough and unpolished, above twelve feet in height, and three in circumference. Passing this gallery, you come to a high mud wall, which hath three gates. That in the center is decorated at the top with a wooden turret of a spiral form, 70 feet high. Upon the very extremity of this cone is fixed a large copper snake, well cast, carved, and bearing marks of a proficiency in the arts. Within the gate you are presented with an area of fine turf, a quarter of a mile in length, and near as broad; at the further end of which is another gallery in the same taste as the former, only that the pilasters, which sustain it, are ornamented with human figures, and many of them cut out in that form, but in a gross and awkward manner. Behind a canvas curtain are shewn four heads cast in brass, neither resembling the human or brute figure, each of them supported by a large elephant's tooth, the king's property. Passing through this gallery and another gate, you have the king's dwelling-house in front; an appearance that by no means dazzles with its pomp and magnificence. Here is another snake over the porch, done probably by the same artist as that on the turret. In the first apartment is the king's audience-chamber, where, in presence of the chief nobility or officers of the court, he receives foreign ministers and ambassadors. His throne is of ivory, under a canopy of rich silk. This chamber of audience would likewise seem to be the repository of his majesty's merchandize (for here the king, as well as his subjects, is a trader), it being filled with loads of elephants teeth, and other commodities, lying in a confusion, which plainly indicates they are not intended for ornament. The room is hung with fine tapestry, and the floor covered with mats and carpets of an indifferent manufacture. All the city, except the royal palace, is falling into decay; and the reason assigned for it by Nyendaël is the following<sup>2</sup>. The king, jealous of the wealth of two petty princes of the street, as they are called, ordered them to be seized, put to death, and their effects confiscated to his own use, under pretence that they had conspired against his life. They gave the clearest proofs of their innocence; but the king was determined; nothing being so inexorable and deaf to the cries of pity as avarice. Soon after this barbarity, he meditated the destruction of another person, whose growing wealth excited his jealousy and natural passion for money. This nobleman, being timely apprised of his majesty's intention, quitted the city, and with him left it three-fourths of the inhabitants, who were strongly attached to his person, and apprehensive how far the king might exert his prerogative of being wicked. They were pursued by his majesty, who, immediately on their departure, had assembled an army. He was, however, so warmly received by the fugitives, that he was forced to retreat with loss and disappointment. After this he made a second attempt to oblige them to return by force; but the event was agreeable to justice; he was defeated and pursued in his turn by the nobleman, who, entering the city sword-in-hand, plundered the whole except the palace, which was too strongly defended for him to make an impression on. For ten successive years he continued with his fugitive band to harass, plunder, and molest, the inhabitants of Benin, till at length, by the mediation of the Portuguese, a peace was concluded; by which he was granted a free and full pardon, and even requested to return to his habitation. As he did not chuse again to put himself into the power of a prince, whose disposition he was but too well acquainted with, he fixed his residence at a place three days journey from the capital, where he kept a court that greatly eclipsed that of the king. All endeavours were in vain used to bring his adherents back to the city<sup>3</sup>. They were promised lucrative posts and honours about court; but they preferred poverty with freedom, to wealth and dignity with servitude; whence the city Benin has ever since remained in a manner depopulated (A). lar. Here so apprehensive are they of the curiosity of strangers, that, as soon as a foreigner enters the city, he is received by officers appointed solely to attend him. The pretext is civility, and the desire of shewing him every

Commodities of the country. BESIDES the dry merchandize with which the markets of Benin abound, they are also well stocked with eatables, a little particular in their kind. Here they expose dogs to sale for eating, of which the negroes are fond. Roasted monkeys, apes, and baboons, are everywhere to be seen. Bats, rats, lizards dried in the sun, palm-wine and fruit, form the most luxurious entertainments, and stand continually exposed to sale in the streets.

Government. As to the government, it is despotic, as may be seen from the instance we have given. The empire is divided into an infinite number of petty royalties, all of them subject to the king of Benin. Although they boast of being born freemen, yet can nothing be more servile than the blind obedience they pay to the king's authority. They are even proud of being looked upon as the slaves of the monarch; that being deemed a distinguishing mark of honour.

Disposition of the natives. THE natives of Great Benin are in general a good-natured, gentle, and civil people, from whom, by kind usage, any thing may be obtained. If they receive presents, they return them by double the value; and will even steal to enable their gratitude. If a stranger makes a request, he is seldom refused, however inconvenient it may be to comply with his desire. In short, their disposition is no less easily worked upon by soft means, than inflexible to all kind of severity and rough usage. By courtesy their pride is flattered, their self-importance raised, and a parasite will succeed in points which a blusterer would try in vain to effect. They are quick and alert in business, greatly attached to their antient manners, and shocked at any the least innovation. In this alone, perhaps, they are disagreeable, many of their customs being equally disgusting and unnatural to an European. In their bargains in trade, with strangers especially, their tenaciousness of their own opinions renders it difficult to deal with them. It frequently happens that a bargain for elephants teeth will take up some weeks before it is completed, with so many ceremonious civilities, truly ridiculous, is it preceded; yet with each other, where they repose a confidence, no people make greater dispatch. Nyendaël complains of another inconvenience, which attends the commerce of that country. The Dutch and Portuguese, he says, are obliged to trust them with goods to make paans or cloths of, for the payment of which they frequently stay so long, that, from the approach of the unhealthy season, the consumption of provisions, and mortality among their people, they are under the necessity of leaving the country without their money. However, upon their return, they are honestly paid to the last farthing <sup>a</sup>.

Method of carrying on business. THE government appoints a kind of brokers called Mercadors, or Fiadors, to treat with strangers about all merchandize. These Mercadors speak a corrupt Portuguese, which enables them to converse with Europeans. This qualification is esteemed by their countrymen their only excellency, as without it they are looked upon as the refuse and dregs of the people, because they trade upon borrowed capitals; in such esteem are riches held even among negroes and barbarians, and such is the contempt affixed to poverty. Among themselves all private bargains are dispatched with the utmost secrecy for fear of exciting the jealousy or avarice of their governors. Their being represented to these as great traders would infallibly be attended with ruinous consequences; for the governors keep a number of emissaries in constant employment, always ready to accuse those persons they are desirous of sacrificing to their interest and ambition. For this reason those who are out of power, and bear no share in the government, carefully conceal their wealth, putting forth every appearance of poverty, in order to escape the rapacious hands of their superiors. This obliges them all to an artful and cunning civility, in order to avoid accusers, and bribe by respect and deference those men to whom they are afraid of offering money <sup>b</sup>.

The political division of the people into classes, with an account of each. THE state of Benin is divided into three classes of men, besides the king, whose will is a law. The first and highest rank or branch of the government is composed of three persons called Great Lords, who are always about the king's person. Whoever wants to apply for favours from the throne must first address himself to them. They undertake to present the petition, and to return his majesty's answer; but in fact acquaint him with no more than they think proper, so that the supreme government may be said to be lodged in the three great lords. They are the more secure in their usurpation, inasmuch as besides them hardly any other persons are admitted into the king's presence, much less to his conversation <sup>c</sup>.

Second class. THE next state or class is composed of those petty princes called Street Kings, or Ares de Roe, some of which preside over the commons, and others over the slaves; some over military affairs, while others superintend every thing relating to cattle, and the fruits of the earth. Out of this class there is a particular supervisor over every branch of trade, manufacture, farming, and every thing relative to civil or military police. From this degree of men are elected the viceroys and governors of provinces, subject to the king; all of them under the direction, and every thing deserving notice; but the real design to limit his curiosity, and mislead his inquiries, with regard to the situation of the streets, the strength of the place, the number of the guards, and the police. They would seem either afraid or ashamed of the weakness and ruinous condition of their capital.

- a responsible for their conduct to the three great lords. These honourable posts are obtained by the recommendation of the great lords; the king, as an ensign of his dignity, presenting them with a string of coral on their appointment, that being equivalent to the badge of the order of knighthood in Europe. This string they are perpetually to wear about their necks, without presuming, under the penalty of degradation, and even death, ever to lay it aside on any account whatever. If they are so unhappy as by accident to lose it, or to suffer it to be stolen from them, they are ipso facto condemned to death, without even the possibility of the king's reprieve. Of this Nyendaël gives the following instances: At the time this gentleman resided in the kingdom of Benin, an Arc de Roe had his chain stolen from him, upon which he was seized, and put to death, without form of trial. The person who had committed the theft was likewise taken and condemned, as were three persons supposed to be accessory to the fact. Thus five men lost their lives for a chain of coral, intrinsically not worth two-pence. The second instance happened in 1700, and with more extraordinary circumstances: The captain of a Portuguese ship having staid after all the European fleet had sailed, in order to collect some debts, finding that they came in but slowly, he resolved to cause the Arc de Roe, his greatest debtor, to be conveyed on board his ship. This the other resisted, endeavouring to make his escape, which produced a scuffle with the sailors. Here the pilot, who had received some hurt in the fray, laid hold of the coral chain, broke it in pieces, and flung them overboard; on which the Arc de Roe, quite dispirited with the fatal accident, surrendered himself to the Portuguese. As his confinement was not strict, he found means, when the pilot was asleep, to lay hold of a blunderbuss, with which he shot him through the head. Nor was he contented with this revenge; he seized upon a cutlass, and hewed the carcase in pieces, saying, That he had now punished the villain, and was indifferent about the consequence; for, continues he, when my coral was thrown over-board, I was dead by the law; now my creditor is the same, and I have had the satisfaction of revenge. The captain, not chusing to punish him by his own authority, delivered him up to justice. He was immediately committed to a dungeon, and, upon the arrival of the next Portuguese ship, punished with death, without discriminating murder from the involuntary accident of losing the coral chain <sup>a</sup>.
- d THESE badges of honour are carefully kept by the king in his own possession; and the counterfeiting or possessing any of them, without being legally invested therewith, is punished with death. They are made of a pale reddish coctile earth, finely glazed and speckled like marble, with a great variety of beautiful colours.
- e THE third order of state consists of the Fiadors, who likewise wear the coral, but with some distinctions of subordination and inferiority to the Arcs de Roes. Besides the Fiadors, under the same class are ranked the Mercadores, or merchants, the Fulladors, or pleaders, the Veilles, or elders, all of them discriminated with some distinguishing mark or method of wearing the coral chain. To these succeed the Plebeians, as next in order. This class of people is in general indolent, lazy, and idle; few of them, besides the extreme poor, chusing to work or better their condition by labour and industry. The whole burden of the necessary work is laid upon the women and slaves, whether it be tilling the ground, spinning cotton, weaving cloths, cleaning the streets, or whatever be the occupation. Besides weavers, the only artists in this country are smiths, carpenters, and leather-dressers, all of them such bunglers in their profession, that an European boy, with a month's instruction, would far surpass those who have employed their whole lives in the business <sup>b</sup>.
- f SUCH of the natives as can afford it, feed well. Their common diet is beef, mutton, or fowls, with yams for bread, which, after boiling, they beat into a sort of cake. They frequently make entertainments for each other, the recrements of which are constantly distributed among the poor; a practice worthy the imitation of more polished nations. The meaner ranks of people content themselves with smoked or dried fish, which, salted, greatly resembles in taste the Dutch Ras or Reckel. Their bread is made of yams, bananas, and beans, mixed and beat up together. For their drink they use the limpid brook, or water mixed with a bad wine they call Pardon. The richer sort drink water and European brandy to their meals <sup>c</sup>.
- g THE king, great lords, and every viceroy and governor, support, according to their ability, a certain number of poor at their residences. The blind, the lame, and infirm, are the objects of their charity; as for the lazy, they are suffered to starve if they refuse to supply their own wants. By this excellent police, not a beggar or vagrant is to be seen. The public officers keep the idle to their labour, to prevent their infirmities, the consequence of poverty, from increasing the tax on themselves. This necessary care succeeds so happily, that in spite of their natural indolence, the indigent are but few. Liberality and generosity are distinguishing qualities in the natives of Benin; but they accompany their donations with an ostentation that destroys the grace and beauty of the action. Nay, so intoxicated are they with the love of praise, and the reputation of liberality, that they often impoverish themselves, and ruin their families, to excite admiration <sup>d</sup>.

THEIR dress is neat, ornamental, and far exceeding in magnificence that of the negroes of the Gold Coast. The rich among them wear first a white callico, or cotton petticoat, about a yard in length, and half a yard in breadth, by way of drawers. This they cover with another fine piece of callico of sixteen or twenty yards, which they very artfully and becomingly plait in the middle, throwing over it a scarf a yard long, and a foot wide, the ends of which are adorned with a handsome lace or fringe. As to the upper part of the body, it is mostly naked. Such is the dress in which they appear in public; at home their cloathing is more simple and less expensive, consisting only of a coarse paan for drawers, covered with a large painted cloth worn in the manner of a cloak, and of home manufacture.

AMONG the ladies, those of better fashion wear fine callico paans beautifully chequered with various colours, but in a form that cannot be described in words. The dress is long and open behind, or on one side, just as fancy directs. The face and upper part of the body is covered with a thin veil, which they remove among their friends and intimates of either sex. The neck they adorn with strings and chains of coral, agreeably disposed and wrought. Upon their arms and legs they wear bright copper or iron bracelets, of a mean workmanship, and all their fingers are crowded with rings of the same metal. Upon the whole, their persons are not disagreeable, after custom has rendered them familiar to the eye; and, excepting the rings and bracelets, the dress is by no means unbecoming or inelegant. The meaner degrees of women, as well as the men, differ from those of higher rank only in the quality of their clothes, the form being in every respect the same. Almost all their children go naked till the age of ten or twelve years; the girls indeed are directed by nature when to wear clothes; till then, their whole dress consists of a few strings of coral twisted round their waist, rather for ornament than decency. The men neither curl or adorn their hair, but suffer it to flow in its natural order, except in two or three parts, which they buckle, in order to suspend a bunch of coral to each lock. The women, on the other hand, use great art in dressing their hair, which they throw into a variety of different forms, great and small buckles, high and low foretops, sometimes plaited up behind, at other times flowing in wanton ringlets down the neck; but generally divided on the crown of the head, by which means the curls are brought into exact order and form. Some anoint it with a kind of oil they express or roast out of oil nuts, whence it loses its black colour, and in process of time turns to a beautiful but unbecoming green, or yellow, of which they are fond <sup>e</sup>.

THE men marry as many women as their circumstances will permit, the laws limiting them to no determinate number. They have scarce any nuptial ceremonies, and indeed the rite is so frequent, that it must diminish its solemnity. The only circumstance in which it differs from a common assembly of friends, is, the elegance and profusion of the entertainment. Nyendaël indeed relates the process of courtship in the following manner: If a man loves a virgin, he discovers his passion to the most considerable person among his relations, who proceeds to the virgin's house, and demands her of her friends. If she be not already engaged, he seldom meets with a repulse. As soon as the consent of the parents is obtained, the match goes on, and the bridegroom presents his future bride with a suit of clothes, bracelets, rings, and necklace, proportioned to the degree of his affection and wealth. After having treated the relations on both sides with a handsome collation, the marriage is ended, and confirmed without any other ceremony. Nyendaël adds, that this entertainment is not given to the friends assembled into one company, but that each has his share sent home to his house <sup>f</sup>.

THE natives are jealous of each other to a degree of madness, but never take offence at any liberties taken with their wives by Europeans, deeming it impossible that the taste of the women should be so depraved as to grant unbecoming favours to a white man. Among the people of fashion, the women here live after the manner of the Eastern nations, cooped up from all conversation with the males of their own complexion and features; but treated otherwise with great tenderness, in order to alleviate the misfortune of the loss of liberty. If the master of the house receives a visit from any of his acquaintance, his wife immediately retires, unless the stranger prove an European, in which case they are desired to remain in their seats. They use every female artifice to engage the affections of their husbands, knowing how much their happiness depends upon his will <sup>g</sup>.

ADULTERY, and every violation of the marriage bed, is punished in three different ways. If, among the lower class of people, a husband suspects the fidelity of his wife, he tries every method to surprise her in the fact, without which he has no power of inflicting any other punishment than ill usage. If he succeeds in detecting the intrigue, he becomes immediately possessed of all the estate real and personal of the gallant, which he may from that instant a seize, occupy, and enjoy, as his own. The offending wife is disciplined with a cudgel, driven out of the house, and left to seek her fortune, which commonly ends in misery, few persons choosing to receive her into their houses, and fewer still to marry the woman who has so grossly violated her faith. The method usually practised in such cases is, to retire into a country where they are not known: here they either pass for widows, and watch for a second opportunity of matrimony, or else enter upon trade, or subsist by labour. Among persons of condition, the crime is atoned for by a sum of money, which the relations of the wife advance, in order to avoid the scandal annexed to adultery. After this, she passes with the husband, and all her acquaintance, for a woman of virtue, proportioned to the money received by the husband. As to the governors and Ares de Roe, they punish this crime with the utmost severity. Both the woman and gallant are immediately put to death, if they are taken in the fact; their bodies are thrown upon dunghills, a prey to the birds of the air, and beasts of the field, without process of law, or form of trial. From the severity of the punishment it is that the violation of the marriage bed is less known in Benin than in any other country. Men are deterred from indulging themselves in a passion attended with such ruinous and fatal consequences <sup>b</sup>.

In general the negroes of this country are libidinous, and much addicted to venery, which they ascribe to the free use of Pardon wine, and good eating. This, however, is an observation which will hold not only in Benin, but in almost all warm climates. Their conversation is pure, and free from all obscenity; the rites of love they hold as sacred, to be spoken of only in places destined for that purpose, in retreats, and in a manner neither to offend the eye nor ear; yet the delicate hint, the well-wrapped double-entendre, is so far from being prohibited, that the person possessed of this talent passes for the first of wits. Hence it is that conversation is continually enlivened with well-contrived fables, and chaste similes, tending however to this point. The pregnant wife is forbid the caresses of her husband till after delivery. If the infant proves a male, it is presented to the king, as properly and of right belonging to him; but the females are the property of the father, are intirely under his power, live with him till marriage, and in this are wholly directed by his will <sup>c</sup>.

ABOUT a fortnight after birth both males and females are circumcised, the former by the loss of the præputium, the latter of the clitoris; a custom that prevailed among most primitive nations, though it might be difficult to assign the cause. The infants have, besides, small incisions made, in a manner expressive of certain figures, all over their bodies. The females are more tortured with those unnatural ornaments than the males, and both at the pleasure of the parent. When the infant is seven days old, the parents, imagining that now it has escaped the greatest danger, give an entertainment, and, to appease evil spirits from doing them an injury, they strew the roads with their best provisions and wines <sup>d</sup>.

WHEN a woman bears two children at a birth, it is deemed a happy omen; the king is made acquainted with it, and public rejoicings are ordered to be kept, which they express by a variety of wretched music, vocal and instrumental. As the task of suckling both children is esteemed too difficult for the mother, the father by law is obliged to look out for a nurse, who has lost her own child; and that no advantage may be taken of his circumstances, her price is rated by authority <sup>e</sup>. At Arebo only, twin births are reputed a bad omen, and attended with great grief to the unhappy parents. Here they actually treat the mother with the utmost barbarity, killing both her and the children, and sacrificing them to a certain demon which they are firmly persuaded haunts the village. If the husband happens to be uncommonly fond of his wife, he purchases her life, and sacrifices in her stead a female slave; but the children, without possibility of redemption, are the atoning offering which this cruel and savage law requires (A). Such an impression have those dismal events made upon the men in general, that those whose circumstances are able to support the expence, usually send their wives to be delivered in another country; whence it is probable that this more than savage custom will one day be abolished. The wood supposed to be frequented by this evil spirit is kept so sacred, that no foreign negro of either sex is permitted to enter it. If a native of

(A) Nyendael relates, that when he resided, A. 1699, in Benin, a merchant's wife was delivered of twins. He redeemed the mother by the sacrifice of a female slave, but put the children to death. Nyendael had afterwards frequent opportunities of conversing with the unhappy woman, who could never bear the sight of a child, it always exciting the melancholy reflection of the unmerited fate of her own little innocents. The following year a priest's wife was delivered of two children, which, with a slave in the room of his wife, he was forced to sacrifice with his own hands, by reason of his sacerdotal function. Nothing could be more moving than to see a heart capable of the emotions of pity, and parental tenderness, compelled by inhuman custom to perform rites the most abominable and savage. The affliction of the poor man was extreme, and plainly shewed, that neither habit, the dictates of blind superstition, nor even the warmest zeal for duty and religion, could suppress the cries of nature, and the tender feelings of humanity.

Arebo accidentally falls into any path leading to this wood, he is obliged, however pressing his business may be, to pursue it to the end without looking back; the violation of which custom, or of that other cruel one of murdering their wives and children, they believe will be attended with a plague, famine, or some public calamity. Notwithstanding this rivetted superstition, Nyendaël says, that he has frequently gone a shooting here; and, to ridicule their stupid credulity, has frequently turned back before he proceeded half way in the track leading to the wood. At first they imagined he would instantly fall down dead, or be seized with some violent disorder; but perceiving that no bad consequences followed his boldness, their faith was somewhat staggered. The roguish priests, however, destroyed all his endeavours by their artful salvoes and subterfuges; affirming, that no inference could be drawn from the practice of a white man, their god not taking any concern about him; and that if a negro were to attempt the same thing, the consequence would most certainly be fatal<sup>m</sup>.

The women fruitful at Benin. Menstruous women esteemed unclean, and the restrictions upon them.

No women upon earth are more prolific than the females of this country. Here a barren woman is as rare as contemptible, the greatest ignominy being affixed to this infirmity; while a fruitful woman is held in the utmost esteem and adoration. Menstruous women are deemed unclean; they are prohibited from entering their husbands apartment, touching any thing belonging to his dress or diet, and even from cleaning the house; nay, they are frequently obliged to quit the house, and live solitary and deserted in another at some distance, during this period; after which, and bathing, they are again restored to their former privileges. If they are interrogated concerning the origin of circumcision, and this opinion, that women, during their Catamenia, are unclean; they answer, that those customs were handed down to them traditionally from their ancestors<sup>n</sup>, yet are they bigotted in both, as if they were supported by reason and the lights of nature and revelation.

The method of treating the sick at Benin. Priests the physicians.

THE inhabitants of the kingdom of Benin seem less afraid of death than the other natives of the same coast. They are not terrified at its approach, ascribing the duration of life to the gods; yet they use the proper means to prolong it. Their first resource, upon their being seized with any disorder, is the priest, who here, as in several other barbarous countries, performs the office of physician. He first applies some green herbs of certain qualities; if these prove ineffectual, he has recourse to sacrifices, and appeasing the gods. The speedy cure of the patient greatly augments the reputation of the priest; but if he recovers slowly, he is dismissed, and another called. If, after all endeavours, the patient dies, they are never at a loss, any more than in Europe, for reasons in defence of their mal-practice. Notwithstanding this great confidence in their priests, little is done for them; they commonly are rich only in fame; the gratitude of the patient continuing no longer than the disease, and the sacrifices being offered at the expence of the priest, which frequently amount to more than his fee<sup>o</sup>. When any person dies, the body is washed carefully. The natives of Benin, who breathe their last in any of the other provinces of the kingdom, are brought with the utmost caution to the place of their birth, the body being first dried over a slow fire, then put into a close coffin, and sweetened with aromatics. As it frequently happens that a conveyance does not offer for years, the body all this while remains unburied, nor can the funeral rites be performed with propriety but in their native soil. The nearest relations of the deceased express their grief after various fashions: some shave their hair, others their beards, and others but half of either. The public mourning is usually limited to the term of fourteen or fifteen days. Their plaints and lamentations are accommodated to the sounds of certain musical instruments, with long intermediate stops, during which they quaff liberally their Pardon wine. When the last obsequies are performed, every man retires to his own home, where the nearest relations, who continue in mourning, bewail the deceased in this manner, at stated periods, for the time limited by custom. Husbands and parents generally prolong their mourning to three or four months<sup>p</sup>.

Deaths and burials.

Customs observed at the last obsequies of the king.

WHEN a king dies, his funeral obsequies are performed with some extraordinary ceremonies. A well is dug before the palace, so deep, that the workmen are often suffocated in the pit themselves have made. It is so narrow at the top, that a stone of five feet in length and three feet in breadth will conveniently cover it; but its dimensions at the bottom are very considerable. Here the body of the king is first laid, in the presence of a prodigious concourse of people of both sexes, all of whom contend for the honour of being buried with him. Such as are chosen for this high dignity are put in with him, and the grave inclosed by a stone. Next morning the nobles return, and, removing the stone, dip their heads in the water with which the pit is generally filled, and ask the persons buried with the king, whether they have met with their royal master. If they make any reply, the stone is again put into its former place, and they return next day to the same ceremony; otherwise, they conclude that they have met with the king, and are now attending him in his flight to eternity; upon which the solemnity

- a solemnity is closed, and the rites duly performed <sup>1</sup>. Hence we may naturally infer, that they have an idea, however gross, of futurity, and that the soul or spirit exists, either with or without the body. Barbot adds, that the ceremony being ended, the first minister, or one of the three great lords, go to the king's successor, who then comes to the grave, and examining into the truth of the report, orders the tomb-stone to be laid, and upon it a banquet of the most delicate wines and sweetmeats. Every one eats and drinks heartily till night, when the mob, intoxicated with liquor, run about the streets, committing the wildest excesses and riots. They put every one to death that obstructs them, men, women, children, and brute animals, cutting off their heads, which they carry to the royal sepulchre, and throw in as offerings to the deceased king, together with all the clothes and effects of those persons they have sacrificed to his manes <sup>2</sup>. Yet, amidst these barbarous and cruel customs, the kingdom of Benin is governed by laws which breathe nothing but humanity, and sympathy for misfortune and distress; witness their laws in favour of the poor.

THE right of inheritance devolves in the following manner: When a person of condition dies, the eldest son succeeds as sole heir, but presents a slave by way of heriot or tribute to the king, and another to the three great lords, with a petition that he may succeed to his father's estate. The king grants his request, and he is accordingly declared lawful heir to his father. The fortunes of the younger children depend intirely on his pleasure; but the widow has by law a jointure proportioned to the estate, and her rank and quality. His father's other wives the son takes home, and, if he pleases, uses them in the same capacity his father did. Those, however, of them, whose charms have no power of attracting him, he sets, with their children, to work, in order to support themselves with credit, and little expence to him. The next akin succeeds to the effects of the deceased; but, in failure of heirs male, the king inherits <sup>3</sup>.

THE punishment of crimes is regulated in this manner: If a thief is taken in the fact, he is forced to make restitution, and is besides mulcted, if he happens to be rich; but if poor, he is beaten. If the robbery is committed upon a public officer, the offender is punished with death. However, the crimes of burglary and robbery seldom occur in this country. Murder is still less frequent: whoever kills a man, is punished with death; but if the murderer be the king's son, or some other considerable person, he is banished to the extremity of the realm, and conveyed to the destined place under a strong guard. None of them being ever afterwards heard of, it is concluded the guard has carried them to the Elysian fields, and the mansions of the dead. If a person dies of an accidental blow, his death is not deemed violent, unless blood appears; and the offence is bought off by burying the dead with decency, and then sacrificing a slave to appease his ghost. This atoning slave the offender touches with his forehead upon his bended knees, in which posture he remains till the slave is dead, and the sacrifice duly performed. Afterwards he pays a sum, proportioned to his circumstances, to the three great lords; which done, he obtains his freedom, and the friends of the deceased rest satisfied that he has fulfilled the law. Every other crime, except adultery, may be atoned for with money; where that is wanting, corporal punishment must supply the deficiency <sup>4</sup>.

e WHEN a crime is doubtful, and the accusation not clearly proved, the method of purgation is practised in five different ways, four of which are admitted in trivial offences and civil causes, and the fifth in capital cases, such as treason, and crimes of a dark and deep complexion. In the first method of purgation, the accused is carried before a priest, who pierces his tongue with a cock's feather well greased. If it passes easily through, the person accused is innocent, and the wound will soon close up and heal without pain. Should he prove guilty, the quill remains fixed in his tongue, the wound cankers, and the accused becomes the sport and derision of the people. In the second method of tryal, the priest takes an oblong piece of turf, in which he sticks seven or eight small quills. These the accused draws out one by one: if they come out freely, he is acquitted, and his innocence untainted; otherwise he is convicted of the crime, and subject to the penalty. The third method of purgation is no less extraordinary. The juice of certain green herbs is injected into the eye of the suspected person. If the eye becomes red and inflamed, he is pronounced guilty; otherwise his innocence is as clear as the sunshine. For the fourth trial, the priest strokes over the tongue of the prisoner three times with an ignited copper bracelet, and he is deemed innocent or guilty according to its effects. His escaping without a blister is a certain criterion of purity, and the contrary as sure a proof of his guilt; a method of purgation similar to the ordeal in England, and other European kingdoms. The fifth kind of tryal, which is taken only by persons of rank, happens but seldom. Here the accused is carried by the king's order to a certain river, whose waters have the extraordinary quality of gently wafting the innocent plunged in them to land, whether he has been taught to swim, or not. On the contrary, the guilty never fail to sink, however well they may be skilled in this art. The river, which before was calm, immediately becomes turbulent and ruffled when a guilty person is thrown in; but innocence preserves the waters in their former tranquillity. It is really amazing, that among nations endowed with common understanding, trials so ridiculous and absurd should be deemed proofs of innocence or guilt; yet we see how prevalent they have been in all countries, as if folly itself had dictated those laws, the most essential to society, to happiness, and the dignity of human nature.

THE fines charged on these crimes are thus divided: First, the person injured by theft has restitution made him either by returning the goods stolen, or out of the effects of the criminal; the governor, next, has a certain proportion, and the remainder of the fine goes to the three great lords. As for the king, he has no share, the matter being carefully kept from his ear, yet do the great lords always make use of his name. If they are dissatisfied with the division made, they send a threatening message to the governor, acquainting him with the king's indignation at the small proportion of the fine allowed him. This has its effect, and never fails of doubling the sum <sup>a</sup>.

As to the religion of the country, it is so fraught with good sense and absurdity, that we are at a loss how to describe it. The Fetiche, of which we shall speak explicitly in another place, is worshipped here, as in all the other countries on the western coast of Africa. They take every thing that seems extraordinary for a god, and make offerings to it. These, however, they consider in a subaltern capacity, acting as mediators between men and the great God, of whom their ideas are less gross and unworthy. To God they ascribe the attributes of omniscience, omnipresence, omnipotence, and invisibility. They believe that he actuates every thing, and governs the world by his providence. As he is invisible, it would be absurd, they think, to represent him under a corporeal form, to image and worship what we never saw, and cannot comprehend. To every evil they give the name of devil, imagining, that an evil-disposed, wicked, and malicious spirit, presides over all that is bad. This being they worship out of fear, and to prevent his injuring them. The devil, however, is not represented by any particular figure or image; he exists wholly in the mind, and the same idol is often worshipped for the great God and the devil <sup>b</sup>.

ACCORDING to Dapper, they have extremely just notions of God's supremacy, invisibility, power, wisdom, and goodness, by which he created both heaven and earth, and continues to govern them according to his profound wisdom. This being they call Oviffa, and think it unnecessary to honour him, because his nature is good and benevolent; whereas the evil spirit requires constant worship to check the malignity of his disposition. Nyendael's account, however, differs from this, he asserting that both spirits are worshipped by sacrifices and offerings <sup>c</sup>.

THE natives of Benin believe firmly in apparitions, and that the ghosts of their deceased ancestors walk the earth unseen. They chiefly appear to them in their sleep, to warn them of some danger, which they are to obviate by sacrifices. As soon as day arrives, they never fail of complying with the spirit's suggestion. They make offerings, and, if their circumstances are low, they will even borrow to enable them to perform that holy rite. Those offerings are generally of no very high value, consisting only of yams mixed with oil, which they place before the idol. Sometimes they sacrifice a cock, the blood is spilt for the Fetiche, but the fowl is kept for their own use. Annual sacrifices are performed with all imaginable pomp by the great; for these, they slaughter great numbers of sheep, oxen, cows, and all kinds of cattle. All their friends are invited to the festival, which generally continues for several days, and ends in distributing valuable presents to the guests <sup>d</sup>.

Their notions of future bliss and misery.

THE negroes of Benin place the seat of their bliss or misery in the sea. The shadow of a man they look upon as a real existence, which will one day give testimony of their good and evil actions. This appearance they call Passadoor, and bribe it by offerings and sacrifices, since by its evidence they are raised to the highest dignity and pleasures of paradise, or sunk into the lowest abyss of wretchedness, where they perish through hunger and poverty <sup>e</sup>.

ALL their houses are so crammed with idols, that it is difficult to find a vacant spot; but they have also particular huts, or little temples, appropriated to the residence of their gods. Here it is they receive the offerings of their votaries. Their priests pretend to a familiarity with the devil, and the art of penetrating into futurity by means of a pot pierced at the bottom in three different places, from which they extract a dismal noise, the oracle of their feigned correspondent, which they interpret as they please. Nyendael alleges, that every man is his own priest; but this not only contradicts what he affirms in another place, but runs counter to the assertions of Barbot and the best authorities. Nothing, according to Barbot, is undertaken without consulting the sacerdotal oracle; however, the priest is limited to private affairs; <sup>f</sup> a if he meddles with politics, and utters oracles that affect the state, he is punished with death. The priests of the provinces are likewise prohibited, under severe penalties, from entering the capital; but no writer explains the reason of a law so whimsical.

* NYENDAEL, p. 413.

THE grand or high priest of Loebo, a town situated on the mouth of the river Formosa, The great power of the high priest of Loebo. is especially famous for his profound skill in magic. All the natives, the king not excepted, believe that his power extends over sea and air; that he can foresee or prevent the arrival of ships, shipwrecks, and innumerable other events of importance. His majesty of Benin, struck with the miracles he had performed, complimented him with the town of Loebo and all its dependencies, he is considered as the head of the priesthood, and so respected, that no one approaches him without trembling; nay, the royal ambassadors presume not to touch his hand without leave, and tokens of the greatest veneration and awe <sup>2</sup>.

THIS is not the only superstition to which the natives of Benin are addicted, Artus relates, that they stand in profound dread of a certain blackbird which they worship, and are prohibited to kill, under pain of death. This bird has priests appointed to attend him; to feed him; and to worship him in the mountains, which are consecrated to his use.

THE Benians divide time into years, months, weeks, and days, each division distinguished by its proper term or appellation. The year is composed of four months, and the sabbath, or day of repose, returns every fifth day, which is celebrated as a festival, with sacrifices, offerings, and entertainments. They have besides a great number of other days, consecrated to the purposes of religion; and particularly one annual feast in memory of their ancestors. Dapper A barbarous custom at festivals. affirms, that, in this nation, they sacrifice not only a great variety of brutes, but offer likewise a number of human victims. These consist usually of condemned criminals, reserved for this purpose; and custom renders it necessary that twenty-five should be sacrificed to complete the ceremony. If the criminals should fall short of this number, the king's officers are ordered to run about the streets of Benin in the night, and to seize indiscriminately all those who are met in the dark. A ray of light will save their lives. The rich have the liberty of redeeming themselves and their slaves, on condition that they provide other sacrifices; but the poor die without pity or remorse in the spectators. This method of seizing by accident turns out to the great emolument of the priests, who receive the price of redemption <sup>a</sup>. They frequently deceive the people, pretending that they have secretly sacrificed people who they have ransomed; a fraud that may justly be termed pious, or at least very pardonable, if they did it from motives of virtue and humanity, and not of gain.

BUT the greatest festival held at Benin is that annual one called the Coral Feast. This, says Nyendaël, An account of the Coral Feast, the greatest feast at Benin. is the only day in the whole year in which the king appears to his people. Artus, however, affirms that he makes two other processions through the city. Here it is that he appears in all his grandeur, marching at the head of his women, who often exceed six hundred, of the most beautiful that can be found. At the Coral Feast he comes magnificently dressed to the second area of the palace, where his throne is placed under a rich canopy. All about him are ranged, his women and officers in their richest attire; after which the procession begins. This part of the ceremony ended, the king removes from his throne to sacrifice in the open air to the gods; an act of piety that is followed by the loud shouts and acclamations of the people. Having paid his devotions, he returns to his throne, and remains there till all his people have likewise discharged that duty. After which he retires to his particular chamber, and the remainder of the day is spent in feasting and mirth. The king and nobility distribute wine and provisions among the people, and the day ends in gluttony, drunkenness, and riot <sup>b</sup>.

DAPPER describes the succession of the kings of Benin after the following manner. When the reigning monarch perceives his end approaching, he calls one of the Onegwas, or three great lords, and imparts to him which of his sons he nominates to fill the throne, with an injunction, under pain of death, not to reveal the secret till after his decease. As soon as the breath has departed his body, the Onegwa takes into his own custody all the royal jewels, treasure, and effects. The young princes, who are in the utmost uncertainty concerning their destiny, come and do homage to the minister, as the arbiter of their fate. When the time limited by law for declaring a successor draws near, the minister sends for the high marshal, and declares to him the last will of the king, which the other, to prevent mistake, repeats six times; after which he returns to his own house with a solemnity adequate to the importance of the secret in his possession. Next day the minister orders that prince, for whom the crown is intended, to be called, and desires him to intreat the marshal to nominate a successor. The prince obeys, and solicits this request with the most supplicating air and manner possible. Six days elapse, during which the Onegwa and high marshal are concerting the necessary measures for proclaiming the king. When the day arrives, the people are assembled, and the high marshal, taking the prince by the hand, names him six times, pausing after every repetition, and asking the minister if he has made any mistake. In the end the other princes are called, and in a kneeling posture, are acquainted with the last will of their father. The young king then returns thanks to the minister and marshal for the integrity with which they discharged their office; and then he is immediately invested with the badges of royalty, and receives the homage and allegiance of the great officers and nobles of the kingdom. This ceremony ended, retires to the town of Ofcebo, distant some miles from Benin, to reside there till he is perfectly instructed in the art of government, and the duties of a king. During this interval, the queen-mother, the Onegwa intrusted with the king's last will, and the grand marshal, hold the reins of government, and possess the whole power and authority of majesty, their decrees being irrevocable by the successor, without their own consent. The young monarch, having finished his studies, quits Ofcebo under the conduct of the high marshal, and takes possession of the palace and ensigns of royalty at Benin. Here his first care is to murder his brothers, and secure his tranquillity, by removing every rival to the crown. Formerly this cruel usage was more limited, one of the family being generally saved; but these, in two or three instances, having raised disturbances in the kingdom, were the occasion of introducing a general massacre of all those who could form the least pretensions to the throne. The bodies of the princes are, however, interred with all imaginable pomp; this bloody act being looked upon as a necessary sacrifice to the public good<sup>d</sup>.

Nyendael introduced to the king.

WHEN Nyendael was at Benin, in the year 1702 (B), he had an opportunity of seeing and conversing with the then reigning prince. He was about forty years of age, of an open countenance, engaging address, and affable manner. Nyendael stood at the distance of thirty paces from him; but, that he might observe him the better, desired leave to approach nearer to him. The king smiled at the request, and, though unusual, ordered the Dutchman to be gratified. His majesty beckoned to him, and he came within eight or ten paces of the throne, in presence only of the three Onegwas, or great lords, and a fierce-looking soldier with a drawn sword in his hand. He then presented the monarch with a fine silk night-gown; with which, he was afterwards informed, he was highly pleased, although, at that time, he expressed no marks of his satisfaction, as it was brought to him covered; the usual method of making presents. Before and behind the presents several negroes march, with white staves in their hands; every one gets out of the way in the utmost hurry, to avoid being soundly beaten, under the pretence of their wanting an opportunity of poisoning the king's goods, or of assassinating him.

Revenues of the crown.

THE revenues annexed to the crown of Benin are very considerable; every governor is accountable to the king for a certain number of bags of bujis, amounting to a large sum. The inferior officers pay their taxes in cattle, fowls, cloth, and other commodities. Thus the court is continually supplied with all kinds of necessaries; the overplus is sold, and the money put into the royal coffers. Certain duties are also laid upon foreign trade, besides the annual taxes paid to the governor for the privilege of commerce, which amounts to a great sum. The king has only a sixth of this annual provincial tax. Notwithstanding those incumbrances on trade, the Europeans are treated with the highest distinction and most profound respect.

Power of the king of Benin.

Dapper represents the king of Benin as a prince so puissant, that, in one day, he can assemble an army of 20,000 men, and in a few days more than 100,000. Hence he is greatly feared and respected by his neighbours. While his general, called Occassarry, is in the field, his pay and dignity are very considerable; but he has no share in the booty; all goes to the king. So strict a discipline is maintained among the troops, that quitting one's post for a minute, without leave, is punished with death. Yet Nyendael alleges, that the art of war is unknown in this country; and that the want of courage and conduct in his armies perpetually exposes the king to the incursions of pirates and robbers, who spoil and destroy every thing, sometimes to the very gates of the capital. When they engage in battle, they observe, says he, neither order nor discipline; they have neither generals nor officers; all are a cowardly tumultuous rabble. This expressly contradicts the assertions of Artus, Dapper, and Barbot; it is therefore possible that Nyendael speaks of the civil war we have mentioned, in which troops of all kinds, and raw undisciplined militia, were used<sup>e</sup>.

Their ignorance of the art of war.

Arms used by the Benians.

THE arms used by the Benians are swords, poniards, javelins, bows, and poisoned arrows. Every soldier has his buckler, composed of reeds, and of consequence so weak and slight as to afford but a slender defence. The nobles carry into the field a fine scarlet robe, to

(B) We are unable to reconcile this with what he relates in another place; viz. that all Europeans are prevented, nay even excluded from approaching the king, or coming into his presence. Perhaps this monarch might have expressed his desire to see a white man; a supposition not incompatible with the despotism of this king.

<sup>a</sup> mark their quality. Others make use of a more convenient ornament, a suit of armour made from the elephant's hide, adorned with the teeth and claws of leopards, and the head covered with a helmet of the same materials, decorated with scarlet fringe and binding, to which is suspended a tail reaching down to the waist. The military standards and colours are made of a fine silk, generally red, carried in the front and center of each corps and division of the army. The soldiers likewise wear sashes of the same, to which they hang their shields, their only defence against the poisoned arrows of their enemies<sup>f</sup>.

THESE are all the particulars of this extensive kingdom, which we have upon the concurring testimony of authors. As for other particulars related by English, French, and Portuguese mariners, they have been generally refuted by Nyendael, and indeed by each other. <sup>Conclusion of the history of Benin.</sup> <sup>b</sup> This gentleman frequently visited Benin, resided six months at a time there, is modest in his account, and speaks not upon hearsay, but from his own knowledge. All the others in general have indulged a wanton and luxuriant imagination. We have therefore rejected their accounts, excepting where they unanimously agree in their assertions; in which case we thought they might reasonably supply the deficiencies of Nyendael, and sometimes be opposed to his relations, in cases where he would seem to be misinformed.

Containing the history of the Slave Coast; viz. the geography of the country; its division into different kingdoms and states; a description of the kingdoms of Koto, and of Great and Little Popo; an account of the wars of their kings, and of the brave king Afforri; with the manners, customs, commerce, religion, and superstition of the natives, &c.

<sup>c</sup> THE Slave Coast is generally included by European navigators under the limits of the kingdom of Benin. It is bounded by the Rio de Lagos in the kingdom of Benin, and extends to the Rio da Volta, the boundary on this side of the Gold Coast. The coast goes by the general appellation of Great Benin. From Port Douarre it extends itself towards the south to Cape Formosa; then turning eastward to Rio del Rey, and again inclining to the south to Cape Gonsalvo, towards the equator, it forms the gulph of Guiney. Thus, in its whole length, it measures about 350 leagues, in a curve line, or arc of a circle<sup>a</sup>. <sup>A general description of the Slave Coast.</sup>

THE Slave Coast comprehends the coasts and kingdoms of Koto, Popo, Whidah, and Ardrab. Authors are not agreed about the several limits of those kingdoms; nor is it material to the reader, since, under the general view of the Slave Coast, they will all be comprehended. According to Bosman, the Koto Coast is often called the land of Lampi by the natives. The country is flat, sandy, dry, barren, and without wood or trees of any kind, except the palm, or wild coco, of which it produces a great number. It is tolerably provided with cattle, at least as many as abundantly supply the inhabitants. Neither river nor sea fish are wanting; but the latter they are unable to catch, on account of the great agitation of the sea, and the prodigious surf on the coast. The whole commerce of this kingdom is confined to the sale of slaves. Sometimes they afford more, sometimes less; in general, the number sold at a time is scarce sufficient to complete the cargo of a single ship. What renders this trade precarious, is a custom that the negroes have of flying into the interior parts of the country, on the arrival of the Europeans. Thus it frequently happens that a ship shall have staid six months on the coast without purchasing one slave. The Portuguese carry on the greatest trade here, and the natives prefer dealing with them to any other Europeans<sup>b</sup> (D). <sup>Its division into different states.</sup> <sup>Description of the kingdom of Koto, or Coto, and its commerce.</sup>

<sup>c</sup> BOSMAN describes the natives as good-natured, civil, and obliging; and Des Marchais observes, that we may safely like their manners, if we do not repose a confidence in them<sup>d</sup>. This remark is confirmed by what the former writer relates. When he acquainted the king that he intended, after finishing his business at Whidah, to return by land, he offered to <sup>Disposition of the natives.</sup>

(D) If Koto is the same country with Quito, as we are led to imagine, by the descriptions of Bosman, Des Marchais, and other writers, as well as from the extent of the country, and the affinity of names, the English have a settlement in it, belonging to the royal African company.

meet him with his whole forces on the borders of his dominions, and to escorte him beyond the Rio Volta, to secure him against injuries from the strolling robbers. This obliging offer Bosman would have accepted, had not the negroes of Popo, who had also offered to conduct him through their territories, dissuaded him from it by their ambassadors, telling him they were apprehensive he might be set upon by the robbers before they could arrive. This advice they recommended, but faintly, while they artfully insinuated under-hand the satisfaction he would receive by this land tour. Bosman, from this double-dealing, suspected some treachery; and he soon after received certain intelligence that their intention was to murder and rob him; their public disputation taking off, as they imagined, all possibility of suspecting them. Bosman had the precaution to avoid this snare, by dropping his design; by which means he lost the opportunity of gratifying his curiosity concerning many important and entertaining particulars.

Religion,
oeconomy, and manners of the natives.

In politics, religion, and oeconomy, they greatly resemble the inhabitants of the Gold Coast; whose manners we shall have occasion soon to describe. In one particular they differ, which is in the number of idols kept at Koto. In the multiplicity of these consists their wealth.

A negro, that is not possessed of a dozen of idols at least, is reputed poor, and his riches increase proportionably with his gods. Their houses, roads, and by-paths, are filled with images; whence we may infer how far their Fetiches contribute to their fortunes and happiness. Their language is directly similar to that spoken by the negroes of Acra; and their commerce being limited to such commodities, it will easily be believed that few rich persons are to be found in this country; rich at least in the European sense of the word. The profits which they sometimes draw from the sale of slaves diminish in no respect their natural poverty; the whole being laid out in the purchase of idols, or materials for making their gods.

shown in their wars with Popo.

As to their courage, it seems proportioned to their wealth. Having nothing to lose but what they are able soon to repair, they are indifferent about the defence of their property. Indeed the very quality of their effects is their best security. This appeared evidently in all their frequent wars with the kingdom of Popo, which continued, with short intervals, for a series of years. At present the king of Aquamboe, whose interest it is to hold an even balance between the contending powers, prevents the consequences of a decisive victory, by throwing his weight in the lighter scale. However, as long as Aquamboe was governed by two monarchs, their quarrels were the occasion of much bloodshed; the old king taking part with his ally of Popo, and the young joining his forces to those of Koto. Upon this occasion it was, that, in the year 1700, the army of Little Popo having surprised that of Koto, obliged them to abandon their native country. In this state of exile they were, on Bosman's arrival on that coast; but he doubted not that the Aquamboans would use their utmost efforts to restore the balance of power.

DES MARCHAIS relates, that, before this event, the kingdom of Koto must have been wholly subdued, if the policy of the king of Aquamboe had not prevented it. He adds, that this last nation, being rich in gold mines, equally dreads the superiority of the one or other of those powers, or their intire reconciliation. For this reason he fomented their quarrels, heightens their jealousies, but constantly keeps victory in suspense.

Description of the kingdom of Popo.

THE kingdom of Popo, or Papa, stretches from Cape Monte to the borders of the kingdom of Whidab; about ten leagues in length. It is divided into two provinces, Great and Little Popo; the latter lying eastward. Barbot affirms, that from Cape Monte, in the territories of Koto, to Little Popo, contains a coast, stretching north-east, of five leagues in extent, the ground flat, sandy, and barren. He subjoins, that Little Popo is a very small province, bearing the title of a kingdom, situated between Koto and Great Popo on the sea-coast. However, he acknowledges that its limits on the inland side are not distinctly known. Bosman reckons the distance betwixt Koto and Great Popo about ten miles, the country flat, without hills or trees, and so sandy, that even the king's provisions dressed here are scarce eatable. This abundance of sand renders the land quite barren, and obliges the better sort of inhabitants to bring their provisions from Whidab. They are likewise pestered with an incredible number of rats, that burrow like rabbits in the sand.

the nation.

THE town of Little Popo stands on a beach in full view of the sea, four leagues west of the town of Great Popo. It is peopled with the remains of the kingdom of Acra, behind the Dutch fort there. Here they sought an asylum, after having been driven out of their own country by the king of Aquamboe, and, from appearances, it is probable they will never again be permitted to return to their native soil. Without being numerous, they have the reputation of being extremely warlike. Afforri, the brother and immediate predecessor of the present king, was a prince of great courage, martial ability, and much feared and respected. The most signal occasion for distinguishing his valour, was against the Phidalgo of Offra, who

a had rebelled against the king of Great Ardrab, his natural prince, and carried his insolence to such a height, as to massacre the Dutch factor Hollwarf, and his attendants. Afforri, solicited by the king of Ardrab to revenge those accumulated crimes, marched with all his forces against the Phidalgo, engaged and defeated his troops, ravaged his country, and obliged him to so humble a submission as to surrender himself to his sovereign the king of Ardrab. Not satisfied with this victory, and spurred on by the entreaties of his friend the monarch of Ardrab, he marched against the people of Whidab, and encamped in their country, within sight of the capital, where he waited for a supply of powder, which he expected from Ardrab. The powder had been put under the escorte of a strong party, of which the Whidasian general having notice, took his measures to intercept it. He secretly detached a numerous corps of his best troops, attacked and defeated the convoy, thereby obliging the brave Afforri to a speedy retreat. This, however, he executed with so much address, that it gained him no less reputation than a complete victory would have done. He was pursued by the Whidasians; but so judicious was his disposition, that they found it impossible to attack him; and he got clear of the country without the loss of a man. On his return to his own dominions, he learned that the Kotons, his neighbours, were preparing to take up arms for the defence of Whidab, had he remained longer in their country. This raised his resentment, and determined him to march against them; which he did with the utmost ardour and expedition. Although the enemy were greatly superior in number, he resolved to attack them. He fell upon them with an intrepidity worthy of his former reputation; but was so warmly received, that, a great part of his army being cut off, he was in danger of losing the battle. Desperate, enraged, and unmindful of his safety, he flung himself, with a few attendants, into the midst of their ranks, where he supported his rashness with an astonishing valour, till all his men were killed, himself wounded, and at length left dead upon the field, disdaining to save his life at the expence of his liberty. His brother and successor, though less martial, was, however, more politic. To revenge the death of the former king, he always attacked the people of Koto when they were engaged in other wars. Continuing this policy, he at length drove them out of their country, by embracing every advantage, which gained him the reputation of the most artful and prudent prince of his time <sup>a</sup>.

THE natives of Popo depend intirely on plunder and the slave trade. In the former they are more successful than the Kotons, being more active, brave and resolute. Their slave trade is not considerable, it frequently requiring a residence of some months to complete a cargo here. In 1697, Bosman could purchase but three slaves in the space of as many days, notwithstanding the assurances of the natives, on his arrival, that, in a few days, they would procure him two hundred, without seeming to discredit their report, he went on board, and sailed for Whidab; soon after which he was informed that the Popons had returned from their incursions into the neighbouring counties, with above the number they had promised him, whom they afterwards sold to the Portuguese. They are uncommonly fraudulent and thievish, it being their usual practice to draw the merchant or factor on shore, under pretence of viewing a cargo of slaves they have ready for sale. Having obtained this end, they detain him till they actually procure the number wanted, which they oblige him to take at the price they think proper to affix. No nation is so much despised by them as the Portuguese, yet no people deal so largely with them, owing to the paltry goods with which they trade. These are refused by the natives of other provinces, and the Popons, who come easily by their slaves, part with them at a cheap rate, accepting in exchange any kind of merchandize. Bosman relates, that, in 1698, a Danish ship staid longer at Popo for a cargo of 500 slaves than he had done at Whidab for 2000. All this while the Dane met with so many disappointments, frauds, and knavish practices, as will deter that nation from ever trading there again. The year before they had treated an English captain in much the same manner, and cheated him of goods to a considerable amount; but returning two years afterwards, he recovered his damages, by seizing the king's son and several of the nobility, whom he detained till ample satisfaction was made <sup>b</sup>.

DURING the reign of Afforri's politic brother, commerce with the Popons was rendered secure, and put upon a footing with that of other nations. He severely punished all frauds and impositions upon foreigners; trade was conducted in an even, equal, and regular course; the merchant delivered his goods, and he was sure of having his returns at the time appointed, except where unforeseen accidents occurred. In his time a Dutch ship procured 500 slaves, at a reasonable price, in eleven days; but, after his death, the reins of government were relaxed, and the people returned to their old and villainous practices. At present to such a height of wickedness are they arrived, that it is impossible to deal with them, and avoid being cheated, in such a manner as destroys the profit of the voyage <sup>c</sup>.

Account of the kingdoms of Great Popo.

Four miles to the eastward of Little Popo are the boundaries of Great Popo. In the inland country are found plenty of fruits, roots, birds, and beasts; but the sea-coast is marshy, and of course low and flat; at the same time that it is almost inaccessible. The sea beats with so much violence against the shore, that boats and canoes dare not venture to approach it for the greater part of the year. The harbour of Little Popo is distant five leagues from that of Great Popo. In going eastward, the latter of these ports is visible at a considerable distance, particularly two flags, which continually fly upon two points formed by the banks of the river Tarri, or Torri. Behind the east flag stands the Dutch factory, and at the mouth of the river the town of Great Popo, built in an island, formed by a creek and marshes, that give the country the appearance of a large lake. Hence the Portuguese call it the Terra Annegada or the Drowned Land. Others give it the appellation of Terra Gozeda.

Description of the town and royal palace.

THE town is divided into three parts, distinctly marked out. The mouth of the river is blocked up by a bar, which, however, the canoes can easily pass. The houses, or rather huts, are small, and much of the same model as those of the Cape de Verd islands, and indeed of most uncivilized countries. Des Marchais makes the whole strength of the town to consist in its situation, surrounded every where by the sea, or inaccessible marshes. It is the only place in the dominions of Great Popo that merits the name of a town; all the rest are but little hamlets of two or three houses each; to which, on the least danger, the inhabitants of Popo retire. The royal palace is a large court, composed of an infinite number of little huts or cabins, the principal apartment being seated in the middle, each having a guard of a company of soldiers. The king's particular house is adorned with a large saloon, reserved for public audiences, and the entertainment of strangers. As the king always eats alone, foreigners are entertained by the lords and principal officers of the court. His majesty keeps a great number of women; two of which always attend his person, to cool and refresh him with fans, neatly made of reeds and feathers. His constant amusement, and indeed sole occupation, consists in smoking tobacco, toying with his women, and conversing with his officers upon the most trifling subjects. All the women, honoured with the royal affection, are entertained in the palace with equal profusion and variety of diet. All the country, except this island, is thinly inhabited, owing chiefly to the perpetual incursions of the negroes of Whidah; hence the grounds are uncultivated, provisions often scarce, and the people in danger of being starved, but for the supplies they get from their most bitter enemies, who run the hazard of an illicit trade, for the sake of the great profits resulting from it.

king lives.

THIS account of Bosman's differs very widely from what Barbot relates, and affirms, with a minuteness of circumstances that adds to the credit of his report. If the reader will invert every particular of the foregoing account from Bosman, and conceive the country populous, well cultivated, and happy, he will have Barbot's idea of it. To reconcile relations so very different, we must suppose that the writers viewed this country at two very distant periods; the former after some dreadful calamity, and the latter in a flourishing, industrious, and peaceable reign.

The kingdoms of Koto, Popo, and Whidah, formerly dependent on Ardrah.

ALL the voyagers agree, that the kingdom of Popo had once been so powerful as to compel the Whidans to pay a yearly tribute. Yet this appears to be a mistake, without any real foundation. It is certain, that the kingdoms of Popo, Koto, and Whidah, were formerly provinces of the great kingdom of Ardrah, often in rebellion against their sovereign, but more frequently involved in war with each other. These only terminated in weakening all, without any advantage resulting to either. Its situation protected Popo; the number of its inhabitants was a sufficient security to Whidah; and its poverty was the barrier of Koto. Thus those wars, supposed to have ended to the disadvantage of Whidah, were in part terminated by the acquisition of liberty to each, and their total dismemberment from the sovereign kingdom of Ardrah (E). Des Marchais, who here indeed appears to be a mere copyist, is of the same sentiments; but then he adds, that Great Popo was in subjection to Whidah till the time of the late king, who was placed on the throne by the Whidashian monarch; in reward for which he withdrew his allegiance, and established an independency.

Wars carried on between Popo and Kida, or Whidah.

THE Whidan, enraged at this ingratitude, raised a powerful army, and was assisted with ammunition by some French ships lying before Whidah. With this army he marched against Popo, intending nothing less than the entire extirpation of that people; in which hope he was encouraged by the French, who promised to fall upon them by sea. However, the shallows round Popo prevented the approach of the ships by sea, and the marshes secured the city by land. Both the French and Whidans were obliged to make their attack upon floats.

(E) This is the account of the learned Jesuit Ca-vazzi, who seems to have drawn his intelligence from the best materials, and the concurring tradition of each of the three countries. He is, however, extremely concise in this relation, which he touches upon only by way of digression from his subject.

- a The enemy had thoroughly provided themselves before these could be got in readiness; and their liberty and property being at stake, they gave the allies so warm a reception, that, after great slaughter, they were defeated, and repulsed from the city. All this was done without the loss of a man on the side of the Popons; for they charged the enemy from under the cover of their houses, and gained a complete victory, without being once seen by the enemy. The king, however, knew to what particular circumstances he owed his good fortune, and was too wise to pursue it beyond the town, as he knew he should then be upon an equal footing with his more numerous enemies. Since this unsuccessful attempt, the king of Whidab has never ventured upon any enterprises against Popo. He has indeed omitted no opportunities of fomenting divisions between them and other neighbouring nations; intrigues which have already cost him immense sums, without drawing a single advantage from them; nay, with the mortifying circumstance of being cheated, duped, and outwitted, upon all hands<sup>c</sup>.
- b The natives of Great Popo trade in slaves, but not deeply. If no foreign ships arrive on their coast, they dispose of their stock to the king of Little Popo, who exchanges for them some of his European commodities. But the greatest trade of the kingdom arises from the fish caught on their coast, which they prepare and sell to other neighbouring kingdoms and foreigners. While it was dependent upon Ardrab, their commerce with the Europeans was inconsiderable, the king obliging them to preserve their slaves and fish, to secure the payment of his taxes; probable it is, that this tyranny was the cause of their revolt. Their natural propensity to theft and pilfering has prevented the English and French from executing their intentions of forming settlements among them. The Dutch, and now and then a Portuguese ship, are the only foreigners who run the hazard of trading with them; and they too under certain restrictions and precautions; such as that the king will charge himself with equitable arbitration of all disputes arising between them and his subjects, and give security for all debts they may contract. Since the last quarrel with Whidab, the trade has been so much on the decline, that the Dutch likewise had thoughts of abandoning it; and probably by this time Popo has no foreign commerce of any kind<sup>f</sup>.

- c The natives of Popo, like all other negroes on the coast, have a blind confidence in their priests. They call them Domine's, a Latin term, which they have undoubtedly borrowed from some European nation. Those African prelates are usually clothed in long white robes, and always carry in their hands a kind of episcopal crosier. All the ships that trade here pay them a sort of duty, under the appellation of a present, to encourage the negroes, by those marks of respect to their priests, to diligence in completing their cargoes. In effect, those weak and superstitious creatures, persuaded that the intercession of their priests can alone procure them the favour of the Divinity, obey whatever they desire; and the priests, finding their interest in obliging the Europeans, leave no means untried to induce them to honesty and industry, although their natural depravity generally overcomes all other motives. While they are assisting the Europeans in loading or unloading the ships, a priest stands on the shore, employed in pouring on their heads a handful of consecrated gravel, which they esteem an infallible security for their canoes in passing the dangerous bar at the mouth of the river. If any of them should have the misfortune to be lost, it is attributed to the mixture of some profane particles of sand with the consecrated. To conclude; Popo is, properly speaking, the first country which can be called a province of Ardrab. They speak the same language with little or no variation, and the form of government is directly similar<sup>g</sup>.

S E C T. III.

Containing the geography of the kingdom of Whidah, with a particular relation of its rivers, harbours, soil, climate, produce, towns, and cities. Also an account of the prodigious number of its inhabitants, the great fertility of their women: and of the government, policy, trade, laws, arts, manners, religion, and customs of the Whidans, &c.

Different names given to the kingdom of Whidah.

THIS kingdom is called Whidah by the English, the Portuguese, and the natives; Juda by the French, and Fida by the Dutch. Phillips and Snelgrave write Whidaw; Smith and Atkins Whidah; and Barbot, and some other French writers, alter the orthography to Ouida. Yet Barbot allows, that the French, for the most part, call it Juda, or Juida; but we shall not dwell upon such trifles<sup>a</sup>.

Geography of the country.

Bosman, who spent three entire months in the country, took all imaginable pains to inform himself of its exact limits; but could never learn more, than that it stretches along the shore about ten miles, its centre seven miles into the inland, after which it branches out into two arms, each of which, in some places, are ten or twelve miles broad, in others much narrower. According to Des Marchais, it begins at the distance of five or six miles from Popo, extending as many miles along the coast, situated under six degrees twenty-nine minutes north latitude. Its boundaries are on the north-west the kingdom of Popo, and on the south-east stands Ardrab. Other historians give this kingdom but six miles in circumference; others again extend it eleven or twelve miles along the coast. Upon the whole, its dimensions being so uncertain, we shall proceed to other particulars better known, and more universally assented to (A).

Rivers.

THIS country is watered by two rivers, which likewise run through the kingdom of Ardrab. The most southern is called the Jakin, and is only navigable by canoes. Its waters are of a yellowish cast, in general about three feet in depth, though in many places much shallower. The other is called the Euphrates, washing with its stream the city Ardrab, and passing at the distance of a mile from Xavier or Sabi, the capital of Whidah. It is wider and deeper than the Jakin, and, but for some banks of sand that block up the passage, would be navigable for large ships. The kings of Whidah have from time immemorial exacted a sort of custom to be paid of two Kowris or Bugis to officers stationed at these fords, without which no man is permitted to cross the river. At the mouth of this river is the port where all freight ships load and unload. It is incommodious and dangerous on account of high surfs and a swelling sea, particularly in the months of April, May, June, and July. In this season dismal accidents frequently happen; boats are overturned, goods sunk, men lost, and the ships themselves in great danger of being driven from their moorings upon the shore. The natives, indeed, are so expert in swimming, that fewer of them than of the Europeans are lost (B).

Harbour dangerous for shipping.

Strong currents and high surfs.

BESIDES this high sea, there is a strong tide running east and west, which proves extremely inconvenient, as no boat or shallop can stem it by rowing. The method they take is to punt or push them forward by long poles; a method so slow and tedious, that ships are twice as long detained in port as otherwise the trade would require. However, having once got on shore, the scene is soon changed from a dreadful swelling surf to a most beautifully enamelled meadow, covered all the year round with a fine verdure, that nothing can exceed. Round the coast the country is flat, rising by an easy and equal ascent towards the interior parts, that

(A) We cannot leave this subject without observing, that some voyagers represent Whidah or Whidaw as at present a part of the kingdom of Ardrab. But their error is manifest; for the kingdoms of Whida and Torri are situated between those of Popo and Ardrab; and Whidah borders upon the west of Great Popo, extending along the coast to Torri on the east. From Great Popo to the port of Fida the coast runs about five miles east-north-east. In this space stands the town of Oy, a quarter of a mile east of a small river that discharges itself into the sea, where an extraordinary tide and high surf render all that shore inaccessible (1).

(B) When Bosman was in this country, in 1698, a Portuguese captain, a clerk, three English sailors, and some slaves, were lost by this surf, and soon after two captains of ships were overturned in their boat, got out of the sea with great difficulty, but died in a few days. "This port, (says he) has cost the company many hundreds of pounds by the loss of goods; and doubtless it must have been more expensive to the English, who have not so good rowers (2).

(2) Bosman, Letter 18. p. 314.

a sets the landscape in full view, and presents a most pleasing and rich prospect to the shipping. The height of the ascent is bounded by a chain of mountains that defends the country from its north-east neighbours. All the Europeans who have been in Whidah speak of the country with raptures, and extol it as the most beautiful in the world. The trees are strait, tall, and dispersed in the most regular order, which present to the eye fine long groves and avenues, clear of all brush-wood and weeds. The verdure of the meadows, the richness of the fields, cloathed with three different kinds of corn, beans, roots, and fruits, and the multitude of houses, with a dimpling stream, murmuring down the declivity to the sea, form the most delightful prospect that fancy can picture to itself. Every inch of ground is converted into use, except those places designed by nature for pleasure, where the woods spring up spontaneously in the most exquisite rural simplicity. A perpetual spring and autumn succeed each other; for no sooner has the husbandman cut his corn, than he again plows and sows the ground; yet is it not worn out; the next crop puts forth with the same vigour as the former, as if nature here were inexhaustible. Unquestionably certain it is, that the kingdom of Whidah is so populous, that one single village contains as many inhabitants as several intire kingdoms on the coast of Guiney; and yet they stand so close, that one is amazed how the most fertile land on earth can supply the number of people contained in so small a compass. One may compare the whole kingdom to a great city, divided by gardens, lawns, and groves, instead of streets; not a village in Whidah being a musket-shot distant from another. Some are the king's, some the viceroy's villages, and others are built and peopled by particular private families. The former are the largest and best built; but the latter the best cultivated; if there be any difference in a country so uniformly rich and beautiful. In a word, it is the true image of what the poets sing of the Elysian fields; and, to speak all its perfections, though the authority is undeniable, would appear to the reader as if we indulged a warm imagination at the expence of strict historical truth (C).

The extreme beauty and fertility of the country.

The prodigious number of the inhabitants.

NOTWITHSTANDING the small extent of this kingdom, it is divided into twenty-six provinces, which take their names from their capital towns. Those small states are distributed among the chief lords of the kingdom, and become hereditary in their families. The king of Whidah, who is only their chief, presides particularly in the province of Sabi, or Xavier, that is, the principal province of the kingdom, as the city of the same name is the capital of the whole (D).

Its division into 26 provinces.

In the capital Xavier, or Sabi, a great market is held every fourth day, in the different streets of the city. In the other towns of the provinces they keep an Aploga, as they term it, or a fair, where one seldom sees fewer than six thousand merchants. At Sabi the greatest market held in each of the provinces.

d DES MARCHAIS, tom. ii. part v. p. 18.

(C) Bosman, who resided on the spot, speaks of it in the terms we have related. The whole country, he says, from the sea to its extreme limits towards the inland, strikes the eye like an amphitheatre adorned with nature's gayest colours. Phillips, who made a voyage thither, declares with admiration, that the kingdom of Whidah is the most delightful spot in the universe, composed of the most beautiful sloping meadows, watered with the finest rivulets, adorned with groves of exquisite fruits, lemons, oranges, pine apples, &c. and supplied with the greatest abundance of fish, fowls, and cattle, of any country in the world. Des Marchais is no less profuse in his encomiums. He enumerates several particulars omitted by other writers, each of them culling different beauties; insomuch that one would imagine they were either describing different places, or that Whidah was an epitome of every thing excellent in nature.

(D) As Des Marchais has favoured us with the names of these provinces, cities, and the quality of their governors, the recital may be deserving of a note.

These provinces we have specified, because their names are no where to be met with besides in Des Marchais, now a work scarce and almost out of print; and also because they afford a specimen of the Whidah language, which appears to be by no means harsh and unmusical. One would be amazed to see how so pretty a kingdom should be divided into such a variety of little sovereignties, each of them not so large as a considerable city, and yet containing within their jurisdiction each an infinite number of villages (3).

(3) Des Marchais, tom. ii. p. 18.

kets are on Wednesday and Saturday. To prevent confusion, and the disturbance that might arise in the city from such a multitude of people, the market is removed at a mile's distance from the walls, to a fine large plain, several parts of which are adorned with groves of tufted trees, which afford a refreshing shade to the people, half stifled in the croud, and scorched under the burning heat of the sun. Here the king's women attend to sell their cloths, and their other manufactures. These fairs and markets are regulated with so much care and prudence, that nothing contrary to law is ever committed. All sorts of merchandize are here collected; and those who have brought goods are permitted to take what time they please to dispose of them, but without fraud or noise. A judge, attended by four officers armed, is appointed by the king for the inspection of all goods, to hear and determine all grievances, complaints, and disputes. To oppress liberty, and sell for a slave the man born free, is a crime of a black complexion, and always punished with death <sup>c</sup>.

Account of the great market at Xavier, the capital.

THE market-place is surrounded with sutlers booths, and places of refreshment, for the convenience of the people. They are only permitted to sell certain sorts of meat, as beef, pork, goats and dogs flesh. Other booths are kept by women, who sell maize, millet, rice, and corn bread. Other shops sell Pito, or a kind of pleasant, wholesome, and very refreshing beer. Palm wine, aqua vitæ, and spirits which they have from the Europeans, are kept in other shops, with restrictions on the sale, to prevent drunkenness and riot. Here slaves of both sexes are bought and sold; also oxen, sheep, dogs, hogs, fish, and birds of all kinds. Woollen cloths, linen, silks, calicoes of European and Indian manufacture, they have in great abundance; likewise hard-ware, china and glass of all sorts, gold in dust and ingots, iron in bars, lead in sheets, and every thing of European, Asiatic, or African production, is here found at a reasonable price. The chief commodities of Whidan manufacture are cloths, umbrellas, baskets, pitchers for pito or beer, plates and dishes of wood, gourds finely ornamented, white and blue paper, pepper, palm oil, salt, Kan-kis, and other commodities <sup>f</sup>.

The slave trade carried on by the men, all the other branches by the women.

THE slave trade is conducted by the men, all other things are sold by the women. Our greatest merchants might here receive useful lessons from those diligent and alert negroes, both in the art of selling and of reckoning. Here they rely solely upon their own address and vigilance, making no account of good or ill fortune, which they think the necessary result of a man's own conduct. The money used in all bargains is gold-dust, which they reckon up with great dexterity, as every thing is sold by prompt payment. Bujis, which the French by corruption call Bauges, pass frequently for money, at their fairs in the country. This is a small white shell, of the size and shape of an olive. In the kingdoms of Whidab and Ardrab these Bujis serve equally for dress and money, for ornament and use. They pierce each shell with an iron made for the purpose; forty of them they string upon a cord which they call Scuze, and the Portuguese Toquos. Five of these strings compose what the Portuguese call a Gallinba, and the negroes a Fore. By these the exchange of gold-dust is rated, and the price of slaves determined. <sup>d</sup>

THE Europeans, the nobility of Whidab, and all the rich negroes, are carried, when they go abroad, in hammocks or litters on the shoulders of slaves. The contrivance of these is ingenious, and an excellent defence against the heat of the climate, which, says Phillips, is so great, that an European could not walk a mile in the middle of the day without fatiguing, and exposing himself to great danger. <sup>e</sup>

Qualities of the natives.

BOSMAN says, that the inhabitants of Whidab exceed all the negroes he had seen, both in good and bad qualities. All ranks and degrees of them treat the Europeans with extreme civility, courtesy, and respect. Other negroes are eternally soliciting presents; the Whidans had rather give than receive. When the Europeans trade with them, they expect they should return thanks for the obligation; but their making a present to a white man they value as nothing, and are displeased at any acknowledgement for a thing so trifling. They have an obliging engaging manner of addressing each other, and a degree of subordinate respect proportioned to the quality of the person, that greatly astonished Bosman, among a rude people, as he first imagined them to be <sup>e</sup>. When any one visits or accidentally meets his superior, he immediately drops upon his knees, kisses the earth three times, claps his hands, and wishes him a good day or good night, which the other returns in the posture in which he then happens to be, by gently clapping his hand, and wishing him the same. The other all this while remains sitting, or prostrate on the earth, till the superior departs, unless some urgent business calls him, in which case he makes his apology in the most submissive terms. The same respect is shewn to the elder brother by the younger, to fathers by their children, and by women to their husbands. Every thing is delivered to, or received from, a superior on the knee. Women do the same to their husbands, adding, what is esteemed a mark of still more pro-

- a found respect, the clapping together of both hands. When persons of equal condition meet, they each fall down, clap their hands, and mutually salute; the same ceremonies being nicely observed and imitated by their several attendants, a whole retinue of 100 persons being down at once on their knees, which might easily be mistaken for some public act of devotion. If a superior sneezes, every one round him falls upon their knees, clap their hands, and wish him happiness. In a word, no part of the world is more polite in the external ceremonies than the kingdom of Whidab. How a nation, confined to so small a spot of ground, should differ so far in manners from the surrounding kingdoms with which they have a constant intercourse, is not so easily accounted for<sup>a</sup>. One would be led to think that this happy little people have a soil, a climate, and a nature peculiar to themselves, and differing from those distant but a few miles from them (E). The natives of Whidab are in general tall; well-made, strait, and robust. Their complexion is black, but not so jet and glossy as those of the Gold Coast, and still less than those of Senegal and the river Gambia. They excel all other negroes in industry Their industry and commerce. and vigilance. Idleness is the favourite vice of the Africans in general; here, on the contrary, both sexes are so laborious and diligent, that they never desist till they have finished their undertaking; carrying the same spirit of perseverance into every action of their lives<sup>1</sup>.
- BESIDES agriculture, from which only the king and a few persons of the first distinction are exempted, they employ themselves in several kinds of manufactures. They spin cotton yarn, weave fine cotton cloths, make calabasses, wooden vessels, plates, and dishes; likewise assaygaves, smiths work, &c. in greater perfection than any other people on the coast. Whilst the men are thus employed, the women brew pito, and dress provisions, which, with their husbands merchandize, they carry for sale to market. Both men and women are employed in search of gain, and their emulation is equal to their industry. Hence it is that they live well, nay splendidly, when compared with the other negroes of the coast. Labour is cheap here, the profits solely arising from the unwearied industry of the labourer; a common porter will run all day long with a burthen of an hundred weight upon his head<sup>k</sup>.
- SEVERAL travellers have not unjustly compared the manners of this people to the Chinese. Resemble the Chinese in certain peculiarities. The same laborious industry, ceremonious civility; jealous affection to their women, and thievish inclinations in trade, prevail (F). Their external respect likewise to strangers has a resemblance. If the Whidabians meet an European twenty times in a day, the same train of ceremonies is repeated, the neglect of which is punished with a fine. The late king of Whidab carried this consideration of foreigners to such a height, that one of his principal officers was beheaded for presuming to lift his cane in a menacing manner over the head of a Frenchman. The chief director of that nation used all his influence to mitigate the punishment; but the king was inexorable, nor could any thing less than his life atone for so heinous a crime as a breach of hospitality<sup>l</sup>.
- THE women till the land for their husbands, unless they happen to be very beautiful; in this case they are maintained at home with all the pomp of eastern nations, but with the loss of liberty also. They are never permitted to go abroad, but in company with their husbands, and close shut up in their Hamars, nor can they receive any male visitors at home. The servile condition of the women. Upon the least jealousy or suspicion, they are sold by their husbands to the Europeans. If in this country one person debauches the wife of another, he must himself not only suffer death, but his whole family are involved in the consequences of his guilt. Touching the body, even accidentally, of any of the king's women, is often punished with death, always with the loss of liberty; it is usual, therefore, with all employed about the palace, to keep continually calling out, as a warning to the women that a man is in the way. For this reason it is, that the king is wholly attended by women, no man being permitted to enter the walls of the palace, unless to repair it, in which case the women are removed to some distant part. When

(E) Atkins takes notice of a singular piece of decency and politeness that prevails among them in the more uncleanly offices of life. Both sexes accompany each other upon those natural calls; but if the modesty of the woman is offended at any indiscretion on the man's side, in exposing parts which ought to be concealed, she has the privilege of mulcting him in what sum she thinks proper, p. 112.

(F) Perhaps, in the ceremonials of public visits among persons of distinction, they even exceed the Chinese. When a person of some quality at Whidab proposes visiting his superior, he first sends to know when he may be waited upon. Having obtained permission, he sets out at the time appointed with a retinue of all his friends and domestics, accompanied with music of all kinds. All his attendants precede him while he is carried in a hamoc, or sedan, on the shoulders of his slaves in the rear. When he arrives at the house, he alights, and is received by the servants of the great man; the music ceases, and the whole retinue prostrate themselves on the ground. The servants of the house put themselves in the same posture, and all the contest is, who shall carry their politeness to the highest pitch of ceremony (4).

(4) Des Marchais, vol. ii. p. 182.

the women go into the fields for pleasure, which they frequently do some hundreds at a time; upon seeing a man, they call out, “Stand clear;” upon which he falls upon his face, continuing in that posture till they are passed by; for the slightest look would be criminal. On the smallest disgust his majesty sells 18 or 20 women, which by no means diminishes the number of his seraglio, their places being immediately filled up by fresh virgins provided by the proper officers. When a lady is presented to the king, he does her the honour of passing two or three evenings with her; after which, she lives the remainder of her life with the chastity of a nun. Hence the women are so little desirous of being brought to the seraglio, that many of them prefer death. An instance of this kind happened about the time that Bosman resided in the country. The officers endeavoured to bring to the Harem a lady of great beauty, whose shyness they at first attributed to a virgin modesty. When she found they persisted in urging her, she fled from them; and they pursuing, to avoid servitude, she flung herself into a deep well, where she was drowned <sup>m</sup>.

exceedingly prolific.

THE women here are exceedingly prolific, and the men vigorous and warm in their constitution. In proof of the fertility of the one, and the powers of the other, Bosman relates, that the king assured him, before his whole court, that one of his viceroys, who had lately triumphed over the enemies of Whidah, had in his army two thousand of his lineal offspring, sons, grandsons, and their children. He has frequently seen fathers who had upwards of 200 children. Upon interrogating a certain captain of the guards concerning the number of his family, he replied with a sigh, that he was unhappy in that particular, not having above seventy living. Bosman then asked him, how many had died, and he answered seventy. Thus a family of 140 children is by no means looked upon as extraordinary <sup>n</sup>.

THE natives of Whidah dress better and more sumptuously than any other nation on the coast; but they are unacquainted with the use of gold and silver ornaments, their country producing none of the precious metals. They wear five or six different suits at a time, the uppermost being seven or eight yards long, which they wrap round them in a decent and becoming manner. None are permitted to wear red besides the royal family, but all other colours are free. Nor are the women short of the men in the multitude of clothes which they heap over each other. Their dress is becoming, but less decent than that of the other sex. Behind, their gowns are long and genteel, but before, loose and open, insomuch that many accidents occasion the discovery of parts which modesty and nature require should be concealed. It is alleged by the men, that this fashion was the invention of the women, for which doubtless they had their reasons. Men, women, and children, have their heads close shaved, in which manner they go abroad under rain, wind, or the burning heat of the sun, without the smallest inconvenience: custom renders it familiar, and the practice hardens their constitutions. Phillips affirms, that the women all go naked till marriage, and that this is a mark of their virginity; but this assertion is confirmed by no other author. “Habit,” says he, “renders them so insensible of this indecency, that I have seen two hundred of them all together in that situation. Of this circumstance the young fellows take all manner of advantage, treating them with the freedom that may be expected among young people let loose together. This custom, we imagine, has been instituted for serious purposes, to secure the peace and happiness of the connubial state, by making the parties acquainted with each others excellencies before they were joined in marriage.” This, however, is not only unsupported by other authorities, but contradicts what the author before advanced, that nakedness is a mark of real virginity; since a woman boasts of losing that appellation before marriage, and, by his account, actually perfects her pretensions.

DES MARCHAIS differs widely from Bosman’s account of the Whidan dress. He treats this particular very explicitly; but how truly, must be submitted to those who have resided there. The royal dress, and that of the nobility, differ in nothing; but their form and value is unlike that of the lower class. Besides, he affirms, that the great wear bracelets and collars of pearls, gold, and coral; also chains of gold and silver. Their heads are sometimes bare; but, in general, covered with an European hat and feather. The same distinctions hold among the ladies.

or division of

The Whidans
expert arithmeticians.

BEFORE we close this section, we shall remark, that the Whidans are to a degree rude and ignorant in some particulars. They have no equation of time; no distinction of hours, days, weeks, or stated periods. They know the sowing time by the moon, or rather they sow as soon as they have reaped; and their markets they keep every third day: no other stated festivals of any kind being known. However, without pen, ink, or the assistance of an artificial arithmetic, they calculate the largest sums with great accuracy, state shares with great exactness, and perform the operations not only of the first elements, but of the more complex rules of arithmetic, with a quickness that exceeds the most expert European arithmetician. Des Marchais alleges, that the wisest among them cannot tell you his age. If you ask, when a such a man was born, he tells you, it was about the time that such a ship, or such an European factor, came to Whidah. From hence we may infer, that their history goes no higher among them than the living generation <sup>2</sup>.

But one of the surest characteristics of a Whidassian is his propensity to steal; in which they are infinitely more adroit than any other negroes. On many occasions their address and refinement in this art are so great, that one would willingly sustain a moderate loss for the sake of the experiment. When Bosman was honoured with an audience of the king, his majesty told him, "that his subjects were not like those of Ardrab, and other neighbouring kingdoms, where, on the least umbrage they would poison an European. This," continues he, "you have no reason to apprehend; but I would have you take particular care of your goods; for my people are born expert thieves, and will steal from you while you are looking at them." This intelligence of the king was soon proved in numberless instances, in which Bosman was a sufferer by their art. It is a vice ingrafted in their nature, that, excepting two or three great persons, has seized all ranks of men throughout the nation. There is no security against their pilfering; locks and stone walls are nothing. Bosman says, that an English captain had put a sum of bujis, the money of the country, into barrels; but while the sailors were carrying them on their heads to the sea-side, the natives made shift to penetrate the barrels; and ease the sailors of their load, by carrying off a great number of bujis, and all this unobserved. If complaint is made to the king, he orders the offender to be punished; but then no retribution is made, nor dare any one inform against the guilty, who is protected by the king's eldest son, a sharer in the general plunder; upon which he has a certain tax <sup>3</sup>.

S E C T. IV.

Of their polygamy, nuptial ceremonies, circumcision, husband's prerogative, respect to parents, rules of inheritance, music, air, diseases, burials, religion, Fetiches, and especially of their snake-worship, of which the reader will find an explicit account, with several other particulars.

d IN general the customs of the Whidassians have a strong resemblance to those of the Gold Coast negroes, except in the articles of religion, and the grounds of their manners. As excess permits to women, while the latter content themselves with one, two, or three, and the persons of the highest quality are prohibited from exceeding twenty wives, the Whidassians, even the poorest, have forty or fifty women. The great men keep three or four hundred, frequently twice that number, and the king four or five thousand, but seldom fewer than three thousand. No people on earth perform the connubial rites with less ceremony. All bargains, contracts, jointures, and portions, are intirely unknown to them. The negroes of the other coasts purchase their women with cattle, fish, and other commodities; they are permitted to dismiss her, if she proves not a virgin: here the practice is directly contrary, and their ideas totally different. As a fertile womb is highly prized in Whidah, she who has given proofs before marriage of her fruitfulness is always preferred; but it costs nothing to obtain her. When a man likes a girl, he demands her of the parents, who never refuse their consent, provided she be of a marriageable age. Custom requires that the parents conduct her to the house of the bridegroom. On her arrival he presents her with a new dress, which is probably all she possesses; for every thing else she leaves behind in her father's house. The husband then kills a sheep, which he eats in company with his wife and her parents; which is the only time in her life that she is admitted to this honour. Some tankards of pito are drank, the parents return home, and the marriage is concluded without any other ceremony. A custom truly primitive and prudent in many particulars <sup>2</sup>.

e A HUSBAND is permitted to repudiate his wife with as little ceremony as he marries her. He only thrusts her out of the door, and the separation is legal; but then it must be upon certain proofs of her incontinence. He also must pay the parents a sum double of the expence of the wedding; a custom, says Labat, that, if introduced into Europe, would prevent so many wretched marriages. Another law, no less severe upon the women, is a strict prohibition, under pain of death or slavery, to enter the palace or the house of a great man, during their catamenia. Des Marchais is persuaded that the Whidassians borrow this custom from the

Jews. No sooner do they perceive themselves in those circumstances than they quit the house, and avoid all communication, and even the sight of men. Every family has a house where the women retire during that period, under the care of an antient matron. Here they remain till they have washed and purified themselves; after which they return to their husbands; and yet, what is very extraordinary, in spite of all these severe restrictions, the women of Whidab had rather not live than avoid intrigues. No women are more addicted to this sort of gaiety, for which they will run all hazards. This is a country, says Des Marchais, that furnishes the richest materials for the annals of gallantry <sup>b</sup>.

used.

ALL their children, male and female, are circumcised in the manner we have mentioned in our account of Benin. Whence they derived this custom, none of them can tell; their usual answer being, that they had it from their ancestors. This operation is performed at no certain age. Some undergo it at four, some at five, six, to ten years of age. Smith observes, that it is common to see in one family 200 little children at play. He has known a man become the father of a dozen children in one day <sup>c</sup>. Hence arises the wealth of the parent, who has the power of disposing of them as slaves; which he commonly does, reserving only the eldest child. Thus this little kingdom can furnish a thousand slaves in the space of a month. In this particular Des Marchais contradicts all the other writers on this subject. He affirms, that no people on earth shew greater indulgence, tenderness, and affection, for their children. They sell their women he allows; but they make a wide difference between their wives and their children. The former are properly and by right their slaves; but as for their children, although they are born of a mother that is a slave, yet are they free. No difference is made between their legitimate and natural children. Here the Whidan law, says the same author, corresponds with the Jewish, and is equally binding to the prince, and to the meanest of his subjects; on the other hand, the veneration in which children hold their parents is extreme. They never address them but on their knees; and the women are subjected to the same humiliation, all except the Betas or priestesses. In this case, the law is reversed, and those sacred dames exact the same submission from their husbands, as they do from their wives.

The husbands

Great respect

Ceremonies of address the same among the women as the men.

THE younger children pay great respect to the elder brother, and any deficiency here is punishable by a fine at the pleasure of the brother; but little regard is paid to the mother. Among the women, the ceremonies of address are the same we have mentioned of the men, making an allowance for the natural taste and refinement of the sex, which carries their politeness to a great length <sup>d</sup>.

The eldest son succeeds to the effects and wives of his father.

AT the death of a father, the eldest son inherits not only his effects, but also his women; with whom, from that day, he lives in quality of husband. His own mother is excepted, who now is her own mistress, has a house appointed her, and a certain fortune for her subsistence. This custom prevails as well in the palace royal, as among the people. But subjects were never permitted to burn the house and sacrifice the women, as had once been customary in the king's family.

The great excess to which their natives carry games hazard.

THE extraordinary industry with which the Whidanese apply to commerce and agriculture, does not destroy their taste for pleasure. They will frequently hazard all they are worth at play; and after having lost their money and effects, will stake their wives, and even their children; nay sometimes themselves. So many disorders resulted from this passion, that the late king prohibited all games at hazard upon pain of death. This law, however, died with him, and now gaming is as fashionable and as pernicious as ever. Some of those games are extremely ingenious, that in particular called Atropoe, or the six bujis, has in the contrivance something peculiarly pretty and artful. They have besides games for exercise and trials of strength, activity, and courage. Their musick is much the best of any to be met with in those countries. One instrument, that resembles a harp, is really musical. It is strung with reeds of different sizes, which they touch with great dexterity, accompany with a sweet voice, and dance to their own musick in exact time, and with an agreeable air and manner. They have likewise a kind of kettle-drums and trumpets, which they use in war; besides flutes and several wind instruments <sup>e</sup>.

The musick of
the Whidans.

Malignity of the air.

THIS country has its peculiar diseases, as well as its games and pleasures. According to Smith, the air is infected with qualities of a contagious and malignant nature. Tradition affirms, that it received this noxious disposition since the ravages of the Dahomay monarch had almost depopulated the kingdom, and left those lands uncultivated. Then sprung up a quantity of poisonous herbs, the exhalations from which tainted the air. This malignity of the air, says Des Marchais, is discoverable from the dew that falls before sun-rise, which instantly breeds a number of insects, in shape resembling lizards, serpents, and toads; but the heat of the sun dries and annihilates them, almost as soon as they have existence. This bad quality of the air produces violent effects, chiefly among the Europeans, and the only preventives are, keeping out of the night air; or, if necessity requires exposing one's self, wrap-

- a ping the head and body warm, keeping the mouth as much shut as possible, and if possible, avoiding every kind of hard labour during the heat of the day. The negroes are accustomed to bear the strongest heat of the sun upon their bare heads; but the experiment always proves dangerous to an European, producing ardent fevers, accompanied with a delirium, that usually carries the patient off in three days. These fevers, which may be termed endemial, prove most dangerous, and indeed always mortal, in the months of June, July, and August. They begin with cold shiverings and sweats, excruciating pains in the head and loins, hæmorrhages at the nose, a violent throbbing of the heart, a thirst that is insupportable, a dry parched tongue, which in a few hours becomes quite black; with other violent symptoms. Des Marchais is particular in the method of cure, and as particular in forbidding phlebotomy in the first stage of the disorder; though one would imagine that all the symptoms, and especially the hæmorrhage, indicated this operation. Dysenteries are likewise frequent and fatal in Whidah.

- THE natives are diligent in the use of medicines, and offerings to their gods, for the recovery of the sick. So fearful are they of death, that they cannot support the sound of the word, without visible emotion; and it is death to pronounce it upon any occasion before the king. Bosman relates, that in his first voyage to this country, he waited before his departure on the king, who owed him an hundred pounds. At taking leave, he asked the monarch who should pay him on his return, in case he died? All the by-standers were shocked at the question (and indeed it carried with it true Dutch bluntness); but the king, who spoke a little Portuguese, told him, "not to give himself any concern about that, for he should always live." The Dutchman perceived his error, took his leave abruptly and departed. On his return, he so frequently raillied them upon their weak fears, that in time the word grew familiar to the better sort; and the king, who was a jovial fellow, used to repeat it as frequently as any of them. But the people of meaner rank retained their old apprehensions, which nothing could remove. In general, the most violent prejudices accompany the blindest ignorance.

- THE burying-place of the kings and nobles is in a gallery, which the sons erect for their fathers. Here the body is laid in the very middle of the vault, and with it the buckler, sword, bow and arrows of the deceased. But though guns and pistols are used in the country, they are never laid in the tomb. A custom inviolably preserved by the heir, is, to mourn for an entire year, during which period he roams about, secludes himself from society, quits his usual attire, his bracelets, chains, and rings; and though at full liberty to enter upon his estate from the day of his father's death, yet so strong is affection, grief, or prejudice, that he firmly and steadily pursues a custom, which at least has a great appearance of decency.

- As to religion, Bosman is of opinion, that the piety of this country is founded upon no other principles than those of interest and superstition. In the latter they exceed all other nations; "for allowing," says he, "the ancient heathens to value themselves upon thirty thousand deities, I dare venture to affirm, that the natives of Whidah may lay just claim to four times that number." However, he believes that they have a faint idea of the One True God, to whom they attribute omnipotence and ubiquity. They believe that a being exists, the Creator of the universe, to whom of consequence their Fetiches are inferior; the thing made, to the maker: but they neither pray nor sacrifice to this being. He is, say they, too highly exalted to take any concern about them; and the government of the world he leaves to the Fetiches. To these, as the mediators between God and them, they apply themselves. It appears, therefore, that they look upon their Fetiches as mere corporeal substances, but endowed by the Supreme Being with certain powers useful to mankind: an apology of a similar nature with what superstitious Roman catholics make for their images.

- ACCORDING to Des Marchais, the more sensible Whidans believe in one spiritual God, who punishes vice, and rewards virtue; who causes the heavens to thunder, the clouds to rain, the sky to lighten, and the sun to shine. His residence is in the heavens, whence with infinite justice and goodness he governs the world. With such sentiments as these, one would think the zeal of the missionaries were unnecessary. They have confused notions of hell, the devil, and of departed spirits. The former they call a subterraneous abode, where the wicked are punished by fire; and this opinion has been confirmed among them by the arrival of a certain sorcerer (probably a missionary), who pretended to have come from thence. There, he affirmed, he saw several persons of the court, whom he had formerly known, and particularly the late prime minister.

The just notions they have of the Supreme Being.

- BOSMAN relates the following story, which shews the opinion the more sensible natives entertain of their idolatry. He once asked a negroe, with whom he was intimate, how they performed their divine worship, and what number of gods they might have? The negroe smiling, assured him that the question greatly perplexed him ; for that no man in the country could a give the exact estimate. Bosman replied, that only three gods were acknowledged by them, he therefore requested that he might have some account of the private deities. To this, the negroe favoured him with the following answer. “ The number of our gods,” says he, “ is infinite. When we undertake any thing arduous and important, we first look out for a “ fit deity to prosper the enterprize. Going out of doors with this view, we take the first “ creature that presents itself, whether dog, cat, or the most contemptible reptile, for a god ; “ nay, often inanimate things, as a stone or tree. To this we present an offering, accom- “ panied with a solemn vow, that if the god will favour our designs, we will henceforward “ worship him. If accordingly we succeed, we attribute it to the influence of this new chosen “ deity, and pay our vow religiously ; if on the contrary we are disappointed, the god is b “ rejected, and his worship neglected. Thus we make and unmake our gods ; we are their “ masters and servants ; their number depends on our fortune, and perhaps their worship to “ our folly.” Bosman, however, attributes this just manner of thinking to his having con- versed much with the French, whose language he spoke perfectly <sup>1</sup>.

Their Fetiches

and the sea.

Worship of the snake, and cunning of the priests.

Description of the snake.

THE Fetiches of Whidah may be divided into three classes, the serpent, tall trees, and the sea ; they sometimes add a fourth, namely, the chief river of the kingdom, the Euphrates. The serpent is the most celebrated and honoured, the other two being subordinate to the power of this deity. The snake they invoke in extreme wet, dry, or barren seasons ; on all occasions relating to their government, civil policy, and cattle ; in a word, on all the great diffi- culties and occurrences of life. For this reason rich offerings are made to it, especially by the king, at the instigation of the priests, and persuasions of the courtiers, who reap the benefit of his devotion. Those offerings usually consist of money, pieces of rich silks and stuffs, all sorts of European and African commodities, live cattle, and elegant entertainments of all kinds of the best food. This snake has a large round head, beautifully piercing eyes, a short pointed tongue, resembling a dart ; its pace slow and solemn, except when it seizes on its prey, then quick and rapid ; its tail sharp and short ; its skin of an elegant smoothness, adorned with beautiful colours, upon a light-grey ground. It is amazingly tame and familiar, permit- ting itself to be approached and even handled. The largest that Des Marchais had seen was about a yard long, and as thick as a man's arm. He adds, that they are extremely fond of rats flesh, and seem no less delighted with the chase than with the food. When they have d tired their prey and themselves, they then kill and eat it ; an employment that holds them long, as their gullet is remarkably narrow. When the snake chances to be on the top of a house, he is unable to disengage himself with the agility necessary for seizing on the rat. Of this, as our author assures us, the latter appears to be sensible ; for he has frequently seen a rat pass and repass in a sportive manner before the snake, as if it played with his embarrassment <sup>k</sup>.

The snake an
animal.

THESE snakes have a mortal antipathy to all venomous serpents. They attack them where- ever they find them, as if they had a pleasure in delivering mankind from their poison. The Europeans themselves find no difficulty in familiarizing themselves to those inoffensive animals, with which they play without any dread or apprehension of danger. There is no fear of mistaking them for the poisonous serpent, the colour and size sufficiently distinguishing them. e The negroes entertain a notion that the first progenitor of this race of snakes is still living, and grown to an enormous bulk <sup>l</sup>.

Their notions concerning the origin of this worship.

THE worship of this snake the negroes allege to be of a very ancient date. According to them, they quitted another country where the people pretended to worship them, but were in truth unworthy of their sacred protection, on account of their vices and crimes. The Whidanesse, charmed with the preference given to them, received them with incredible marks of respect, and an hearty welcome. They carried them on a silken carpet to a temple, and paid them a worship due to their divinity. Certain it is, that the snake was worshipped first at Ardrab, though the date of this worship in either kingdom is uncertain. As the first temple in which it was placed was thought too mean for the residence of so respectable a deity, a reso- lution was formed to erect one more worthy of its dignity. A revenue was appointed for its support, with pontiffs and priests to attend it. Every year a certain number of beautiful virgins are consecrated to it. What is very remarkable is, that the natives believe this to be the very snake which their ancestors carried with them, when they gained a great victory over their enemies <sup>m</sup>.

THE posterity of this noble animal is grown numerous, but nothing degenerated from the virtues of their ancestor. Although this chieftain snake be the most honoured, yet all the rest are likewise worshipped, fed, and fondled by the negroes. No insult or injury dare be com- mitted to it, under pain of death, by a native ; and even an European, who would be so hardy as to pass an affront on the deity, would run hazards from his votaries. Of this the English g a had a tragical instance, as is affirmed by the concurring testimonies of Barbot and Bosman. Tragical accident which befel the English, for having killed a snake. When the English first settled in Whidab, the captain having unshipped his goods on the shore, the sailors found at night one of those snakes in their magazine, which they ignorantly killed and threw upon the bank, without dreaming of any bad consequences. The negroes, who soon discovered the sacrilege, and had it confirmed by the acknowledgement of the English, were not long in avenging the horrid impiety, by a method no less horrible. All the inhabitants of the province assembled. They attacked the English, massacred them all to a man, and consumed their bodies and goods in the fire they had set to the warehouse.

b THE kings of Whidab used formerly to make annual processions to the Snake Temple. These Rich offerings were celebrated with great magnificence, and terminated with rich offerings. Presents of great value were not only made to the deity and his priests, but to the nobility that assisted at the solemnity. The present king has broke through the custom of making this procession; and indeed seems tired of offerings attended with so great an expence, and so little advantage. This, Bosman says, he had once an opportunity of observing. Finding him one day in a violent rage, he took the liberty of enquiring into the occasion of his majesty's passion. To this he frankly replied, "that he had this year sent much richer offerings than usual to the snake, in hopes of obtaining a good harvest: that his viceroys urged him to make farther offerings, and the priests threatened him with a barren year if he refused to comply. However," says he, "I have no intention of doing it: for if the snake will not grant a good year, he may let it alone: he will suffer with me. He cannot hurt me more than he has done, by emptying my coffers, and yet letting my corn rot." c THE king's expences in supporting the snake's household, and making him offerings, are, however, in some measure reimbursed by the revenue he draws upon his account. The manner of raising this revenue is this: annually, from the time the maize or corn is laid in the ground till it grows to a great height, the natives imagine, that, during this interval, the snakes make it their business every night to seize all the beautiful young virgins they can meet with, and to make them delirious. Their parents then send them to a house appointed for their cure, where they are kept at a great expence for months, under the direction of the knavish priests; who fail not of making all possible advantage of the parents simplicity. The time thought necessary for their confinement being expired, and the pretended cure completed, they are dismissed; the parents first paying the charges of board and fees of the house. These are proportioned to the circumstances of the patient, and seldom amount to less than five pounds. As the number of girls throughout the kingdom who have passed this operation amounts to several thousands, we may believe the revenue drawn from a practice, foolish only on the side of the people, is very considerable. The rich pay liberally. Most villages have an hospital, and the towns three or four each. Bosman says, that the whole booty is divided between the king and the priests. He tells us, that the people strenuously endeavour to persuade him a snake was able to carry a girl away against her will, and in spite of all the bolts and bars with which they were able to secure her. The method of dedicating virgins to the snake. The truth, however, is, that the priests diligently watch those young women who have never been in the hospital. These they first attempt by liberal promises, and if these fail, by menaces; denouncing terrible execrations against them, if they persist in refusing to comply. After they have persuaded the girl into their opinion, they order her to embrace the opportunity at night, when the way is clear, and immediately fall a screaming and howling, as if the snake had laid hold of her, and was carrying her off. Before relief can arrive, the snake is vanished, and the girl delirious, which obliges the parents to send her to the lazaretto.

The influence which those sacerdotal knaves gain over the understanding, is really amazing. By the time the girls obtain their liberty, they seem almost persuaded of the reality of the cheat contrived by the priests, and convinced, that their brain had been actually disordered, and their person seized by the snake. However, to secure them against revealing the fraud, the priest never fails to threaten with the most signal vengeance, if they ever betray the smallest circumstance. Their menaces they have been known to execute; and women, who have blabbed the secret, have next day been found buried alive.

f THE daughter of the present king had been seized by the snake, Bosman thinks, by his own orders. She was conducted to the snake-house, where she committed all manner of extravagancies, while the music of certain instruments appointed to attend her was performing. The king's daughter confined in the hospital. She was visited by the most considerable persons of the kingdom, each bringing her presents worthy of her quality: a booty shared between the barbarous father and the priests. Her confinement was not so long as the usual time; but her madness, say the negroes, must work out its destined period. Some, however of the more intelligent, seem to look upon the whole as a pious and political cheat; but they find their security in professing their ignorance.

Those who have been hardy enough to shew their sagacity, have forfeited their lives. An instance of this kind happened while Bosman was in the country. A negroe, born on the Gold Coast, lived at Whidah, and by his address, obliging carriage and conduct, arrived at the dignity of captain, and interpreter to the English. This man had married a woman of Whidah, who being seized by the snake, pretended to be delirious; upon which her husband, ignorant of the custom of the country, clapt her in chains, instead of sending her to the hospital. The woman, enraged, complained to the priests, who had him poisoned in a few days; not caring either to let him escape unpunished, or to execute public vengeance upon him, as his fault proceeded from his ignorance. Hence, says Bosman, you see how dangerous a thing it is to fall under the censure of ecclesiastics, even in the remotest parts of the world <sup>a</sup>.

by Bosman.

ANIMALS of all kinds are punished with death for injuring a snake. In 1697, a hog, that had been teased by one of them, gnashed and devoured it with his teeth. The priests carrying their complaint to the king, and no one presuming to appear as counsel for the hogs, a warrant was obtained for a general slaughter of them all over the kingdom. A thousand negroes, armed with cutlasses, began the bloody execution; and the whole race of hogs would have been extirpated, without remorse or feeling, had not the king, who was not of a cruel disposition, put a stop to the bloody scene, by representing to the priests, that they ought to rest satisfied with the vengeance they had taken. With this care and attendance these ridiculous deities multiply so fast, that the kingdom swarms with them. They are become a perfect nuisance, from their number and familiarity. In hot weather they come into the houses of the Europeans, five or six at a time, and creep up the chairs, benches, tables, and the beds; in which last they sometimes continue several days, and till they have brought forth young. Yet such is the veneration in which the natives hold them, that it would be running the utmost hazard to attempt to dislodge them. Bosman relates, that a snake had taken up its habitation on a beam directly over the table where he used to eat. Here it continued for a fortnight, to his great uneasiness. But though it was within reach, no one durst presume to touch, much less to remove it. Some days after, Bosman had the chief persons of the court at dinner with him. Speaking of snakes, he turned his eyes to that above their heads, and remarked to the company, that the poor Fetiche over them, not having eat for several days, must be ready to perish with hunger, and was imprudent in not changing his quarters. They replied, that though he might not have observed it, yet the snake knew well enough how to come at his share of the provision. <sup>b</sup>

THIS raillery was carried no farther at this time; but Bosman, going to court soon after, told the king, that one of his Fetiches was bold enough to eat at his table for fourteen days, without apology or consideration; and that it was but reasonable he should be paid board for the maintenance of the deity. If this was not done, he should be under the necessity, he said, of dismissing this hard intruder. The king, delighted with this pleasantry, agreed to the proposal, and accordingly ordered a fat ox immediately to be sent to the Dutchman's house. <sup>c</sup>

cannot bear to hear the snake
ridiculed.

If the snake is trod on, it stings or bites, but either is quite innocent; nay, the negroes have a notion, that the sting is a sovereign specific against venomous serpents. When the Europeans want to get rid of the company of the natives, they begin blaspheming against the groveling god; which effectually answers their purpose: the negroes stop their ears, and hurry with the utmost trepidation out of the house. But though they pass over this freedom in an European, if a negroe was to take the same liberties, the consequence would be fatal. If a fire should happen, and a snake be burnt, the accident is heard with horror by the natives. They stop their ears, and give money, by way of atoning for the crime of omission they have been guilty of in not taking more care of the god. They farther believe, that the burnt snake will again return to life, and signally punish the carelessness of those who occasioned the calamity <sup>d</sup>.

which priests are held.

The power and artifice of the priests.

THE service of religion is divided between both sexes. The priests and priestesses are so much respected, that their very office is a protection for all crimes. However, the present king once broke through this custom, with the consent of all his nobles. A priest having engaged in a conspiracy against the state and the king's person, he was seized, condemned, and put to death, together with a number of his associates. These Feticheres, or priests, have, according to Atkins, a chief, little less respected than the king. This power frequently balances that of the monarch; because the notion that he converses familiarly with the chief Fetiche, gives him, in the opinion of the natives, the power of doing them good or evil, either in extremes. Of this superstitious veneration the crafty priest knows how to make his advantage; equally obliging the prince and the subject to a subservience on his wants. This high dignity is here- <sup>e</sup> <sup>f</sup> <sup>g</sup>

- a dietary in the same family ; to which is annexed that of one of the lords of the court, and government of a province. All the other priests are subject to his jurisdiction. The sacerdotal tribe is exceeding numerous ; and the males enjoy it by birthright. Their bodies are filled with marks, and the cicatrices of certain incisions, made on them in their infancy. Their habit differs in nothing from that of the common people ; though, when their circumstances can afford it, they have the privilege of wearing the dress peculiar to the nobility. They have no determinate revenues or salaries ; yet their income is very great, arising from fraud, ignorance, and superstition. They trade, like other negroes ; and, by reason of the number of their women, children, and slaves, they are able to cultivate large plantations, feed a multitude of cattle, breed slaves, and sell them to vast advantage ; methods which
- b equally augment their power and raise their fortunes ; however, their most certain resources consist in the credulity of the people, whom they pillage, by their artifices, at discretion. One shall see whole families, nay villages, ruined by their cruel extortion. Most of the nobility, who have understanding, spirit, and no religion, regard them as vile and impudent impostors : but their sentiments they are forced to utter with great caution ; for in this country poison is the priestly weapon, no less terrifying than the anathema of the conclave has been in the blind and ignorant ages of Christianity. They pretend a great regard for the Europeans, in order to gain their confidence ; but their sentiments are very wide of their professions. The timid superstition of the people, and the influence they have acquired by the Fetiché, the grand instrument of their hypocrisy, afford them an opportunity of committing the blackest
- c crimes, under the pretext of religion and the public good. One would almost think, that the priests of more civilized nations were here delineated<sup>1</sup>.

THE women promoted to the dignity of Betas, or priestesses, immediately assume dignity, even though born of slaves and the dregs of mankind. They are equally, often more respected than the priests, and claim to themselves the appellation of the children of God. While other females pay the most slavish obedience to the will of their husbands, these arrogate to themselves an absolute and despotic sway over them, their children, and effects. She who yesterday breathed at the pleasure of her lord and master, to-day (such is the force of weak zeal) governs with the pride of an Eastern princess, and the arrogance of one unused to power. This makes the men decline those holy matches, and prevent, if possible, their wives being d raised to that honour they so much covet.

- DES MARCHAIS thus relates the ceremonies observed in the election of priestesses. Every year they chuse a certain number of young virgins ; who are separated from the rest of the sex, and consecrated to the snake. The old priestesses are charged with this business. They begin at the time when the corn first buds forth, retiring first to their habitations, situated at a short distance from the town. Armed with clubs, they fall out from thence like furies ; enter the town, and run about the streets, crying out, Nigo badiname, " Stop them ; seize them ! " All the girls from eight to twelve years of age, whom they are able to catch, are their property by law : and, provided they enter not into courts or houses, no one is permitted to resist or oppose them. Their attack is supported by the priests, who, without pity,
- e kill all those who presume to defend themselves from the blows of those remorseless gorgons. The young captives are conducted by those old beldamites to their abodes : their apartments are assigned them, where they are instructed in the mysteries of religion, or rather of fraud, vice, and hypocrisy, and marked with the image of the serpent : the parents are made acquainted with the place of their retirement ; and, far from lamenting their fate, they are overjoyed with the honour done their family, and the good fortune of their daughter ; nay they frequently voluntarily offer to dedicate them to the snake. If the old priestesses should happen to fail of seizing in the city the number of virgins required, they then make excursions into all parts of the kingdom ; which generally continue four or five days. These, in the same manner as those in town, are limited to certain hours of the night<sup>2</sup>.
- f At first the young ladies are treated with abundance of tenderness : they are taught to sing and dance at the sacrifices, and, after a complete education, they are permitted to reside with their fathers, under the restriction of returning at appointed periods to their duty. As for the old priestesses, they are composed of such as have either lost their husbands, or were never married, possessing all the virulence, rancour, and malignity, inseparable from the breast of an old virgin, envying the happiness of others, unworthy of felicity themselves, and, equally hated and despised by all mankind. To conclude this account of religion, to the other accomplishments of the young lady are superadded the arts of love and gallantry. They are taught by the old bawds to wheedle, to toy, and to counterfeit the fits and transports of the most violent passion. Thus they raise the price of their favours, share in the booty,
- g and encourage the girls to compliance, by promising them they shall be amply rewarded in the great Fetiche's country; yet, where their interest is not concerned, they are the most vigilant guardians of virgin honour, more out of spite than principle; less from virtue, than envy of those joys of which they can never participate. We shall sum up the whole of this section, with some reflections from Atkins concerning the origin of this snake-worship; adding likewise a few lines on the worship of trees, the sea, and toads. This writer, who appears to be an intire stranger to the tradition of the negroes, regards the whole as fabulous, and deduces the superstition from the age of Solomon. He thinks it probable, that this monarch's fleet of Tharshish coasted from Ezion-Geber, at the bottom of the Red Sea, round the Cape of Good Hope, to Sophalu, by some thought Ophir, and thence to the Slave, the Gold, and the Grain Coasts. The length of the voyage, and the returns of ivory, gold, and apes, support the probability of the conjecture. From them, he thinks, some traditional story of the grand serpent, the deluder of mankind, might be derived, which is farther corroborated, in his opinion, by the analogy between many of their customs and the Jewish law<sup>1</sup>. But we shall not waste the reader's time in idle conjectures and whimsical fancy-built hypotheses.

As to the worship of trees, toads, and the sea, it is less in esteem than the former. These deities are only used upon less occasions, subordinate to the supreme culture of the snake, but superior to their accidental and transient gods of wood, stone, &c. The sea, however, has solemn offerings made to it, sacrifices, and annual processions; probably arising from the terror of the scene in tempestuous weather; or from the benefits they derive from it, either by fishing or by commerce. Trees are worshipped in a still inferior manner. The respect paid to them would appear to arise chiefly from their excessive veneration for the snake, who usually takes up his abode in groves. Here likewise are built his temples; which seem to give weight to the supposition. In the last class of their great and fixed gods is the toad: an animal deified, probably, for the same reason as an ape in Agypt. But farther reflexions we shall leave to the suggestion of the reader.

The government of Whi-dah.

THE supreme authority here is lodged in the hands of the king and nobles. By their joint concurrence every thing civil and military of consequence to the state is transacted. In criminal cases, the king assembles his council, lays open the case, receives their sentiments, and recapitulates them before he proceeds to judgment. If a majority falls in with his own opinion, he follows it; if otherwise, and the majority should dissent from him, their sentiments determine his verdict; yet has he an absolute power even in this case, as his nobles are generally too polite to differ with their prince<sup>a</sup>.

The punishment of crimes.

Few crimes are made capital in the kingdom of Whidah. Murder only and adultery with the king's women are made so by law: although other trespasses against religion and the state are frequently punished with death. Murders are so rare, that in the space of six years only two instances happened in the whole kingdom; and one of these proved merely accidental. The law is extremely rigorous in cases of adultery. This makes the women circumspect in their intrigues; but does not prevent them: their ardour seeming to be increased by the difficulty and hazard. The king's women are above all others cautious; yet of all others the most addicted to gallantry, when an opportunity offers. A few years since a young fellow, in a female habit, was taken in the palace, after having debauched several of the most beautiful princesses. Fearing a discovery, he passed into another quarter of the palace, where a he was found the next day, and taken in bed with a young lady. He was instantly seized and carried to punishment; but the most cruel torments could not oblige him to reveal the names of those who had granted him favours. In the midst of the flames he was observed to smile when he saw those persons, who had fondly embraced him a little before, now the busiest in bringing fuel to the fire that was consuming him. Being asked the reason of a conduct so unreasonable, he declared it; but without betraying those inconstants <sup>b</sup>. The manner of this punishment is described by Des Marchais and Barbot: but it has something so terrible in the circumstances, that a humane reader will not be displeased if we omit it.

WHEN any of the king's women is proved unfaithful, he leaves it to the rest to pronounce upon her fate. The punishment is seldom the less cruel; for they think they cannot more strongly prove their own fidelity than by the severity of their sentence; besides the corporal torture and death inflicted on the criminal, the women go in bodies of two or three hundred to pillage, spoil, and raze to the ground, the house of the unfortunate person. Punishment inflicted on adulterers.

THE king has a very extraordinary manner of humbling the pride of his nobles, when they fall under his displeasure, or when their arrogance is overweening. It is seldom however practised: for though he is despotic, yet does he stand in awe of a body who have so strong an influence over the people. To give a colour of justice to his pretences, he detaches two or three thousand women to ravage the lands of those who are wanting in respect and duty, or who reject reasonable proposals. Such is the veneration for these women, that no one dare presume to touch or oppose them, without adding to the former offence, by a new crime of a more heinous nature, and such as would be condemned by the kingdom in general. Thus the haughty peer finds it necessary either to submit, or be devoured by these legions of female furies, who burn and destroy with a bitterness proportioned to their natural weakness. Almost all other crimes are punished by pecuniary fines; which make no contemptible part of the king's revenue <sup>c</sup>. The method the king takes to humble nobles.

WHEN an accusation is unsupported by proofs, the suspected party justifies himself by his Fetiches, or by another method of purgation extremely common, and similar to the method used at Benin. Notwithstanding the accused is acquitted, after trial, by purgation, yet is he obliged to pay a certain sum into the king's coffers; and Bosman takes this to be the origin and cause of continuing the custom. The viceroys have the same power in their governments, and make a perquisite of all fines imposed on criminals. Barbot takes notice of a remarkable kind of obligatory custom among them. This method of compact they call boire dios, from a mixture of French and Portuguese. Each of the parties digs a little pit in the ground, which he sprinkles with his blood, and mixing up a little cake of the earth and blood, he exchanges it for that made by the other party: they each swallow the cakes, and hence enter into the most solemn obligation that can be taken. Fines imposed on accused persons.

ALTHOUGH credit in trade is seldom given, yet they are sometimes forced to deal in that manner. If the debtor proves insolvent, the king invests a right in the creditor to dispose of him, his children, wives, and effects, to any purchaser who will pay the debt; or a certain part of it. Thus the creditors enjoy a very extraordinary privilege, with which neither the king or the nobles can dispense. If the creditor demands before witnesses the sum due to him three times, and that he is not paid, he may seize upon the first slave he meets, without enquiring whose property it is. This law arises from their great regard for liberty, thinking it more just property should answer the payments of debts, than that freedom should be made the price of folly or youthful extravagance. When the creditor lays hands on his prey, he ought to pronounce audibly in the presence of credible witnesses, "I arrest this slave for a certain sum due to me:" the master of the slave is forced to pay the sum in twenty-four hours, else the creditor may sell him, to pay himself. Thus the master of the slave becomes the debtor, and the creditor generally takes care to seize on the slave of some rich and responsible man. As is the case with all laws, this has its advantages and disadvantages; it preserves liberty to those born free, and his right to the creditor; but then it subjects the rich to the debts of the poor, and obliges the industrious to pay for the indolence of the extravagant <sup>d</sup>. Their great regard for liberty; in cases of insolvent debtors.

DES MARCHAIS observes, the Lex Talionis is here in use; murder is punished by the death of the murderer; and if a person is maimed or deprived of the use of a limb, if he be hurt, or mutilated in any of his members, the punishment is made to correspond as near as possible to the offence. By strong intercession, the king sometimes alters the sentence of mutilation for banishment. The criminal is sold to the Europeans; his family and effects are confiscated to the king; and thus the innocent are involved in the chastisement of the guilty. Incendiaries are punished by fire. The crime is not common in the country; but if theft were punished Punishment of murderers.

with the same feverishness, the kingdom of Whidab must have long since been a desert: however, if a thief be convicted of the crime, and unable to make reparation, he is sold for a slave<sup>a</sup>.

THE king and nobility have prisons for the confinement of criminals, and slaves to guard and defend them. They agree with the prosecutor for a certain sum for jail-fees, and charge themselves with his security, under the penalty of a certain fine if he escapes.

BEFORE we proceed to treat of the strength, forces, arms, and wars of this kingdom, it may not be disagreeable to the reader, that we give from Des Marchais a more particular detail of the manner of the royal succession, education, and other particulars, than we have yet done<sup>f</sup>.

A detail from Des Mar-chais, of the right of succession to the crown.

THIS historian is extremely circumstantial in all the ceremonies observed; however, we shall extract only such, as in a particular manner merit attention. The crown we are assured is hereditary, passing inviolably to the eldest son; yet the nobles arrogate to themselves the power of choosing one of the younger brethren, upon extraordinary occasions; an instance of which occurred in the year 1725. In all the countries inhabited by negroes, from Senegal to the Rio Volta, the succession may descend to the children of the sister, notwithstanding the kings are always of the blood royal, and as near a lineal descent as possible. In Whidab there is no reserve, but that the crown descend to the first-born of the king, after his accession, those being entirely excluded of an earlier birth. Another law, no less sacred and inviolable, is, that the moment the heir apparent sees the light, the nobles convey him to the province of Zingbe, on the frontiers, where he is educated as a private person, without regard to or even knowledge of his rank, quality, and pretensions, or the smallest instruction in the art of government. No one has the liberty of visiting, or being visited by him. Those charged with his maintenance, education it cannot be called, are not ignorant of his birth: but they are prohibited, under pain of death, from giving him the slightest hint of his birth, or from treating him otherwise than as their own child. The king, who at present fills the throne, was found at his father's death attending the hogs of his governor. His surprise was inconceivable, when the nobles made him acquainted with his fortune; nor could they for a long while prevent his imagining it a mere delusion. It is no difficult matter to penetrate into the reasons for so singular a custom. When the young king is called to the government of a kingdom, to whose maxims, policy and laws he is an entire stranger, he is constrained to rely on the advice of his nobles upon all occasions, and in fact to put the reins of state into their hands. Thus their power is perpetual, like their rights to their private estates. The eldest son is always called to the throne; and his ignorance of the world gives the nobles the authority, to him only the name, of a monarch; yet is the king despotic and arbitrary.

THE young king is not crowned upon his accession to the throne; that is, on his arrival from Zingbe; for he generally passes several months, and frequently years, before the performance of that ceremony. The nobles, who have the power of fixing the time of coronation, prolong their own; but without being able to exceed seven years, during which interval, the government of the kingdom is wholly in their hands, nor is the king's name so much as mentioned in public acts and instruments; yet is he attended with all the external badges of majesty, without daring to stir out of the palace. At length, when the long expected day for his coronation arrives, he assembles a council of the nobles, and approves their conduct during their administration, rectifying all the laws and acts of the interregnum. A discharge of eighteen pieces of cannon gives notice, at eight at night, that the council is broken up; immediately a shout of joy is spread over the capital, and in a short space communicated to the most remote parts of the kingdom.

NEXT morning the high-priest waits on the king, to remind him of the homage due to the great Fetiche, or serpent; telling his majesty, that as it is well known this deity is dumb, he cannot be surprised that he makes known his intentions by the tongue of his minister. If on this occasion he should demand the women most beautiful in the seraglio, and dear to the king, they must be surrendered to him; however, he seldom pushes his authority to so great a length. On the coronation of the present king Amer, the high-priest modestly contented himself with an offering of a horse, a cow, a sheep, and a fowl. These animals were sacrificed before the palace, and carried with much ceremony to the most public parts of the city. One each side of the sacrifice were placed two millet-cakes, baked in palm-oil; the high-priest erected with his own hands a staff nine foot long, upon which he hoisted a large silken ensign or flag; the whole ceremony being accompanied by the musick of tabors, flutes, trumpets, and acclamations of the people. After this the carcases were abandoned, a prey to the birds, the negroes being prohibited, under severe penalties and death, to meddle with any part of them. While the victims were thus exposed to a public view, the king's women of the third class, or those who from age, or other reasons, were incapable of administering to his pleasure, marched out of the palace under the the escort of a file of musqueteers, and preceded by music. The chief of the women leads up the rear, carrying in her arms the statue of a child, in a sitting posture, which on her arrival at the place of sacrifice, she lays down upon the victims, each of them sing a hymn, which perfectly accords with the instrumental musick, and forms a concert not disagreeable. While they pass, all the people prostrate themselves on the ground, with great devotion and loud shouts, and their return is notified to the king by a general discharge of artillery, which concludes the procession.

Next day, all the nobility croud to the palace, with all the state and magnificence of dress and equipage they can afford; a fine band of musick in great order marches before them, and a great body of men slaves armed behind. They come before the throne, prostrate themselves in a humiliating manner, and retire in the same order they advanced. In the meantime the women abandon themselves to the most riotous mirth; the cannons roar like continued peals of thunder; the whole kingdom is filled with tumultuous joy; and this confused state of things continues for the space of five or six days.

As soon as the nobles have done homage, they dispatch one of their number to the king of Ardrab, attended by a splendid retinue, to request of his majesty, to send a certain nobleman of his kingdom, in whose family the honour is hereditary, to crown the king of Whidab. This officer of state, with all his retinue, is supported at the expence of the young monarch, and he is treated on his journey with the most profound respect. Two miles from Xavier, he meets with horses and carriages to conduct him to the palace, after he has first staid four days in the village nearest the capital. All this time none of his attendants are permitted to enter the city, and it would be death to infringe this custom. Here he receives the compliments of the Whidan nobility, who load him with respect and caresses. The king sends him twice every day great quantities of wine and provisions, which are carried by his discarded women, in platters and vessels upon their heads, under a strong convoy, and preceded by musick. This quarantine being performed, the king invites him to the capital, assuring him that he will be received with joy, and have apartments suited to his dignity appointed him in the palace. The Ardran nobleman receives the king's message with solemnity, telling the ambassador, that he is all obedience to the commands of the king of Whidab, but that he must wait for instructions from his court, relative to the late treaty concerning the reparation of the great gate of Assen, the capital of Ardrab. On receiving this notice, the king sends commissioners to Ardrab, charged with the reparation of the gate; when, upon their return, with a proper officer to certify their having executed the treaty, the Ardran nobleman at length enters Xavier, and proceeds to the coronation. All the nobility, attended by their usual trains, and prodigious crouds of the populace, go to meet and conduct him to the city, where he is received by several rounds of cannon, the cries of the king's women, and the shouts of the mob. The king congratulates him on his safe arrival, and orders him to be attended by his own officers and servants. Every morning the same compliments are repeated, and on the third day he is admitted to an audience, a ceremony that is conducted with great pomp and solemnity, the Ardran preserving his dignity, and talking upon an equality with the king. For the five first days he receives or makes no visits to the nobility, who with the people are busied in processions to the temple of the grand snake, imploring that divinity, that their young master may reign with the goodness, the mildness, and equity, of his predecessors, cultivate trade, observe the laws, and maintain the people in the full exertion of their rights and privileges. This is the labour of the day; the nights are employed at their windows, in singing, dancing, shouting, accompanied by the acclamations of the populace, and continual peals of loud musick and artillery. Strangers, not accustomed to this strange medley and uproar, are in danger of being stunned and confounded with the horrid noise and tumult. On the fifth day in the evening, the people are advertised, by the firing of nine great guns, that the coronation will begin the following day, that the king will appear on his throne in the great court of the palace, and that the gates will be thrown open to all strangers as well as subjects. At the same time, the prince sends a special message to the European factors, requesting the favour of their company to assist at the solemnity. The preceding night is spent by the nobility in the company of the Ardran ambassador, where the conversation is grave, polite, and easy, interrupted by frequent prayers to the Fetiche, by way of interlude; each of them forming an essential part of the ceremony: On the sixth day, at five in the evening (A), the king, attended by some of his favourite women, comes out of the palace.

(A) The reader is here to observe, that Des Marchais divides the time probably in the European manner; the Whidanese being extremely deficient in all divisions and equations of hours, days, weeks, &c. Their chief, and indeed only rule, is their festivals or markets, held every third day. In this manner they calculate all their periods of time.

They

They are dressed in rich silk robes, taken out of his majesty's wardrobe, or presented to them a by the European factors, together with gold necklaces, ear-rings, bracelets, and other valuable trinkets. The king is also decked out in the most magnificent manner, having on his head a gilt helmet, stuck with red and white feathers. In this manner he traverses the great court before the palace, afterwards seats himself on his throne, which is no more than a large two-elbow-chair, on which are painted the arms of France, a circumstance that shews it to have been a present from the West-India company. Des Marchais particularly mentions the order in which the women and nobility stand round him, which, he says, has something more nobly striking than the most august European courts. Here the English, French, and Dutch factors, have honourable places, and chairs seated for them, while the Portuguese director is forced to stand with his head uncovered; and so low has the credit b of this nation sunk at Whidah, that if a negro strike a Portuguese, the latter has not the liberty of returning the blow; whereas any other European may put him instantly to death.

WHAT merits particular notice in this ceremony, is the custom of having two dwarfs standing before the king, who alternately represent to him the qualities of his predecessors, admonish him to follow their example, to make his people happy, and to build his own security and power upon their affections; these little animals concluded their harangue, by wishes for his prosperity, long life, and the happy continuance of his reign. As soon as the introductory ceremonies are finished, the Ardran ambassador enters the court, attended by musick, a grand retinue, and repeated discharges of all the artillery in the city. He approaches the throne without any other reverence but a slight bow, or inclination of his head forward. c After a laboured discourse upon the ceremony which he has the honour of performing, he takes in his hand the king's helmet, and turns it towards the people: upon a signal given, the musick ceases, the acclamations and noise are succeeded for a few minutes by a profound silence. Then the Ardran pronounces with a loud and clear voice, "People! behold your king: Be faithful to him; pray for him, and your prayers will be heard by the king of Ardrab, my royal master." After repeating this short speech three times, he puts the helmet on the king's head, and then steps back to prostrate himself, and pay the homage now due to him as a king. The great guns, the musqueteers, the musick, and the acclamations again resume their noise, and the sky is rent with the dreadful demonstrations of joy; the ambassador retires, and the king with his women return peaceably to the palace; d the Europeans attend him to the gate, and there take leave with profound respect. All the ornaments used in the ceremony become the property of the Ardran nobleman; but as the political superstition of the priesthood drew unhappy presages from that custom, the Ardran contents himself with a rich present the king makes, and five slaves, or their value in merchandize: the rest remains with the priests, under the notion of its being consecrated to the Fetiche.

A DAY or two after his coronation, the king distributes presents among the nobility of the realm, which are returned by others of much greater value. Five days are spent in rejoicings; and the ceremony terminates with a solemn procession to the Snake temple. Upon the whole, the priests never omit an opportunity of profiting by the superstition of the people. All e festivals and public occasions end in offerings to the snake, or rather in perquisites to the artful and cunning ministers of this reptile deity.

Revenues of the crown.

As to the revenues of the crown, Des Marchais, without determining the precise sum, assures us, that they amount to a very considerable fund, by the taxes on the people, and the duties on merchandize. Besides this, large sums are got by fines imposed on criminals, and the confiscation of their goods, chattels, and women, whom the officers of the crown sell for slaves. The crown has lands unalienable from it, not only in the vicinity of the capital, but in the remote provinces of the kingdom, and from these the palace is supplied with all necessaries. When the quantities sent in exceed the demand, the surplus is sold to great advantage, and hence arises no inconsiderable part of the revenue. These lands are f cultivated at no expence; so absolute is his power, that the subjects cannot perform their own most necessary affairs, till they have first done the king's business. Their corn lies rotting on the ground, while they are cutting his; and their families would starve while they are supplying the court with superfluities, if the fertility of the soil, and the bountifulness of nature, did not ease the weight of their yoke. These servitudes are performed at stated periods. Nine cannons are discharged as a signal, the day preceding their labour. Next morning at break of day, the nobility conduct the people to the king's palace, where they begin with dancing and musick, which last for a quarter of an hour. One part of this troop is armed for war, and the other with instruments of labour, the scythe, the hook, and the spade. While the people are dancing before the gates of the palace, the nobles receive their g instructions from the king, by his gentleman of the bed-chamber, upon which this body disperses itself to the different employments assigned. All the while they are at work the musick plays, and they keep time by the strokes of the spade, the sweeps of the scythe or hook; their

Servitudes due to the king.

- a their industry is increased by the musick, their spirits sustained, and they would seem indefatigable in their toil. Their labour has all the air of an amusement; and while they are groaning under the chains of servitude, they seem the happiest people on earth. One might apply Des Marchais's description of Whidah to his own country, which he appears to have in his eye, while he is painting the manners of negroes. In a word, the king would be a powerful monarch, from the greatness of his revenues, the number of his subjects, and the despotism of his government, if he were not a bubble to the politics of his neighbours, and the intrigues of his priests. Besides the immense sums expended in continual wars with Popos, in the conquest of Offra, in the expences of his court, and in superstition, he maintains a standing force of 4000 men. Altho' he regards his subjects as his slaves, yet when they work for him, Military force he is forced to pay them liberally <sup>5</sup>. This is Bosman's account, which differs considerably from Des Marchais relates above.

While Bosman presided over the Dutch commerce in Whidah, the king treated the Hollanders with more respect than any other nation; he made them larger presents, conferred extraordinary privileges on them, and supplied them with greater store of the best provisions than he had ever before done foreigners. But this favourable disposition was altered, as soon as the conduct of their trade was committed to the captains of ships, who paid little regard to the manners of a people so refined and polished, putting them on a footing with the other negroes of the coast.

- DES MARCHAIS says, that notwithstanding the person and education of the king were so totally neglected before he ascended the throne, yet no sooner was he crowned, than the people, forgetting that he was a man, worshipped him as a god, and never approached him but with a respect mingled with fear and awe. Such as pay him their compliments in the morning, throw themselves on the ground, kiss the earth thrice, and clapping their hands, pronounce with profound devotion certain words of adoration. After entering the gate, and arriving at the place where the king receives their homage, they repeat the same form of compliment. The nobles of the first rank are sometimes permitted to eat in his presence, but never with him. This honour is reserved for his women. Our author imagines, that the origin of the king's never eating in public was from policy, as if he would persuade his subjects that he lived without nourishment; a notion which must certainly confirm their belief of his divinity; however, he makes no scruple of drinking before all the world <sup>b</sup>.

It is never known in what part of the palace the king sleeps, and if that question is asked of the captain of his guards, or any of those nearest his person, their constant answer is, "do you imagine that the deity sleeps?" The ignorance and low way in which he is always bred, gives him a high relish for pleasure, as soon as he is raised by one step to the dignity of a crown. He lives in the most slothful, luxurious, and debauched effeminacy among his women, without ever seeking or enjoying the conversation of men, or those exercises that could strengthen his mind, and give vigour to his body.

- To conclude this article, Bosman observes, that the reigning prince in his time was about fifty years of age, of a middle stature, ordinary countenance, but with eyes full of fire and spirit. This is probably the same prince which latter authors speak of as an elderly person, brisk and lively for his years. He was, says Bosman, the most civil and obliging negro ever beheld; but the selfish counsels of some of his flatterers altered his disposition, and made him severe, difficult and harsh in his commerce with the Dutch. At first he took whatever they gave him; in the end he became more nice in his choice; and out of ship-loads of merchandize, it was difficult to please him. Thus the merchants, says our author, lost by their traffick with the king; for after he had the best of their goods, it was no easy matter to dispose of the rest separately <sup>1</sup>.

- It would be hard to discover the exact number of the king's children by such a number of women; Bosman saw but four; three sons and one daughter; all of them handsome, but in particular the eldest. He was the most beautiful negro he had ever seen; but the qualities of his mind did by no means correspond with those of his person; for he was proud, obstinate, and mischievous, insomuch that all men wished he might not succeed to the crown (B). He kept in every quarter of the town certain agents, employed to plunder and steal from the natives and Europeans, out of which he received a proportion agreed on; even the king's goods did not escape his rapacious hands. He never stirred abroad but at night; and Bosman was honoured with several visits from him at the most unseasonable hours. It was his pride that kept him shut up in the day, because he would not expose himself to the people, nor appear before his father. The second son greatly resembled the king, in the sweetness and openness of his disposition, all the nobility were assiduous in paying him their respects, charmed with the freedom of his manners. From the difference of their tempers, Bosman thought it probable that the king's death would be followed by a civil war. A majority of voices could not fail of being on the side of the younger; but the eldest was supported by right, and by the forces of the kingdom, as well as those bands of miscreants he employed for the meanest purposes. All the Europeans he doubted not would join the younger brother's party; and this conjecture was verified by facts. The French, Dutch, and Portuguese, all united to support the cause of the present king against his brother, and were the chief instruments of seating him in his father's throne. If we may credit Atkins, he soon lost that sweetness of manners which Bosman describes. Soon after he came to the crown, he grew morose, retired, and lascivious in his temper, gross and unweildy in his person; he never went out of the palace, but passed his time in luxury and lust, with no other company than that of his women. Atkins alleges, that not having made the people the usual present on receiving the crown, this avarice induced him to conceal himself, in order to save that expence. Others again say, that having never been invested with the sword of state, he could not depend on the allegiance of his subjects, and hence arose the motives for his retired life <sup>k</sup>.

(B) We are at a loss in what manner to reconcile this with Des Marchais's account, of the education of the presumptive heir. Bosman saw him at court; but it might possibly be a younger son, mistaken by the people for the eldest.

DES MARCHAIS acquaints us, that in 1715, the throne, then vacant, was filled by a new prince, called Amer, in prejudice of the birthright of his elder brother; but this assertion he seems to contradict in the following page, where he represents him as drawn from his obscurity, and, from tending the hogs of his guardian, raised to a throne. He ought therefore to be the elder, because, according to the same author, the eldest son alone is bred in that obscure manner. It may therefore be doubted whether it was a new king that was made in 1725, when Des Marchais saw the coronation, considering the long interregnum which the laws admit of. Snelgrave and Smith seem to speak as if the king, who reigned in 1725, had filled the throne for a number of years. They admit that he was one of the grossest and most unweildy men they had ever beheld; but we shall defer the relation of the extraordinary revolution brought about in Whidah by the brave king of Dahomay, till we have given the natural history of the country <sup>l</sup>.

Whidah.

In Whidah, the rainy season commences about the middle of the month of May, and ends in the beginning of August. This is a dangerous and unhealthy time of the year, fruitful in abundance of diseases, both among the natives and foreigners. The rain falls not in showers, but in torrents and deluges; and so warm, that one would imagine it had been heated on a fire. In narrow passages, you are struck with a stream of hot air, enough to cause suffocation; and nothing but perpetual fanning with certain instruments they contrive for that purpose, can render life supportable <sup>m</sup>.

Soil and produce.

As to the soil of Whidah, it consists in general of a rich red mould, fertile, as may be imagined, from the number of crops it produces in a year; however, trees are extremely scarce on the sea-coast, till you pass the Euphrates, and those such as bear little or no fruit. Their barrenness prevents not the natives from deifying them; and perhaps this method of consecrating trees, might arise from policy, being desirous by this superstitious regard to multiply them, and thus to prevent their being cut down by natives and foreigners. At a small distance however from the sea, all kind of fruit-trees are found in abundance. Here are citrons, lemons, oranges, tamarinds, guava's, bananas, &c. The palm and pardon trees are the most plentiful; the former is valued for the oil drawn from its fruit; the latter is but in little esteem on any other account than its wood, which is hard, lasting, and capable of receiving a fine polish. They make wine from it; but this liquor is in less esteem than their beer. European figs grow well here; and Bosman affirms, that the soil and climate are capable of producing every species of fruit, root, and pulse. He made the experiment on cabbages, carrots, turnips, radishes, parslly, and pease, and succeeded to his wish. Indigo is plentiful in this country; and our author believes the sugar-cane might be cultivated to the greatest advantage. They have also a species of the cotton tree which they call Polon, peculiar to Whidah. It produces a sort of fine down, short, but beautiful, and, if rightly prepared, capable of making fine stuffs and cloths. An English factor had a piece dyed scarlet in the grain, that was greatly admired by all the Europeans for its strength, fineness, and incomparable colour, which exceeded any thing they had ever seen in Europe. This kind of cotton might be usefully manufactured into hats, which would be at the same time handsome, light, and warm. Des Marchais extolls a small kind of fruit, which, according to him, has neither a name, nor peculiar or certain figure. He says it resembles the pip or seed of a pear; and if chewed without swallowing, communicates a pleasant and sweet taste to the sharpest acids and bitters. Hence it would seem to be the Kola, of which Bosman speaks in his account of the Gold Coast. Potatoes the natives commonly use for bread, of which they have prodigious quantities. They have yams likewise, but neither in such plenty, or of so good a kind, as on

- a other parts of the western coast. Several sorts of small beans are produced in great abundance; of these, one kind is called acraes, of which they make oil cakes, a pleasant and wholesome food, to those who are accustomed to it. Whidab also bears onions and ginger; but the first especially is scarce. Des Marchais gives us a particular, but indistinct account of a species of pea, that grows upon a shrub about twenty inches in height, greatly resembling the red pepper shrub. The form of the little twigs, the rind and the leaves, have so strong a resemblance, that it is difficult to distinguish them. This shrub bears no flower, and the pease are inclosed in a pod as tough as parchment. The pod grows at the bottom of twigs, which sprout out from the roots, whence the plant draws its nourishment. This pod or sack commonly contains from 120 to 150 pease, tender, easily digested, and of a flavour and taste equal to
- b European pease.

WHIDAH produces three sorts of grain. The first in rank and esteem is the milbio, or small Grain sown twice every year at Whidah. maize, the cultivation of which forms the chief object of the husbandman. It is sown twice every year; but the increase is much greater at one season than at another. The earth in the plentiful season is so thick with it, that scarce a foot-path is left untilled in the whole country. Notwithstanding the immense quantities produced, yet it scarce holds out from one season to another; so populous is the country. Another reason is, that a great part of it is run to Popo, notwithstanding the severe laws prohibiting its exportation. Hence it is, that one barren year occasions an almost incredible famine in Whidab; freemen have often sold themselves for food; others have discharged their slaves, and given them freedom and hunger, because they were unable to maintain them. An English ship, in Bosman's time, purchased his cargo of slaves for provisions, with which he happened to be well stocked.

THEIR next sort of grain is the great milbio, good in its kind, but not used by the natives for bread. This great maize is intirely applied to brewing; of it they make beer; and no more is sown than they think necessary for that purpose. The third sort of milbio grows not upon stalks, but in ears, like barley. Its grain is of a reddish colour; and what is remarkable, it takes eight or nine months to ripen. This grain is not used for bread, but mixed with great milbio in brewing; by which they imagine the beer is improved and strengthened. All the women are well skilled in the art of brewing; and one particular sort of Whidan beer is equal to any we meet with in Europe. The common beer is sold for three pence a bottle; but for the same quantity of the best you must pay a rixdollar. Even the slaves here drink nothing but beer. Their water, which they draw from wells, is esteemed unhealthy on account of its extreme coldness. It has often indeed been found to produce fevers, especially the free use of it in hot weather.

As to the animals of Whidab, it is too populous, and well cultivated, to afford a retreat for wild beasts. Elephants, buffaloes, and tygers, are found in the mountains, which divide this from the interior country. Some deer and hares are seen in Whidab, but in no great numbers; and they probably descend from the high countries, without making this their constant residence. Des Marchais says that their venison is greatly inferior to what he has eat in Europe; but, says he, they are fully recompensed by the goodness and abundance of their apes, which are the fattest and most beautiful in the world. No flesh is more esteemed at Whidab than apes flesh; it sells at a higher price than mutton, and is always preferred to it. Even the European sailors soon overcome their prejudices, and eat it with a peculiar goût. The oxen, cows, sheep, goats, hogs, and all tame quadrupeds, differ in nothing from those of the other coasts. They are in general fatter, on account of the fine meadows and rich pasture in which they live the whole year. Their horses are but indifferent, slight in the make, easily fatigued, and of a bad carriage, probably owing to their little skill in breaking them.

THE whole country is covered with game of various sorts. Their tame fowl, as geese, ducks, hens and turkeys, are reasonable and good. Turtle-doves are so numerous, that a good marksman may shoot above a hundred in a day. Besides these, they have an infinite number of birds, valuable only for their beauty. Among these is the Crown Bird, which is here less elegant than on the Gold Coast. The kingdom of Whidab is every-where stocked with such variety of those charming feathered animals, that many of them have yet obtained no proper names; and are distinguished only by their colour, size, or some such characteristic. Birds of prey however are scarce.

WE shall conclude this account of the kingdom of Whidab, with a short relation of their wars with the powerful and politic king of Dabomay, that terminated in their ruin, and the subversion of their liberty. This relation we shall chiefly extract from Snelgrave, who was an Cause of the revolution in Whidah. eye-witness of most of the transactions, and upon the spot at the time the revolution was brought about. The wealth of this nation, arising from the fertility of the soil, and the flourishing state of its commerce, was attended with the usual effects of great riches. Effeminacy and luxury had crept among the once industrious and active inhabitants; the mind was debauched with prosperity, and emasculated with pleasure, ease, and indolence. Hence it was, that the king of Dahomay was invited to the conquest of a nation, no less easy than valuable in the acquisition. The king of Whidah, who had mounted the throne at the age of fourteen years, left the government intirely in the hands of the nobility of the court, and abandoned himself to his women, to pleasure and indolence. The nobility, in order to possess a more unlimited and secure authority, encouraged him in his natural disposition, and flattered all the passions of the young prince, with a truly European refinement and policy. He was thirty years of age at the time when this revolution happened, an. 1727: but so far was he from meddling in public affairs, that he indulged every appetite with the same freedom he had done in his more boyish years. At his court he kept some thousands of women, and never permitted himself hardly to be approached by his own sex.

In this situation were things at Whidah, when the king of Dahomay, an inland prince, sent ambassadors to the king of Whidah, desiring permission that his subjects might trade to the sea-coasts, with an offer of paying a yearly tribute of a certain number of slaves, or at least a certain duty upon every slave, to be disposed of either to the European shipping, or to the natives of the coast. His request was denied, with a haughtiness that enraged him, and occasioned that bold and resolute prince to vow revenge. These menaces were however disregarded by the king of Whidah. Snelgrave relates, that, having occasion to wait on his majesty, he acquainted him with the great preparations for war making by the king of Dahomay: but the reply of that infatuated monarch was, “that he would not cut off his head, according to the custom of the country, but reduce him to the quality of a slave, and employ him in the meanest and most servile offices.” How different was the event! but how agreeable to his weak and foolish conduct!

Their wars with the king of Dahomay.

TRURO AUDATI, prince of Dahomay, was a brave and politic monarch, who, in the space of a few years, had extended his conquests towards the sea as far as Ardrah, an interior country, but the next in position to Whidah. He now proposed to sit down in peace, to enjoy and secure his conquests, had not the above accident rekindled his ambition, and forced him to take arms. To this was superadded another circumstance that hastened the catastrophe of Whidah. The king of Ardrah had a brother, a prince of great hopes, whom he treated with great rigour and severity. This the young Hassar could not longer endure with patience; and, finding himself unable to make a sufficient party in the kingdom to shake off the yoke and procure his liberty, he had recourse to Truro Audati; promising him a large sum of money, if he would revenge the insults, indignities, and gross injustice, under which he laboured. Nothing more was necessary to encourage that ambitious and wise prince, who entered so heartily into the young Hassar's cause, as if he had been actuated by motives of sympathy and compassion. His designs were not long a secret to the king of Ardrah; who, in order to ward against the impending stroke, had recourse for assistance to the king of Whidah: it being the common interest of both kingdoms to oppose the growing power of Truro Audati. The Whidanese, however, were too much addicted to their ease to attend to the danger that threatened their neighbour, and of consequence themselves. Audati was suffered to enter Ardrah with an army of 50,000 men, to cut in pieces the army that attempted to resist, and make prisoner the king; who, according to the savage custom of those nations, was instantly beheaded.

King of Dahomay conquers Ardrah.

There was at the court of Ardrah, at that time, one Mr. Bullfinch Lamb, an English factor, sent by the governor to expedite some accounts between the king and him. A large balance was due to the king; and he detained Lamb, as a pledge for the payment, treating him for the two years of his residence with great kindness and civility. He was now presented to the conqueror Audati, who expressed the utmost surprize and satisfaction at the sight of a white man; ordered him to be conducted to his court; and an house, domestics, and women, to be appointed him. After having kept him for three years in this situation, he returned him to the factory, loaded with gold and rich presents. During his residence here he constantly dissuaded the king from his design of invading Whidah, which he represented as a numerous and potent kingdom, accustomed to fire-arms, and strongly connected with the Europeans, who would not fail to exert themselves in their quarrel. After Lamb's departure, the politic Audati employed his spies in Whidah; and from them learnt a true account of the divisions, the sloth and indolence that reigned; a piece of intelligence which determined him no longer to defer the intended invasion. He began his attack upon the most northern province of the kingdom. Here an Appragbab, or Negro chief, ruled, in whom the government was hereditary. The Appragbab immediately demanded succours from the king; but he had enemies at court, who wished his ruin, and rendered the king deaf to his remonstrances. Seeing himself abandoned, he took the resolution of submitting to Audati: and his voluntary homage procured him favourable and mild terms from the conqueror. After this, a free passage was open to the kingdom of Whidah, and even to Sabi, the capital; there being no other obstruction than a river, which ran on the north side of the city. The king of Dahomay encamped on the opposite banks, not doubting but the passage would be disputed: in this, however, he was mistaken;

The king of Dahomay invades and conquers Whidah.

<sup>a</sup> mistaken; the effeminate Whidanese placing their security in their numbers and gods, without thinking any farther precautions necessary. In the morning they met their priests on the banks of the river, and there sacrificed to the grand serpent; after which they returned to the city, fully assured of the efficacy of what they had done to stop the progress of the enemy.

THE first step taken by Audati was to send to the Europeans an assurance, that if they remained neutrals, they should not only be treated with kindness, but their trade likewise freed from those duties and restrictions at present laid upon it by the king of Whidab: if, on the contrary, they joined his enemy, and took up arms against him, they must expect all the horrors of war, and the most cruel effects of his resentment. This declaration threw the Europeans into the utmost perplexity and consternation. Some proposed retiring to their forts on the sea-coast, some miles distant from Sabi, and there wait the event. Others again apprehended that this retreat would irritate the king of Whidab, as setting a bad precedent to his subjects: these were therefore inclined to stay in the capital, and this proposal was determined on.

TRURO AUDATI, perceiving that the defence of the river was committed to the Fetiches, or <sup>The weak and</sup> snakes, detached 200 men, to sound the fords. This body, gaining the opposite shore, without any resistance, marched immediately towards the capital, attended with a great number of <sup>superstitious</sup> warlike instruments. The king of Whidab, hearing of their approach, fled precipitately out of the palace, and retired, with all his women and court, to a maritime island, disjoined by the river from the continent (C). The rest of the inhabitants, having no canoes to transport them, <sup>conduct of the</sup> were drowned in thousands, attempting to swim across. Others, amounting to one half of the people, took shelter in the woods and thickets; where, endeavouring to avoid the sword, they perished by famine. The detachment of Dabomans, that had entered the city, meeting with no resistance, set fire to the palace, and sent word to their king, that nothing stood in his way from approaching the capital. Upon this, the whole army began their march, and, crossing the river, were fully persuaded of what nothing less than ocular proof could convince them; viz. that a whole nation had deserted their liberty and property, their wives, children, and gods, without one attempt to resist the enemy. To the latter the Dabomans by no means paid the regard and veneration with which they were worshipped by the Whidanese: for, finding them tame and numerous, every house being filled with snakes, they took them up <sup>Whidanese.</sup> by the middle, and jeeringly desired them, if they were gods, to speak, and defend themselves. As the snakes made no reply, they cut off their heads, gutted, and broiled them upon charcoal; saying, "they had never before dined upon divinities; but as they had often feasted upon human sacrifices, it was but reasonable they should treat in their turn."

IN the beginning of the year 1729, Snelgrave found the unhappy king of Whidab in that miserable island, where, on the approach of the enemy, he had taken shelter. Here he led a <sup>The king of</sup> deplorable and destitute life, in a poor village, barren, sandy, and void of every necessary of <sup>Whidah re-</sup> life. Snelgrave, taking pity on his sad reverse of fortune, waited upon him, with such presents as he thought would be most acceptable, which the fugitive king received with great satisfaction, expressing his gratitude by a present of a goat, the only effects of value of which <sup>tires to a de-</sup> he was possessed. He was attended only by one of his Cabocoers, the most faithful of all his subjects, who had never deserted him in his misfortunes, and preferred his honour, gratitude, and loyalty, to all the advantages he could receive from subjecting himself to the conqueror, and forsaking his native prince: a rare example of fidelity and attachment in a courtier! All besides had paid their submission to the victorious king of Dabomay, and received the yoke without murmur.

AFTER having possessed himself of the capital, and received the obedience of the chief men of Whidab, Audati returned to the more complete conquest of Ardrab, and to prosecute a war <sup>An attempt to</sup> he had been engaged in with the king of Yos, the ally of Ardrab. Some losses he had here <sup>restore the</sup> sustained, and the busy disposition of an European factor at Jachen had nearly occasioned a <sup>king.</sup> revolution in Whidab, and restored the lawful prince to the throne. When governor Wilson, in July 1729, had quitted Whidab, he left the management of the English affairs in the hands of one Testesole, a foreigner, but of what nation is uncertain. This man had resided a great number of years in Guiney, supplying by experience what he fell short of in judgment, moderation, and prudence. Although he had made frequent visits to the king of Dabomay, and was always received with affability and particular distinction, yet the notion he entertained of his weakness after his late losses, and from too extended conquests, made him project the scheme which had nearly terminated in his ruin and that of the English establishment in Whidab. He communicated to the king of Popo his design of restoring the king, and was confirmed by him in his intention.

(C) This island, which the king pitched upon for his the north, north-east, and north west it is surrounded by asylum, is upon the borders of the kingdom of Popo, a river (1).

conduct of the king of Dahomay.

Since the late revolution, the chanel of commerce between the kingdoms of Whidab and Popo had been wholly blocked up : nothing therefore could be more agreeable to the king of Popo, than a project that promised the restoration of the king of Whidab, and the usual commerce between the nations. He not only encouraged Testefole to prosecute his plan, but promised him powerful assistance in executing it. Accordingly they raised an army of 5000 men, under the command of the deposed king, and his faithful Cabocoer Ossu. The king of Dahomay was at this time busied in repairing his cities, and settling the conquered country of Ardrab : it was a long time before he was apprised of the revolt, the news of which he received with the utmost astonishment ; wondering that a prince so negligent in defending his rights, should attempt by force of arms to regain them. He was now in no condition to undertake a fresh war : he had buried a great number of his men while he was encamped in the marshes of Los : he had lost a great number of his troops in a battle fought with that prince ; and now he had detached the greater part of the remaining forces to the different sea-coasts, to dispose of the prisoners he had made in the war. However, he fell upon a stratagem to deliver himself out of this extremity, no less happy in the contrivance than successful in the event. Assembling a great number of women, he had them cloathed and armed as men. He formed them into companies, giving to each their proper officers, colours, and music. This female army he put in motion against the enemy, the first line of every company being composed of men, the better to deceive, and likewise, if necessary, to sustain the first shock of the Whidanese. The news of this march was soon carried to the Whidan camp, where it raised a consternation proportioned to the suddenness of the event, the deceit put upon the troops by Testefole, and the natural timidity and effeminacy of the soldiers. All of them abandoned their colours, their king, and their fidelity : nor could all the endeavours of that unfortunate prince bring them back to their duty. In this extremity he was forced a second time to retire to his barren and desolate island, and Testefole took sanctuary in the English fort, whither he was pursued to the trenches by the Dahoman women, and a considerable number of his men cut off. He was soon after made prisoner in the French fort, carried, bound hand and foot, to the king, punished with the most cruel tortures, and, lastly, put to death : a punishment which his rash and impetuous, as well as disrespectful, conduct to the king of Dahomay richly merited (D). In this manner does the once famous kingdom of Whidab remain to this day : a province dependent on the king of Dahomay, governed by a viceroy ; but in the full and free use of their antient religion, laws, and government. The fate of this kingdom furnishes a striking lesson to all commercial states, how they suffer luxury, the natural concomitant of wealth, to creep among the people. It may, as a judicious modern essayist observes, help to civilize and refine the manners ; but it at the same time weakens and debauches the mind. Luxury may introduce the arts, and improve science ; but it will surely enervate the genius by excess, ruin the morals, excite at once a spirit of avarice and profusion, destroy public spirit and patriotism, confining our whole views to the gratifications of our unruly passions, and the means of supporting our pleasures, at the expence of honour, honesty, liberty, religion, and every thing that can or ought to be dear to a man.

BEFORE we enter upon our account of the kingdom of Ardrab, we shall conclude this section with a few particulars relating to the king of Dahomay (E). When his army entered Sabi, they were shocked at the sight of some Europeans, who remained there, not daring to approach them, their complexion and dress being so different from any thing they had ever beheld <sup>m</sup>.

A short sketch of the politics, strength, and manners of the Dahomans, with a description of the king.

NOTWITHSTANDING the resemblance of symmetry, they could not be persuaded they were men, till they heard them speak, and were assured by the Whidanese, that these were the merchants who purchased all the slaves that were sold in Guiney. As soon as their understandings were informed, and their prejudices removed, their respect ceased. They seized upon Duport, the French factor, robbed him of his watch and money, conveying him and some other white men, English, French, Dutch, and Portuguese, all prisoners to the camp. Of this number was Jeremy Tinker, who a few days before had resigned the government of affairs to Duport, with an intention of sailing for England. The Sieur Pereira, of all the Europeans, made his escape out of Sabi, and arrived at the French factory at Jachen.

(D) While the Dahoman army surrounded the fort at Jachen, several overtures for a peace were made by the king, all of which Testefole rejected, with an insolence little becoming a conqueror, much less a petty factor, blocked up in his fort by a potent monarch. One day, the Dahoman ambassador being with him, in order to bring to reason that imprudent man, some words arose, upon which Testefole struck the ambassador ; saying at the same time, that were his king in his power, he would use him after a different manner. This affair being told to the king of Dahomay, he replied, with more than usual composure, " this man must certainly have some very extraordinary reason for his enmity to me. Is it that he is unable to repay the many favours and civilities I have conferred on him ? " An answer that ought to be written in golden characters.

(E) Snelgrave, we believe, is the only writer who gives any account of this prince : we shall therefore relate from him all that is known concerning a monarch so powerful. The situation of his kingdom is intirely unknown, it lying far up the country, north of Ardrab.

a ON the following day they arrived in the camp four miles distant from Sabi, where they were separated according to their different nations, and ill treated for some days. At length they were brought into the king's presence, who graciously removed their fears concerning the consequences of the war; promising, they should have no reason to be sorry for the revolution brought about in the kingdom of Whidab. After this he set them at liberty, without ransom, permitting them to return to their several forts. He presented the English and French governors with some slaves; assuring them, that his intention was, the moment he had established his conquests, to cultivate trade, to render commerce flourishing, and to give the Europeans peculiar testimonies of his friendship and regard.

b SNELGRAVE, after passing a few days with the French and English on the banks of the river, proceeded to Jachen, a town situated about seven leagues eastward of Sabi, where the English and French have factories. It has a district stretching about three miles along the coast, a good road for shipping, and the only harbour by which Europeans have a communication with Ardrab. It is governed by an hereditary prince, paying a yearly tribute to the monarch of Ardrab. When the king of Dabomay became master of that country, the prince of Jachen paid him his submission, with an offer of the same tribute he had yearly paid to Ardrab: a conduct that was greatly approved by Truro Audati: in consequence of which he remitted part of the tribute. After ravaging, plundering, and destroying all the other countries he had conquered, the politic Audati imagined he might render the natives of Jachen useful to his subjects, by instructing them in the mysteries of trade. He had now opened a path to the sea: but still, without knowledge in commerce, all the blood he had spilt would be of little use to the wealth and happiness of his people. Jachen had always been the rival of Whidab in trade: the latter being overturned, all the commerce, which before had been in the hands of both, could now be engrossed by Jachen alone, or rather by the Dabomans, who would always preserve the right of conquest over the ports, and of course the greater share of the traffick. Such were the views of this wise prince, in depriving the one of their trade, while he encouraged and supported the other in all their privileges, and whatever could promote a spirit of industry and commerce.

THE following extract from the journal of Snelgrave may not be unacceptable to the reader. We were carried, says he, to the camp in litters, placed on the shoulders of six Negroes. d Nothing could exceed in beauty the prospect the country afforded, if you did not on every side perceive the devastation and ravages of war. Not only the ruins of towns and villages were continually present to the eye, but heaps of bones, the remains of those unhappy victims of ambition and avarice. When we arrived within a quarter of a mile of the camp, a messenger came to us, with compliments from the king; advising us to be of good courage, and to pay his majesty the respect due to so great a prince. On our arrival in the camp, we were delivered into the custody of a superior officer, bearing the title of captain, and surrounded with guards, armed with guns, naked swords, targets, and accompanied by a standard. They made such a number of ridiculous grimaces and contortions of the muscles of the face, that it was scarce possible to avoid laughing, and utterly so to penetrate into their designs. Their actions growing e still more absurd and obscure, when the captain, attended by two other officers, came up to us, with their swords drawn; the points of which they applied to their naked breasts, skipping, leaping, and shaking their heads, for some time. This ceremony ended, they resumed a more composed air, congratulating us on our arrival, and poured out a cup of palm wine, to the king's health: after which we were conducted to our tents, under an escort of 500 men, preceded by a band of music.

f THE camp was pitched near Assen, which had been the capital of Ardrab, but now a large pile of rubbish and ruins. The victorious army was lodged in tents, composed of the branches of trees, covered with straw, of the form of a bee-hive, but large enough to contain ten or a dozen soldiers. After the captain had left the Europeans in their tent, with a guard placed at a small distance, he went directly to the king, to give an account of his commission. Next day a large tent, surrounded by pallisadoes, was erected in the middle of the camp: hither the Europeans were ordered to be brought; and to prevent the croud from incommoding them, a proclamation was published, prohibiting them, under pain of death, from assembling round the pallisadoes. This regard for their safety and ease gave the Europeans great joy. They dined in the large tent, exposed to the view of the whole camp; but now, being secure of their lives, they sustained no other inconvenience than what arose from the myriads of flies that swarmed round them, it being impossible to convey a bit of meat into one's mouth that was not loaded with those vermin. Soon after dinner the captain returned, to conduct the Europeans to the king. In their way they saw a scaffolding, covered with human heads; and, upon enquiry, g they were informed by their interpreter, that those heads were all that remained of 4000 prisoners the Dabomans had sacrificed in the space of three weeks. A piece of information that struck the Europeans with horror and astonishment! Those unhappy persons were chiefly Whidane; among whom were several of the nobility, who had basely deserted their king, and reaped reaped this reward of their treachery and pusillanimity. The Europeans were conducted thro' a large porch into a wide square, filled with houses, the walls of which were of mud. Here they were made to sit down upon turf-seats, and presented by the captain with a cow, a goat, and a sheep ; to which he added a compliment, that his majesty was sorry it should be out of his power, amidst the din and tumult of arms, to treat them in a manner consistent with his affection and esteem : a compliment and usage that seems to contradict what our author before asserted. Upon this occasion they had not the honour of being presented to his majesty : they were permitted, however, to gratify their curiosity in regard to every particular about the court. As they went out at the porch, in order to return to their tents, they were met by four handsome, lusty Negroes, armed with a fusée upon their shoulders, a naked sword in their hands, and their necks adorned with collars of human teeth, which hung over their breasts and shoulders. They were told by their interpreter, that these were heroes of the Daboman nation, who were permitted to deck themselves with the teeth of the enemies they had slain in battle ; in the number of which consisted the difference of their rank and quality. Snelgrave desired the interpreter to compliment them in the name of the Europeans, and to assure them that they looked upon them as the bravest of men : to which they replied, with great politeness, that they only claimed the next rank to the white men, whom they greatly esteemed.

Two days after they received orders to prepare themselves for an audience of the king ; when they were conducted to the same square they had seen before. Here they found his majesty seated on a throne, raised high for the occasion, and set off with the spoils of the royal palace at Sabi. A fine silk canopy, supported by four beautiful women, was held over his head, to defend him from the scorching heat of the sun, while other females fanned him, and drove away the flies. The women were richly clothed from the girdle to the heels, the upper part of the body being intirely naked, after the fashion of the country. On their arms they wore gold bracelets of great value, set with jewels, necklaces of the same metal, studded with precious stones, and pretty little ornaments, peculiar to the country, interwoven with their hair. These consisted chiefly of pebbles and crystals, of various colours, ranged with great taste, and in a manner that set off their lustre to great advantage. A number of other fossils and gems they used, which were brought from the interior parts of Africa. Our author observes, that most of the diamonds he saw were small, but of a fine and delicate water, exceeding any imported from the kingdoms of Golconda and Visiapore.

As to the king, he was dressed in a robe of silk, flowered with gold, and sweeping the ground behind with a long train. On his head he wore an European hat, embroidered, and sandals on his feet. When the Europeans approached within twenty paces of him, he made a motion for them to halt, and bid them, by his interpreter, a hearty welcome to his dominions. After giving Snelgrave assurances of his protection, he ordered them to be seated ; and calling for some wine, drank their healths, desiring that the cup might go round. While they were thus employed, eight hundred prisoners were brought into the camp, from a country called Tusso, distant six days journey from Ardrab. This people, while the king of Dabomay was employed in the conquest of Whidab, had attacked 500 of his troops, sent to escorte twelve of his women and some treasure to Dabomay. The Tussos, after routing the convoy, put the women to death, and seized on the treasure : an insult which Truro Audati hastened to revenge, as soon as he was disengaged from the Whidan war. A strong detachment from his army was sent against them, which meeting with the enemy, intirely defeated them, and made prisoners the unfortunate persons now led into the court. The sight of those wretches going to be sacrificed could not fail to excite emotions of pity, though their crime was of such a nature as little merited compassion. A certain number of them was chosen by the king to be offered up as victims to the Fetiches, and the manes of those women they had basely murdered ; the rest were kept as slaves, for the use of the king and court, or sold to the Europeans. All the soldiers who were on this expedition were rewarded for their services, receiving from the hands of their officers cowris to the amount of twenty shillings for a male slave, and twelve for a female. The same soldiers brought likewise into the middle of the camp some thousand heads of those they had slain in battle ; for each of which they were paid a certain sum of money.

ALL the time the king continued in the great square, the nobility lay prostrate on the ground, without presuming to approach nearer to him than twenty paces, or hardly to lift up their faces, unless they were spoken to. Those who had any thing to communicate to him first kissed the ground with profound reverence, and then whispered in the ear of an elderly lady, who stood on the right hand of his throne, whose business it was to convey the request, information, or whatever it was to the king. This day his majesty made presents to his principal officers and women of above 200 slaves ; which royal bounty was proclaimed over the camp, and echoed by the joyful shouts and acclamations of the soldiery. The last ceremony which our author saw was the most extraordinary of the whole. Two Negroes came before his majesty, carrying a vessel filled with grain, the quantity amounting to at least six gallons. After setting it down on the ground, they fell upon their knees, and then, without any apparent concern, began eating a eating the grain in handfuls, so fast that the whole was consumed in a few minutes. Snelgrave was told by the interpreter, that the intention of this ceremony was purely to amuse the king, and that the poor wretches never long survived this inhuman diversion : however there never were wanting a number of candidates for the honour of succeeding them. Dinner then was served up ; during which the prince of Jachen's brother entered the tent of the Europeans, in the utmost fright and disorder. He had just met the unhappy Tuffos going to be sacrificed : his ears and heart were penetrated with their piteous cries, and himself melted into the tenderest compassion ; nothing being so horrible and shocking to a native of the sea-coast as that monstrous practice of the interior nations, of sacrificing human victims, and feeding upon the flesh of their own species. This barbarous usage is familiar to the Dabomans. When Snelgrave b reproached the Whidanese, for having permitted themselves to be conquered by those savages, they answered, that it was not possible to resist such canibals ; and, when they were once dead, it did not much signify whether their bodies were devoured by vultures or by men.

SOME of the Europeans had the cruel curiosity to go and see these sacrifices performed ; and to their account we owe the knowledge of the manner in which this savage ceremony is conducted. The first who made his appearance was a Negro, of a majestic air, robust, and handsome symmetry, about fifty years of age. His hands were bound behind him ; but in his face he bore no marks of fear or grief, and his whole deportment was that of a conqueror, rather than a slave going to be sacrificed. A Daboman priest standing upon the scaffold, pronounced over his head certain mysterious words ; after which the victim was mounted up, and his head at one c blow severed from his body ; the whole assembly sending forth a loud shout. The head was thrown to a corner of the scaffold, and the body suffered to lie till all the blood had run out ; after which it was carried to the camp, and the head sent to court. The interpreter told Snelgrave, that the head was the property of the king, the blood was given to the Fetiche, and the body always left to the soldiers. With the same formality was the sacrifices continued through the several victims ; the men offering themselves with great constancy and courage ; but the women, agreeable to the tenderness of the sex, lifting their voices in doleful lamentations to heaven, and cries that would melt the most callous heart. After the sacrifice was finished, a colonel of the guard came up to Snelgrave, and asked him what he thought of it ? To this Snelgrave d replied, that it was wonderful to him, how so wise a prince as Truro Audati should sacrifice such a number of men, whom he might have sold to great advantage. The colonel answered, that it had been the custom of their nation for time immemorial : that after a certain great victory, the king could not dispense with a vow he had made before the battle, of offering up to God a certain number of prisoners : that the Daboman kings ever since believed that the neglect of this ceremony would be attended with some dreadful calamity, either to them or to the nation ; and to the exact performance of it they attribute the run of prosperity they have enjoyed for a series of years : that the reasons for chusing out old men for victims were purely political ; they being of less value at market, and more dangerous, from their experience and cunning, than the young. This the Dabomans had frequently observed : for almost all the disturbances which happen among slaves, had their origin in the plots and contrivances of the old ones. Lastly, the e colonel added, that as to the young men they sometimes sacrificed, it was with intention they should wait in the next world upon the king's women the Tuffos had slain ; from which superstition we may conclude the Dabomans have some idea of a future state, and the immortality of the soul.

SNELGRAVE after this interrogated the colonel, What sentiments his nation entertained concerning the Supreme Being ? The answer was confused and embarrassed ; viz. that the Dabomans acknowledged one invisible God, who protected them in all dangers and difficulties ; and that this incorporeal being was subordinate to one more powerful. This last God, says the colonel, is the same who communicates all those extraordinary advantages to the white men : but continues he, when this great being does not chuse to impart himself to us, we then content ourselves with the invisible God, whom we actually worship.

f SNELGRAVE relates, that he was assured both by the prince of Jachen and by his interpreter, both eye-witnesses of what they affirmed, that the Daboman priests broiled and eat the bodies of the victims, distributing the remainder to the soldiers, who had spent the whole night in gluttony and riot. However, he does not advance this horrid barbarity as certain truth, but on the report only of credible witnesses, who could have no view or design in deceiving him. This he thinks is more strongly confirmed by the attestation of an honest and plain writer, Robert Moor, surgeon to a frigate in the English service. John Dagge, the captain, on his arrival at Whidab, finding himself indisposed, sent Moor upon an embassy to the camp of the king of Dabomay, with presents to the monarch. Moor had the curiosity to go round the whole camp, when in passing the market he saw human flesh exposed to sale. Snelgrave, who had this account g from Moor's own mouth, says, that his curiosity did not lead him to the market-place ; but that if it had, he doubts not but he should have met with the same dreadful spectacle. Atkins, however, discredits this report ; and affirms, that Moor mistook monkey's flesh for human. He blames Snelgrave for relating, upon the authority of others, things in which he might have so easily satisfied himself <sup>a</sup>.

AMONG the European prisoners the king of Dahomay had taken in the conquest of Ardrab, was a Portuguese mulattoe, whose affection and attachment he gained by his liberality and kindness. In particular he had presented him with a woman, whose beauty Snelgrave greatly admired (E). She had the complexion of an European, and was really fair and delicate, but the features and hair of a Negro. The Portuguese was besides raised to some high offices about the court, and was the favourite and minion of the king. This man paid great regard to Snelgrave, visited him, and every day supplied him with the best provisions the country afforded. By him he was told of the war the Dahomans maintained against the king of Yos, after the conquest of Ardrab. This last country, he said, lay a great way north-east of Dahomay, on the opposite side of a vast lake, from which issued a number of rivers, some of which discharged themselves into the gulph of Guiney. He said, that a number of fugitive princes, whose fathers had been put to death by the Dahoman monarch, had fled to the king of Yos, as their protector, and engaged him, by their intreaties, to declare war against Truro Audati. He was soon in a condition to take the field; and the king of Dahomay, quitting Ardrab, was not long in opposing him, with all his forces, which consisted wholly of infantry. As the enemy's army was intirely composed of cavalry, Audati apprehended, that in an open country his troops would be surrounded, and every-where broke by the vigour, weight, and impetuosity of the horse. To prevent this, he ranged in different parts of his wings and center platoons of musquetry, whose fire, he knew, would terrify the horse, unaccustomed to those explosions. This had the effect: it prevented the two armies from coming to a general and unequal engagement. As they had continued, however, for four or five days to skirmish incessantly, the Dahoman army began to grow tired of standing constantly to arms, and watching the motions of an enemy, equally alert and intrepid; besides, the horse now began to stand fire, and were not, as at first, put into confusion upon every discharge of the musquetry. In this situation Audati found it necessary to have recourse to stratagem, and effect by art what he perceived was impossible to courage alone. He had in his camp a great quantity of brandy, aqua vite, and spirituous liquors, which he had brought from Ardrab. These, with some valuable effects, he ordered to be removed to a neighbouring village, under a strong guard, as if he intended to secure them from danger. After this, by an advance detachment, he vigorously attacked the enemy; who received him with equal bravery. After a sharp action he retreated, on the approach of night, in seeming confusion, and as if he had yielded to their superiority. The enemy, not doubting but they had obtained a complete victory, seized upon the magazine of spirits, which they drank with great avidity, and with just the effect which Audati desired and expected. He watched the proper opportunity by his spies; and, returning, with great diligence, before sleep should again refresh them, he attacked them with vigour, while two-thirds of the army were dead-drunk or asleep, and found it no difficult matter to conquer. Some, however, mounted their horses, and stood the charge with the utmost obstinacy: but these being few in number, could not prevent a total defeat and prodigious slaughter. However, added the Portuguese, Truro Audati is so well assured of the bravery of the enemy, and the superiority they maintain by their cavalry in an open country, that he tries every means to gain their friendship. He has made rich presents to the king of Yos, to keep him quiet, and dreads nothing so much as a second war with so intrepid a nation. Another invasion, continued he, may turn the scale of fortune, and reduce the Dahomans to the condition to which they have brought many other nations: for there is no depending upon stratagems, where every other advantage is on the side of the enemy. Should another war break out, and Audati be deserted by his good fortune, he has taken the resolution of retiring to the conquered provinces on the sea-coast; knowing that the superstition of his enemies will prevent their pursuing him. The great Fetiche of the people of Yos is the sea: but so profound is their veneration, that their priests prohibit them from approaching or seeing it. The breach of this part of their faith, they are fully persuaded, would be attended with the most terrible national calamities. Snelgrave remarks here, that all the Negroes have their Fetiches, either general or particular; and that, whether the sea, a serpent, sheep, goat, or stone, be the object of their adoration, they continue through the whole course of their lives to worship it, with a literal obedience to the mode prescribed by their priests.

SOME days after Snelgrave's arrival in the camp, he was invited to a second audience of the monarch. On entering the court, he was desired to stop till the king had examined the quality

- a of the presents which he understood Snelgrave proposed making. After this he was introduced into a little court, at the farther end of which the king was seated, cross-legged, upon a fine silk carpet. The appearance of his attendants was brilliant; but few women were in waiting. On seeing Snelgrave and the other Europeans, he very affably enquired after their health, how they liked their accommodations and manner of living, ordering some fine mats to be placed near him for them to sit on. He then interrogated Snelgrave concerning the nature of the commerce he carried on with the maritime kingdoms of Africa? To this the captain replied, that slaves were the chief branch of traffick, but that he likewise purchased gold and ivory, in exchange for which he gave European commodities: concluding with his humble request, that his majesty would be pleased to countenance a trade equally advantageous to Europe and to
- b Africa; a request which he was assured would be granted as soon as the rights of each nation could be ascertained, and general commercial laws established. The king then desired Snelgrave to address himself to Zuinglar, an officer of distinction, whom he had known at Whidab. The Zuinglar, by order of his master, declared to Snelgrave, that, notwithstanding the rights of conquest, it was his majesty's resolution not to raise the duties and imposts upon trade, and to continue them on the footing they had formerly stood at Whidab. The English captain replied, that his majesty being infinitely a greater prince than the king of Whidab, it was hoped that
- c he would lessen the restrictions upon trade, and content himself with a smaller duty. This objection puzzled the Zuinglar, and made him hesitate about the answer he ought to return; but the king, who obliged the interpreter to explain every particle that was uttered, replied, that the natural consequence of his being a greater prince, was a more profound respect and higher imposts: "however," says he, resuming a more mild and gracious manner, "as you are the first English captain I have seen, I will treat you as one would a young wife, to whom he can deny nothing." Snelgrave was struck with the lively politeness of this answer; and imagining the interpreter had given a different turn to the king's expression, he accused him of deceiving him; but his majesty resuming the discourse in the same terms, soon convinced Snelgrave, that true complaisance is not confined to Europe. The whole of his compliment was perfectly calculated to render the stranger happy; and he concluded it with a promise, that his conduct should by no means discredit his professions. Encouraged by this extreme condescension, Snelgrave took the liberty of representing, that the only sure method to
- d render commerce flourishing, was to lay as few clogs and restrictions upon it as possible; and to protect the English not only against the petty frauds of the common Negroes, but the exorbitant exactions of the chief officers of the court and customs. He added, that from neglecting those two important points, the king of Whidab had greatly injured the trade of his country. His majesty replied, that he was intirely of his sentiments, and desired to know what the English believed they should be able to pay. Snelgrave answered, that to give vigour to their traffick, and inspire them with zeal and gratitude to his majesty, a moiety of what was exacted by the king of Whidab would be sufficient, and as much as they well could bear. Immediately the terms were accepted, and the king, to conclude the audience with the same amiable dignity with which he had begun it, assured Snelgrave, that he would thoroughly restrain the exactions and frauds he complained of, punish with the utmost rigour all impositions and injuries done to the Europeans, and the English in particular, and be himself the support and protector of commerce, which he hoped to see flourish in every corner of his dominions.
- e This treaty of commerce being finished, the affection and regard of the Dahoman monarch for the Europeans was so conspicuous, that Snelgrave did not hesitate to implore his clemency in behalf of the unhappy people of Whidab. In acknowledging that the common people were fraudulent, he excused them by the example of their superiors, who always shared in their acquisitions and thefts from strangers and foreigners. He scrupled not to assert, that if it should please his majesty to shew mercy in restoring them to their country, and imposing a tribute on them, they would become useful to his interest, and highly serviceable to the state
- f by their industry, their skill in husbandry, acquaintance with the Europeans, and knowlege in commerce. To this he added, that it was a maxim among European princes, to estimate the strength of a kingdom by the number of its inhabitants, and that if his majesty would adopt this principle, he might easily add an hundred thousand useful subjects to the number of his people. His majesty's reply was, that he was fully assured of the truth of all the English captain had advanced, but that the tranquility of Whidab could never be established while the king was living. He had, therefore, he said, offered to restore the people to their former possessions, provided they would put the king into his hands, dead or alive.
- g This conversation was followed by a variety of other discourse, through every part of which the king displayed the qualities of a noble and generous mind, as well as of an able politician, considering the barbarous ignorance in which he had ever been bred. Among other subjects that occurred, he complained to Snelgrave of the ingratitude of Mr. Lamb, the English factor; who, after receiving above three hundred ounces of gold from him, eight slaves, and in particular Tom, a favourite slave of Jachen, under promise of returning within a certain time limited, he should have have broke his faith, made light of the friendship of a great monarch, and infringed the rights of hospitality, by a flagrant breach of his word. His villainy, however, did not, he said, prejudice him against the nation ; there were bad men in all countries ; but it would be his endeavour not to furnish the English with an opportunity either of retorting or repeating the crime. The best apology Snelgrave could make for his countryman, was by disclaiming all acquaintance with him. After this, he told the king, that the English merchants had, besides the ship he commanded, five others that traded to Whidab and Jachen: he hoped therefore that his majesty would shew the same favour to the others he was pleased to confer on him ; to which the king replied, that notwithstanding he meant to restrain some of his favours to him in particular, yet the other captains should have no cause of complaint. Then began a bargain about slaves, at the conclusion of which, his majesty ordered the prince royal of Jachen to be called in. To him he declared, with orders to communicate his will to his brother, that whoever was detected of defrauding, robbing, injuring, or exacting exorbitant presents from any Englishman within the kingdom of Whidab or Jachen, should be impaled alive on the shore, in terrorem, and by the severity of the example to deter others from violating the sacred rights of hospitality. It being now late, Snelgrave and his companions took their leave, after returning his majesty thanks for the high honour he had done them, and the numberless favours conferred upon the Europeans in general.

As this audience lasted above five hours, he had full leisure and opportunity of making all the observations he could desire on his majesty's person and understanding. As to the former, it was of a middling stature, robust, and exactly proportioned. His face was filled with the small-pox, but not disfigured. His eyes were piercing and black, full of fire and spirit, of a gentleness and softness, just as the subject of discourse happened to turn. Snelgrave affirms, that every feature bespoke the greatness of his mind, and his whole deportment was that of a king. He was affable without being familiar, and possessed the happy art of descending to the level of his company, without laying aside majesty ; although you were invited to speak with freedom, yet it was not possible to lay aside respect ; and you beheld in the same person, the social companion and the mighty prince, the ease of the friend blended with the dignity of the monarch. In short, take him all in all, Truro Audati was a most extraordinary person, who possessed the most amiable virtues and striking qualities, without one vice, but what he owed to the prejudice of education, and the barbarous manners of his country.

BEFORE Snelgrave quitted the Dahoman court, he had occasion to see a review of the troops before the royal tent. Three thousand of them were armed with musquets, swords, and targets, which they exercised to admiration, having gone through all the evolutions, and fired twenty rounds in the space of two hours. All the rest of the troops were armed in the manner common to Negroes. As they passed the king, they prostrated themselves to the ground, kissed the earth, and rose up with a sprightliness and activity that was astonishing. What most surprized our author, was about 10,000 boys that followed the camp. These he was told were young soldiers, bred up to all the hardships of war, and fatigues of campaigns. They were taught the exercise, put at a certain age upon dangerous exploits, by way of probation, before they were admitted to the honour of serving their king, and supported at the public expence. " After this," says Snelgrave, " I could not wonder how Truro Audati came to be so powerful a prince, and mighty conqueror *."

Conclusion of the abstract from Snel-grave.

THIS abstract from the voyage of Snelgrave, we thought a necessary appendix to the history of Whidab. No author has described the manners of the potent kingdom of Dahomay ; and this occasion of relating all we knew concerning the conqueror of Whidab, and a prince of so glorious a character, we imagined would be no ingrateful present to our readers.

Kingdom of Ardrah.

- a WE come now to the kingdom of Ardrah, or the fourth division of that part of the kingdom of Benin called the Slave Coast. Europeans have not frequented it enough exactly to ascertain its geography or dimensions. We know, however, from undoubted authority and the concurrence of writers, that it extends a great way to the northern and interior country, that it is filled with populous towns and villages, and the kingdom in general is fertile and well cultivated, and the people warlike, although they were subdued by a nation more powerful than themselves. The truth is, Europeans are only acquainted with a few towns near the coast, and from these form their judgment of the rest. It is bounded, we are told, on the west by the Rio Volta, on the east by the kingdom of Benin Proper (these, including the kingdom of Whidab, taking in a tract of an hundred leagues), on the south by the ocean, and on the north-north-west, by the kingdoms of Oyeo and Alghemi, or Ulcami. Towards the south or sea-coast, Ardrah is extremely confined, widening as it extends northward into the form of a triangle. However, this is purely the conjecture of voyagers, and founded upon the lame and imperfect account of the natives, who are amazingly ignorant of the chorography of their own country, and indeed of every thing removed a few miles from their houses. The coast beginning four leagues east of Great Popo, and ending at Acqui, comprehends the space of twenty-five leagues, if we include the province of Jachen, which has a prince of its own, tributary to the king of Ardrah. Bosman and Barbot divide it into Great and Little Ardrah. Under the latter, they comprehend all the maritime coast, the interior country making the former. Little Ardrah ascends up the country as far as Offra, and Great Ardrah takes in the petty state of Torri (F). The coast from Whidab to Little Ardrah is low and flat, but rises by a gentle ascent as you proceed to Jachen<sup>p</sup>. This latter town is a league north-north-east distant from Praya or Little Ardrah, and is governed by a prince or Phidalgo, who resides here in a sumptuous manner, lodged in a palace wonderfully splendid for the country, and his confined dominions. Jachen, so called from the first Dutch factor, who resided there, is 1500 fathoms in circumference, surrounded by a deep ditch, supplied with water from a rivulet that runs into it. The Dutch and English had factories here; but of late years the latter is withdrawn. After the conquest of Ardrah, the palace of Jachen was burnt to the ground, notwithstanding the prince paid his submission to the king of Dahomay. How the accident arose we are not informed. Smith, indeed, affirms, that the Phidalgo at first resisted Truro Audati, and that the natives made an obstinate defence; but we are told by Snelgrave, and other good authors, that no attack upon the town was ever made; Lamb and the other Europeans surrendering themselves, and the Phidalgo yielding submission to Audati upon the first summons<sup>q</sup> (G).

Description of Ardrah.

The kingdom divided into Great and Little Ardrah.

- b NORTH of Jachen stands Offra, a considerable city, where the English and Dutch have each a handsome house or factory. Here the Dutch in particular carry on a great trade, and live with a splendor proportioned to their profits. Still farther north, between Offra and the capital, is situated Great Foro, in which is erected an inn for the accommodation of passengers, who are plentifully supplied with eatables, such as the country produces, and pito beer remarkably good. This town is populous, but inferior in beauty to the others we have mentioned.
- c Next stands the metropolis, called Assem by the natives, and Great Ardrah by the Europeans. It is the residence of the kings of Ardrah, and a fine city, five or six leagues in circuit. Here

(F) Torri has Faulaon for its capital, a town seated on the river Jachen, running east and west to Great Popo. The territory of Torri is four leagues in circumference, having Whidab on the west, Offra on the east, and the sea on the south. The state is independent, paying only a small acknowledgement for the protection of the king of Ardrah; the people industrious, but, like their neighbours, expert thieves and robbers. Their chief occupation is husbandry. They supply Europeans with the fruits of their labour, live themselves on those of their genius, frequently refuse paying the customary tribute to Ardrah, throw off their submission to the king, make incursions into the neighbouring kingdoms, and in particular rob and spoil the towns on the borders of Ardrah, by way of retribution (3).

(G) Barbot's account of Jachen is something different from the above. It derives its name, according to him, from a Negro, who raised it from a village to its present splendor, rather by his beneficence than his wealth. It is inclosed by a high and thick wall (4). The Phidalgo's house is rather convenient than magnificent, and built with mud. As to Little Ardrah, which all the Europeans call Offra, both Bosman (5) and Barbot agree that it stands upon a lower ground, but more interior country, than Jachen; a description we are unable to reconcile with their account of the land rising by an easy ascent, as you proceed from the sea-coast to the inland parts. One indeed perceives, at the first glance, a variety of contradictions in all their topography: Jachen, according to the maps inserted in Prewett's collection, stands upon a river of the same name, also called Torri or Tarri, about seven miles from the sea. The wars of Ardrah with the Dahomans having ruined the country (6), Smith alleges, that the viceroy and his court had retired to an island, which they fortified, in the middle of the river; but this is false, as Jachen was never governed by a viceroy, nor was the Phidalgo ever obliged to abandon the capital.

the royal family has two palaces, the one only inhabited, the other reserved for a retreat in case of fire or other accidents. The dimensions which the Negroes give to this city are not improbable, if we consider the breadth of the streets, and the space between every house, as a security against the effects of fire; each house being likewise inclosed by its own rampart, forming a court round it, as a farther precaution against this dangerous element. D'Elbee, who visited this city in 1669, says, that you enter it by four gates; whereas other writers affirm, that notwithstanding its great extent, it has but one gate; an improbable circumstance that requires the testimony of the best authority. The walls, which are of mud, are high and thick, firm and compact as stone and lime. The gates front each other, and are defended by deep ditches on the inside. Over these you pass by a draw-bridge, which may either be raised up, or intirely taken away at pleasure. Over each gate is a guard-room for the accommodation of the officers and soldiers entrusted with the keys of the city; and upon each side stands a file of musqueteers, with drawn swords in their hands. The Euphrates encompasses one half of the city. The buildings are of clay, covered with straw, and the streets kept in the utmost order, free from filth and every inconvenience<sup>r</sup>.

BOTH the royal palaces are surrounded with high walls of earth and clay, that binds like cement, and is firm and smooth as plaister. They consist of large courts, with long wide galleries, supported by beautiful pillars finely ornamented. Under these piazzas the natives have the privilege of walking. The buildings are two stories high, with long narrow slips of windows, perfectly adapted to the climate, as they occasion a great draught of fresh air. The floors of all the apartments are covered with silk carpets, or fine mats, of a pretty taste. In each was a single armed chair, a variety of silk and brocade cushions, tables, folding screens, Japan cabinets, and chests of the finest China porcelain. The windows were hung with curtains of taffety, and lashed with white cloth, glazed in a manner that admitted the light, but excluded the night air. The gardens were spacious, and laid out in the most delicate taste, in fine long walks, shaded with odoriferous trees, and lined on each side with shrubs and flowers of a sweet smell, and pleasing colours. Nothing could be more beautiful than the elegant parterres, the fanciful grass plats, joined by serpentine walks and groves, and refreshed by the cooling murmur of a dimpling brook, which glided over shining pebbles<sup>s</sup>. But we speak of what the palace of Ardrab has been, not what it is since the reduction of the kingdom by the king of Dahomay.

BESIDES the capital, and above-mentioned towns, Ardrab has others surrounded by walls. The natives boast chiefly of Jajo and Ba, the one three days journey from Jachen, the other half a league further. Jajo, or Jago, has two gates to the south, and is washed by a river on the north, that falls into the Rio de Formosa, or river of Benin, at Ba, where the Dutch have a small factory. If in the whole kingdom there are any towns unwalled, it is because their natural situation and strength render the assistance of art unnecessary; and yet we see that all these precautions could not secure them against a warlike nation, led on by a brave and politic prince. Between all the cities are great roads, cut extremely commodious for travellers and traders, who have an easy method of transporting their merchandize. There are also deep canals cut from one river to another; these are constantly filled with canoes, either for pleasure or business, which give the country an air of wealth and industry. The vallies are pleasant, and produce wheat, millet, yams, potatoes, lemons, oranges, coco-nuts and palm-wine. In the low and marshy grounds near the sea, they make salt, by evaporation of the stagnated water; with which commodity they drive a great trade to the interior countries of Alghemi and Oyeo, by the great canal of Ba, the finest in the kingdom. Here may be seen myriads of canoes, going and returning either with salt, gold dust, or the commodities of the countries to which they carry their salt. But however convenient for trade and industry the fine roads and canals of Ardrab might be, they were the great means of its conquest, as by them the victorious Truro Audati found it an easy matter, not only to march his army into the country, but to supply himself with provisions, amunition, and every necessary<sup>t</sup>.

Small-pox epi-

fatal at *Ar-

The Ardrasian method of corresponding by a cypher.

As to the air, it is in general unwholesome, and disagrees with Europeans. Out of five that are seized with any disorder, hardly four ever recover; but the small-pox is the disease most common and most fatal. The natives who escape the ravages of this cruel disease are robust, healthy, vigorous, and long-lived. Here the people prefer the language of Alghemi to their vernacular tongue, esteeming it more elegant, sweet, and sonorous. No letters or written characters of either of these languages are in use, but the king and nobility speak, read, and write the Portuguese fluently. The vulgar, who can neither write nor read, use a small cord tied in knots, to each of which they affix certain ideas, and by that means convey their sentiments to a distance. It is a kind of cypher, where the parties must settle certain preliminaries, before they are able to correspond. There is, however, a great deal of genius in this contrivance, and prodigious memory necessary to the execution of it with a tolerable degree of accuracy; yet

- a. it is surprising with what facility they retain and combine the ideas first annexed to each knot<sup>u</sup>.

THERE is no great difference in the manners, dress, or religion of the Ardrans from those of the Whidans. The court dress, like the Persian, consists of two silk or brocade paans, or petticoats, with a broad scarf down across the breast and shoulders, in the manner of a sash. The king wears a kind of laced coif, with a long appendage behind a small crown of fragrant wood, and a whip with a wrought handle, curiously ornamented. The people of inferior distinction wear five or six paans one over another, of cotton cloth, the manufacture of the country. Those who can afford it, have them set off with ornaments of gold studs, hanging round in a loose and jingling manner. Although the ordinary custom of the country is to leave the upper part of the body naked, yet many persons of distinction wear a short sattin mantle over their shoulders, by way of morning dress. In visits, and upon ceremonious occasions, this is laid aside, and the natural black skin preferred, as more beautiful and becoming. The Marbut, or high priest, has a long piece of white cotton wrapped round him, plaited in a pretty taste. He likewise covers his thighs and legs with long cotton drawers, and his feet with slippers or sandals of red leather. On his head he wears a cap, or European hat, a large coteau with a gilt head by his side, and cane in his hand. The Marbut alone stands covered in the king's presence: as for the nobility, they pull off their caps and slippers before they enter the presence-chamber. But the women carry their passion for dress and finery to an extravagant height. You shall see them clothed with loads of the finest sattins, chintzes and brocades, adorned with a profusion of gold, and panting under the weight of their ornaments, that they may gratify their vanity. Nor is this altogether the fault of the women, it is owing in a great measure to the false taste of the men, who never think a woman genteelly dressed, without she be oppressed with superfluous bales of silk or sattin. One custom both sexes have in common, and that is the most scrupulous regard to cleanliness, and keeping their bodies neat and sweet. They both wash and perfume themselves with civet and aromatic herbs every morning and evening; nor does a woman ever presume to receive the caresses of her husband, before she has performed this just duty<sup>w</sup>.

THE usual food all over the kingdom is pork, beef, mutton, goats and dogs flesh, together with rice, fruits, roots, pulse, and all kinds of vegetables; which they indiscriminately call by the name of Kade. Their bread is made into cakes or Kankis, and their drink composed of pito and water mixed. This species of beer we have already fully described in our account of Whidab, where it is made in the utmost perfection. The best that this country affords is at Foro and Offra, whence the court and nobility are supplied. What is brewed in other parts of the kingdom soon grows sour, and if carried, ferments violently, bursts the casks, and is intirely lost.

THE men have here the same liberty as at Whidab, of taking as many women as they are able to maintain. No great ceremony is observed in matters of love; the great liberty enjoyed by single women, whose general carriage is loose and lascivious, affords abundance of opportunities for making and receiving addresses. Birth and fortune are seldom regarded. The men of the lowest class pretend to women of the highest quality, love qualifies alone, sets all degrees upon a level; regulates the conduct of parents in unequal matches, and makes all the parties happy. How different this custom from a certain unnatural act, past in a country the most admired for its laws, and the first in rank of any perhaps in the world, for the good sense, the erudition, and the manly freedom of the people! Notwithstanding this toleration, men seldom look for wives out of their own class: as they chiefly associate with those, so their choice is generally confined among them. The king's favourite woman is honoured with the title of queen, and enjoys the strange prerogative of selling the other concubines, when the king is deficient in his disbursements (H). The nobility marry young ladies of quality, of nine or ten years of age: they take them home to their houses, keep them naked in quality of slaves, and defer the consummation of their nuptials till nature indicates their maturity. Upon this occasion they present them with cloaths; and now the feast is kept, which consists in pro-

(H) To procure the title of queen, she must, as in Turkey, be the mother of the king's first-born son. An instance of her power over her rivals occurred when D'Elbee was at Ardrab. The king refusing to give the queen certain jewels and trinkets she demanded, to enable her to purchase them, she privately conveyed eight of his women on board an European ship, and had a handsome price for them. They were stamp'd immediately with the company's mark, treated with uncommon tenderness while on board, but carried into slavery to Martinico, where they spent the remainder of their lives (7).

fuse eating, and riotous drinking and mirth. Liquors are likewise distributed to all the relations, acquaintance, and neighbours of either party. The mode of courtship is extremely concise, the gallant using no other ceremony, than presenting the object of his love with a callico paan, and her relations with some pots of pito. After this he declares to the company, that he will marry the lady, whom he names; she grants her consent, and the courtship and marriage are ended all in one *. Yet though polygamy is permitted, adultery is no less frequent than in countries where the men are confined to one woman. This arises from the strong desires of the women; the husband generally confining his favours to one or two, the rest are forced to look out for other means of gratifying their appetites (I).

authors.

WRITERS observe, that the climate of Ardrab is unfavourable to the propagation of the species, it seldom happening that a woman ever becomes mother of more than two or three children. But this we would rather ascribe to their policy, than to any default in the air and climate. The women are married so young, that their charms vanish, they lose the power of exciting desire, and indeed of enjoying nature, before the age of maturity in other countries. Besides, the men are enervated with the opportunity which variety affords of indulging their passions; and as they marry while they are boys, they are debilitated before they become men. One extraordinary notion, considering the inequality of births, prevails in this country; it is, that a woman delivered of twins is reputed an adulteress, because they cannot conceive how a woman, who has confined her caresses to one man, should bring forth two children. The men, says Barbot, after having robbed the flower of its chief beauty, the modest blush, do not confine themselves to their own women, but lie on the watch to decoy the wives and daughters of their neighbours; a vicious principle in human nature, that grasps at whatever is without the reach of possession. This author affirms, contrary to the testimony of all other writers, that the women are kept in the utmost subjection, prohibited the sight of men, much more their conversation, and scarcely admitted into the company of Europeans, before the husband is fully satisfied of their morals, and possessed with high notions of their honour and character. Indeed, if the manners of the women be such as we have described, this restriction is almost a natural consequence †.

tilling the earth at Ardrah.

THE inhabitants of the sea-coast employ themselves in fishing and making salt, which, as we have said, they send to the interior countries. Those of the inland are all husbandmen, farmers, and graziers. They cultivate the earth by the strength of their arms, and as the scripture has it, with the sweat of their brow; for here are no ploughs or instruments of husbandry to ease the labourer; all is performed with the spade and mattock, whence the ground is more thoroughly broke, the grain better covered, and the fruits proportioned to the superior degree of care and labour. Where-ever husbandry is wholly pursued, the country discovers evident marks of the skill and pains bestowed upon it. The whole is divided into the nicest order. Here stands a plat of maize, there a field of wheat: on the one side grow pease, cabbages, and all sorts of culinary greens; on the other potatoes and roots; every separate article being divided by a double row of fruit-trees, and the whole inclosed by tall strait trees, either for ornament or use, the boughs of which afford a pleasing and cooling shade to the labourer, spent with fatigue and the scorching beams of the sun ‡.

Funeral obse-quies at Ar-
drah.

THE manner of burying the dead in Ardrab differs only in particular circumstances from what we shall relate in our account of the Gold Coast. There the relations of the deceased furnish the winding sheet and cloaths in which the body was wrapped; here that expence falls upon the governor of the place, who adds it to the king's account. Besides, instead of a public burying place, the natives of Ardrab are interred in their own houses, where there is a vault appropriated for the dead. All funeral obsequies are performed with great pomp and magnificence. Be the person ever so much despised in his life-time, he is respected at his death, agreeable to the maxim of the poet, extinctus amabitur idem; nor does the king's interment differ from that of his subjects, only that three months after his death a certain number of slaves are sacrificed to his manes, and buried by his side.

Government.

As to the government, it is monarchical and despotic. The king, stiled of Ardrab Algbemi, and sometimes of Jachen, is absolute, and approached with prostration, and the most humble marks of submission. His court is numerous and splendid. The chief priest is second

(1) What greatly contributes to the frequency of this crime, are the lascivious manners and wanton air which the women assume before all men except their husbands; for in their presence they are full of respect, awe, and submission. When the husband receives the visit of a stranger, his wives are all ranged on mats on each side of him. Upon a signal made, they begin beating little brass musical instruments, perfectly calculated to raise loose desires, and the appetite of love (8).

- a in dignity, and prime minister in spirituals and temporals. Phidalgo's are appointed governors of every town, dependent on the king, who, though to little purpose, generally raise by seizures, confiscations, and extortion, immense estates, which often excite the avarice of the king, and occasion their death or banishment. Nothing can be more pompous than the king's public appearance. He is preceded by the master of horse, bearing the sword of state, and supported on foot by two chief officers, the general of horse on the right hand, and the captain of commerce on the left, with down-cast eyes, and bended knees; the whole followed by a numerous train, first of nobility, and next of gentry, dressed in robes proper for the occasion. The prince-royal and high-priest enjoy the exclusive privilege of talking to the king standing face to face; the other subjects of all degrees prostrate themselves, kiss the ground, and are permitted only to raise their heads to receive an answer. Every officer of the household is called captain; the high steward of the household captain of the table; the purveyor, captain of the victuals; and the cup-bearer, captain of the wine<sup>a</sup>.

THE crown of Ardrab is hereditary, devolving by birth-right to the eldest son, who alone inherits the effects of the deceased king. To prevent contests and rebellion, as well as to maintain an absolute and servile dependance on the crown, no provision is made for the younger children. They serve in the army, and are raised by their merit, but never to the chief command. Others apply to trade and acquire plentiful fortunes; for their affinity to the king, even though they are not countenanced by him, procures them numberless advantages in the course of business. Foreigners pay them extraordinary respect, and in compliment to the monarch, make them presents, and indulge them in the first offer of their goods. The other subjects treat them with great deference, and allow them advantages in bargains, which they deny to each other, either from the motives of compassion, on seeing them reduced to the necessity of trade, or from a natural respect for the blood royal, of which they are unable to divest themselves.

THE crown revenues arise from heavy capitations on the natives and foreigners, slaves from tributary countries, the sale of slaves of all sorts, duties upon foreign trade, taxes upon markets and the necessaries of life, and lastly from the confiscation of the estates of governors, who have either rebelled or incurred the displeasure of the court, and the seizure of all estates got in the government's service, upon the death of the proprietor. In this case the children inherit nothing, and the unhappy wives, who have lived in the utmost pomp and luxury, are sent to work and drudge in the salt-pits; nay, some political cases occur, where the deceased king's children are made the slaves of his successor, perhaps of their own brother.

WHOEVER disobeys the king's command is beheaded, his wives and children becoming the slaves of the crown. Insolvent debtors are sold at the pleasure of the creditor; and yet notwithstanding the rigour of the law, no country abounds more with bankrupts. The case is the same with adultery. A violation of the marriage bed is punished with servitude: a married woman who prostitutes her person to a slave, becomes the slave of her gallant's master, if he be superior in quality to her own master or husband: on the contrary, if the husband be of higher rank, the adulterer becomes his slave, and yet is the crime frequent.

SEEING the king eat or drink, or even the dishes carried to or from table, is punished with death, and the criminal's whole family partake of the punishment, by their being enrolled slaves for life. When the king drinks, an officer makes a signal with two iron rods, for all to prostrate themselves. Des Marchais relates a melancholy instance of the consequence of disobeying this signal, though the trespass was merely accidental. A favourite-child having fallen asleep by the king's side, awoke at the noise of the rods, and was unfortunate enough to cast his eyes on his majesty, while he was drinking. The high-priest ordered the infant to be killed on the spot; nor did the king offer to intercede for him. On the contrary, the priest sprinkled his cloaths and body with the blood of the little innocent: an inhuman ceremony, they imagined necessary to expiate a crime of so black a complexion, and prevent direful consequences<sup>b</sup>.

IN every town the wives of freemen are sent by turns to certain schools, where female accomplishments are taught. Here they learn the exercises for five or six months, in a house belonging to the high-priest. Old women instruct them in dancing and singing, the voice being accompanied by the jingling of bits of iron and copper, suspended to their legs and arms, with which they beat measure. They are forced to dance and sing with such violence, and for so long a time, that their spirits being fatigued, spent, and exhausted, they drop down with faintness. Parties succeed each other day and night in this frantic and extravagant employment; nor can a woman come better recommended to her husband, than by holding out longer than any other in the company<sup>c</sup>.

EUROPEANS are permitted to travel only by night, and through by-roads, to prevent <sup>a</sup> their making remarks on the country; there have been many instances, however, wherein they have been exempted from this general restriction. They are treated with great civility by the natives, and the king entertains at his own expence all merchants who come to Assem upon business. Apartments are appointed them in the palace, and their distinct quarters to each nation. At an audience the king distinguishes them with particular marks of regard and friendship, by taking and pressing their hands in his own, touching their forefingers three times, placing them by his side on mats spread on the floor, and dispatching their affairs with expedition; nor is the respect and amity shewn them by the prince-royal and high-priest inferior; the same motives of policy and hospitality actuate each. The Dutch drive a considerable trade with Ardrab; that of the English, without being so extensive, is extremely profitable. <sup>b</sup> This commerce, consisting of provisions, slaves, cotton, cloths, and a blue stone, called acori or aigris, is settled with the king or high-priest. Captains of European ships, who are conducted and introduced to court by the Pbidalgo or governor of Praya, present the king with coral, Cyprus cloths, morees, and damask, for customs and liberty of trading. The queen, the prince, and the high-priest are likewise presented with coral, damask napkins, and armoisin. Beads, or brass rings and bujis, are given to the foello, or captain of white men, to the court dancers and porters. Licence is proclaimed at a village four miles to the south-south-west of Praya, called by the Dutch Stock Vis Dorp, upon the captain's return from Assem; and warehouses are appointed for lodging and selling the goods. Forty brass rings, twenty hens, one goat, and a piece of kanchin, or a little armoisin, are paid to the crier. The bonga, or cap- <sup>c</sup> tain of the bar, whose duty it is to attend the beach, and direct the landing of all goods, is paid for twelve trips of a canoe to and from the ship to the beach, to the value of a slave in effects. When the sale is ended, the king receives in acknowledgement of his favour a second present, consisting of two musquets, twenty-five pounds of powder, and merchandize to the amount of nine slaves. The foello, bonga, and inferior officers are also presented a second time with armoisin, &c. The customs and duties paid by each ship, great or small, amount in the whole to 70 or 80 slaves. The king has the first choice of goods, whether in the payment of duties, or in exchange for slaves; the hereditary prince the second, the merchant prince the third, the Mar- but the fourth, and afterwards the great officers of the court. With respect to the people, the <sup>d</sup> general price of goods is regulated by a tariff; when differences arise, they are terminated by the king's decision. The slaves that are annually exported, to the number of 3000, are prisoners made in war, contributions levied upon tributary princes, criminals whose punishments are changed into slavery, slaves born, or the children of slaves, insolvent debtors sold for the benefit of the creditor, or the wives and relations to a certain degree of all who disobey the king, or incur the lash of the royal displeasure <sup>d</sup>.

Goods proper for importation are large white beads, large glass or crystal ear-rings, gilt hangers, iron bars, sailors knives, copper bells, of cylindric and conic forms, guns, copper and brass basons of all kinds, coloured taffeties, striped pinked silks, fine coloured handkerchiefs, long white horse-tails, looking-glasses, large umbrella's, brandy, china, Indian silks, gold and silver in dust, with English and Dutch crowns. By the last great profits are gained; ten <sup>e</sup> crowns being the highest price for a slave: but bujis or cowries, which are the currency of the country, are the best commodities. Europeans, in all bargains for slaves, pay half bujis; or, if they run scarce, one-third in bujis and the remainder in goods. There are public markets all over the country for salt. One is established at Ba, another is held round a lofty tree with spreading boughs, about six leagues distant; others in other places, at each of which three or four thousand African merchants attend with goods from all parts. The manner of reckoning the bujis is the same here as at Whidab <sup>e</sup>.

With regard to the martial abilities of the Ardrasians, authors differ extremely. Some charge them with the most effeminate cowardice, while others characterise them as a hardy <sup>f</sup> bold people. Perhaps both accounts may be reconciled by comparing the different circumstances at the times when those authors wrote. If we form our judgment upon the event of the war with the king of Dahomay, we may be led to attribute their misfortunes to their pusillanimity: if, on the contrary, we judge from the extent of the kingdom and the number of states tributary to Ardrab, it may reasonably be inferred, that once the people had been martial, however they might have degenerated. All authors indeed agree, that they fought in a tumultuous manner, without order, or any plan of operations, and with great cruelty: no great proof either of courage or conduct. Barbot and Bosman affirm, that the king of Ardrab, with his dependent countries, has twenty times the strength of Whidab; yet did he never gain any advantages over that little nation, or even venture to declare war, though the kings lived in a state of perpetual hostilities. This indeed may be true, and yet no reflection on the courage <sup>g</sup>

- a of the Ardrasians. It was an easy matter for a populous compact kingdom, like Whidah, to defend itself against the attempts of an enemy more powerful, and as brave as itself. The extensive frontiers of Ardrab exposed her to the continual incursions of all the neighbouring states: the number of tributary provinces, that watched an opportunity of throwing off the yoke, rendered it dangerous for her to enter a-fresh into war; and perhaps a peaceable reign might have contributed to confirm the political maxims of the government. But not to reason, we shall proceed to facts. An army of 40,000 horse and foot is easily raised by the king; none being exempted from taking the field besides old men and children. On the maritime coasts, musquets and swords are the soldiers weapons; in the interior country they use bows and arrows, hangers, javelins, and wooden clubs. In all expeditions they carry a pole, bent
- b in form of an S, with silk flags and colours at the extremity. Their drums are long, and sharp pointed at the lower end. Bells make a part of their military music; and while they ring, the soldiers throw their bodies into a variety of antic postures and contortions. The horse make use of trumpets, of a small size and shrill animating tone. These instruments are also the music at festivals and public rejoicings for victory, which they keep with great solemnity, and as a thing not very common among them. But, besides musical instruments, the army is attended by bards or story-tellers, to rouse and animate the men, by the relation of valorous actions, and amuse and divert them, by buffoonery and scenes of comic humour<sup>f</sup>.
- Voyagers take notice of considerable differences between the religions of Ardrab and Whidah. Although the natives of Ardrab are perhaps the least addicted to superstition of
- c any people upon the coast, yet the number of their priests is infinite; and persons of the highest distinction deem it an honour to treat them in their houses. Most of the nobility keep Feticheers, or chaplains, under the direction of the high priest; who appoints an idol for the worship of every family. Some have an allegator, some have a bird like a crow, and mountains, trees, and stones have their votaries. Notwithstanding they are thus plunged into the grossest idolatry, and void of all notions of a future state, yet have they some confused ideas of a Supreme Being, who directs the time and occasions of their births and deaths. They believe likewise in his power over their good or evil fortune. They are alarmed at the smallest accident, and shrink at the thoughts of death. Their Feticheers are respected in general; but the Marbut, or chief priest, is held in the highest esteem and veneration: he is believed
- d able to foretel future events, by conversing with an image, of the size of a young child, which he keeps in the audience chamber. This image is painted white, according to their notion of the devil, and reveals the arrival of European ships six months before. Families assemble every six months, to interrogate this Fetiche concerning their future fortune, and to perform sacrifices to him. The Feticheers return answers in a low voice, which they are firmly persuaded issue from the image: such is the craft of priesthood in all ages and countries of the world, as if their authority depended upon fraud and imposture. After the oracles are delivered, the idol is covered with an earthen vessel, pierced in several places. The Feticheers, whose perquisites are a butt of beer and a sack of flour, and the company sprinkle the vessel with beer and meal mixed into a thin dough; after which a bumper is filled round in
- e honour of the Fetiche, and the company withdraws, when the liquor present is ended. No business is transacted upon certain days sacred to the Fetiche of the family; and this rule even the king inviolably observes; yet in most points the Ardrasians relax from the rigid austerity enjoined by their priests. They disbelieve in the resurrection of the dead; except where the person has fallen in battle, and fighting for his country. In this case they suppose the order of nature may be inverted, in honour of those heroes; and that they shall rise again in two days, with new features and lineaments. This they believe to be the reason why they are not recognized by their old acquaintance. The Feticheers here, as at Whidah, are the only physicians the country affords. They make decoctions of certain healing herbs, and sacrifice animals, for the recovery of the sick, in their respective dwellings. The Fetiche is rubbed with
- f the blood, and the flesh is eaten, or burnt. Snelgrave relates an extraordinary instance of their respect for the priesthood, those doctors of soul and body. It is an inviolable law, he observes, that in whatever house near the palace a fire should chance to break out, the master of that house, with all his family, suffer death. Nothing can be more unjust and cruel than this law; but it is attended with happy consequences; fewer accidents from fire occurring in Ardrab, than in any other kingdom, as the law is executed with unrelenting rigour on all degrees of men. Yet when the royal palace at Jachen was burnt down, though it was well known that the fire began at a priest's house, and strongly suspected that he had done it with design, the affair was hushed up, and no enquiry made<sup>g</sup>.
- As authors have not minutely described the manners, laws, and government of this king-
- g dom, the reader must content himself with such detached pieces of history as they afford.

Wars of Ardrah.

Recital of a French voyage, from Des Marchais.

While Barbot resided at Ardrah, there arrived in that city the ambassadors of a mighty inland prince. Their instructions were, to represent to the king the grievances of his subjects, who had complained to the king their master of the despotism of his government. They were ordered to declare to his majesty, that if he did not loosen the reins, and govern with moderation and equity, the king their master would think himself obliged, in defence of humanity, to march his army into the country, for the protection of those who sought his assistance. This menace the monarch of Ardrah received with anger; and, to shew his contempt, ordered the ambassadors to be punished. After this insult, the inland prince marched an army of a million of men, says our author, into Ardrah; who, carrying terror and desolation everywhere, laid almost the whole kingdom waste: after which the general withdrew his troops. An extraordinary method of relieving the distress of his supplicants! The king his master was highly displeased at his retiring so soon, and ordered him to be put to death, because he had not brought him the head of the king of Ardrah: “for which,” says he, “I sent you, and not to ruin his innocent subjects.” Such was the terror struck by this nation, that the Ardrahians cannot hear their name mentioned without horror. The negroes relate a thousand terrible stories of them; among others, a custom they have of depriving their prisoners of their privy members, and adorning themselves with those indecent spoils. Barbot concludes with giving it as his opinion, that the prince here meant must have been the prince of Yos or Oyeos. His reason is, that the sea, which they are forbid by their priests from approaching, is the national Fetiche: a reason that rather proves this conqueror to be the king of Dabamoy, unless both kingdoms agree in this object of their worship <sup>a</sup>.

WE shall conclude our account of Ardrah with the following voyage and embassy, extracted for the entertainment of the reader from the second volume of Des Marchais's voyage to Guiney. The French West India company, established in 1664, being in great want of slaves, equipped the ships Justice and Concord, to make a slave trading voyage to Guiney. The Sieur D'Elbee was appointed commodore, the Sieur Debourg commander of an intended fort, and one Carlof, who had long resided at Ardrah, in the Dutch service, chief factor. The ships departed from Havre de Grace on the 1st of November, A. 1669, and anchored January the 4th, 1670, in the road of Ardrah. Carlof set out for Offra, from whence he sent an express to acquaint the king of their arrival, and another to the commodore, to inform him of the endeavours the Dutch were using to frustrate the expedition. In ten days after, his majesty dispatched the deputy captain from Assem, with assurance of his joy, and intention to grant the French equal, if not superior, privileges to any other nation. Two days after, the prince royal and captain of commerce arrived, to conduct the French to court, and came even to the sea side. The commodore D'Elbee saluted them with four discharges of twelve pieces of cannon, and then landing, waited, by order, the prince's arrival. Different companies of blacks approached, with drums beating and colours flying, exhibiting various feats of activity and adroitness, as they saluted D'Elbee in passing. They were followed by the great officers of the household, at the head of the guards, with shouldered musquets and gilt headed sabres by their sides. The master of horse walked on foot, richly dressed, covered, and bearing on his shoulder, the sword of state. His royal highness advanced slowly, under a large umbrella, supported by two officers of state; the general of horse on the right, and the captain of commerce on the left hand. Several grandees followed, and the procession was closed by above 10,000 blacks, just in the manner in which we have described the king's public appearance. His highness having stopped within ten paces of the commodore, D'Elbee advanced, as directed, and saluted him with a profound reverence. The prince stretched out his hand, and received the commodore's, which he gently squeezed, looking at the same time earnestly into his face, as if he would penetrate into the sentiments he entertained of him. D'Elbee then addressed him in Portuguese; but the prince, though he spoke the language well, chose out of pomp to answer by his interpreter. He assured the commodore, that all his interest with the king should be exerted in his favour; then, walking hand in hand with D'Elbee to the shore, he examined the long-boat with great attention, took the ensign in his hand, and ordered it to be placed on the top of the tent erected for the commodore's reception. Round this, an hundred musqueteers were drawn up, whose pieces, pouches, and sabres, were in good order.

THE prince was about thirty, of a large stature, lusty, but not fat or unweildy. His face was handsome, his eyes fine, his teeth regular and white, his countenance smiling, and the whole of his manner agreeable. On his head he wore an European hat, with red and white feathers: his dress was a fatten paan, a robe of taffety, that flowed loose, and long behind, a broad taffety scarf, in the manner of a belt, red morocco slippers on his feet, and the upper part of his body naked from the girdle. Dinner was provided in the tent, by the prince's order, who honoured the commodore with a seat on his right hand, the Sieurs a Debourg, Carlof, and the English factors on the left. Beef, wild boar, goats flesh, pullets, and other fowls, were served up, boiled and roasted, with ragouts made of palm oil. Kowries, or half calabasses, resembling the small tortoiseshell, were the dishes and plates. The prince was served on the knee, and fanned all the while by officers with scented fans; he fed with his own hands three favourites, who stood behind him, and performed the honours of the table with great politeness. An air of grandeur and dignity, tempered with sweetness, gained the affection and respect of the company. Water for washing was served in crystal cups, with napkins neatly folded, after the last course; when palm wine, sack, port, and claret were sent upon table, in the fashion, and with all the politeness of the most refined luxury of Europe. His highness, who was well acquainted with the history of Europe, kept up the conversation with spirit, preserving much gravity, yet discovering great vivacity in his remarks, and good sense, penetration, and delicacy of taste and genius in his questions. The commodore, having distributed among the people a great quantity of bujis, was received on his coming out of the tent with loud acclamations. After this, trade was opened, and full liberty granted to all the subjects of Ardrab to traffick with the French. The prince accompanied the commodore to his boat, which the blacks carried upon their shoulders beyond the high furs; and at his departure he promised his protection to the French nation. On going on board, the commodore took leave of his highness by several broad-sides from the ships, and cheers from the crews.

THE Sieurs Debourg and Carlof attended his highness, by invitation, to Assem, where, by the king's order, they were lodged in the palace, in a department appropriated to the French nation. Debourg was introduced to his majesty, in quality of ambassador, by the prince, high priest, and the captains of horse and commerce. The king placed him on a cotton couch near his armed chair, and returned the most obliging answers to his speech by the interpreters Matteo and Francisco. Debourg presented his majesty with a coach, and other presents, from the company; desiring leave to erect a factory at Offra, and engaging that four ships should be sent yearly to keep up a brisk trade with his dominions. To this his majesty answered, that he neither wanted merchandize or ships: that the Dutch, who had proposed an alliance, and made considerable offers to obtain an exclusive right of commerce, sent more ships than he could load. He taxed the English and French with neglecting the trade of Ardrab, by forfeiting their former engagements: "yet," continued he, the great things I have heard of your king, and the regard his ministers pay to commerce, has raised a desire in me of securing the esteem of so great a prince, by treating his subjects kindly. To encourage therefore and protect their trade, I have given orders to my captain of commerce to erect a factory." Upon this declaration, boxes of the richest goods were immediately presented for the king's choice, and the prices left to his majesty. The compliment had the intended effect, and raised his admiration of the polite generosity of the French nation. Carlof, who became manager by Debourg's illness, sent presents to the queen mother, and queen; and, raising the price of slaves from twelve to eighteen bars, traded for three hundred slaves with the prince, chief priest, and great captains. Besides these, the deputy captain brought seventy-five more, for the goods taken by the king, which was greatly above their value. Liberty for the company to trade in slaves was proclaimed in every part of the kingdom on February the 8th; and the king's receivers fixed the same duties at Offra as at Assem; such as were purchased of the king paying no customs or imposts of any sort.

THE Justice being ready to sail on the first of March, waited for her consort, who had not yet completed her cargo. To expedite matters, the commodore took a journey to court, attended by the Sieur Carlof and Mariage. Necessaries for their journey were provided by the Phidalgo of Offra, and the captain of strangers conducted them to Assem. Here he was lodged in the French apartments in the palace, and honoured the day of his arrival with an audience. The great captains of horse and commerce introduced him to the king, who was seated under a rich canopy, in a great armed chair of damask, in the garden. This prince had been bred in a Portuguese convent, where he imbibed the principles of Christianity; but, for political reasons, concealed them. He dreaded the resentment of the Marbut, whose authority with the people was so great as might have made him totter in the throne, had he attempted any innovations in religion. King Torison, for that was his name, was seventy years of age, lusty, tall, and robust, with large and lively eyes. Penetration, wisdom, and good sense appeared in his countenance; nor did his conversation falsify those first impressions. He was dressed after the Persian fashion, with taffety paans, the uppermost of pinked sattin, with a girdle of broad taffety, and all above naked. On his head he wore a coif of fine linen, edged with lace; over which he wore a crown of finely polished ebony. In his hand was a whip, probably a truncheon, with a black handle, curiously ornamented. After kissing hands with his majesty, the commodore was seated on a mat on his right hand, and his officers ranged on mats on both sides. Compliments being finished, the commodore, addressing his majesty, proposed building a factory in the French manner, that erected by the captain of commerce a being neither commodious nor sufficiently large. He told the king, that it would be the greatest security to trade to have their officers protected, and their goods well secured, and therefore intreated his royal permission to enter upon this first step towards both. In answer to this the king told him, that the officers might rely on his protection; that debts contracted by his subjects should be paid in twenty-four hours; and that the factory should be enlarged; but he refused to let the French build. "You will," says the sensible monarch, "erect a house, and put two small pieces of cannon in it at first. Next year you will mount four; this number you will gradually increase, till in a short time your factory will become a fort, that shall make you masters of my dominions, and enable you to give me law." This he accompanied with an air of raillery and good humour, that made it impossible for the commodore to be displeased with his refusal. After this, his majesty expressed great surprize that the French goods did not exceed in quality the English and Dutch. The commodore replied, that the company tried the success of the first voyage with the same effects, but that his majesty should for the future be supplied with the most elegant and curious merchandize. He intreated the king to name what would be most agreeable, and his majesty mentioned a silver hilted sword and cutlafs, large mirrors, the finest linen, laced shoes, velvet of all colours, scarlet cloth, slippers, silk stockings, and scented gloves. These the commodore promised he would bring or send in the first ship; and in the mean time presented his majesty with a fowling piece, and case of pistols with silver mounting; a present that was well received.

THE king proposed a visit to the prince, and accordingly the commodore was conducted to his palace, a league from the capital, by the captain of horse, at the head of an hundred troopers, armed with blunderbuffes and sabres. On this occasion the prince dispensed with the ceremonial that prohibits people of high rank from receiving visits in the morning. He met the commodore in the audience-chamber, which was spacious and handsome, the floor covered with a rich Turky carpet. The prince, who was seated on a mat, received him with great politeness, and familiarity; called for liquors, drank his health, and assured him in the kindest manner of the protection he had promised him. This visit ended, Monsieur D'Elbee supped, by invitation, with the high-priest. This great person's age was about forty, of an agreeable aspect, well made, and tall. He received the commodore with more formality than the princes had done, but with as much politeness. The finest clean mats were spread for table cloths on a Turky carpet that covered the floor. Sattin and taffety cushions were brought in for the guests to sit on; china and delft plates with fine diaper napkins, were served round; and the repast consisted of ragouts, boiled and roasted meats, with divers kinds of liquors, wines, brandy, pito, &c. Music enlivened the entertainments, and voices were heard like young childrens at a distance, which corresponded like the echo of the stronger voices, and were accompanied with the ringing of small bells. The priest, perceiving the commodore's attention, asked his opinion; and he in return expressed his astonishment and delight in the childrens singing. "They are my wives," replied the Marbut, "who afford you this amusement. It is not customary to shew our wives; but to convince you of the esteem I have for the French, I will give you the satisfaction, if you please." The commodore thanking him, after supper the priest conducted the company to a high gallery, with a window into the hall where they had supped. Here were seventy or eighty women, covered only with taffety paans, the upper part of the body being wholly naked. They sat in rows on mats at the ends and sides of the gallery, undisturbed and unconcerned at the entrance of the company, and continuing, with a modest bashful look, to sing and play with iron rods and little cylindrical copper bells. A figure of a child, of four years of age, stood in a corner of the gallery. It was painted white, and well cast. The commodore asked whose image it was? "The devil's," replied the priest. "The devil is not white," said the commodore: "that is your mistake," answered the priest; "for I can assure you he is very white, having often seen and conversed with him." He added, "you are obliged to him; for it is six months since he informed me of the design you had planned in France of opening a trade here. Pursuant to his advice we have neglected other Europeans, that you might the sooner have your cargo completed." The commodore suppressed his sentiments of this relation of the prelate's, not caring to enter into a dispute, which it would be impossible to determine. After this he took his leave, and the priest attended him to his hammock, in which he obliged the commodore to place himself before he would return to the palace. Hence he was escorted to Offra under a strong guard; and his consort having obtained her full complement of slaves, the commodore set sail from Guiney. It was thought convenient, however, that the Concord should remain a few days behind for the Sieur Mariage, who was putting the last hand to some affairs of the company.

THE Dutch apprehending the loss of their trade, if the French succeeded in their design of establishing a settlement here, did all that lay in their power to traverse them; and looked with

- a envy on every mark of civility and favour the king bestowed on a Frenchman. Hitherto the force of the commodore kept their resentment from breaking out; but on his departure, and the arrival of two Dutch ships, that jealous people began to give full scope to their spleen. Under pretence of an exclusive right of trading, they pulled down the French flag at Praya. The Sieur Mariage flew with his people to oppose the indignity, and the dispute must have ended in blood, had not the Phidalgo interposed, and threatened with banishment whoever should disturb the public tranquillity. Expresses were dispatched to court with remonstrances from the Phidalgo; the affair was referred to the king, and both parties summoned to Asses. When they came here, new disputes arose concerning precedence, that still more embroiled the king and council, already perplexed. Mariage declared he would run the Dutch factor through the body, if he presumed to go before him. The prince prevented the quarrel from rising to extremities, by conducting the Frenchman to audience on his right hand, and the Dutchman on the left. The king approving the expedient, placed the parties accordingly, and admitted their remonstrances. The Dutchman could not deny the superiority assumed by the French, and acknowledged by all Europe, over the States General; but he insisted upon his right in consequence of a prior settlement at Ardrab. Mariage published the republic's original, and declared to whom they owed their liberty and very being. Both parties grew warm; when the king, commanding silence, spoke to this effect. "Address yourselves to your masters; let them regulate the precedence and rights of their servants; it doth not become me, who am ignorant of their circumstances and power. The date of settlements seems to determine the precedence in favour of the Dutch; but the great things I have heard of, and the power ascribed to, the French monarch, incline me to infringe this right, rather than be wanting in respect to so great a king. I therefore forbid flags to both, and all occasions of fresh disputes, till you receive the decision of your superiors. You are both but traders in my dominions, and it would better become you to vie in industry, diligence, and honesty, than in ostentation and vanity. I intend to be fully acquainted with the grandeur of the French king, and to assure him of my regard: wherefore I appoint my royal interpreter ambassador to him; and, turning to Mariage, recommend his safe conduct thither to you. In the mean time my pleasure is, that you embrace before me, that you eat together, live in harmony, and French and Dutch be but as one nation." The equity and strong sense of the royal reproof and decision enforced a compliance. Mutual embraces succeeded; the prince, highly pleased, entertained both parties with great magnificence; and the king, who ordered victuals from his table, would have been present but for those ceremonials and clogs on felicity in support of dignity. The Sieur Mariage had afterwards a long audience of the king, in presence only of the prince and the royal interpreter, now ambassador.
- MARIAGE, having thus happily succeeded in all he desired, embarked, with the ambassador, on board the Concord, who had now a cargo of 600 slaves. The ambassador was a man far advanced in years, but upright in his gait. He had a good countenance, with a bold manly air and polite address. He was at this time secretary of state and royal interpreter, a place of great trust and honour; had often represented the king at the courts of Benin and Oyeo; was perfectly acquainted with the manners, customs, governments, and interests of all the surrounding states; spoke the Portuguese language fluently, and was inquisitive in his inquiries, but close in answers; a courtier in complaisance, but a statesman in silence: in a word, he was a man agreeable to strangers upon indifferent topics, and fit to be trusted by his master with subjects of the highest importance. He had been instructed in the principles of the christian religion, assisted at mass with great devotion, and promised to be baptized upon the king's admitting missionaries into his dominions. Three of his wives only and three of his younger sons attended him, with eight domestics. They arrived after a happy voyage at Martinico, where they were well entertained by the governor and director general, and provided with proper necessaries for their voyage to France, where they arrived in February 1670.
- f On the ambassador's landing at Dieppe, the governor of the town entertained him with the greatest magnificence. The director, informed of his arrival, ordered the Hotel de Lagnes for his reception and residence. He was received at St. Dennis by proper attendants, with an equipage of two coaches and six horses, by whom he was conducted to Paris. There he was complimented on his arrival by the West India company, and the king sent a gentleman to attend him where-ever he went. He asked the Sieur D'Elbee and other officers of the company, who had informed him that the king would give him audience at Paris, "whether he had not done wrong in going out the day before, and seeing any thing before he had seen the king, and executed the principal intention of his embassy? I will go abroad no more," said he, "till I have waited on the greatest king in the universe, except my master."
- g The directors of the company had visited him in a body, and expatiated largely on the virtues, power, and potency of Lewis; insinuating the difference there was between a company protected by so great a king and the Dutch. He told the interpreter, "that by what he had seen, he

“ he believed no country in Europe was equal to France: that the manner in which he was “ treated, convinced him of the dignity of the company, and the falshood of the aspersions “ thrown upon them by the envious Dutch:” adding, “ I must have the honour of seeing “ and assuring the king, that the kingdom of Ardrab is wholly his, and its ports and trade “ at the company’s service.” To a director, who enquired after his health, he answered, “ that “ from indifferent it was become better, since he had seen the gentlemen of the company, “ and it would be quite established after he had the honour of seeing the king.” The air, rich clothing, and arms of the musqueteers and Gens des Armes, drawn up on the day of the audience in the courts of the Tuilleries, surprised and greatly attracted his attention: nor was he less pleased with the king’s curiosities and immense riches, displayed, in order for his view, on large tables in the hall of the lower apartments. On being asked his sentiments, he said, “ that he was going to see the king, whose splendor would throw a shade on all he “ had seen.” Lewis, distinguished by a profusion of diamonds on his robes, was seated on a throne raised on an estrade of several steps, at the upper end of the gallery, which was crowded with persons of distinction. He had the dauphin on his right hand, and the duke of Orleans on his left: lower on each side stood the princes of the blood, and the dukes and peers of France below them; the whole forming the most brilliant circle of any court in the universe. The ambassador in advancing made three profound bows, and, being mounted on the estrade, prostrated himself at the king’s feet, his sons doing the same behind him, with a politeness of manners that astonished the whole court. He then raised his head a little to begin his compliments, which he expressed gracefully in the following words. “ The king of “ Ardrab, my master, having heard the wonders fame has proclaimed of your majesty, “ and being ambitious to gain your favour, has sent me to offer himself and his kingdom “ to your majesty.” The king made him rise, and observing some confusion in his face, and a paper in his hand, asked what it was? The Sieur D’Elbee answered, that the ambassador, apprehending that his majesty’s grandeur would awe him so much as to disorder his speech, had desired him the day before to translate his memorial into French, in order to be read, if his majesty pleased. Accordingly the Sieur D’Elbee read it aloud, by his majesty’s permission, and in the following words.

“ SIRE,

“ THE king of Ardrab and Alghemi, my sovereign, named me ambassador, to offer and “ assure your majesty, that his dominions, ports, and trade are at your service, and open to “ your subjects. In confirmation of which, and to cement the friendship he is inclined to “ enter upon with your majesty, my sovereign declares, that for the future the company shall “ pay no more customs than 24 slaves. This is less considerably than the Portuguese for“ merly, and the English, Spaniards, Danes, and Swedes, at present pay; it is even upon “ an equality with the Dutch, who have been long engaged in a treaty of commerce with “ Ardrab. I am further ordered to assure your majesty, that my sovereign will protect your “ subjects against the Dutch and prefer Frenchmen to them, wherever it can be done con“ sistently with that justice he owes to all nations in alliance with him: and he engages to “ load French ships before the Dutch shall be permitted to purchase a single slave.
 “ In a dispute about precedency, the king, in distinction to so great a monarch, placed “ your majesty’s servant on his right hand, and lodged him in his palace, while the prince “ entertained the Dutchman, who was placed on the left. My sovereign desires to know of “ your majesty the honours due to your majesty’s flag, that he may order them to be observed “ throughout his kingdoms; and he requests of you to send two religious men, to instruct “ his subjects in the tenets of christianity. The principles are already superficially known to “ many of them, who have in consequence embraced the true faith. I am ordered to present “ my two sons to your majesty; to request your acceptance of them, and of two hangers, two “ Haffagays, a vest, and carpet. The advantages my children must receive in the service of so “ great a monarch I shall esteem my greatest felicity. My sovereign also requests your majesty’s “ belief, that if his country had produced any thing more curious, and which he would have “ thought more acceptable, it should have been sent to your majesty with joy, as he desires “ nothing so earnestly as to persuade the king of France, that he is also king of Ardrab as “ much as the reigning sovereign.”

Lewis listened to his speech with attention, answering the ambassador, that he was highly obliged to his brother of Ardrab for his genteel compliments, and for sending an ambassador whose person was so agreeable to him: that he accepted the present of his children, whom he would take under his own care and protection, when he left Paris. As to trade, he referred him to the directors of the company. The sign then being made to withdraw, the ambassador again prostrated himself at the king’s feet, made a low reverence when he rose up, and retired backwards

a backwards till he had made the third bow at the gallery door, whence he was conducted by the master of the ceremonies, in the king's coach, to the Hôtel des Lagnes.

A few days after the Sieur de Bellisle attended the ambassador, with the same retinue, to an audience of the queen. The captain of the guard in waiting received him at the entry of the hall, and the queen, dressed in jewels as far as mourning permitted, amidst the princesses and ladies of her court, received him in her chamber. His excellency made three steps towards her majesty, at each he bowed profoundly, and then prostrated himself with his wives and children, expressing their reverence by the clapping of their hands. The ambassador made his compliments in Portuguese: and the queen having obliged him to rise, answered him with great sweetness in Spanish. He made a second prostration, and three bows in his retreat; and was afterwards introduced by the duke de Montancier to the dauphin; the same ceremonies being observed. In his compliments to the dauphin he politely mentioned the happiness the duke de Montancier enjoyed, in being honoured with the education of the first prince in the universe. He told the dauphin, that the prince royal of Ardrab had commanded him to assure him of his respects; that he desired his esteem and friendship, which he would endeavour to merit; and presented the dauphin with the arms sent by the prince. His compliments were answered with that gracefulness of manner peculiar to the dauphin; upon which the ambassador was reconducted to his apartments. The greatest civilities were shewn him by the king's ministers and the lords of the court, who returned his visits. He was entertained with a representation of La Feste de Pierre, and regaled at Rambouillet by the directors of the company. He said his countrymen would take him for a liar when he related what he had seen in France. Four tables of twelve covers each were provided, and served in the most elegant manner. He was seated with the king's gentlemen and some directors at the first table; his sons were placed at the second; his three wives with some ladies at the third; and a director with other guests at the fourth. His good sense, politeness, and sobriety, were the admiration of all present. He seemed pleased with every thing, but suppressed his wonder, and resembled a connoisseur running over a gallery of fine paintings, where all the pieces struck him rather by their excellency than their novelty. After dinner he was carried to Vincennes, where the spaciousness of the apartments, the richness of furniture, and the elegance of the taste, made him say, "that, after seeing France, it was unnecessary to visit the rest of the world." He was reconducted from Vincennes, by torch-light, which surprised him more than any thing he had seen, and made him say, "that in France they had the art of altering the course of nature." He spent a few days afterwards in viewing the palaces and seats round Paris. Crowds attended him to the levee of M. De Lionne, secretary of state for foreign affairs. There he declared publicly, "that it was his duty, as he came to offer the king of France the dominions and services of the king his master, to beg that M. De Lionne would promote the correspondence by his good offices; and that he entertained great hopes from his merit and zeal for the honour of the king his sovereign." M. De Lionne having promised his interest, made several enquiries concerning the number of ports, the extent of the kingdom of Ardrab, and whether it was much exposed to wars? To which his excellency answered, "that his master's dominions towards the sea were small, but of great inland extent, and a fortnight's journey. That there were no ports on the coast of Guiney; roads only, where shipping suffered but little from the furies of the sea, and tempests were rare. As to war, he said, that the king of Ardrab was often involved in quarrels with potent neighbours, and on those occasions, headed a numerous army of well-armed and disciplined horse and foot." Upon taking leave he was carried to the company's hotel, where the directors received him in a body. On this occasion he told them, "that he had long wished for this opportunity to thank them for the favours he had received; that his gratitude would be perpetual, and that they might always esteem him their zealous and obliged servant." The directors concluded their compliment with thanking him for the dispatch given by the king of Ardrab to their ships Concord and Justice; for the grant of a settlement in his dominions; and finished the audience with the following proposals in regard to trade.

" 1st. THAT the company's ships trading to Ardrab shall enjoy a preference to those of all other nations.

" 2d. THAT instead of eighty, their duties shall amount to no more than twenty-four slaves; and that this duty shall be put on the same footing as in the time of the Portuguese.

" 3d. THAT the king of Ardrab shall oblige his subjects indebted to the company to render speedy payment.

" 4th. THAT the factors shall not be obliged to give credit to any grandees whom they have reason to believe incapable of payment.

" 5th. THAT leave be granted to cover the magazines and factory with tiles, instead of straw; to prevent the danger to which it is hourly exposed from fire.

MOD. HIST. VOL. VI.

“ 6th. THAT the king will be pleased to take the company’s factory and effects under a

THESE articles granted, the company shall engage to keep the warehouses stocked with goods to the value of 500 slaves above the common call ; to send ships yearly, and to trade with no other prince for the same commodities.

THE ambassador agreed to all besides the first and fifth articles : but answered to the first, that, if the company would deal only with the king, he could assure them of the preference they proposed. As to the fifth, he said, that all his interest with his master should be used to obtain it ; but he could not insure success, as his majesty seemed fixed in his resolution to prohibit their building. A duplicate of the negotiation was drawn in French and Portuguese, which was signed and kept by both parties. He presented the company with a carpet of the bark of trees, manufactured at Ardrah ; in return for which he received a large looking glass in a copper frame gilt : after which the directors conducted him to a coach in waiting. His excellency, having had his audience of leave, left Paris in the middle of February 1671 ; his charges to Havre, where two ships waited his arrival, being defrayed by the king. Upon seeing the presents of Lewis to his master, he cried out, “ there is but one monarch in the world ; all “ kings must yield to the king of France : my master will never believe what I tell him ;
“ he will even doubt of what he shall see.” The presents were committed to the care of Carlof, who, after the arrival of the ships at Ardrah, injuriously suspected the ambassador’s intention of converting some of them to his own use. There never appeared the smallest foundation of proof for this jealousy ; and the indignity so stung the ambassador, that, forgetting his respect for the French nation, he used all his interest with the king to their prejudice. Fortunately for the company, the king was wholly employed in a civil war that had blocked up the passages for carrying slaves to Offra. Before the war was ended the minister died, the presents were returned to France, and the company enjoyed a sort of trade till the revolution we have mentioned was brought about by the brave king of Dahomay. b c

Contains the origin of the French, Portuguese, Dutch, and English commerce on the coast of Guiney, and more particularly on the Gold Coast.

<sup>a</sup> HAVING described the kingdoms of Benin, Whidab, and Ardrab, with some other states contained under the general division of the Slave Coast, we now come to give an account of the Gold Coast, or Guiney Proper. As this division is not only better known, but also of more importance to Europeans in general, and particularly to this nation, we shall beg leave to describe it with all the minuteness which the best authorities will admit of, adding to the testimony of writers some farther particulars we have received from some gentlemen long resident at Cape Coast, and perfectly acquainted with the manners, customs, government, produce, and trade of the country.

Gold Coast.

<sup>b</sup> THE Gold Coast had its name given by the Portuguese, from the immense quantity of the precious metal which it produces. The same reason has made all the other nations of Europe retain the appellation. According to the best charts, founded upon the latest observations, the situation of the Gold Coast is between  $4^{\circ} 30'$  and  $8^{\circ}$  north latitude; and  $16^{\circ}$  and  $18^{\circ} 4'$  of longitude, beginning at the river Ankobar, and extending to the Rio Volta, that is, about 130 leagues from west to east<sup>a</sup>. Smith makes some variation in its dimensions; but as his assertions are confirmed by no reasons, we shall adhere to the accurate Prevost's account. We have observed, that the French and Portuguese dispute the discovery of this coast. Villault and Robbé are positive that Nigritia and Guiney were known to the French above an hundred years before the Portuguese began their discoveries. The one goes as high as the year 1346; the other fixes the date of this discovery in the year 1364. It was this year, according to <sup>c</sup> Robbé, that some merchants of Dieppe made a number of trading voyages to the Cape de Verde islands, penetrating as far as Sestro Paris, on the Grain or Malaguette Coast. A. 1382, the merchants of Dieppe and Rouen jointly sent three ships to make discoveries on the same coast. One of the ships, called the Vierge, went to Commendo, and thence to the spot where the village Elmina stands, which had its name from the quantity of gold supposed to be dug out of the mines in the country. The following year the same merchants built a strong house or factory here; for the defence of which they left twelve men, which colony was for some years increasing. In 1387, it was so considerable, that they built a chapel, and the trade continued to flourish till 1413, when the civil wars in France occasioned its falling into decay. <sup>d</sup> The Normans were soon forced to abandon not only Elmina, but also Sestro Paris, Cape Monte, Sierra Leona, the Cape de Verds, and all their other establishments (A).

VILLAUT supports the claim of his nation by a relation somewhat different. His account is, that in the year 1346, some adventurers of Dieppe, accustomed to long voyages, having sailed along the coast of Europe, passed over to the coasts of Nigritia and Guiney, where they established several colonies, particularly one in the Cape de Verds, in the bay of Rio Fresco, and another on the Grain Coast. They called that bay extending from Cape Verd to Cape Mosto, Baye de France. A village between Rio Juna, and Rio Sestos, they called Little Dieppe; and to another village near Cape Palmas they gave the name of Sestro Paris, or Great Sestro. From each of these colonies they yearly imported great quantities of gold dust, elephants teeth,

(A) Where Robbé picked up all this ancient history we know not. Certain it is, that he brings but lame proofs to support the claim of his countrymen to the discovery. One of the most notable arguments for their having built Elmina, is, that after a number of revolutions, one of the bastions of the fort still bore the name of the French bastion, and had distinctly those cyphers 13 — wrote upon it. But these might as well be the last as the first cyphers of the date. In short, he proves nothing but his being possessed of a fruitful invention.

and other African commodities. From the ivory, the inhabitants of Dieppe made a number of valuable toys; which gaining them a reputation of ingenuity in that way, they maintained it for a number of years. The same writer affirms, that in the year 1383, the Normans laid the foundation of the fort at Mina, which flourished till 1484, when the civil wars prevented the French from attending to commerce, and suffered their colonies to pass into the hands of the Portuguese, Dutch, English, Danes, and Courlanders. a discovery.

BUT if we admit those facts, it must appear a little extraordinary that the greatest French historians, neither Serres nor Mezeray, should ever once mention them. Enterprizes of such a nature would seem to merit their attention, especially in the infancy of commerce, and when long voyages excited universal admiration, and were regarded as miracles. Besides, not the smallest testimony appears in any Portuguese historian, in support of their conjecture, that Fort Elmina b was built by the French in 1383. Nay Azambuja, who undertook to fortify that place in 1484, appears to be ignorant of there having ever before his time been a fortification there. From this silence of the best French and Portuguese historians, we may conclude, that the assertions of Robbé and Villault are bold and hardy, corroborated rather by the silence of the opposite side, than proved by the arguments they bring, and founded more upon prejudice and national attachment, than upon authority.

Origin of the Portuguese settlements on the coast of Africa.

THE Portuguese, continues Villault, who knew nothing beyond Cape Verd, observing the great advantages drawn by the Dieppers from their commerce to Guiney for the space of fifty years, fitted out a ship at Lisbon, under the protection of Don Henry, for the sole purpose of making discoveries along the coast. Alphonso the first at that time reigned in Portugal. c The ship arriving on the Guiney Coast in the rainy season, all the crew, unaccustomed to such a climate, fell into diseases of different kinds, which made such terrible havock of them, that they resolved to leave so inhospitable a shore; but being ignorant of the tides, winds, and the navigation of those seas, they were driven on an island in the gulph of Guiney, which they called St. Thomas, their arrival being upon that day. The liberal supplies they found here of all necessaries, made them regard this incident as the peculiar favour of heaven to them, at a time when the crazy condition of their ship made their situation very distressful. Here the Portuguese made a considerable stay, laying the first foundation of a colony on the island. After repairing the vessel, they set sail for Lisbon, where they arrived in 1454. The court of Portugal, eager in the pursuit of wealth, and warm in the interests of commerce, were not d long before another fleet was fitted out to secure and strengthen this infant colony. They pushed their discoveries as far as Benin, and in process of time arrived in the road of Akra, on the Gold Coast, where they procured a great quantity of gold. On their return, the governor of St. Thomas fitted out three caravans, having on board a number of adventurers, and materials for building factories on different parts of the coast. These vessels came to Elmina four years after the departure of the French b.

PURCHAS relates, that Alphonso having but little leisure for pushing discoveries towards the latter end of his reign, formed or gave an exclusive privilege for five years to Fernando Gomez, a citizen of Lisbon, to sail to the coast of Africa. By agreement he was every year to discover 300 miles, beginning at Sierra Leona, and advancing along the coast c.

THIS Gomez it was that sent out Santeren and Scovane, says Purchas; Escobar, according to Marmol; who discovered Elmina, and to Cape St. Catherine, south of the equinoctial. During this period were also discovered, the islands of St. Thomas, St. Matthew, Annobon, and del' Principe (B). In the year 1681, John the second, resolving to encourage and support the commercial spirit of his subjects, sent ten caravans laden with stores and every thing necessary for building a fort, and houses for a colony, under the conduct of Jago Azambuja, or according to Purchas, Diego Dezambuja. This general arriving on the coast, sent notice to Kasamanfa, prince of the country, to come on board to ratify the treaty concluded with him by the former Portuguese ships. In the mean while he possessed himself of a little eminence, capable of containing 500 houses, as a situation the most commodious for a fort. Here he hoisted f the Portuguese standard on St. Sebastian's day; a name that was given to the neighbouring valley, where the Portuguese landed. Soon after their landing, Azambuja perceiving that the negro prince with his retinue was approaching, drew up his men in order, and seated himself in a great

(B) Purchas fixes the date of these discoveries from the year 1449 to the year 1454. Gomez, he says, had a five years lease of the African Coast, during which time the above places were found out. Marmol, as he is quoted by Prevost, asserts that they were unknown till the year 1471; at least that they were not known to the Portuguese till the time of John the second; and in this Purchas seems afterwards to agree with him (1).

a chair in the center. He was richly dressed in a gold brocade, with a gold collar set with diamonds. All his attendants were clothed in silks, and every thing set off with the utmost magnificence, in order to strike the negroes with high notions of the wealth and power of the Portuguese. Nor did Kasamansa on his part neglect any thing which could set off the state, the puissance, and the pride of his nation. He was attended by a strong corps of negroes, all armed after their manner, and attended by warlike musick, which made a horrible noise. The chief officers were dressed in their hostile apparel, of which we shall give a description elsewhere, each followed by two pages, the one carrying his shield, the other his weapons of offence. All had their hair and beards finely adorned with gold and other ornaments, interlaced with garlands, or wove in like beads. After the first salutations were over, Azambuja entered upon a formal discourse, in which he expatiated on the great power of the king his master, the affection he bore Kasamansa, his desire of carrying on a commerce to the mutual advantage of both their nations, and lastly his request, that he might be permitted to build a fort for the protection and security of this commerce. Kasamansa, who was a sensible, politic prince, raised several objections against this proposal, but at length consented to it; and next day Azambuja entered upon his work. Stones were drawn from the neighbouring quarries, for erecting the fort and houses; but the negroes began to shew marks of displeasure, both on account of the respect and worship they pay to stones and rocks, and because they disliked seeing themselves curbed, and hemmed in by strong works. However, they were appeased by presents, and so diligently did the Portuguese labour, that in less than a month their fort was in a state of defence. The materials they had brought were so artfully contrived, that the workmen had nothing more to do than lay them upon each other. Azambuja having succeeded no less happily in his trade for gold, returned loaded with immense wealth. Upon this occasion, whatever the French writers may allege, it is probable the fort St. George de la Mina or Elmina, had its first rise (C).

JOHN, the successor of Alphonso, conferred many privileges on this new colony; he made Mina a city, and lavished his gifts and immunities on it. He ordered a church to be built, which he dedicated to St. George; and it was ordained, that all those who for the future should make discoveries along the south coast of Africa, should erect a monument of square stone six feet high, with the arms of Portugal engraved, and a Latin and Portuguese inscription, bearing the date of such discovery, the reign in which it was made, and the admiral or discoverer's name.

A few years after, the same prince established a Guiney company, with exclusive privileges. So considerable were the profits of this new corporation, that their views rising with their success, they built fort St. Andrea, near Axim, another little fort upon Akra, and a storehouse at Sama, on the river St. George, to furnish Elmina with provisions, as it had hitherto been supplied by a sort of dependance on the prince of the country. The king however, reserved to himself the right of appointing the governors and officers of the head settlement, with a view to make those employments the reward of eminent services to the crown; and the recompence of diligence, courage, and public spirit. Thus, says Barbot, the garrison of Elmina was in time composed of officers equally poor and covetous, and of soldiers accustomed to war, plunder, and rapine<sup>d</sup>. When to these were joined all the felons and other malefactors of Portugal, whose crimes were thought too slight to merit a gibbet, but morals too loose to be permitted to stay in the kingdom, can it be wondered, that in all historians, we meet with the most hideous pictures of Portuguese violence, cruelty, and inhumanity?

In the reign of Henry the third of France, tranquility being for a time restored to the kingdom, the French began to renew their voyages to the Grain and Gold Coast. But such was the terror the Portuguese had struck into the natives, that they were afraid to accept of any

After the civil wars the French renewed their voyages to Guiney.

(C) By a treaty concluded on the fourth of September, between the kings of Castile and Portugal, it was stipulated, that the commerce and navigation to Guiney, as well as the conquest of Fex, should belong to Portugal, to the perpetual exclusion of the Castilians; and that the Canaries should in the same exclusive manner be annexed to the crown of Spain. The historian Faria pretends, that in contempt of this solemn agreement, the Castilians sent a fleet to the coast of Guiney, which falling in with the Portuguese squadron, a brisk action ensued, the advantage remaining on the side of the latter. Barbot takes great pains to refute the truth of Faria's assertion, and his arguments appear conclusive.

First, he alleges the intire silence of all the Spanish writers concerning this transaction. Next, the strict union begun this year between the two crowns, their forces being united against the common enemy, the Turks. Thirdly, the expedition of Azambuja he thinks a manifest refutation of the whole transaction related by Faria; for Azambuja did not sail till near two years after the date of this imaginary treaty. The same historian (Faria) says, that in 1478, the Castilians sent a fleet of 35 sail to Guiney, which returned with prodigious rich cargoes. But this Barbot likewise denies, supporting his opinion with several weighty reasons (2).

between the French and Portuguese.

overtures made by the French. At length the inhabitants of Akra were raised to the highest pitch of indignation, by some severities committed by the Portuguese; they attacked the little fort situated in this province, massacred the garrison, and raised the walls to the ground. Henceforward the credit of the Portuguese began to decline. From 1578, when this occurrence happened, we may date the first beginnings of the commerce of other Europeans to the coast of Guiney. Others now shared in that wealth, which had long been engrossed by the Portuguese; but this was not accomplished without great loss of blood on all sides. Numbers of French in particular lost their lives, not only by the hands of the Portuguese, but by those of the negroes also, who had a large premium given them for every French head they brought to the Portuguese fort. Their heads were set up, and exposed on the walls of Elmina; a barbarity which intimidated the French merchants, and made them once more abandon the Guiney trade. Artus of Dantzick has left us a curious account of their conduct, from the destruction of the Portuguese fort near Akra, till their total expulsion from that coast.

Success of the Dutch.

THE Portuguese, he says, did not confine themselves to the extirpation of the French only; the same severities they used against other Europeans, and even against the private merchants of their own nation, who were hardy enough to encroach on their privileges. Their ships and cargoes were confiscated, and the crews put to death. One instance in particular is given of a Lisbon ship, the cargo of which was condemned to the king's use, the ship to the company's, and the crew to death. The Dutch were the only Europeans who continued firm to their interest, in contempt of dangers and difficulties. Their perseverance was crowned with success, and at last they made themselves masters of the forts of Elmina and Axim, obtaining that security by their courage, which the Portuguese had lost by their insolence and cruelty. In what manner they used their good fortune, is a point we shall at present pass over. Certain it is, that if any credit be due to the Portuguese historians, neither natives or foreigners had any reason to rejoice in the change of masters; as to the pride and barbarity of the Portuguese, the Dutch added a species of cool brutality, peculiar to that phlegmatic people. The rebels, says Vasconcelos, speaking of the Dutch, owed their success more to debauchery and drunkenness, than to courage. They stuck at no means to accomplish their ends; fraud and force were the same to them, so that they arrived at the same end. They first ruined the morals of the natives and perverted their understandings, after which they became the fit tools of their wicked designs. Wine, spirits, and the indolence of the Portuguese, were in fact the true instruments of their good fortune. By these they raised themselves to be masters, or rather pirates, so formidable by their numbers, that they seized the forts of Bourtri, Cora, Cormantin, Aldin de Fuerto, and Commendo. In the end they got possession of Elmina itself, and for the space of many years carried on so peaceable and profitable a commerce, that their returns from thence amounted to little less than two millions in gold, besides other commodities. The quantity of merchandize, which they exported thither from Europe, and the good bargains they gave the negroes, raised them high at first in the esteem of those barbarians, who soon found reason to consider their fair and honest dealing as a bait to lead them to their destruction. Such are the words of Vasconcelos, an historian who may be supposed strongly prejudiced against the Dutch; although it must be owned, that his report of their conduct here bears but too strong a resemblance to their behaviour in the Indies, and wherever they proposed to settle colonies.

Origin of the Dutch commerce with Guiney.

THE first Dutchman who led the way to Guiney, was one Bernard Erick. This man had made the proposal to some merchants in Holland. The scheme was thought so rational, that a ship was fitted out; the command given to Erick, and a rich cargo sent by him in 1595. Running along the Gold Coast, Erick established a correspondence with the natives; he treated them with great civility, shewed them a variety of fine goods at an easy rate, and intirely alienated their affections from the Portuguese. The Portuguese governors were however not wanting in their endeavours to crush rivals they foresaw would be dangerous. They represented the Dutch as rebels and traitors to their natural king; a lawless people, whose sole principle was the love of gain. They assured the negroes, that however speciously they might for the present conduct themselves, their view was first to gain a footing, and afterwards to maintain and extend it by force of arms. Commerce was the pretext, but the real design, they said, was to reduce the natives to slavery. By large rewards, the governors engaged the negroes to destroy the first vessels that should arrive on the coast; and Simon de Tave was the first victim of the Portuguese jealousy; this gentleman and all his crew being cut off by a stratagem of the negroes. Many other misfortunes of the same nature befel the Dutch, some of which they revenged, others they patiently bore with, while their interest required it. They had formed a strong interest among the natives; and those who still adhered to their allegiance to the Portuguese, were induced to it solely from the force of rewards, or the fear of punishment. At length, by their intrigues with the king of Sabo, they obtained permission to build a fort a three leagues east of Cabo Carso or Cape Coast. This fort was finished in 1624, the command of it given to captain Adrian Jacob, and the Dutch power founded in Guiney, at the time the states were engaged in a war with Philip the IVth of Spain.

It was in the year following, that the Dutch formed their design against the fort of St. George d'Elmina. Their troops consisted of 200 Hollanders, and 150 negroes of Sabo, led on by the vice-admiral Jean Dirks Lamb, who entered Ampona in the kingdom of Commendo. But they were intirely defeated by the negroes of Elmina, who charged themselves with the defence of the Portuguese. They attacked suddenly the Dutch forces as they descended a mountain, before they had time to range themselves. The action was long and obstinate, when at length the Dutch were killed almost to a man. Lamb the general was dangerously wounded; and b owed his life to the seasonable succours sent by the negroes of Commendo <sup>z</sup>.

THE next attempt of the Dutch upon Elmina was in the year 1637, when the West India company procured a strong squadron to be sent to the coast of Africa. This armament was commanded by colonel Hans Coine, a diligent officer, who left no measures untried, necessary to the success of the enterprize. Eight hundred soldiers, five hundred sailors, and a considerable body of negroes were landed within a small distance of Cape Coast; provisions for three days were taken with them, and Hans Coine began his march, dividing the troops into three columns. The general who led the rear, observing that the negroes of Elmina, to the number of a thousand, possessed the hill of St. Jago, to prevent his seizing a post, which absolutely commanded the fort, he determined to force it, and for this purpose ordered it to be attacked by four c companies of fusileers. The negroes made so brave a resistance, that the Dutch were cut in pieces, the heads of the slain fixed upon spears, and carried in triumph to the fort. However, another party, conducted by major Bongarçon, crossing the river Dona by a ford, attacked the hill on the other side with such vigour, that the negroes, after a great loss and an obstinate conflict, were forced to surrender the fruits of their late victory, and abandon the important post of St. Jago. Bongarçon, leaving a strong guard here, pursued his march, and happily rejoined the army in spite of all the endeavours of the Portuguese to cut off the communication. The Portuguese and their negroes despairing of being able to keep their ground on the plain, retired to a redoubt they still held on the declivity of mount St. Jago. Here they were again attacked by colonel d Coine. The redoubt was covered on the one side by a wood. Coine, who perceived this, and that only two paths led to it, one across the ford of the river, the other through the wood, ordered two pieces of cannon and a mortar to be drawn up through the latter, and so advantageously pointed, that after forcing the enemy to abandon the redoubt, a battery was raised which played with great success upon the fort of Elmina. After the siege had continued for two days, and the event became doubtful, by reason of the courage of the besieged, and the perseverance of the besiegers, the Dutch received a strong re-inforcement under the conduct of the Dutch commander in chief, Van Ypren. This officer, to cut off all delay, summoned e the garrison, declaring in the most positive terms, they should without distinction be put to the sword, if they stood an assault. The Portuguese governor desired three days to determine, and the Dutch general refused it, assembling all his forces for storming the walls. This f had the effect, the garrison hanging out a white flag, and beating a parley. Two officers from the governor waited on Van Ypren to regulate the articles of surrender; but no others would be granted than submitting at discretion. The general however consented to the following terms, viz. that the governor and all the other Portuguese, with their wives and children, without their effects, ensigns, arms, or provision, should immediately evacuate the fort. That all the merchandize, the gold, slaves, &c. should remain the property of the conquerors. That all the ornaments of the church, except such as were of the precious metals, might be carried away. And that the Portuguese and Mulattoes should be transported to the island of St. Thomas <sup>h</sup>.

THUS it was, that the Dutch entered upon the possession of the celebrated fortrefs of St. George d'Elmina, on the 29th of August, 1637. Bosman refers this transaction to the following year; but in this he is contradicted by all other historians, French, Spanish, and Portuguese. Here they found 30 pieces of cast cannon, nine thousand weight of powder, great store of other ammunition, but little gold or merchandize. Colonel Coine having appointed a governor, and a garrison of 140 Dutch, besides negroes in the fort, returned to Mawri. Resolving to draw all possible advantages from the consternation with which so rapid a conquest had struck the whole coast, the Dutch general sent a message to the governor of Axim, summoning him to surrender the place, before he should be compelled by force of arms. This was a settlement, next to Elmina, of the greatest consequence to the Portuguese; and the governor answered, with a resolution worthy of the confidence reposed in him. His reply was, that the fort had g been given him to defend: that his oath, and duty to his country, obliged him to this; that therefore the Dutch might come as soon as they pleased, they would always find him in a condition to receive them. This bold conduct caused the Dutch for that time to lay aside the design; nor did the fort Axim come into their hands till the year 1642<sup>i</sup>.

Natives besiege Elmina.

AFTER the reduction of Elmina, the Dutch doubted not but the whole trade of Guiney would soon center there, and fall into their hands. Van Ypren was ordered by the company to reside at that important place in quality of governor-general of Guiney and Angola. He applied himself assiduously to the reparation of the fortifications; he enlarged the chief building, encreased the number of the houses, and was no less careful to give strength and beauty, than conveniency to the place. At first he treated the natives with great indulgence, but as soon as the English expressed an inclination to share in the trade of the country, and had for that purpose applied to the negroes for leave to establish colonies, then was the kindness of the Dutch altered for a severity and cruelty unbecoming a nation that owes its being to commerce, and forms pretensions to civilized humanity. They even presumed openly to attack the English, by seizing upon Fort Cormantin, where at that time the governor usually resided; a barefaced usurpation, that became one motive of the war in 1666, between England and the United Provinces. To keep the natives in more absolute subjection, they erected forts at Bourtry, Sama, Cape Coast, Anamaboa, and Akra, under pretence of protecting them against the frequent incursions of the inland natives, their constant enemies. Not contented with this, they assumed to themselves a right of confining the commerce of certain places solely to themselves; even the fish caught by the poor negroes of certain sea-ports, they prohibited, under severe penalties, from being sold at any price to other nations; although to cheapen it they have suffered it to rot in the market. In a word, the government they erected was the most despotic and arbitrary that could be, taking cognizance of all affairs civil and criminal, and rendering themselves the sole judges of property, liberty, life, and death. Notwithstanding this, they still continued to pay the lawful sovereigns a small tribute for the lands on which they built their factories: but this they soon reimbursed themselves in, by the most unfeeling extortion, and corrupt perversion of justice.

THE discontent and disaffection of the negroes rose so high, when Barbot resided in the country, that having come to an open rupture with their imperious masters, they kept the director general blocked up in Elmina. This quarrel, which continued for ten months, ended, after two assaults were given, in the loss of four men only on the side of the Dutch, and about fifty on that of the negroes<sup>k</sup>. However, had those barbarians had perseverance enough to continue the siege longer, St. George Elmina must probably have fallen into their hands, and been for ever lost to the Dutch. Barbot thinks their resentment against the Dutch but too well founded. He relates some of the most cruel and savage punishments inflicted upon those miserable wretches for faults merely trifling, by the Hollanders, who ought rather to have smiled at their simplicity, had they been possessed of the bowels of humanity. Hence it was, that the author was daily implored to procure them the protection of France, and assist them to throw off a yoke altogether unsupportable (D). Such has been the conduct of this phlegmatic people, invariably in all their conquests and establishments, whether in Asia, in Africa, or in America. They would monopolize the whole trade of those countries, without deserving any share of the favours of the natives; they would insinuate, cajole, flatter and cringe, that they might rule, domineer, and play the tyrant, both tending to the same ends, self-interest, and the love of gain.

Origin and progress of the company.

WE come now to the first establishments of our own nation on the coast of Guiney; a trade here having been carried on some years by private adventurers, without the participation, aid, or protection of the government. In 1585, and 1588, queen Elizabeth granted two patents to certain rich merchants of England, the one for an exclusive trade to the coast of Barbary; the other for that of Guiney, between the rivers Senegal and Gambia. In 1592, the same body of merchants obtained a third patent, extending their rights from the river Nogne or Nagnez, to the south of Sierra Leona. But whether this trade was discontinued on account of a deficiency of their capital stock, from an ignorance of the nature of the traffick; or that the term of their charter was expired, we are no-where told: certain only it is, that the trade

(D) The following instance may serve as a specimen of the arbitrary conduct of the Dutch. As Barbot's ship lay in the road of Elmina, the Dutch governor observed, while our author was at dinner with him, some canoes going to trade with the French ship. This put the Dutchman into the most violent passion, and made him threaten to seize the ship and cargo; which the Frenchman, knowing he was too weak to resist, endeavoured to divert by all the concessions in his power. Every means however was ineffectual, till he proposed selling the cargo at an under price to the governor. This bargain was made; and Barbot, to prevent losing all, accepted of about a tenth of what the goods were worth (3).

a was wholly dropt, and again resumed in the sixth year of James the first, who granted a patent under the great seal to Sir Robert Rich, and other merchants of London, with an exclusive power, of more validity and extent than any of the former grants. Even this was insufficient; the new company sustained such a variety of losses, that they grew heartily tired of the commerce of Africa, and, as appears by a memorial delivered to the house of commons, were ready intirely to abandon it, without relief from parliament. Then it was that the Dutch began to share in the wealth of the other hemisphere, and to divide the trade with the Portuguese. Their success excited some other English merchants to represent to James the first, of what importance it was to this kingdom to preserve the African trade; a remonstrance that was followed by a patent to Nicholas Crisp, Humphrey Hamer and company, for the sole and exclusive right of that commerce<sup>1</sup>.

b In the year 1651, the same rights were rendered and confirmed to Rowland Wilson and several other merchants, by the republic of England; but during the unhappy distraction of affairs preceding this period, the Dutch and Danes had seized the opportunity of fortifying themselves on the coast of Africa; infomuch, that with the loss of their settlements, the English company had the misfortune to see their stock and capital ruined. Some private traders still however continued to frequent those coasts; but their success was no better than that of the company, having lost ships and effects to the amount of 800,000 l. sterling. The parliament, upon some representations made by the merchants of London, resolved to address Charles the second, upon the subject of the African trade. Accordingly in 1664, they c petitioned his majesty that he would be pleased to re-establish this commerce, and, by a vigorous exertion of his power, curb the insolence of the Dutch; but the war in 1665 prevented the effects of this application<sup>m</sup>.

CHARLES had granted, in 1662, a charter to a body of merchants, under the name of the Royal Company of England trading to Africa, extending their limits from the mouth of the Streights to the Cape of Good Hope. This company, which was only in its infancy when the war broke out, suffered extremely from the depredations of De Ruyter, who took the castle of Cormantin and fort of Tokaray, with ships to the amount of 200,000 l. By an article in the treaty of Breda, restitution was to have been made of all the places taken by either party during the war; but the affairs of the company were so low and disordered, that they d consented to surrender that charter for a sum of money; upon which the king immediately erected another corporation, called the Royal African Company, which has subsisted to this day. This charter bears date September 27, 1672, and establishes the limits of the company's exclusive privileges from Cape Sale on the south of Barbary, to the Cape of Good Hope. Although the capital this new corporation begun with was small, yet so great was their diligence and success, that in a few years the face of affairs received a total change, Cape Coast was enlarged and beautified. This fort was the only remains of the old company, and purchased from them at the price of 34000 l. The forts of Akra, Dicks Cove, Winebaw, Sukkonda, Commendo, and Anamaboa, were built or repaired, all of them on the Gold Coast, several e within musquet shot of the Dutch settlements. They bought Fredericksburg of the Danes, and built a new fort in Whidah. In a word, in spite of all the murmurings, jealousies, and heart-burnings of the Dutch, they raised their commerce equal to theirs, and superior to that of all other nations<sup>n</sup>.

It appeared, that the Royal African Company, soon after their establishment, exported of home manufactures to the value of 7000 l. yearly (E); that they abundantly supplied our American and many other silks and calicoes, with great variety of drugs, porcelain, &c. Besides the above goods, the African company send fine hats, felt hats, handkerchiefs, hollands, iron bars, wrought iron, knives, scissars, hard ware of all sorts; lead, bars, sheets, and shot; liquors, as arrack, brandy, beer, rum, malt spirits, wine; long ells, looking glasses, medicines, paper, padlocks, pewter, perpetuances or ranters. Provisions, as pickled beef, pork, butter, cheese, bread, flour, biscuits, suet, vinegar, oil, sugar, raisins, currants, spices, tobacco. Shalloons, Silesia linen, and all other German, Scotch, and Irish linen cloths, sealing wax, swords of all sorts, hangers, scymitars, cutlasses, soap, floss, tallow, slate, and marble. Trimmings, as lace, buttons, silver thread, buckram and tapes, ticken, striped hollands, and striped lincens, Welch plains; coats, waistcoats, breeches, drawers, shifts, shoes, slippers, stockings,

American colonies with slaves at an easy rate, and often gave long credit: that they imported <sup>a</sup> into England a great quantity of red wood, elephants teeth, gums, cottons, and gold dust; the latter in such plenty, that from thirty to fifty thousand guineas have at once been coined from the gold imported; the impression being an elephant. Their success, however, was less considerable on the north-coast, where the Dutch West India company possessed themselves of Fort Arguim, and the French of St. Lewis, at the mouth of the river Senegal. In 1673, indeed, they got possession of Fort James on the river Gambia, and of a small castle at Sierra Leona; the commerce of the coast from Cape Blanco to Cape Monte becoming about this time equally open to the English, French, and Dutch. But in 1677, and the year following, the French drove the Dutch from Arguim and Goree, and since those places have been formally <sup>b</sup> ceded at the treaty of Nimeguen to the French, and they have claimed an exclusive privilege from that time. They have frequently seized upon the Portuguese, Dutch, and English traders, and not only assumed a despotic government over that district, but made constant attempts to extend their limits.

THE revolution introduced a number of interlopers in the African trade, to the great prejudice of the company. Those adventurers diminishing the price of European commodities, and raising that of slaves, ivory, and gold dust, obliged the company to implore the aid of parliament; but a majority appeared at that time in the house for an open trade. For three years the trade was made free to all the merchants of Great Britain, upon paying to the company ten per cent. on their exports and imports, from port to port in Africa. Thenceforward, the decline of the trade became sensible, and so low was it reduced in 1700, that the company, after <sup>c</sup> setting forth the prejudice they had received from the encroachments of adventurers, proposed as the only resource, to enter upon a treaty of neutrality with the French company, for all the establishments between Cape Verd and Sierra Leona°. This, however, did not take effect, and the act for laying the trade open being expired in 1712, all the remonstrances of the company to parliament did not prevent a renewal of it. Then the directors again changed their measures, and began to think, that the decline of commerce was owing rather to the warm opposition and rivalry between them and the adventurers, than to the act, which laid the trade open. In fact, this opposition only served to irritate both parties, now so highly inflamed, as to stick at no means to accomplish the ruin of each other. The company spoke of the adventurers as pirates, and treated them as such as often as they had it in <sup>d</sup> their power; while the private merchants retorted upon them, by asserting that they fattened upon the spoils of the nation, and restricted the trade, in order to raise the profits. Now at length, the company finding every other endeavour fruitless, began to chime in with their rivals, and to insinuate, that, by a coalition, the profits of each might be augmented, the trade extended, and the encroachments of foreigners prevented. By means of their forts, and the facility with which they could penetrate the navigable rivers, the company in one respect maintained great advantages over their competitors. They could easily push their trade into the inland countries, and procure a variety of commodities in greater abundance, and at a lower price than their rivals. But the adventurers, on the other hand, balanced these by equivalent advantages. They fitted out shipping at less expence; they carried <sup>e</sup> on the trade by correspondents, without the expence of forts, governors, factors and servants. Hence they were able to undersell the company, particularly in the slave trade, and to make three returns from the American colonies, while the others performed two voyages. All these reasons concurred in persuading the directors of the company, that their best method was to join issue with some of the most wealthy among the adventurers. In truth, they could not expect but to be losers, while the nation in general were gainers, and this it was that put it out of their power to maintain their forts and establishments. But as it was unreasonable, that they should support the expence, while the rest of the nation shared the advantages of their forts, the company, in proposing a coalition, demanded an equivalent for this. The matter was referred to the board of trade, and all the particulars <sup>f</sup> examined by a special committee. The resolutions of this committee were, that the trade should be free, and be exempted from all expences whatever, and that the crown be at the stockens, perukes, wool-cards, all coarse woollen cloths, &c. &c.—Mr. Poffletbwayte, the sensible author from whom we have extracted this catalogue of exports, has shewn a variety of irrefragable arguments and reasons, why the government ought in a peculiar manner to protect this trade. He has also given some visionary projects for raising sugar colonies upon that coast without the labour of negroes; but as the first can hardly be denied by any who admit the utility of supporting our American colonies, so the latter do not merit any great attention, till the author has proved them reconcileable with practice (4).

a yearly charge of 10,000 l. for maintaining forts. The company complained that this sum was insufficient, and made it appear from their books, that in factors, agents, repairing, interest of money, and other expences, near three times the money would be necessary to put the commerce upon a right footing. This they more fully proved by the examples of France and Holland; but notwithstanding all these measures, things remained in the situation we have mentioned till in the year 1730, when some new regulations, of little consequence, were made. As we shall have occasion towards the close of our history to speak more particularly of the present state of this trade, we have here given only a general idea of the rise and progress of the three chief European companies.

Conclusion of the history of the European settlements.

Geography of the Gold Coast.

b STRETCHING along the sea, the Gold Coast contains a variety of different kingdoms and states, viz. Adomir, called likewise Saku and Avina; Axim; Ankobar; Adom, likewise called Little Inkassan or Warshes; Jabi or Jabs; Commendo or Guaffo; Fetu; Sabu; Fantin; Ackron; Agonna or Anguirra; Amra or Aquambus; Labbade; Ningo or Lampi. Several authors have represented Guiney as a mighty kingdom, whose prince had by his valour and power subdued all the neighbouring states, and subjecting them to himself, erected the whole into one potent empire. This, however, appears to be a mistake of the grossest nature, the very name of Guiney being hardly known to many of the natives, and such a monarch as they describe unheard of by the best and faithfullest writers <sup>p</sup>.

c THE beginning of the Gold Coast may be placed at Rio de Suiero da Costa, near Issini, that being the first place where gold is found; and the end at Lay in the country of Lampi, three or four leagues from Akra; because there the gold is procured, but accidentally from a people called Amaho inhabiting the more distant interior country. Each of the above divisions, provinces, or kingdoms, have one, two, or more towns or villages on the sea coast, between or under the European forts and settlements. Eight of them are real monarchies, having their own proper kings, who before the arrival of the Europeans were called Captains; the rest are republics governed by magistrates, who are subject to the laws and periodical changes (F). Upon the river Ankabar or Cobre, which is properly the first country of the Gold Coast, there are a number of towns, which compose the three different provinces of Ankobar, Aborrel or Abocro, and Eguira. The first is a monarchy, the two latter republics. For a number of years the Dutch had a fort at Eguira, and their gold trade, besides what they drew from the neighbouring countries, was very considerable; this canton having its own proper mines: During Bosman's presidency at Axim, a very rich one was discovered; but the Dutch soon lost footing in the country, by an event equally tragical in itself and prejudicial to their interest. The Dutch governor having quarrelled with the chief of the negroes, besieged him in his own house, where he made a brave defence. His ball being exhausted, he fired golden bullets at the Dutch, giving them at the same time to understand, that he was ready to compromise the difference, which was an artifice of his despair, to involve the enemy in his destruction. In the middle of the negotiation he blew up himself and the Dutch, by an act as brave, as it was desperate and unfortunate. To effect this he had engaged a slave, by promising him new cloaths, to stand ready with a lighted match, with which he was to set fire to the train, upon a signal given. The poor wretch punctually executed his orders, and was buried in the ruins, no one escaping besides a slave belonging to the Hollanders, who suspecting the design, ran to acquaint his masters of it. By the communication between the negroe's house and the fort, the whole was destroyed <sup>q</sup>.

f EIGHT leagues east of Cape Apollonia stands the town of Axim (G), which Barbot, without assigning a reason, calls Achombene. According to the ideas of power established among the negroes, this had formerly been a great and powerful republic; but the arrival of the Brandenburghers divided the natives. One party, in expectation of an easier government and looser reins, put themselves under the protection of the new comers; while the other adhered to the Dutch. If we take a view of the country before this period, we shall find it extended six miles in length, seven, says Barbot, computing from Rio Cobre to the village Bosna, a mile west of the Dutch fort, near Bourtrie. The canton of Axim produces a prodigious quantity

(F) Bosman divides this coast into seven kingdoms, and four republics; but we have here followed the division of Barbot and Des Marchais, the minuteness and agreement of their accounts giving an air of truth to their relations.

(G) The negroes call it Axbem; the Dutch Atsim or Atchiem; but the French, to avoid a guttural or harsh sound, call it Axim, now the most general term (5).

(5) PREVOST, vid. t. v. l. ix. c. 4. p. 9.

Description of the country. of rice, water melons, ananas, bananas, cocoes, oranges, lemons, of two different kinds, with abundance of other fruits, and vegetables of all sorts. As to the maize, it is neither plentiful nor excellent, by reason of the humidity and moisture of the soil. So continual is the rain here, that according to the proverb of the country, it rains eleven months and twenty nine days in the year. Rice the natives export to all the kingdoms of the coast, bringing home in return millet, yams, potatoes, and palm oil. Axim produces likewise great numbers of black cattle, sheep, goats, and tame pigeons, as well as other fowls. The whole country is filled with populous villages, some on the sea-side, others farther up the country; all of them rich and beautiful. All the intermediate lands are well cultivated, and the soil so fertile as richly to compensate the labour of the husbandman: besides which the natives are wealthy, from a constant traffick they maintain with their gold with the Europeans. This trade however is somewhat diminished by the long wars supported against the negroes of Ante, or Adem, since the year 1681<sup>r</sup>.

ACHOMBONE, the capital, stands under the cannon of the Dutch fort. Behind, it is secured by a thick wood, that covers over the whole declivity of a neighbouring hill. Between the town and the sea runs an even and spacious shore of beautiful white sand. All the houses are separated by groves of cocoes and other fruit trees, planted in parallel lines, each of an equal width, and forming an elegant vista. These avenues, together with the extensive prospect, render the Dutch fort here one of the pleasantest establishments in Guiney; an advantage which is greatly diminished by the humidity of the air and unhealthiness of the climate, particularly in the rainy seasons. The little river of Axim crosses the town, and the coast is defended by a number of little pointed rocks, which project from the shore, and render all access to it dangerous<sup>c</sup>.

Government.

THE government of Axim is composed of two bodies of the natives; the caboceroes, or chief men, and the manceroes, or young men. In their republics in particular all over the coast, the modes of administration are so perplexed and confused, that it is difficult to describe them. At Axim the cognizance of all civil affairs belongs to the caboceroes; but whatever is of general concern, and may properly be called national, equally appertains to both members of the state. Thus, making war or peace, treaties or alliances, imposing and augmenting taxes, levying or paying tributes to foreigners, are determined upon by both bodies composing the legislative power. They here form a constitution somewhat similar to a British house of peers and commons, where nothing passes into act that has not received the assent of each. Like the commons too, the manceroes often trespass upon the bounds of authority, and transgress the political line that separates and divides the different departments of the government. Their number being greater, their property is proportionable, and this will ever imply power in all states where a spark of liberty remains; so the peers of Axim are often forced to yield their opinion to the obstinacy and weight of the commons. The caboceroes are less wealthy in gold and slaves, and of course less regarded by the people. But what sets the authority of the manceroes more conspicuously superior to the caboceroes is, that the latter are often impeached before the bar of the former; but no manceroe can be tried for crimes of a public nature but by his own assembly<sup>d</sup>.

BOSMAN describes their method of distributing justice nearly in the following terms. If one negro of private rank hath pretensions upon another, he goes loaded with presents of gold or brandy, both of magnetic virtue here, to the caboceroes. This he delivers, then states his grievance, desires speedy redress, retires, and leaves them to deliberate rather upon the merits of his present than of his cause. If it be determined to favour the plaintiff in an extraordinary manner, a full assembly is convoked immediately, or at farthest in two or three days. Here they proceed with great solemnity to an iniquitous decision, without assigning any other reason for their verdict than the force of the received bribe, and the gratitude due on that account to the plaintiff. If, on the contrary, the present of the defendant be the more liberal, or if the bribes be equal, and the address of the latter superior, then the sentence takes a quite different turn, and the justest cause in the world cannot procure the plaintiff redress, or even a hearing. However, when the case is too flagrant, and the merits of the plaintiff's grievance universally known, to avoid scandal, the caboceroes will decline giving sentence, and have recourse to artful evasions and procrastination. The suit will be perplexed by false glosses, or interrupted by other affairs; nay, if hard pushed, the assembly will be adjourned, and the plaintiff obliged to sit down with the loss of his bribe, his grievance, and the disappointment of his views. The suit is in this manner devolved to his heir, who perhaps thirty or forty years after resumes it with more ability, and perhaps before less partial judges. Bosman adds, that he himself has in the derniere resort, or last appeal, had such causes before him, as, from their antiquity, one would be amazed how the smallest trace of evidence or vestige of resentment a could be found among a people ignorant of writing, and who have no memory of past facts but by oral tradition<sup>a</sup>.

It sometimes happens, that the plaintiff, finding the sentence likely either to be tedious or unfavourable, redresses himself by seizing upon the property in gold or slaves of the aggressor. In this method of retaliating he keeps strictly within the bounds of justice, and apprehends no bad consequences from this self-decision, provided he lives in another town or village. Here he is sure of being supported by his townsmen, and a private quarrel presently terminates in a civil broil, no other way to be appeased than by the sword, or an agreement between the original opponents. If the sentence of the caboceroes should happen to be equitable, or if the cause should be decided by the Dutch governor, the dispute is amicably concluded by adjudging according to evidence; but if neither party produces sufficient testimony by witness, or probable circumstances, the defendant, clearing himself by oath, is acquitted. Should he scruple to purge himself by solemn deprecation, judgment passes against him, on condition that the plaintiff corroborates his charge by oath. The oath of purgation is always preferred to that of accusation; but if the plaintiff proves his charge by two or one witness, then the purgation-oath is not permitted to be taken. Hence arise numberless inconveniences, perjury being a common crime among the negroes: besides, he who believes himself aggrieved, by subornation, never fails to watch an opportunity of revenge. Instances of this nature are however the most frequent in the interior and distant districts; as all suits arising near the European forts are determined by the sentence of the factor and the caboceroes; a judgment that is obligatory, admitting of no appeal, but to the director-general. "Thus," says Bosman, "you see, when a law-suit commences without the assistance of attornies and counsellors, those pests of society, they are terminated in a shorter time, with less expence, and perhaps with more justice, than in countries where those gentlemen are employed. It must indeed be acknowledged, that causes here are seldom so puzzling and perplexed as to require the advice of counsel, or the address of solicitors and attornies, for the point in dispute; the judges and the parties are equally simple and on a level." This account of Bosman's might have been true in trivial crimes, and before the Europeans came to share in the executive power; at present we find it contradictory to his own assertions, and the accounts of the best writers, who all agree, that venality and corruption are no where carried to a greater height than in the little republic of Axim. As all crimes are atoned for by fines and pecuniary punishments, a door is opened to partiality and the indulgence of an avaricious disposition, the judge always sharing a certain proportion of the fine*.

As to penalties in criminal cases, first, murder is punished either by death or a pecuniary mulct. The former is seldom executed, except where the criminal is poor and unable to answer the demands of his judges. The latter is of two sorts with respect to freemen and slaves, the fine for murdering a slave being trifling in comparison to that exacted for the life of a freeman. We shall have occasion to speak of this more explicitly under the section of general customs among the negroes. At Axim all fines are paid into the hands of the Dutch factor, who in a manner assumes the supreme executive power. This fine he distributes to the injured person, after having first deducted his fee, which before the presidency of Bosman rose high, but by him was reduced. At present the factor is permitted to receive no more than eight crowns for determining the most important suit that comes before him (H). The only punishment for theft is restitution, or paying a fine proportioned

* Aut. supra citat. ibid.

(H) We are at a loss how to reconcile this with the following relation extracted from the same writer. In the country of Ancobar, which hath long been subject to Axim, there lived two caboceroes, both men of rank and distinction. These had for a number of years been involved in a dispute, each pretending that the other was born his slave, and that by inheritance he had an inviolable right over him. Each supported his claim with plausible reasons, and proofs deduced down for a series of years; insomuch that the caboceroes, finding themselves unable to decide a case so perplexed, referred it to Mr. Bosman, at that time president of the Dutch factory. Both parties came to an agreement to plead their cause before him, and to stand by his award. Accordingly the court sat, and a whole day was spent in the hearing, after which Bosman assures us he knew just as much of the merits of the cause as when it began. Both sides brought such a cloud of witnesses, and advanced such a variety of arguments, that it was impossible to decide, where the merits seemed so equal. To put a period however to so litigious an affair, Bosman asked both parties, whether they were willing to stand by his sentence; and upon their answering in the affirmative, he proceeded to speak to them in conciliating terms. He told them, that their pretensions on both sides were plausible, and their claims apparently just; that the proper witnesses of the cause being long since dead, it was not possible to arrive at a certainty; and that all the evidence hitherto produced being only hearsay and tradition, the merits of the cause must consequently be doubtful. In a word, after having fully prepared the parties, and represented in the strongest manner the difficulty of the case, he requested that they would both relinquish their claims, and enter into a perfect harmony and friendship, each acknowledging the other free, and submitting to the penalty of a fine, if he should ever again resume the suit. Both parties and all the by-standers seemed pleased with this equitable decision, and departed with all the marks of satisfaction, after embracing each other and vowing eternal affection.

portioned to the quality of the offender. In cases of debt the creditor may seize of the property of the debtor double the sum due to him; but the execution of this law being deemed oppressive, the usual method is, to settle the account by arbitration, or restitution of the goods and chattels bought<sup>y</sup>. But of this we shall have occasion to speak elsewhere.

Description of the European settlements; and first of Fort St.
Anthony.

WE shall now describe the European settlements in Axim, beginning with the Dutch fort of St. Anthony. This fortress stands on a high rock, which projects into the sea in form of a peninsula<sup>y</sup>. It is so invironed on this side by other dangerous shoals and blind rocks, as to be inaccessible to an enemy but by land; and there it is fortified by a parapet, drawbridge, and a battery of heavy cannon. The building is neat, strong, and commodious for the extent, that being but small, on account of the narrowness of the rock or point on which it is situated. At some distance at sea it may be taken for a large white house; but for two miles along the shore nothing can be more agreeable than the fort in perspective, the village of Achombone, the wood behind, and the multitude of rocks of unequal heights which border upon the coast. In war time, the custom of the natives is, to place their families and most valuable effects among those rocks, to secure them against the enemy. The Portuguese, who were the founders of this settlement, fixed themselves during the reign of Emanuel upon a small point, which they found not only inconvenient but insecure against the attacks of an enemy. They therefore, on being hard pressed by the Dutch, built the fort where it now stands; from which they were likewise driven in the year 1642. Upon a peace between Portugal and the States General it remained by treaty in the hands of the Dutch company, who have ever since kept possession of it.

THE form of Fort St. Anthony is triangular. It has three batteries, one towards the sea, and two, says Des Marchais, towards the land, all mounting 24 pieces of iron cannon, besides redoubts. The gate is low, secured by a ditch dug out of the rock, and, as we have said, a drawbridge, behind which is a platform, capable of holding in military order a body of twenty men. The factor's or president's house is built of brick, and of a moderate height. The form is the same with that of the fort, having three fronts, each of which has an esplanade, adorned with orange trees. The garrison is usually composed of 25 white men and an equal number of negroes, under the command of a serjeant. It is maintained at the expence of the West India company, and, when well furnished with stores and provisions, capable of making a long defence against any number of negroes. However, St. Anthony fort is liable to the same inconveniences as all the other fortifications on this coast; the heavy and continual rains damaging the walls, and rendering frequent reparation necessary. This obliges the Dutch always to keep a quantity of lime or cement, composed of calcined oyster-shells, of which the coast produces great abundance. The situation of the fort is east of the river Axim, which the Portuguese called Rio Manco; a river navigable only by canoes, but rich in gold dust washed down by the stream from the inland countries<sup>z</sup>.

THREE leagues east of Fort St. Anthony stands Mount Mansore, near which is the town of Pockeso, large and populous, the chief or captain of which is known by the name of John. This is probably the same person as Atkins calls John Ronny. Pockeso is an extensive handsome town, says he, the houses not inferior to those on the north and west of England, each surrounded by a grove of coco trees. It is usual with the people to assemble in the streets, to sell their coco nuts, oranges, lemons, maize, and kanka, or a kind of pastry, in making which the women are very expert<sup>a</sup>.

Fredericksburgh.

MOUNT Mansore is a situation extremely commodious for a fort, it being the first point of Cape Tres Puntas. Here it is that the Brandenburghers or Prussians have their principal factory, called Fredericksburgh. This fort is well built, strong, and beautiful, mounting 46 affection. The more effectually to convince Bosman of their entire acquiescence, both sides made him presents suited to their ability, his rank, and the trouble he had taken. But three months after, the one hired ruffians to murder the other in his own house, which they accordingly effected in the most cruel manner. Bosman receiving intelligence of this, sent to demand the criminal might be surrendered up to him, that due punishment might be inflicted; but this the people of Antobar absolutely refused. He then went in person, but with as little success. Determined to maintain the authority and dignity of his nation, he threatened, that, if they persisted in their obstinacy, he would seize all the inhabitants of the town in his power, and punish them as accessaries to the murder; upon which they desired time to consider of his demand. Next day the criminals appeared before the fort, in fetters, and were surrendered to him; their countrymen at the same time soliciting that the crime might be atoned for by money. To this Bosman had no objection; but pretended difficulties, in order to raise the price. When the sum was agreed on, the criminals were dismissed, the fine paid, and almost the whole appropriated to the judge, a small proportion going to the relations of the deceased. Such were the equity and resolution of the Dutch president, by his own confession (6).

(6) Bosman, Epist. 11.

a pieces of ordnance upon four batteries. Bosman observes, that the cannon are too small for the importance of the settlement, and the gate so large as to give the other Europeans an opportunity of applying in derision the proverb, "Shut your gates, that the town may not run away." On the east side is a beautiful outwork, which greatly diminishes the strength of the fort: but the greatest fault in the whole building is, that the breastworks are too low, reaching no further up than the knee, whence the garrison in case of an attack would be totally exposed to the fire of the enemy.

THE commander in chief of Fredericksburgh, and indeed of all the Prussian establishments in Guiney, takes the title of director-general of the Prussian African company. In Bosman's time, their commanders and servants, common soldiers excepted, were chiefly composed of Dutch; who, in imitation of that people, exerted a supreme authority over the negroes. However, they were always unsuccessful, owing chiefly to the intestine divisions among themselves, and in some measure to the obstinacy of the natives, who are tenacious of their liberty. Barbot gives us the following relation of the rise of that establishment. In 1682 the Elector of Brandenburgh sent two frigates to the Gold Coast; the one mounting 32 pieces of cannon, the other 18 guns, having on board 120 men. The largest frigate was commanded by Matthew de Vas, the smallest by Philip Peter Blanco. They arrived in the month of May off Cape Tres Puntas, and landing at Mount Mansore, then called Mantfort, erected the standard of the electorate. Blanco, who was well acquainted with the character and customs of the natives, employed his credit with so much address, that he obtained liberty from the caboceros to build a fort upon the mount, and to establish a regular commerce. After landing his cannon and throwing up some slight works, he built a few houses, and left a garrison there, after which he returned to Hamburg. So well had he managed his affairs, that some of the caboceros determined to accompany him to Europe, and they were accordingly conducted to Berlin, where the elector received them with great kindness, shewing them every thing that could excite their admiration and engage their esteem. Next year they returned, under the conduct of the same Blanco, who then built the fort, and fully established the colony.

BOSMAN gives us the names and characters of six successive directors<sup>b</sup>. Of these the last, John Vistor was a person of so little conduct and prudence, that the affairs of the company began to fall into confusion and ruin. At last the negroes, enraged against him for some acts of cruelty he had committed, seized him, broke all his limbs, and after torturing him with the utmost barbarity, threw his body into the sea. Henceforward the affairs of the Prussians were on the decline till the year 1708, when Sir Dalby Thomas was governor of the English fort at Cape Coast. This gentleman acquainted the African company, that the king of Portugal had offered his Prussian majesty 40,000*l.* sterling for the fort; however, it was not till the year 1721 that the Brandenburghers abandoned it, the company having purchased both it and Arguin for 30,000*l.*

ACCORDING to Des Marchais, the Prussians quitted Fredericksburgh in the year 1720, and put the fort into the hands of John Ronny, king of Cape Tres Puntas. This author adds, that the year following it was attacked by the Dutch under pretence of a prior contract with the Prussians. But that the negro king replied with great courage to the commissioners sent to him, that the fort had been put into his hands, and that he would defend it with his blood. That he could not conceive any right the Dutch could claim to a fort built in his territories, and that their menaces should not deter him from defending it for the French, whose right only he chose to acknowledge. The conference being now broke off, the Dutch began the attack with great fury, the governor of Mina marching with a choice body to give the assault. John Ronny received him with such spirit and address, that, after the loss of 155 men they were forced to quit the siege, and embark with great precipitation, the governor and several officers being dangerously wounded. During the attack, a French ship, called the Princess of Rochefort, lay at anchor in the road. After the Dutch were repelled she approached the shore, and the captain in landing was civilly received by the natives, and particularly by the king, who offered him the fort and his protection. A formal instrument to this purpose was drawn up; eight French and a certain number of negroes were appointed to garrison the place, till the captain's return from Europe with a sufficient force, and every method for establishing the right of the French nation. But all proved abortive, through the timidity of the captain. After his return on board his ship he sent orders for the eight French left in the fort to quit it, and avoid the snare laid for them by the negroes: thus, by his suspicion and pusillanimity, robbing his country of a valuable settlement.

DES MARCHAIS asserts, that Fredericksburgh is one of the most commodious situations on the whole coast. The anchorage is safe, and entrance into the harbour easy to pilots acquainted with the road. The climate is as healthy as any in Guiney, and the surrounding country rich and well cultivated. Besides the great quantity of gold found in the river, the inhabitants <sup>a</sup> carry on a considerable trade in ivory and slaves, besides the profits arising from the salt made by the women for their amusement. The government is well conducted, and the people in general, the magistrates in particular cases excepted, possessed of the principles of humanity, industry, and justice. In a word, says he, this trade is no less pleasant than profitable; and, if the French had known their own interest, the most important colony they could have settled in Africa might have been at Fredericksburgh.

Dutch.

Soon after the above accident it was taken by the Dutch, who have kept possession of it, with great advantage, to this day, and probably will continue to do so, unless circumstances occur to make them totally abandon the African trade; a resolution that can only flow from some peculiarly unhappy change in the situation of the United Provinces.

<sup>b</sup> CAPE Tres Puntas, of which we have made frequent mention, had its name given by the Portuguese, from its being composed of three points or eminences projecting into the sea. These points are separated by little bays, which afford good anchorage. Each of the hills is clothed by beautiful woods, which are seen a great way at sea. Upon the shore of the two bays stand three villages, Akora, Acaron, and Infiamma; to which last the English give the name of Dickscove. The village of Akora is situated at the bottom of the first bay, westward; Akron, on the declivity of the middle point, and Dickscove on a little gulph formed by the land between that point and Akron. Some voyagers affirm, that these three villages belong to Wasbas, a country lying between Axim and Anta. The whole of this coast is mountainous and woody; among which the timber most in esteem is a yellow tree, much used in chairs, <sup>c</sup> tables, and household furniture. Near Akora stands the little fort Dorothea, which received considerable improvements from the diligence of the Hollanders. This building consists of one house, flat roofed, defended by two batteries of ten guns each, and divided into a great variety of convenient apartments.

thea.

Dickscove.

<sup>d</sup> DICKSCOVE was rebuilt by the English in 1691, after having long disputed the ground with the Prussians, who were at length forced to evacuate it. In the space of six years the conquerors had not completed their building; and after all it scarce merits the name of a fortress. Bosman has often heard the English complain of the situation of this fort, as it is not only inconvenient for trade, but placed in the midst of a fraudulent, intractable, and obstinately vicious band of negroes, with whom there is no dealing with safety. If the English <sup>e</sup> have recourse to force, they are also opposed by force, and so warmly, says our author, that for five years after their establishment they were continually skirmishing with the natives, who at length laid siege to the fort, and were very near carrying it. The consequence was, that they forced the English to accept of their terms, threw off the yoke, and recovered their liberty. Hence proceeded, says the same author, an alliance so strict between them, that they jointly agreed to cheat all the ships that traded there, by passing false gold for pure; a fraud they here frequently practised. Bosman relates an instance of this within his own knowledge; an English vessel having bartered 1700*l.* worth of merchandize for sophisticated gold. On discovery of the fraud he applied to the English chief governor on the coast; but could never procure redress. These are actions which discredit a whole people, and ought to be punished by the <sup>e</sup> legislature with the utmost severity. The fraud is so common as to be practised every day in some degree; nor is it hardly possible for strangers in the trade to discover the false from the genuine gold, so artful is the imitation. In a word, says Bosman, this place may be called the false mint of Guinea.<sup>d</sup>

BARBOT describes this fort as standing two miles east of Dorothea. It borders on the sea, is of a quadrangular form, built of stone and cement, and its principal strength consists in two bastions, mounted with 12 cannon. In 1726 it would seem to have been greatly improved; for Smith describes the fortifications as complete and regular, with four bastions, mounting 20 pieces of cannon, and gardens equally pleasant and useful.<sup>e</sup>

Of the Countries of Anta and Tabi, with their Towns and Forts.

Kingdom of Anta.

Description of Anta.

<sup>f</sup> THE kingdom of Hante, as the negroes call it, or Anta, begins with the village of Boesira (1), eight miles east of Ankora. For a series of years this country was divided into the Upper and Lower Anta; Axim being reckoned the former, and that district now called Anta composing the latter. It is bounded on the north by the country of Adom, on the north-east by Mampo, by Axim on the west, and on the south and south-east by the ocean: its extent from east to west being about ten leagues. The country is mountainous, and covered

(1) Prevost, after Barbot, gives this country the above name; but Bosman calls it Bosna, and differs in many other appellatives from all the other writers.

by

- a by large trees, among which stand a number of fine villages. Formerly Anta was potent and populous, inhabited by a bold and rapacious people, who greatly annoyed the Europeans, by their warlike disposition and frequent incursions. By continual wars with Adom and their other neighbours, they are however now greatly enfeebled, the country in a manner depopulated, and no vestiges remaining of their former glory. The land here is well watered, the vallies rich and extensive, producing rice in abundance, maize of the best sort, sugar canes, yamms, and potatoes the largest on the whole coast. Bosman is of opinion, that it might easily be improved into a fine sugar colony; an experiment we are amazed has not been tried with more success, or rather diligence. No finer soil is to be met with in any part of the globe than along the banks of the river of Bourtry, and the country is no less beautiful than it is rich. It
- b affords the greatest abundance of bread, wine, oil, and animal food: but with the number of the people, the spirit of the few remaining inhabitants is fled; desponding, dispirited, and abject, they shelter themselves under the cannon of the Dutch fort, leaving the greatest part of the land wild and uncultivated. It is really deplorable to view it at present, and reflect on its once flourishing condition; and perhaps a better lesson in politics and the direful effects of war cannot be given, than by a view of the changes made by ambition, and a haughty, turbulent spirit in the Aniese nation, in the space of one century<sup>f</sup>. Bosman relates, that before the war that put a period to its glory, and closed the last scene of its felicity, he had an opportunity of walking to Bourtry, when it regaled the eye with numerous villages well peopled, with rich fields finely cultivated, and with every other object capable of filling the
- c mind with pleasure, content, and admiration of the wise Author of nature. Here a soldier, who could hardly breath on his scanty pay in other places, fared luxuriously on half his income; the labourer lived with the affluence of the gentleman, and he with the splendor of the nobleman. Besides, it is remarkably the most healthy situation on the coast, it being observed by all writers, that the number of deaths here bears no proportion to that in any other country on the coast of Guiney<sup>g</sup>.

THE river that washes Bourtry, whose banks are covered with stately trees that spread a melancholy shade over the water, is navigable for four miles up; but there it is choaked up by rocks and prodigious falls of water, which add to the beauty of the scence, though they diminish the conveniency. On both sides are seen infinite numbers of monkeys, apes, d tygers, wild cats, and some elephants, as well as cows, horses, sheep, hogs, fowls, and all kind of birds. Its waters are filled with shoals of delicious fish; but the catching them is rendered dangerous by the great number of sharks and crocodiles with which the river abounds.

- THE principal villages of this country are Bourtry or Botro, Boyera, or Petre Grand, Pando, Bourtry, Tokorari, which surpasses all the others in extent and beauty, Sukonda, Anta, and Sama; all of them deserving particular notice, on account of the commerce they drive. Botro, or Bourtry, stands upon a small river at the foot of an eminence, on which the Dutch have built an irregular and mean fort, of an oblong form, divided into two parts, each defended by four small pieces of cannon. It was built by one Carolus, in the service of the Dutch, who afterwards
- e passed into the pay of France, and who obtained that privilege from the king of Anta, on acknowledging his superiority by a slight tribute. This fort is called Badenslyn. Its batteries command the village of Bourtry, which has no other commerce than the gold trade carried on with the negroes of Adom. The inhabitants are of a mild and gentle disposition, greatly affected to the Europeans, upon whom they look as their protectors. In 1708 the Dutch began to mark out ground for forming sugar plantations, and their director-general sent to Whidab for two hundred slaves, who were to be employed in cultivating them. They likewise sent to Europe for all the necessary implements, and made such preparations as alarmed Sir Dalby Thomas, the English governor at Cape Coast. He transmitted an account of their proceedings to his constituents, and frequently remonstrated to the Royal African Company, the
- f danger of permitting the Dutch to bring to execution a plan which must lessen the value of the British colonies in the West Indies. Whether the intrigues of the company, or some other cause, might be the occasion, we know not; but those plantations never answered the great expectations of the Dutch.

THE king of Anta has fixed his residence four miles from the Dutch fort, chusing to live near the Europeans, as even now he is seldom freed from his apprehensions from the incursions of the Adomese<sup>h</sup>.

- POYERA and Pandos, two villages lying between Bourtry and Tokorari, are wholly inhabited
- g by fishermen and labourers, who drive a considerable trade with their neighbours, exchanging the fruits of the earth and fish for the produce of other countries. Those two villages are known at sea by a large pointed rock lying before the coast. Tokorari, or as the English call it Tokorada, is the chief village on the coast. Its situation is on a hill, advancing into the sea at the south-east, surrounded by a number of rocks, some below and some above the surface of the water, for two miles along the shore. These rocks are extremely remarkable, a on account of the prodigious waves that dash against them, which probably inspired the negroes with the notion of praying to them as divinities; fear, according to the maxim of Lucretius, rendering them susceptible of the sentiments of piety and devotion. The town, which is discovered behind these rocks, yields nothing in point of beauty, wealth, and extent, to Bourtry. Around it are plains and delicious vallies, adorned with large trees and thick groves, and at every yard's distance are seen the footsteps of different animals on the white sand. The Dutch had formerly a fort, called Witsen, hard-by Tokorari, which the English, commanded by captain Holmes, took from them. De Ruyter retook it the following year, and, after putting the garrison to the sword, levelled it to the ground, as a place of little consequence. Still the ruins of the fort are to be seen, after having successively passed b through the hands of the Portuguese, Danes, Prussians, Dutch, and English; and some French writers allege, that it owed its origin to certain merchants of Normandy; but on the most minute inquiry Barbot declares that assertion to be false and groundless<sup>1</sup>.

The natives famous for building canoes.

THE inhabitants of Tokorari have the reputation of building the best finished canoes of any in Guiney. One shall see them thirty feet long and eight broad, composed of one piece of wood, and dug out of the trunk of a single tree. The European ships who frequent the coasts of Whidab, and trade to Ardrab, usually load and unload by those canoes; and their value may be judged of by the price they are usually sold for, which is never less than forty or fifty pounds sterling. Such is the opinion Europeans entertain of the dishonesty of the inhabitants of Tokorari, that no commerce is carried on with them, except for their c canoes; besides, the coast affords but unsafe and bad anchorage. Bosman relates, that in the wars between Anta and Adom this village was destroyed, so that in his time it consisted of a few houses only. Since his time it would seem to have been rebuilt, as subsequent writers speak of it as a large and populous place.

Sukonda.

SUKONDA stands on the opposite side of the same bay. This is a rich and pleasant village, much noted for the clemency and healthfulness of the air. It stands about six miles distant from Bourtry; and before the wars of which we have spoken, was reputed the finest village on the whole coast. It however shared the fate of all the other places in Anta; its inhabitants were dispersed, its houses demolished, and a number of years ensued before it was restored to its former flourishing condition. The country for eight or ten miles round is not inferior d in any particular to those we have described. The vallies are beautiful beyond imagination; and here, says Bosman, nature seems to have exerted all her skill, and poured forth her richest treasures. Formerly the French had an establishment here; at present the English and Dutch are the only Europeans who maintain forts at Sukonda. The Dutch fort called Orange Fort, was built in the year 1682: the English fort a few years before; but the exact date is not known. They are exactly of the same model, and situated at the distance of a musquet shot from each other. In the year 1694 the Dutch fort was surprised and pillaged by the negroes, who massacred in it a whole ship's crew, that had unfortunately put into the road. Four years after, the English fort met with the same fate; and was rebuilt the year after by Mr. Nourse, the English factor, whose name is still inscribed on the wall. Phillips, who relates e this transaction, speaks of it as a mean and trifling fortification. In the year 1699 it was, according to him, no more than a plain house in the middle of a court, defended by eight or ten pieces of cannon. For five or six years after this the commerce of the Europeans at Sukonda was on the decline; owing to the mutual jealousies of the English and Dutch, and a rivalry that was prejudicial to the interests and felicity of all parties. Their animosities, indeed, had birth prior to the taking of either fort by the natives, and this it was that encouraged them to the attempt. When the negroes formed their design upon the English fort, they came in two bodies from Elmina, the one in a large canoe, the other by land. They approached the fort under pretence of demanding an old debt; and the English, after being made acquainted with their complaint, referred them to the Dutch governor. Although f the Hollander was perfectly informed of the design of the negroes, he affected a profound ignorance and disbelief of their intentions, notwithstanding the repeated remonstrances of the English. After they had been driven from the fort, they were hard pressed in their flight by a party of the enemy in their rear, upon which they requested the protection of a Dutch ship that lay in the road; but the captain's answer was, do you imagine that we take any concern in your misfortunes? An answer perfectly suitable to the character of a Dutchman and a barbarian. The English replied, that they must then perish. "Perish then," said the Hollander, "and God have mercy on your souls." Hence there remains no doubt but the Dutch were deeply concerned in the plot, and other reasons appeared to confirm the suspicion, that they had no small dividend of the plunder<sup>2</sup>.

IN the year 1700 there remained only the walls of the English fort: but though the Dutch g possessed the whole trade, they drew little advantage from it; because the continual efforts a of the English to restore themselves, greatly disturbed their operations. At last a re-establishment was effected, and a new fort rose out of the ashes of the old, with more splendor and strength than the former. Smith, who had been there in the year 1726, represents it as larger and better fortified than Dickscove. The form is quadrangular, upon an eminence, says, Barbot, and Sama on the east. It is built of brick, and mounted with several pieces of cannon, the garrison consisting of five white and twenty black men. As for the harbour and pier, the advantage the Europeans at Sukonda enjoy peculiar to this situation; it is, that the forts standing so near, the factors of both nations have constant opportunities of each other's company when they happen to live in friendship and harmony; an advantage of inestimable value to rational and social beings, placed in this barbarous and ignorant country.

b As to the villages of Anta and Boari, their commerce is but accidental. They are situated between Sukonda and Sama: the country behind being woody and mountainous. The former is of some note for its palm wine, which the merchants buy up there, and sell to all the countries on the Gold Coast. This makes a chief branch of their trade, at the stated periods of their vintages. The soil produces abundance of roots, fruits, pulse, goats and fowls. It is remarkable, that the natives of this country are even harrassed with a canine hunger, a Boulimy, or insatiable appetite; arising, as some imagine, from the liberal use of krisca, a kind of wine common in this place. The gold comes from Mampa and Eguira; but only with the permission of the Adomese, and on paying a high duty; those negroes drawing a large revenue from the power they have of blocking up the chanel of this trade. At the village of Aboari the Dutch had formerly a small factory; but the profits were so trifling that they removed it to Sama, a large and populous village, where however the inhabitants are extremely poor<sup>1</sup>.

c SAMA stands on an eminence, the fort of which is watered by the pleasant river of St. George, Sama. that discharges itself into the sea. The town contains above two hundred houses, which seem to form three distinct villages, one of which is immediately under the cannon of the Dutch fort St. Sebastian. Des Marchais deems this town to be one of the largest on the whole coast, Barbot likewise agreeing with him in its situation, extent, and number of inhabitants. The sole employment of the natives is fishing, a circumstance which easily accounts for their poverty. The government of this place is republican, the magistrates having the supreme power, being subject to periodical changes, and under the authority of the king of Gavi, who seldom, however, interferes in the affairs of the state. This prince resides some leagues distant from the sea, is rich, and much respected by his neighbours<sup>m</sup>.

d HERE the Dutch fort is built upon much the same plan as that at Bourtry. During the wars between England and Holland, the English, joining the negroes of Jabi, made frequent attempts on Fort St. Sebastian, but could never succeed farther than in damaging the fortifications, without being able to seize it, the Dutch keeping possession in spite of all their endeavours. Barbot says, that the apartments are convenient, and the situation for trade exceedingly favourable, the negroes of Adom and Worcha carrying on a constant traffick in gold, which they exchange for European commodities. The Dutch maintain a great authority over the natives, notwithstanding they pay an annual tribute to the king of Gavi. The river of Sama was by the Portuguese called Rio de St. Juan, but the natives call it Bosum Pra, which signifies God or the Divinity, agreeable to which they worship it. They affirm, that its source lies four hundred miles up the country, and Barbot agrees with them. The entrance is commodious for shipping, who have nothing to fear besides a flat rock, which the sailors call the sugar-cake. Des Marchais alleges, that the Dutch having resolved, if possible, to discover the mines, whence the negroes brought their gold, they fitted out a yawl with six men, to proceed up the river to its source. After they had been gone six days, and had rowed with great difficulties against a rapid stream for sixty miles, they found their labour was lost, and that the passage was choked up by rocks, shoals, and cataracts, which obliged them to return<sup>n</sup>.

f SAMA is supplied with roots, fruits, and other vegetables, by the little territory of Jaben on the east, it standing at so small a distance, that most geographers have mistaken it for part of its district. A little farther east lies the country of Jabi or Jabbab, which extends quite to Sama. Commendo. The king of this country is so poor, that Bosman advised the European merchants not to trust him with goods to the value of ten pounds sterling, and this from no distrust of his will, but of his ability to pay. He adds, however, that the fertility of the soil would soon enrich the inhabitants, if they were not exposed to the continual inroads of their neighbours, who spoil and destroy what they are not able to carry away. Here the village Abrobi alone deserves mention. It is situated upon a bay, with a large plain behind, that stretches to the foot of some high mountains. Very little pure gold is to be found here, the natives being as well skilled in adulterating it, as any other people in Guiney. To conclude this head, the Chamefcian river, or Rio de St. Juan, is so useful to the Hollanders, that without it, Bosman says, it would be difficult to keep possession of the fort. By means of it they are supplied with wood and water; the kitchens and ovens have not only their fuel from thence, but materials for canoes; and small shipping are procured by means of the river. In short, it is the chief chanel both of commerce and of the conveniences of life<sup>a</sup>.

Description of the Kingdom of Commendo.

Kingdom of Commendo.

THIS country, which by voyagers is called Commendo, Commany, Komany, Auguesto, and Guaffo, is bordered on the west by the countries of Jabi and Jaben, on the north-west by Adom, by Ambranbo on the north, on the east by a little republic lying between Commendo and Fetu, called Addena or Elmina, and by the ocean on the south. Its dimensions are about five miles along the sea coast, and about as much up the country. In the center, on the strand, stands Little Commendo or Commany, by the negroes called Ekki Tekki, having Cape Aldea das Terras on the west, and Ampeni on the east, with some little hamlets lying in the intermediate space. Commendo had formerly been a part of Sabu and Fetu, but of late years erected into a separate and distinct monarchy. The chief city or residence of the king is called Guaffo. It is well inhabited and large, containing no less than four hundred houses. The situation is upon a high ground, at the distance of four miles from Little Commendo; the Dutch distinguish both by the names of Great and Little Commendo. This kingdom produces but little rice, yet are the vallies no less fertile than agreeable, and the hills covered with wood, which affords the most delightful prospect. Behind Little Commendo, the land rises by a gentle ascent into little hills, beautifully clothed with woods of a perpetual verdure, and at the bottom are meadows and plains disposed in the most agreeable manner, and filled with fruit-trees of various kinds: The natives are of a warlike disposition, and so numerous, that in this little kingdom his majesty is able to raise an army of 20,000 men. His ordinary body guard is composed of 500 stout fellows, well armed, resolute and loyal. Most writers are persuaded that Commendo abounds in gold mines; but that the king, for fear of exciting the avarice of the Europeans, prohibits their being worked. Barbot relates, that near Cape Aldea some of the natives had discovered a rich mine, which the policy of the council, to guard against the consequences, and prevent its being opened, immediately consecrated into a divinity<sup>b</sup>.

Produce of the country.

Disposition of the people.

As this country is divided into two distinct provinces, we shall begin with describing Little Commendo. This province, says Artus, is by the Portuguese called Aldea das Terras, and by the natives Ekki Tekki. Villault says, that this town contains at least one hundred houses. It stands upon the banks of a fine rivulet, that empties itself into the sea on the southward, which forms a kind of canal, or little oblong harbour for canoes. The north-east side of the town, where the French had formerly a settlement, is bordered by little hills, at the foot of which lie fine rich meadows, and pasture, as well as fertile fields, every-where interspersed with groves of fruit-trees. Little Commendo had once been a place of great note, and one of the finest towns in Guiney. At present it is only the remains of a town destroyed by fire; and well peopled ruins of a once flourishing and great city. Such it was in the year 1675, when most of the inhabitants, who were burnt out of their houses, retired to Ampeni.

Little Com-
mendo.

HERE the natives are in general turbulent, cunning, and deceitful, much addicted to lying and stealing. Their employment consists either in fishing or in commerce, and their neighbours employ them as brokers and factors, particularly the people of Akamen, who drive a considerable trade. Every morning 70 or 80 large canoes may be seen upon the coast, fishing or trading with the European shipping in the road. About the middle of the day they put to shore, when the south-west winds begin to blow, both for facility of unloading and for securing a market for their cargoes, either at Great or Little Commendo, whither the inland negroes assemble with the commodities of their several countries. No markets on earth are better supplied with all sorts of grain, roots, fruits, pulse, and fish, than these, nor at a more reasonable price<sup>c</sup>.

English fort.

HERE the English and Dutch have forts: According to Barbot, the English fort is a regular spacious square, with bastions at each angle, the whole mounted with twenty-four pieces of iron cannon. The fort is well supplied with water, and guarded by a body of sixty men, including negroes. Smith affirms, that, next to Cape Coast, this is the principal fortifia cation the English have in Guiney, at least on the Gold Coast. The Dutch fort of Wedenborough is but a musket-shot distant, but the advantages arising from so near a vicinity are destroyed by the quarrels and jealousies between the factors of both nations, who, according to the same author, never live upon a footing of friendship. An English factor, a friend of Smith's, was attacked by a Dutch factor in a cowardly manner, as he was asleep under the shade of some trees near the fort. The approach of his adversary waked him, and he was just able to save his own life at the expence of the Dutchman's. The landing place, or where they unship goods, is convenient, the gardens excellent, and the fort pleasant<sup>r</sup>.

WEDENBOURGH, the Dutch fort, was built in the year 1688, by Swerts, at that time director general. The building is a square, defended by good batteries, capable of mounting 32 pieces of ordnance if complete. In 1695, the negroes attacked it in the night, and at a time when 20 out of the small garrison, commanded by Bosman, were laid up with sickness. However, after an engagement of five hours, they were repulsed with considerable loss. Although the negroes poured showers of shot into the embrasures, which could not be shut close, yet so bad marksmen were they, that Bosman lost but two men. Not discouraged, they returned a second time to the charge, resolving to push their way sword in hand. Bosman had sent for relief to Elmina, and a seasonable reinforcement arrived, just as the negroes were cutting down the port-holes with their swords. An obstinate engagement ensued between this detachment, endeavouring to force their way to the fort, and the negroes determined to oppose them. After a warm conflict, which lasted half an hour, the Dutch were overpowered and defeated; however, a considerable number found means to enter the fort. By this supply the spirits of the garrison were raised, and the negroes discouraged from prosecuting the siege. Bosman relates, that his gunner had the treachery to nail up his cannon; a piece of villainy that was nearly attended with the loss of the fort. When the siege was raised, the delinquent was sent in irons to Elmina, to be punished according to his deserts, instead of which, he was not only set at liberty by the director general, but promoted to a place of more trust and profit than he had before enjoyed<sup>s</sup>. Thus we see that prejudice and partiality can have place even in the bosom of a stoical Dutchman.

Siege of Wedenborough.

THE principal commodities for which there is a demand by the negroes of Commendo, are, glass beads, brass bells and buttons, long linen cloths, and woollen stuffs. The former they send up the country in exchange for gold; the latter they keep for their own consumption; however, those articles are sold only by retail, and such a variety of factors, brokers, and agents, are employed by those negroes, as makes trading with them equally tedious and uncertain. When they are at war with neighbouring nations, trading thither for slaves is profitable, for they hurry to dispose of their prisoners to save the expence of maintaining them. A vessel arriving upon such an occasion is sure of completing her cargo in a few days. Barbot complains, that the adulteration of gold here is commonly practised, and with great ad- dress. The worst gold is that called Akra or Kraka, but this fraud is not of late invention; for Artus observes, that in his time, the people of Commendo were infamous for this scandalous custom. After having melted it with copper, they cut the mass into small pieces, the better to disguise the mixture. Nay they have even had the effrontery to offer the Dutch copper instead of gold<sup>t</sup>.

WHEN the people of Commendo are at war, they usually have a slave market at Little Commendo, for the more quick dispatch. Here too they keep quantities of gold in the hands of certain agents, employed to carry on trade, while the rest are fighting the enemy in the field. The gold trade indeed is not very considerable, tho' the negroes show the ruins of a Norman factory, established solely for the gold traffick. The French build much upon this old factory; and a late writer of that nation asserts, that had they chosen it, they might have retained the exclusive commerce of Commendo to this day. His arguments are founded upon a traditional story, that one of the kings, hearing that a French ship was arrived in the road, sent refreshments on board, and ordered the messenger to acquaint the captain with his resolution never to trade with any other Europeans, as long as the French favoured him with their custom. Barbot relates, that the natives to this day express a peculiar regard for the French. On his second voyage, in the year 1682, the king sent his son on board, as a pledge for his, the captain's, return, if he came to Commendo to settle a treaty of commerce between the two nations, although at that time he denied the English and Dutch the liberty of erecting forts. Barbot, after his return, proposed this treaty to the minister, and mentioned the district of Ampeni as the most commodious for a fort. His remonstrances were, however, disregarded<sup>u</sup>. In the year 1688, Du Casse arrived on that coast with a squadron of four men of war equipped at Rochefort, with intention of forming some settlements at Commendo, where the natives were proposing to throw off the yoke imposed upon them by the Hollanders. Here he actually erected a factory, in which he left a small garrison, and then sailed to Alampy and Whidab, with the same intention.

A few months after Du Casse's departure from Commendo, the intrigues of the Dutch kindled a war amongst the negroes, in which their king was killed, and the new-founded French settlement pillaged; the garrison being forced to screen themselves under the protection of the English at Cape Coast. After this disgrace, the enterprize was never again resumed.

Lari.

A LITTLE to the east of this fort stands a village, called Terra Piguena, or Lari. It belonged to the Dutch, but the commerce carried on was inconsiderable, on account of its vicinity to Elmina, which engrossed all the capital branches of trade. When the Portuguese desire to trade, they send some of their natives to Tekki Ekki, or to Commendo, with gold dust to be sold to the Dutch<sup>w</sup>.

Cause of the war with the Dutch.

THE kingdom of Commendo was in the most flourishing condition, when the arbitrary and haughty conduct of the Dutch obliged the natives to seize arms in defence of their liberty, and to rescue themselves out of the jaws of destruction. Hostilities were however for a while suspended by the good offices and interposition of the king's brother, then in the service of the Dutch governor of Elmina; but this useful mediator having been dismissed and affronted, the Commendians only wanted a fair opportunity of declaring themselves and coming to an open rupture. In 1694, the governor of Elmina, having had miners sent him from Europe, began to make some trials of their skill upon a little hill, two miles distant from Wedenbourg; the natives were highly enraged, because that eminence happened to be one of their divinities. They attacked the miners, seized upon all their utensils, and made prisoners of those whose want of address or activity prevented their escape. Of this insult the Dutch complained to the king, but he declined giving satisfaction, by protesting his innocence and ignorance of the fact. Being strongly urged to punish the offender, he laid the whole blame upon John Kabes, who resided near the fort Wedenbourg, and carried on a considerable traffick with the Dutch (K). Bosman however contradicts this, giving for a reason, that Kabes was a person of no courage or resolution; a character by no means consistent with what Barbot relates, and probably owing to Bosman's strong prejudices against him. The governor of Elmina, upon the king's declaration, marched some troops into the territory of Commendo, under the pretext of obliging Kabes to make satisfaction. Upon the first report of their arrival, Kabes came out of his village to justify himself, and to offer them presents; but finding that they proceeded to ravage and lay waste the country, he prepared for his defence. He assembled a body of troops, met the Dutch, and a sharp action ensued, in which both sides lost a number of men. This event flung the affairs of the whole country into confusion: Kabes, to be revenged on the Dutch, invited the English to settle in Commendo, or in its neighbourhood. He even offered them a residence in his own town, and promised them in a short time to enable them to rebuild the ruins of an old fort they had formerly possessed. Bosman said, that with such diligence did they set to work on the fort, as in a few weeks to make it habitable, and so strong as to render dispossessing them difficult<sup>x</sup>.

Hostilities begun between the Dutch and Commendians.

Misconduct of the Dutch governor.

It is defended by four batteries, and a strong tower mounted with cannon, which might greatly annoy the Dutch. Bosman asserts, that the Dutch company complained grievously of this establishment, and impeached the indolence, the ignorance, and the cowardice of the governor of Elmina, for so easily permitting it to be erected. His conduct to Kabes was likewise taxed as highly impolitic; but the governor flattered himself with acquiring the same honour as Swerts, another Dutch governor, had done. This man, after the king's death, had obtained by his address an absolute power over the natives of Commendo, and the present governor expected the same success. To repair his former errors, he had the precaution to engage for the sum of 5000*l.* an army of negroes in the service of the company. This body was formed out of the inhabitants of Jaffer and Kabestere, and powerful enough to reduce both the king of Commendo and Kabes, had not the governor been imprudent enough to declare, that after chastizing them, he would turn his arms against the negroes of Fantin and Sabu. To avoid ruin, and from absolute necessity, those kingdoms were obliged to join the Commendians. They formed a body so powerful, that after frequently defeating the Dutch and their allies, they rendered them incapable of attempting new enterprizes; but divisions soon arose among the

(K) By Sir Dalby Thomas's letters to the directors, dated Nov. 1. 1701, it appears that this Kabes had formerly lived at Cape Coast, from whence he retired, to avoid the payment of certain debts he had contracted. Although he had been the bitter enemy of the Dutch, on this occasion a purse of gold gained him the governor of Elmina's protection, and the liberty of settling near Wedenbourg. Afterwards upon some disgust he again went over to the English, and became useful in erecting a fort at Commendo. Upon some fresh occasion of complaint, he joined himself to the interlopers, and they by his assistance, put themselves in a condition, in the year 1702, to erect a fort with eight pieces of cannon. This did not prevent his being again reconciled to the company in 1707, and furnishing them with powerful succours against the Hollanders. In a word, he was a person of an active lively turn, perfectly acquainted with his own interest, but too fickle to pursue it (7).

(7) Barbot, p. 439.

- a conquerors, that quickly stopped this rapid course of victory. Tekki Ancan, brother to the king of Commendo, unmindful of his duty to his country, king, and engagements, went over to the Dutch, with the negroes of Adom, and some other auxiliaries. An incident so unforeseen, put the Dutch in a condition to venture the hazard of another battle, where the issue remained a long while in suspense. At length victory so far declared itself for the Dutch, that their troops began to neglect every other care for the business of plundering the enemy's camp. This the king of Commendo, one of the bravest princes of his age, observed, and determined to profit by their error. He rallied his men, and gave orders they should march up to the enemy with their muskets clubbed, to deceive them into a belief of their being a body of allies, come to share in the booty. The stratagem succeeded to his wish; he attacked the enemy with the utmost vigour, easily drove them out of the camp, made prodigious slaughter among them, and obtained a most complete victory. Bosman charges the whole of this loss upon the misconduct of the Dutch governor, first in imprudently irritating two powerful nations, and next in permitting his troops to desert the victory in their hands, in quest of plunder.
- THE next governor who succeeded, resolved to pursue other measures. Having nothing to hope for by force of arms, he tries the effects of negotiations and treaties. He proposed to the king of Commendo a perpetual alliance offensive and defensive, on the sole condition of being indemnified in the losses occasioned by the war. Here the English, who could expect no advantages from this reconciliation, represented to the king, that as he had not occasioned the war, it was unreasonable he should sustain the expence, which would only encourage the Dutch to enter upon a fresh war. They added, that now it was the king's power to impose his own terms, and that the English were ready to assist him with all their forces, in doing himself justice. The king, gained with proposals which equally flattered his resentment and his interest, recommenced hostilities. The Dutch continued for some time to bear those injuries with patience, hoping to overcome the king's passion by gentleness and moderation; but perceiving that every day produced fresh outrage, they had recourse to the negroes of Fantyn, engaging them by a subsidy to remain neutral. Thus those barbarians were engaged by both sides; from the one they received a sum of money for fighting, and from the other, a larger sum for remaining inactive spectators. The last they chose, as most for their interest, and agreeable to their inclinations; nay, by raising the subsidy to 300*l.* sterling, they engaged to declare war against their former allies, and to assist the Dutch with all their forces. While the governor of Elmina was feeding himself with great hopes from this new alliance, he had the mortification to see all his views destroyed, by a counter-mine of the English governor at Cape Coast, who offered the same sum to the Fantiyese, if they would remain neuter. This they embraced for the same reasons for which they accepted the first offer of the Dutch. Their chief was the only man among them who was disposed to perform his engagements with the Hollanders. Him therefore they deposed in a solemn assembly, and in his room substituted a prince more ready to comply with the humours of the people. The Commendians still continuing their insults, obliged the Dutch to apply to the Adomese on the one side, and to the negroes of Akani and Kabeshore on the other, promising each the sum of 500*l.* for their aid against the Commendians. The effects of these treaties appeared infallible; but the division of the subsidy had occasioned civil wars among the new allies, and so embroiled their affairs, as rendered it impossible for them to serve the Dutch. Instead of reproaching their treachery, the governor of Elmina turned to the negroes of Dinkira, whom he endeavoured to gain heartily into his cause, by a sum of 800*l.* sterling. This they accepted, and were preparing to take the field, when an incursion of some neighbouring nations into their territory obliged them to employ their troops in their own defence. However, they had so much honour as to return the subsidy, deducting only a part for the expences of ambassadors; an example that was by no means followed by the Fantiyese, who thought of nothing less than a restitution. In this desperate state of their affairs, there remained no alternative besides ruin, or in the humblest manner supplicating peace; but a fortunate incident gave a happy turn to affairs, and an opportunity of extricating themselves with more honour. The brother of the king of Commendo, who had deserted to them in the beginning of the war, had, upon some misdemeanour, been banished with all his family to Surinam. His banishment coming to the ears of the directors of the company, was by them thought too rigorous, and accordingly revoked. The prince was set at liberty, brought back to Elmina, and employed to bring the king his brother to hearken to reasonable propositions of peace. In this business he acquitted himself with so much address, that he soon disposed the king to listen to certain terms, in consequence of which a peace was concluded, every way honourable and advantageous to the Dutch. We are shocked at the thoughts of relating the sequel. The English at Cape Coast, disgusted with the king's conduct, had him assassinated at a feast to which they invited him; a sad recompence for the faithful services this brave prince had done them; and an action that will stain with ignominy the memory of that unworthy governor, whose name we chuse to pass over in silence (L). a

The Commendians resent the murder of their king.

The English defeated.

An action so barbarous and insidious, threw the country into new troubles<sup>a</sup>. The Commendians were seized with the strongest resentment against the English, and entertained the most bitter but just notions of revenge, for the death of their brave king. On the other hand, Tekki Ankan, the king's brother, who had connived at the murder, secretly quitted Elmina to join himself to the English, and with them to fight against his country. They proposed to the Dutch an union against the Commendians, and pointed this out as the favourable opportunity of revenging the injuries they had suffered in the late war; but the governor of Elmina shut his ears against every proposition tending to involve him in fresh quarrels, so ruinous to trade and commerce. Tekki Ankan and the English then looked out for other alliances; they engaged several little states in their cause, and assembled an army greatly superior to the Commendians. The issue of the first battle was agreeable to justice; the English were defeated, and a complete victory obtained by the Commendians, owing chiefly to the conduct of their leader Tekki Ami, who signalized himself greatly in the action, and gained the reputation of being as brave and skilful a commander as their late king. b

A villainous action of the Dutch governor.

ALTHOUGH the Dutch had embraced a strict neutrality, the Commendian general paid them the compliment of sending to Elmina a great number of the enemies heads, testifying by this, that he was resolved to live and die in the service of the Hollanders. The compliment was well received, and the ambassadors returned loaded with presents. A fairer occasion, says Bosman, could never offer of revenging themselves upon the English, had they heartily espoused the cause of the Commendians; but the Dutch governor was influenced against the national interest by a favourite negro, called Azim, a mortal enemy to the Commendians. This man never desisted from exciting his ambition, by proposing the conquest of Commendo, as a just reparation of the losses the company had sustained under the preceding governor. His arguments had such weight with this weak agent of the Dutch, that without consulting his council, he determined to attack the negroes of Fetu, a nation subject to the Commendians. All the rights of nations were violated to gratify his ambition and favourite slave. He began hostilities upon a market day, when the Fetuans were bringing their goods to Elmina, under the sanction of publick faith and solemn treaties. In a word, as if the Dutch governor were determined to equal in treachery and the blackest villainy the English at Cape Coast, he attacked and pillaged, without honour, remorse, or conscience, those industrious and inoffensive negroes. Many of them were killed on the spot, and twenty-four prisoners carried into Elmina, put on board a ship in the road, and sent into perpetual slavery. The pretext for so shocking a violation of public faith, was the murder of certain women of Elmina, whom the Dutch asserted were massacred under the walls of the fort by the Fetuans. The allegation was false; and had it been true, none but a base mind could stoop to so mean and treacherous a revenge. Those women were put to death by Tekki Ankan, and the council of Mina were so sensible of the share their governor and his favourite Azim had in it, that they chose to drop the inquiry, which they knew must terminate to their dishonour<sup>b</sup>. c

The Dutch trade on the decline.

The English defeat the Commendians, and kill their king. Peace established.

By this detestable and unwarrantable conduct, the Dutch trade at Elmina was ruined at one stroke, and the Commendians and Fetuans became the irreconcilable foes of Holland and the Dutch company. On the other hand, the English had strengthened themselves by new alliances, and believed the opportunity favourable for renewing the war with the Commendians. They attacked them with an army greatly superior in number; but the superior courage of the Commendians would have gained them a decisive victory, had not their brave general received a mortal wound, just when the scale of fortune was weighing down in their favour. This unlucky accident dispirited the troops, and made them fall into confusion; for Tekki Ami was the soul and vital principle of his army. The English pushed the advantage; and the loss of one man made fortune change sides, and declare against the Commendians. They were routed with great slaughter; a prodigious number of prisoners were taken; which, with the booty, more than indemnified the English in the expence of the whole war. In consequence of this victory, Tekki Ankan mounted the throne of Commendo; a change of government greatly to the advantage of both the English and Dutch; though they might, had other measures been at first pursued, have hoped for advantages still more considerable and important. Bosman has concealed from us the names of all the Dutch governors, whose false system of politics brought upon the company all the losses of the Commendian war. He excuses or rather f

- b TH E reader will perceive that, in describing the situation of countries, we have somewhat changed the method pursued in the former volume, for one which, we hope, he will esteem more rational and uniform. We have here proceeded from west to east, in describing the maritime kingdoms, in order that we might in one regular chain pursue the history of the interior countries from east to west. Thus, we begin the sea coast with the provinces farthest west, going regularly back till we come to the most easternly province of the division we are describing. Then we proceed to the interior kingdom immediately north, and follow a direct line to the west, where we fall in with the next division to be described. By this method all chasms are avoided, and we are relieved from the disagreeable necessity of skipping over whole kingdoms, in order to lay down the geography of those north of it.
- c The maritime and interior kingdoms are described in one sweep; the reader's attention fixed, and his ideas rendered perfectly clear by the uninterrupted succession of kingdoms immediately adjoining. This alteration became the more necessary, on account of the multiplicity of petty kingdoms, states, and provinces, into which the coast of Guiney and the inland country are divided. Without it we apprehend it would be impossible to lay down the geography with any tolerable precision, as we must have described inland and maritime kingdoms, after the manner of voyagers, just as they happened to occur to our memory.
- THIS kingdom, which Barbot calls Fetu, has the name of Afuto by Vasconcelos, and by most English writers is called Fetou. The first orthography we have retained, as nearest the sound and expression of the word by the natives. It is bounded on the west by the river Benja, and kingdom of Commendo; on the north by the country of Ati; on the east by Sabu, and by the ocean on the south. The king, who reigned in Barbot's time, was called Aken Penin Ashrive. The crown is elective, and the capital, also called Fetu, stands in the inland country. Bosman gives this kingdom 160 miles in length, and near as much in breadth. He describes it as beginning at mount St. Jago, or the river Sel, and terminating at mount Manfro, or Montfort<sup>d</sup>.
- THE kingdom of Fetu had once been so powerful as to inspire with terror all the neighbouring nations, and render Commendo tributary; now the scene is reversed, the civil divisions and broils among the inhabitants reducing it so low, that neither the king or nobility dare take a step without leave from the king of Commendo. During the Commendian war, the *Fetuan*s were divided, one party joining with the Dutch, the other with the king of Commendo. Hence they contributed to their own ruin; neighbour fought against neighbour; they were cut down on all sides, and in the last battle almost totally destroyed. At present the inhabitants are scarce sufficient to cultivate the country, which is fertile and pleasant as any upon the coast. Before those wars, which ended in its destruction, Bosman, who had often traversed it, says that it was filled with populous villages, the country every-where shewing proofs of wealth and plenty. Grain of all kinds, cattle of all sorts, oil and palm wine, constituted its principal riches. But what rendered it unspeakably pleasant and beautiful, were the groves with which all the public roads were shaded, by which the passenger was equally defended against the rain, and the scorching beams of the sun. One of the finest in the whole kingdom was that from Elmina to Sambu, a village near the capital. Add to this the trees of various kinds with which the hills were cloathed, and the rivulets, which in pretty meanders watered the valleys, and the whole will give the prospect of a country luxuriously beautiful. It is extremely well situated for European settlements, by reason of the neighbouring trading kingdoms, and the conveniency and cheapness of living. The natives, to a man, were busied in tilling the ground, sowing the seed, planting trees, making oil, or drawing wine from the palm, with which the kingdom abounded. Some indeed were employed in fishing, in making salt, in driving a trade upon their own capitals, or as brokers for the merchants of the inland countries. Smith affirms, that he country round Elmina and Cape Coast is not inferior to any part of the kingdom in beauty and fertility; but that it is more thinly inhabited. In another place he says, that the nearer you approach the Slave Coast, the land grows more rich and pleasant<sup>e</sup>.
- THREE miles below Wedenburgh, stands the town and fort of La Mina, or St. George Elmina; a name given it by the Portuguese; but for what reason cannot so clearly be determined, as no part of the country affords mines of any kind. Bosman thinks it probable, that the name arose from the great abundance of gold sent hither from the interior country, which made it seem as if the neighbouring mines produced it. The town is by the natives called Oddena, though the Europeans in general retain the appellation first imposed by the Portuguese; it is of a great length, but narrow. The houses are built of a stone hewn out of a neighbouring rock. In the year 1684, this town was so populous, so powerful, and the inhabitants so brave, that they were the terror of the whole coast. Under the conduct of a good officer, they were, according to Bosman, capable of the greatest undertakings; since then, the small pox first made terrible havock among them; afterwards the tyrannical government and wars of Commendo concluded the devastation begun by that nauseous and filthy disease. So depopulated, impoverished, and miserable is the place, that one finds it difficult to credit the best authorities concerning its potency, and that a change so sad should be produced in so short a time. It is not able to raise above fifty men, exclusive of the servants of the factory, fit to bear arms. Hardly a town on the whole coast, but has profited by the calamities of Oddena. They have become populous by its becoming a desert; and the tyranny of the governors of Elmina, the dread of the small pox, and the Commendian war, have all been so many advantages to Akim and other places, which have furnished an asylum to the miserable inhabitants of Oddena. When Bosman first arrived there, not a morning passed, but five or six hundred canoes were seen fishing beyond the beach; in the space of four years not one tenth part of that number were to be found in the whole town; but he indeed imagines, that were a governor of a mild disposition, an encourager of the arts, and a man of conduct, set over them, the place might soon be brought to its former flourishing condition. He might by his gentle usage recall the fugitives, restrain the engrossing disposition of Akim, and by proper encouragement render the town of Elmina populous, industrious, and wealthy; a change which would be attended with unspeakable advantages to the company. Hitherto, neither the natives or Dutch have been so happy, as to meet with such a governor, and one would be tempted to think, that our author's sentiments of one are merely ideal.

THE town of Elmina, La Mina, or Oddena, as the natives call it, stands on the river Benja, upon a low, flat peninsula, formed by the ocean on the south, the river on the north, Commendo on the west, and the famous citadel of St. George D'Elmina on the east. Towards Commendo it is fortified with a strong wall of large stone, brought from an adjacent rock, a deep ditch, and some pieces of cannon mounted on each side of the gate. The wall begins at the sea side, and stretches along to the banks of the river, which separates the town from the fort on mount St. Jago. This fort the Dutch call Conradtsburgh, which they built for the security of Elmina, upon a situation that equally commands the town and their chief factory.

THE natives of Elmina are well limbed, clean made, and robust, of a warlike disposition, but more civilized and polished than other negroes, on account of their familiar acquaintance with the Europeans. Their usual occupations are fishing, trading, and making palm wine and oil. They come to market with their fish about mid-day, paying the Dutch a fifth by way of customs. Their commerce extends along the coast even to Whidah. They have great address in adulterating the precious metals, and pretend that they acquired the art from the Portuguese; if so, they greatly excel their instructors. In Elmina are a great number of artisans, who work in metals in a manner little inferior to the best European mechanics. They cast and carve in gold and silver; they make buttons, plain or filigrane rings, chains, sword hilts, and other ornaments; nor are they ignorant of the method of cutting, grinding, and polishing crystal and glass, and of giving it all shapes and forms. In the town are about two hundred houses, and hardly any but has its mechanics. Most of the streets are ill peopled; otherwise, from the ingenuity of the inhabitants, they would appear to great advantage.

THE town is divided by most writers into three districts, each having its particular rights, and governed by a chief, whom the negroes call brasso. Under them the brassos have caboceros and certain inferior officers, the ministers of justice in ordinary cases. The three chiefs with their councils form the regency and legislative part of this small republic, since the Portuguese rendered it independent of the kings of Fetu and Commendo, who enjoy the sovereignty of all the country besides. In this condition, and from the nature of their government, it was, that the inhabitants of Elmina found means to render themselves formidable to all their neighbours; their freedom inspiring them with a courage, a boldness, and independency of thought and action, no where else on the Gold Coast to be met with. First they maintained their liberty under the protection of the Portuguese; and afterwards of the Dutch; but no sooner had the latter begun to limit their privileges, to retrench their rights, and to mix in their government, than that spirit which was the soul of their courage vanished, and they became timid, cautious, and dastardly, like slaves fearful of disobeying the nod of an imperious master.

a BEFORE we proceed to the description of the Dutch fort, we shall beg leave to mention a few particulars concerning the river Benja, which glides by the walls of the town of Elmina. Monsieur Foequenbergh observes of the waters of this stream, that they are ten times more salt than the saltiest brine or pickle. In the months of May and June, it is as fresh as rain water, from the quantity of rain that pours down in streams from the hills. It is only in the dry seasons that it is remarkable for its saltness, which Foequenbergh attributes to the nitrous quality of the soil; but perhaps more properly to the evaporation of the sea water, by the intense heat of the sun, and the shallowness of the chanel: for he acknowledges that the tide runs for two miles up the river. What confirms our opinion, is the practice of the natives, who generally make their salt after a high tide, which they let by sluices into basons, or small ponds dug in the earth. Here the water is evaporated, and a fine bay salt produced in the same manner as in different parts of Europe.

b THE citadel of Elmina, standing in the center of the Gold Coast, is extremely commodiously situated for the purposes of trade, and the protection and security of the trader. Its situation is upon a rock, bounded on one side by the ocean, and also defended by strong bastions. The whole building is square, surrounded by a high stone wall, cannon proof. As the company have spared no expence in beautifying and fortifying this settlement, it is beyond contradiction one of the most complete on the coast. The fort, exclusive of the out-works, is forty rhinland yards in length, and thirty-two in breadth, surrounded by four grand bastions, or four interior batteries. Two of these point towards the sea, and are of a prodigious height, the point of the peninsula on which they stand being a high perpendicular rock; the other two front the river, where the land descends by a gentle declivity. Upon these four batteries are mounted forty pieces of heavy cannon, with a multitude of swivels and patereroes. A little lower stands another battery of large iron cannon, chiefly intended for salutes and public rejoicings.

c THE garrison is composed of an hundred white men, well officered, and an equal number of free negroes in the pay of the company. On the land side are two canals cut in the rock, serving for the security, the conveniency, and the ornament of the citadel, supplying it with fresh water, at the same time that, by means of a drawbridge, and two redoubts mounted with eight pieces of cannon, it renders it strong, and almost inaccessible. Here nature took the least care in fortifying it; but this defect art has compensated, by portcullis's, strong barricadoes, and iron rails of prodigious weight. The guard-house, which stands immediately behind, is a strong building, well defended with swivels, besides a number of flits in the walls, by which the musquetry have the intire command of the river. It is inconceivable with what toil and expence these works have been completed, all the houses being built of stone hewn out of a hard rock, and the canals of a great depth, effected by the same labour. They were begun by the Portuguese, but not completed when the place fell into the hands of the Dutch.

d THE principal building is a magnificent square stone house, divided into a number of different departments. The upper part of it is appointed for the governor's residence, which you ascend by a grand flight of stairs, of black and white stone. At the very top of the house are placed two swivels, and a variety of smaller artillery, which command the armory, and are defended by a strong guard of soldiers. In your way thither, you meet with a fine long gallery, beautifully ornamented with hard plaister, carved with great art, and Venetian windows, handsomely glazed. There is a spacious chapel with a rich altar, where prayers are every day read, and all the officers were obliged to attend, under the penalty of 25 sols for each absence, and double that sum on Sundays and Thursdays. Along the ramparts by the river side, is the infirmary for the sick and wounded, capable of containing an hundred persons, and attended by the surgeons of the fort. The magazines for stores, provisions, and merchandize are large, convenient, and always well stocked. Nor is the factory or residence of the agents neglected, where there are accommodations for sixty persons, the number of servants, exclusive of soldiers, retained by the company. On the porch of the old storehouse there is an inscription, intimating the year when the foundation was laid, in the reign of John the second of Portugal; viz. in 1484. The letters, which are engraved on a hard stone, are as distinct and clear as if they had stood but a few years. All merchandize and goods enter the fort by a gate towards the sea, at which a crane and other machines for raising them, and unloading the ships, are erected. In a word, tho' the citadel of Elmina is strong, it has more the air of a palace than of a fortress, or a house destined for the purposes of commerce. It was far from being thus beautiful while possessed by the Portuguese; it was the Dutch West-India company that gave it this perfection, at a great expence, which they have no cause to regret. Smith affirms, that it is larger, more convenient and beautiful than Cape Coast, but less pleasant on account of the situation. You land from the shipping at a grand key, built by the company, near the mouth of the river. The materials are the same we have mentioned, only that great great labour has been bestowed in cutting the stone, and giving the cornices an elegance and polish.

The fort of Conradfbourg.

ON the north side of the river Benja, the company have built the fort Conradsbourgh on mount St. Jago, so called from a Portuguese chapel dedicated to that saint. Fortifying this hill the company judged necessary for the security of Elmina, though if the enemy once got possession of it, they would soon be in a condition to oblige the citadel to surrender. Hence it follows, that, if obstinately defended, an enemy will be able to carry on no approaches against the citadel by land; but from the moment they get possession of Conradsbourgh, they are masters also of Elmina. Conradsbourgh stands in the kingdom of Fetu, just on the frontier. Its form is quadrangular, with a strong bastion at each angle, and a curtain between each, twelve feet high, built of stone; behind which stand four batteries, mounted with 48 cannons. The interior edifice consists of a tower, which commands all the adjacent country, and affords a commodious lodging for a garrison of 25 soldiers, with their officers. The garrison is relieved every day from Elmina; and upon emergencies, increased to double the number. As it is a post of the utmost importance, it is constantly well supplied with stores, and provisions, and the fortifications kept in constant repair. On the side of Elmina it is not difficult of access, there being a fine road cut by an easy ascent out of the rock; but on this side it cannot be attacked by an enemy, who must necessarily be between two fires, that from Elmina, and the post of St. Jago. Towards Fetu and Commendo, nothing can be stronger than the situation, which is a high perpendicular rock. The bridge over the river, which forms the communication between the two forts, is altogether after the Dutch fashion, with a drawbridge in the middle. At the foot of the hill stands a large magazine, where they lay up their canoes in the wet season, This also is the repository of carpenters tools, and all other mechanical instruments. Near this are seen a great number of tombs, with ridiculous figures cut upon stone, the workmanship of the negroes, in compliment to the memory of their kings, who lie buried here.

The company's gardens.

BELOW mount St. Jago, on the north-side, the company have a fine garden, inclosed by high stone walls, and divided into beautiful alleys and parterres, by rows of orange, lemon, palm, and coco-trees. Here they have all sorts of fruits, roots, and pulse, peculiar to that country, as well as the natural growth of Europe. In the center stands a magnificent dome or temple, surrounded by lofty trees, that afford the most delightful cooling shade and fragrance. In a word, all the fruits produced here are the best in their several kinds, and, in particular, their sweet oranges yield in nothing to those raised in China; by many they are thought superior.

DES MARCHAIS observes, that the territory of Elmina is by no means fertile; a remark which he says is applicable to all countries abounding in gold. However, other authors, of no less credit, affirm that the country is fruitful, and no gold found, besides what is brought from the interior countries. Des Marchais adds, that they are supplied with provisions from Fetu, Commendo, and Cape Coast. "Besides," says he, "the gold found in the rivers and rivulets, there are several mines of that precious metal, at the distance of five leagues north north-east of the fort. The negroes have neither the art nor industry to work them; and they are too jealous to permit the Europeans to open them." Whence Des Marchais procured this intelligence we know not; nor is it very material, as it appears to be without foundation. Bosman expressly affirms, that no part of the country affords gold; and his long residence in it must procure him credit. As for the quantities of gold which Des Marchais says the Portuguese drew from hence, it is probable they were supplied by the negroes from the interior countries. The Dutch have since amassed prodigious sums; but it was never imagined that they were in possession of one mine in Africa, notwithstanding they pretend to have made great discoveries in the inland kingdoms.

Account of this settlement under the Portuguese.

BEFORE we enter upon the trade and regulations of this factory, since the conquests of Elmina by the Dutch, it may not be disagreeable to the reader, that we take a retrospect view of these, while it remained in the hands of the Portuguese. After the discovery of the Gold Coast by those great founders of European commerce and maritime power, and the great sums expended in building forts and establishing settlements, the king of Spain, to whom they became subject by the union of the crowns of Spain and Portugal, looked upon himself as the absolute master of all the discoveries of the Portuguese. He bestowed therefore the citadel of Elmina and its dependencies on a company, for a certain annual acknowledgment; prohibiting at the same time all his other subjects, under pain of death, from trading to those places specified in the charter of the company. The governors, who were still appointed by the king, became triennial; and old officers, who had served with reputation in the army, but without interest to raise them to the highest preferments, were sent thither.

a Here they soon found means of enriching themselves and rewarding their faithful and long services. The inferior servants of the company were the chaplain, surgeon, viador or factor, king's attorney or judge, the commandant of the garrison, the deputy of the company, and the military officers and soldiers; all of whom had their lodgings within the fort. All the artisans and black soldiers in the pay of the company were quartered in a neighbouring village, protected by the cannon of the fort, all of them returning to their several employments at stated hours to the citadel. When no ships were in the road, all military duty was wholly neglected; and for a small bit of money a soldier was excused from guard, and permitted to employ his time as he pleased; an abuse common to almost all European settlements in Asia, Africa, and America, where the military power is lodged in the hands of the civil magistrate. The garrisons were composed of criminals, banished their mother country for life. In 1600 they were so diminished, that only thirty remained, and these loaded with diseases, shut up within walls, and confined to the hospital. However, Artus affirms, that even then there were among them persons of rank and quality. They were paid by the king, who charged himself with the whole military expence: but when the trade began to decline, the court of Spain began to relax in the care with which hitherto they had supported it. They neglected to maintain the usual number of troops to fill up the vacancies, and to relieve by able-bodied men the old, decrepid, and infirm. The misery and weakness of the garrison had often been so great, that a soldier was afraid of stirring out of the gates, dreading to be knocked on the head either by the Dutch, or by the negroes in their interest. At length the commerce was so totally depressed and sunk, that they seldom saw at Elmina more than one or two small ships in a year from Europe, the whole trade of the coast passing into the hands of the Dutch<sup>1</sup>. The decline of the Portuguese trade.

WHILE the affairs of the company flourished, the Lisbon fleet arrived every year, about the vernal and autumnal equinoxes. This fleet consisted wholly of five stout ships, which, after unloading their cargoes, passed a month in refreshing the men, and laying in a stock of fresh provisions. The natives had no other trouble than to deliver their merchandize to the factors, who gave them European commodities to the value of the gold they sent in. In eight or nine months the whole voyage was completed, while the Dutch seldom performed it in less than twelve, fifteen, or eighteen months, for want of strong warehouses and forts to deposite their merchandize in with security; yet did this industrious people overcome all difficulties, and by dint of diligence rise superior to all the advantages of the Portuguese. Such a number of ships were yearly sent out from Holland, that a stock of European goods was never wanting on the coast. They snatched all opportunities of improving their condition, watched the indolence of the Portuguese, and profited by it. Cause of the rise of the Dutch trade.

WE need not wonder at the success of the Dutch, and the preference given to them by the natives, if we consider the arbitrary manner in which the Portuguese traded. They obliged the negroes to keep their warehouses constantly filled, to barter their gold for whatever kind of goods they thought fit to give in exchange. The nobles of the district of Elmina lived in perpetual terror. Upon the smallest suspicion, frequently upon false evidences, their persons were imprisoned, and all their effects seized and confiscated. Thus for a time the African trade became greatly advantageous to Portugal; but it could not last long under so despotic a government. The natives threw off the yoke, as soon as they found themselves succoured by the Dutch; yet in the sequel it appeared, that they had only exchanged one set of tyrants for another; the Dutch being now as arbitrary as lately the Portuguese had been. It must however be acknowledged, that the country is obliged to the Portuguese for many advantages it has received, although they had only their own interest in view, and that mistakenly. The cattle, fruits, and grain, have been increased by their means, and many of these, intirely unknown in the country, are now so abundant as to be thought indigenous. The Portuguese supported all the inconveniencies of the climate much better than the Dutch. This most travellers have attributed to their temperance and sobriety; but the women are more susceptible of diseases peculiar to the country; numbers of the most healthy and robust being carried off in a few months, weeks, and frequently in two or three days<sup>2</sup>. It would be difficult to explain this phenomenon, and it is the business rather of the physician than the historian. We can easily perceive why the Dutch should be less healthy than the Portuguese; the change they undergo from a cold to a hot, from a moist to a dry, and from a dense, heavy, to a thin, fine, and rarified atmosphere, must occasion correspondent alterations in the fluids and solids; but why the Portuguese females, whose habit is lax, fibres delicate, and perspiration free, should be more sickly than the males, is what we find so difficult to explain, that we must either doubt of the fact, or ascribe it to some irregularity in their manner of living. As the Portuguese who settled on the coast intermarried with the negroes, a race of mulattoes soon sprung up, more healthy than the European women, better-liked, and more congenial to the blacks; and, such is the force of custom, no less agreeable to the Europeans than the Lisbon ladies. Notwithstanding this prudent measure, their arbitrary government alienated the minds of the natives from them, and made room for the establishment of the Dutch; of which we are now to speak.

WHEN the Hollanders first began to settle on the Gold Coast, the highest rank among them was that of military officers. The government constantly employed the soldiers as clerks and agents in the counting-house, if they were capable of business and taught to write. Their appointments were thirteen florins per month, which they might pocket, and twenty florins for their support. The misconduct and irregular behaviour of the soldiery obliged the company to alter this method, and totally to exclude them from the direction of trade, and all civil affairs; a change more agreeable to the constitution of a commercial state, and the general interest of commerce; though frequently attended with inconveniencies, from the jarring interests and inclinations of the civil and military power. At present, the servants of the company are gradually raised to the highest employments, passing a kind of probation in the several inferior stations. Hence, by understanding the proper duty of each department, they are reasonably supposed to direct the whole with more ability.

The regulations of the Dutch factory, and the several officers belonging to the African trade.

THE first step towards the post of director general is that of sub-deputy, whose appointments are 24 florins per month. These sub-deputies receive all the gold, and give in their accounts to the inferior factors, and sometimes to the chief factor, who is accountable to the company. As the public magazines, stores, and warehouses are at Elmina, the employment of sub-factor is of considerable consequence, as he has a great share in the regulation of markets, and the necessaries of life. Thus the head factor, who is responsible for the conduct of his inferiors, holds a delicate post, that requires great address, diligence, and judgment. The eyes of all are upon him, and he is equally to satisfy the expectations of the negroes, the settlement, and company. From the sub-factors are chosen the commissaries or governors of the smaller settlements dependent on Elmina. These are obliged to reside at their several governments, and without any other authority or power than in affairs relative to trade. Their salaries are 36 florins per month, exclusive of 10 florins for their domestics, and 20 for the expence of their table, besides the profits arising from private trade. The fort of Mawri, or Cormantin, being the most considerable interior settlement, this government is bestowed upon persons of the greatest experience, diligence, and merit. The gift of it is reserved to themselves by the company, all others being in the disposal of the director general. Till the year 1699 the governor of Mawri derived great advantages from the slave trade to the coasts of Ardrah and Whidah. The profits were so considerable that the gold trade was neglected and sunk to the lowest ebb. Upon information given to the company, they determined to commit the slave trade solely to the commanders of ships, which Bosman speaks of as a greater evil than what they intended to remedy. Their ignorance of the manners and customs of the natives led them into numberless difficulties, and their low rank in life and rough manner into contempt. The company lost the esteem of the natives, and that respect, which will ever attend grandeur and power, vanished as soon as the trade was taken out of the hands of those who alone could support it with dignity.

BESIDES those immediately employed in trade, the company maintain a number of other officers on the coast of Africa. Of these the fiscal is the chief in rank and profit. His salary is 60 florins per month, 10 for paying the expence of domestics, with the privilege of eating at the table kept for the director-general. If his appointments should seem mean and trifling for a post of so high a nature, this deficiency is amply compensated by his perquisites. He has a third of all the gold and merchandize forfeited by interlopers or others upon the coast, and also a third upon all fines upon criminals, which are so frequent as alone to make a handsome revenue. Next to him is the comptroller-general, whose business it is to inspect the books of the factory. The salary annexed to this post consists of 70 florins per month, and 35 for the expence of his table and servants. Under him he has a lieutenant, or deputy comptroller, and two secretaries, each of whom have 390 florins per annum. The comptroller of the garrison is the next office, whose appointment is about 36 florins per month. His inferiors have an equal salary; but, to supply the smallness of his, five per cent. is given him upon the effects of all persons who die upon the coast, together with the power of selling them by public auction, should any dispute arise with the heirs at law concerning the amount of the property. There is also a secretary of the fort, with a salary of 15 florins per month; but with perquisites which render the place not contemptible. The last and formerly least lucrative employment is that of deputy fiscal, or auditor: This place is neither agreeable nor honourable; the employment of the deputy consisting in lodging informations and proving indictments against his fellow officers, the servants of the company, and the natives. As the nature of his office is in itself contemptible, and the salary small, in order to raise the credit of the place, the company have given him a fifth of all confiscations,

- a confiscations, and ordered, that he should take rank of the sub-factors. Thus it is, that with all the ignominy and ill-will annexed to his employment, he is at present raised to the rank of the third person for consideration belonging to the factory <sup>1</sup>.

Liber, honoratus, pulcher, rex denique regum.*

- b THE interests of religion are by no means cultivated with the same care as those of trade; for in this whole tract of country the Dutch have but one chaplain or minister of the gospel. The stipend of this clergyman is very considerable, amounting to an hundred florins per month, exclusive of ten florins to defray the expence of domestics, spiritual fines, and the constant use of the governor's table. The fines arise chiefly from an excellent custom we have mentioned, of mulcting, according to their rank and ability, every person who absents himself from divine service <sup>m</sup>.

- c THE following is the order and precedency in rank among the company's servants in Africa, or rather of the officers at Elmina; 1. The director-general. 2. The chaplain. 3. The fiscal. 4. The head factor. 5. Three superior factors. 6. Ordinary or inferior factors. 7. Ten lowest factors. 8. Twenty deputies. 9. The captain or guard of the magazines. 10. The comptroller-general. 11. His lieutenant. 12. The comptroller of the garrison. 13. The clerk of the spiritual court (whose employment we are ignorant of). 14. The sub-fiscal or auditor. The chief power and reins of government are lodged in the hands of the director-general, as the other officers are incapable of acting without his consent and approbation; yet in all affairs of importance, and where caution and deliberation are requisite, a council is assembled, consisting of the director-general as president, the fiscal, head factors, and comptroller-general. The governors of the out-forts are sometimes called, and the council enlarged according to the exigency and circumstances of affairs. In this assembly each member has the liberty of freely delivering his sentiments, or voting, without assigning a reason for the opinion he approves. The authority of the director-general is very extensive, having power to displace at pleasure all the officers on the coast, without being accountable for his conduct. For this reason they pay him the most servile submission, watch every nod, and tremble at every cloud upon his countenance; a despotism that has been attended with the worst consequences under bad governors, and useful in no conjuncture, but to quicken the motions of trade, and prevent divisions among the servants of the company. Bosman, sensible that commerce can never flourish under the conduct of an ill-disposed director-general, exhorts the company to retrench and moderate their power: he proves incontestibly the advantages which would result from an administration more regular and equal, where the interest of each individual is regarded with more discretion and justice. In a word, as the servants of the company in the aggregate do not exceed sixty persons, none of them, if they behave well, can fail of being advanced to profitable and lucrative employments <sup>n</sup>.

- e WE now proceed to a description of Cape Coast, the chief English settlement upon the coast of Guinea. Previous however to this we shall speak in a few words of a considerable town lying between Elmina and Cape Coast. The town we mean is Agua, or Oegwa, standing, according to Artus, on the brow of an eminence, raising itself by a gentle ascent to a considerable height, and defended by rocks, against which the waves beat with the utmost violence, and a noise which is heard at a great distance <sup>o</sup>.

- f BARBOT affirms, that Oegwa contains above 500 houses, disjoined by narrow crooked streets; and that from the sea it has the appearance of an amphitheatre <sup>p</sup>. Des Marchais reduces the number of houses to 200, in the center of which stands a large square building, the repository of their gold dust, and other commodities (M). The houses are built of earth and clay, but convenient, and well furnished with chairs, stools, mats, carpets, earthen pots, and even looking-glasses, which last they purchase from the Europeans. No part of the coast is better provided with all kinds of eatables, which are sent in from the adjacent cantons, and sold in public markets. Every thing is bought and sold by gold dust, which is the standard of all other commodities, and brought hither in great abundance from all quarters of Fetu, Abrambo, Affiento, and Mandingo <sup>q</sup>. The gold is sold by weight, and the quantity determined by nice scales, made in the country before it was frequented by the Europeans: a proof that those negroes are not wholly ignorant of the more

(M) Almost all writers agree, that the town of Oegwa is entirely commanded by the cannon of Elmina; which plainly indicates an error in the best Dutch charts refined principles of mechanics. Next to gold, the chief commerce of the place consists in the sale of fish, of which they catch prodigious quantities on the coast. Although the natives are brave and warlike, yet in time of peace no people are more industrious, their whole time being employed in catching fish or cultivating the fruits of the earth. They are extremely expert in throwing the lines, and fishing by the hook; nor is their intrepidity in combating the elements, and pursuing their employments in all kinds of weather, less astonishing. Every day in the week, besides Wednesday, which is sacred to their Fetiche, is taken up in their several occupations, and no season of the year exempted from fishing. Their canoes weather storms which would endanger the largest shipping; and the negroes have the dexterity of making their advantage of those seasons, which obliges others to discontinue their labours, by throwing their lines with the same success in tempestuous as in calm weather. This conduct however we are not altogether to ascribe to courage; insensibility would seem to have a great share in it; for Phillips assures us, that he has seen them drinking and smoking upon barrels of powder they had bought of the English, without apprehending the smallest danger from the sparks of fire which fell from their pipes.

A description and history of Cape Coast, the chief English settlement in Guiney.

THE name of Cape Coast, by which the English call their chief settlement, is thought to be a corruption of Cabo Corso, the antient Portuguese appellation. This cape is formed by an angular point, washed on the south and east by the sea, upon which stands the English fort, nine miles from Elmina. Here the Portuguese settled in 1610, and built the citadel of Cape Coast, upon a large rock that projects into the sea. A few years afterwards, they were dislodged by the Dutch, to whom this place owes its principal strength. In 1664 it was demolished by admiral Holmes, after his expedition against fort Witsen, at Taberari. In 1665 De Ruyter, the famous Dutch admiral, had orders from the states to revenge the insults committed by the English. With a squadron of thirteen men of war he attacked all the settlements of this nation along the coast, ruined the factories, and took, burnt, and sunk all the shipping of the English company: but after all his endeavours he was frustrated in his attempts on this fort, although at that time it had not recovered the damage done it by Holmes. The treaty of Breda having confirmed Cape Coast to the English, and the king granting a new charter in 1672, the directors applied all their attention to fortifying and rendering commodious this their chief possession.

THE walls are high and thick, especially on the land side, built partly of stone, but chiefly of brick, which the English made at a small distance. To the height and strength of its walls the fort owes its chief security, and the neighbouring negroes dependent on the company a protection against the incursions of the Fantins. The interior parade, raised twenty feet above the surface of the work, forms a quadrangular space, cooled by the refreshing sea breezes, to which it lies open, and pleasantly situated on account of the prospect, having in view Queen Anne's Point, and all the shipping in the road of Anamaboa. This platform is defended by three pieces of large cannon, the three other sides of the square being extremely well built, containing spacious lodgings, with their offices and other conveniencies; but particularly the south side, which is occupied by a handsome chapel, adjoining to the walls of the fort, or rather the walls making one side. The three pieces of artillery on the platform command the road and its entrance; nor is the landing-place less exposed to the fire of the musquetry behind the rocks. The fort has four bastions, mounted with 29 pieces of cannon. On the battlements are ten pieces of cannon, and six upon the wall towards Tabora, of no other use than to command the respect of those negroes, and to keep them in awe. Towards the sea, the prospective of Cape Coast is beautiful and regular; the fortifications are happily imagined, and all the assistance that could possibly be drawn from art is added to nature. You enter it by a large gate, well fortified, which leads to the square parade we have mentioned, capable of receiving 500 men drawn up. The four bastions communicate with each other by covered ways and curtains, forming a beautiful chain of batteries of 15 cannon, pointed towards the road. Smith says, that the whole artillery of the fort amounts to 40 pieces of large cannon, exclusive of demi-culverines. Phillips says, that the garrison is composed of an hundred men; and Barbot mentions that number of Europeans, besides as many negroes in the pay of the company, with their proper officers, and all cloathed in red. Neither of those writers mention more than one military officer above the rank of a serjeant, whom they call captain, and who would seem to be the lieutenant of the fort. The gates are shut every evening at eight o'clock, and defended by a regular guard.

NOTWITHSTANDING such a number of authorities and undoubted testimonies of the strength of Cape Coast, Bosman, who is an author of reputation, would insinuate a very different idea of the fort. After giving an advantageous account of the fortification, he adds, that the garrison is composed of wretches, less capable of inspiring terror than pity. The

* BARBOT & SMITH, ibid,

- a reason he gives is, that the English too readily receive the Dutch deserters, from a false principle of humanity; which in fact is an infraction of the articles stipulated between the companies. "Though," says Bosman<sup>a</sup>, "those who leave us are generally drunkards and fots, yet the English receive them gladly, as their factors are never better pleased than when the soldier spends his money upon spirits, sold at double the price. Of this the agents make a considerable profit, selling it privately by their emissaries. No care is taken whether the soldier saves enough of his pay to provide victuals, sufficient for their purpose it is that he has punch; by which excessive tippling and poor feeding the garrison is composed of lean, meagre, half-starved, and decrepit beings, fitter for the ease of an hospital than the duties of a fort." Nor is Smith more favourable to the conduct of the officers of the factory; for he says, that the soldiers are suffered to abridge and shorten their lives by excessive drinking, while their superiors run into an extreme equally dangerous, by indulging in idleness, and the most gross and luxurious eating.

WITH all its advantages of situation, Cape Coast has also its inconveniences: among these are some neighbouring hills, by means of which it would be no difficult matter for an enemy greatly to embarrass and annoy the fort. This it is that obliges the English to study the inclinations of the natives, to keep well with them, and engage them by acts of kindness into a strict alliance. They spare neither presents nor caresses, exclusive of the tribute paid to the king of Fetu, by way of acknowledgement for the ground they possess. Thus it was in the days of Barbot; and we believe that very small alterations have been made to this time.

THE soldiers at Cape Coast are lodged in the best barracks of any upon the coast of Guinea, and receive their pay daily in gold dust. Here are also convenient apartments for the slaves, who in this particular, are treated with great humanity; with forges for smiths, sheds and workhouses for carpenters and other mechanics, together with a convenient public kitchen for the use of the settlement. Our author remarks, that the officers of the company at Cape Coast make but two meals a day; the first at ten in the morning, the second at four in the afternoon; notwithstanding which the expence of the public table amounted to near 1500*l.* in one year*.

THE governor's apartments communicate with the chapel, which is no more than a large hall, answering a double purpose, that of a church and a dining-room. The first story is ornamented with a handsome balcony, extending the whole length of the front; and the accompting-house is large and convenient. In Barbot's time there was a school for the instruction of negro children, to initiate them in reading, writing, and the principles of the Christian religion: whether it still remains so, is what we cannot take it upon us to affirm. A little way from the gate is a prison for murderers, traitors, and other criminals, convicted of capital crimes, where they are detained till an occasion offers for sending them over to England, to take their final trial. Finally, there is cut in the rock beneath the platform a large vault, for the confinement of slaves. This horrid dungeon is divided into a number of cells, well contrived to prevent their revolting or forming conspiracies. Such only are confined there as are purchased for exportation. An iron grate serves it for a roof, to admit the air, and as much light as is thought necessary; and the numbers of ships which frequent the coast prevent their being so long detained as to contract distempers, the consequence of close confinement. The cistern for preserving their water, by which the fort is chiefly supplied, is capable of holding 400 hogsheads. It is dug in the rock, and made as convenient as the nature of such a necessary contrivance will admit; for, besides this, they have no water, but what is brought at a considerable distance†.

FORMERLY the salary and perquisites of the governor were very considerable, amounting to two thousand pounds per annum; at present they are dwindled to half that sum, and the chief profits arising from trade. His council is composed of the governors of the outposts, in which he has no more than a single voice; but as this is assembled upon extraordinary occasions only the chief management of affairs devolves upon him. He had formerly the appointing of factors and supercargoes, some of which were exceeding lucrative, as, besides their salaries, they were permitted to trade to a certain extent. The government of Akra was in particular a place of profit; but those of Anamaboa and Dicks Cove were rather laborious and important than lucrative or convenient; the living being bad, the lodgings inconvenient, and the salary and trade inconsiderable. In general the presidency of Cape Coast is lodged in the hands of one man; but when Smith resided there the government was divided among three persons, who enjoyed a more ample authority than any single governor, the company leaving to their choice the disposal of all places and preferments in their service. Des Marchais says‡, that the governor of Cape Coast does not confine himself to the traffick of the place, but employs a number of great and small vessels, who bring to his warehouses all the commodities of Guiney, which he ships off for Europe.<sup>a</sup> At present they deal chiefly in gold dust and slaves, the former being returned to Europe, laid out in trade, or the purchase of slaves for the West Indies. The company's gardens, which are no less than eight miles in circumference, are the chief beauty of the place, but without walls or any other inclosure; all that place going by this name that is planted with trees. Here the soil is fertile, producing every sort of fruit to be found in the warmer climates, as lemons, oranges, citrons, guavas, mangoes, plantains, bananas, pine apples, tamarinds, cucumbers, water melons, coco nuts, cinnamon, and every kind of sallads and roots. It is believed that the cinnamon tree would grow here to great perfection, if properly cultivated; an experiment we are amazed the company have not made, as it would justly revenge the injuries received from the Dutch in their spice trade, and be a prodigious saving to the nation, without interfering in the smallest degree with the rights or interest of the East India company. When Phillips was at Cape Coast, the African company had two gardens; the first a large one, and probably the same that Smith speaks of; the other the pleasure garden of the factory, where they had a pleasant summer-house, in which the gentlemen of the fort used frequently to refresh themselves. It served for a burying-ground for the factors, and all the Europeans in the fort, except the governors, who were generally interred within the walls of the fort.<sup>b</sup>

country.

THE sea coast extends from east to west, facing directly the south. The country is filled with mountains, which, without having any extraordinary height, render the vallies narrow, upon account of their standing so close to each other. They are covered with a sort of low thick briar, that renders them impassable, except where the paths are cut. The negroes do not cultivate one tenth of the ground; and six months interruption will produce a new crop of briars in those places they had intirely cleared. Voyagers have endeavoured to account for this extraordinary peculiarity, by conjectures equally unsatisfactory and absurd; some ascribing it to the barrenness of the earth, others to the disposition of the air, others to moisture, and a few to a vitriolic principle in the soil, as if they were determined to be more ridiculous in their system than any of the foregoing. The surface of the earth is in general sandy, poor, and gravelly; a kind of soil which in this country we find productive of thorns and brambles. A little lower is a kind of white marl, and somewhat deeper a brown earth, of a dry, sandy nature. We here speak of the hills, the vallies being in general fertile and rich, except round Cape Coast, where the land is dry and sterile. Except here the kingdom of Fetu is peculiarly rich and fruitful, and the ground well cultivated. The people are numerous and industrious, employing themselves in the gold trade, fishing, agriculture, or some other business supplying the necessities of life. They send great quantities of provisions to the markets of Elmina, no less to their own advantage than to the conveniency of the Dutch. Their fish is excellent and abundant; their fowls, and especially the muscovia ducks, are good and cheap; the mutton and goats flesh of the country lean and insipid, beef scarce, and pigeons in great plenty.<sup>c</sup>

Of the climate.

WITH regard to the climate, Barbot says, that it is neither better nor worse than that of the other kingdoms of the Gold Coast; although he observed morning and evening a thick fog spread itself over the face of the country, which he imagines could arise from no very good cause, nor continue without carrying sickness and disease with it. But the principal cause of the unhealthiness of the country he places in the quality of their food. Smith, on the other hand, affirms the air to be the most wholesome, and the people the most healthy, of any on the Gold Coast; nay he calls Cape Coast the most supportable situation in all Guiney.

An Account of two forts at a small distance from Cape Coast.

IN the neighbourhood of Cape Coast the English have built two forts, the one called Phillips's Tower, and the other Fort Royal, or Queen Anne's Fort: each of them are three quarters of a mile distant from Cape Coast; the first standing on an eminence on the side of the garden, south-east of the fort. In Bosman's time Phillips's Tower was garrisoned with six men, the intention of it being to keep the negroes in awe, by means of some pieces of cannon, and to guard against the incursions of the neighbouring nations. Phillips speaks of a redoubt raised upon an eminence, resembling those little watch towers on the coast of Spain, to alarm the country upon the approach of the Moorish or Turkish pirates. It was garrisoned with a few men, and mounted two or three pieces of small cannon, to sound the alarm upon the smallest danger.<sup>d</sup>

QUEEN ANNE'S FORT is situated near the village of Manfro, upon a hill called Danistein, where Fredericksburgh formerly stood. At present it is a square building, mounted with sixteen pieces of cannon, twelve of them standing on a platform, and guarded by six white men and an equal number of blacks. Des Marchais says, that it is accessible only by a crooked path, which forms a kind of spiral street, bordered on each side by negro huts.<sup>e</sup>

a THE town of Manfro is of an oval form, situated on the banks of a river, in a place almost inaccessible, on account of rugged rocks that surround it. The inhabitants are continually busied in fishing, agriculture, and making salt, a commodity greatly wanted in that country; and many of them act as factors to the merchants of the interior countries. To conclude our account of the kingdom of Fetu, there is held at Abramboe a brilliant assembly of the natives, from all parts of the kingdom, to celebrate by dancing and other diversions the birth-day of the king. Here an incredible number of negroes of both sexes pass the whole day and night in this fatiguing exercise. The only division of time at Fetu consists in the sitting of the courts of judicature at certain periods, at which all causes of property, that cannot be determined by the inferior judges of districts, are tried and finally decided. This supreme court is composed of the king, the prime minister, the jaraffo, the braffo, and two English factors, chosen by the governor of Cape Coast. These two commissaries appear at every session in new suits, an expence which costs the company annually the sum of 300*l.* sterling. Finally, Aquaffo is a negro town, west of Cape Coast, that has the reputation of being large and populous, with a market, where the natives buy and sell their slaves which they intend should be sacrificed at the interment of their king, and buried with him.

Of the Kingdoms of Sabu and Fantin.

c IT is not the extent of Sabu that has attracted the attention of voyagers; for this is so incon siderable as to be confined to two leagues, some say miles, from east to west along the coast; and four from south to north into the inland country. It begins at the foot of mount Danistein, and ends within a mile or two of Mawri, or Mawerri, there joining the kingdom of Fantin, its boundaries being the sea, and the countries of Atti and Fetu on the south and west. Sabu produces an amazing quantity of Indian corn, potatoes, yamms, bananas, oranges, lemons, and other fruits; besides palm oil, with which it supplies the countries of Akra and Axim. The natives pass for the most industrious people on the Gold Coast, being in a perpetual course of employment, either in tilling the earth, fishing, or trading with the Europeans, or Akanese, a nation that exchanges gold for the fish and fruits of Sabu.

Ageographical
description of

d BOSMAN represents the negroes of Sabu as equal in power to those of Commendo, and nothing inferior to them in villainy and treachery; probably because they disappointed the design of the Hollanders against Commendo. This writer runs out into bitter invectives against the king of Sabu, for having, under pretence of mediating a peace, ruined the Dutch affairs by a political procrastination and delay, which he calls fraudulent and wicked; although by his acknowledgement the conduct of the Dutch merited every artifice that could possibly distress or oblige them to abandon the country. But what chiefly excites Bosman's indignation is, that his countrymen should not only be forced to acquiesce in the conduct of the king of Sabu, but also to engage him by presents from siding with the Commendians. Hinc illæ lachrymæ! Barbot, on the contrary, attributes the animosity of the negroes to the Dutch to that brutish insolence and barbarity that characterizes this nation where-ever they have acquired dominion. He adds, that with the affection, of the natives the Dutch have likewise lost their trade; and that the king of Sabu in particular has frequently offered to assist with two thousand men, supported at his own expence, any European nation that would undertake to expel the Dutch from the coast. The motive of his disgust arose from the intrigues of the Hollanders to wean the inhabitants of Mawri from their allegiance to him, to excite them to a revolt, and persuade them to refuse paying the usual tribute and homage. It appears from the distinct testimony of Artus, that the disaffection of the negroes to the Dutch was by no means voluntary, or the effects of caprice, but the result of a series of ill usage, and an arbitrary, cruel usurpation which the governor of Elmina assumed: they were far from wishing to disturb commerce; but they panted eagerly after freedom, and longed to remove that iron scourge held over them by the Hollanders. This voyager relates, that, a few years before his arrival in that country, some Dutch sailors landed, to cut wood upon the banks of a neighbouring river, and began with hewing down those trees consecrated to the Fetiché. The natives, who beheld the sacrilege with horror, gently remonstrated to them upon so prophane a conduct and unprovoked usage; but, perceiving all their representations disregarded, they had recourse to arms, and soon obliged the Dutch by a shower of darts and arrows to retreat to their ships. One sailor was left dead on the field, and his head cut off by a negro. The day following the negroes, repenting of what they had done, repaired in a troop to the ship, and offered to deliver up the murderer of the Dutchman, desiring he might be punished in the manner his crime deserved: their proposal and contrition being rejected, they returned, and with their own hands cut off the head of the offender, severing his body a into quarters, which were exposed a prey to the birds and beasts of the field. When the Dutch came ashore they found the body of their countryman decently interred, and the head of the negro placed on his grave<sup>b</sup>; whence we may rationally infer, that the inclination of the natives is to live upon a footing of friendship with the Dutch.

For a number of years the negroes of Sabu were in a perpetual state of hostilities with those of Atti and Akana: but the late king, being of a mild and pacific disposition, put an end to those troubles, and restored peace and tranquillity. The Sabuans were always inferior in number to their enemies; but sufficiently made up that deficiency by the use of fire-arms, in which they were expert, and gaining thereby many signal advantages. They frequently brought loads of their enemies heads to the Dutch fort at Mawri, as a token of b their respect and submission<sup>c</sup>.

Fort Nassau.

THE city of Sabu, where the king takes up his residence, stands two leagues from the coast. It is long and populous; and Des Marchais describes it a fine city, north north-east of Mawri; which is all that historian relates concerning it. The first place westward which deserves mention is the English fort on Queen Anne's Point, built with stone and lime, upon an eminence about a mile from Fort Royal, or mount Danistein, and two miles from Nassau Fort on the east. It is defended by five pieces of cannon, and a garrison of five white and as many black men. Near this lies the village Ikon, or Congo, where may be seen the ruins of a Dutch factory, the principal intention of which was to descry European ships at sea, which were coming to disturb the commerce of Mawri. Next stands Mawri, or c Mouree, a town half a mile from Congo, and, according to Artus, upon an eminence, without being more healthy, clean, or regular, than if it stood in a plain. Its market is bad, and every thing, even palm wine and fruits, scarce and dear. It is the immediate property of the king of Sabu, who levies his rights by proper officers, under his own direction, and accountable only to him. The chief trade of the place consists in crude gold dust, with which canoes every day arrive from all the sea-port towns. Before the Dutch fixed their residence here, it was a petty inconsiderable place: at present it carries on a trade the most flourishing of any besides Elmina and Cape Coast on the coast of Guiney. Villault affirms, that it contains above 200 houses, which surround three sides of the Dutch fort Nassau. In his time it was supplied by the Akanese, and by Ikon, or Congo; though d then it had the reputation of a place rich in gold, but poor in the conveniencies and necessities of life. The greater part of the inhabitants are fishermen, who go out every morning in four or five hundred canoes, paying on their return one-fifth of their fish to the Dutch factor in the town, by way of toll or tribute. This kind of tribute they also exact at Elmina and Schana, in right of conquest; though Bosman does not pretend that they have yet conquered Mawri<sup>k</sup>. No other Europeans have this prerogative, nor do any of them exercise the same sovereign authority as the Dutch, who would seem to affect despotism abroad, in proportion to the freedom of their constitution at home. A great number of Akanese have lately settled at Mawri, for the conveniency of trading with the Dutch. The houses stand at a great distance from each other, and the intervening space is generally e filled up with a rock, which makes the passing from one to another incommodious, and sometimes dangerous. It is called the grave of Dutchmen, on account of the great number who have died there; yet is the place still in a flourishing condition, because all ships bound to the Gold Coast are forced to wood and water here<sup>f</sup>.

FORT Nassau, the greatest Dutch settlement in Guiney, except Elmina, stands upon a rock, watered towards the south by the sea. It owes its origin to the Hollanders, who made it their head settlements as long as Elmina was in the hands of the Portuguese. Its form is nearly quadrangular, the front being rather the largest side. It is provided with four batteries and eighteen pieces of cannon; and, if we except Elmina, its walls are the highest of any fort on the coast. The curtain comprehends the two sea batteries, and is so spacious f and convenient as easily to admit of such a battery as the English have on the platform at Cape Coast. But the greatest ornament and strength of the fort consists in four towers at each angle, well provided with artillery, musquets, and stores. Des Marchais remarks, that it stands on the east side of Mawri, the gates being defended by an out-work resembling a half-moon, built with the same stone as the bastions or towers. According to Barbot, Fort Nassau was built in the year 1669, by order and at the expence of the States General, who gave it the name of Nassau in compliment to the prince of Orange. At first it was intended for no other purpose than to awe the inhabitants of Mawri. The States soon made it over to the West India company; but in a condition very different from its present state, the works being all of earth, often destroyed by the rains, and leaving the garrison g exposed to the insults of the Portuguese at Elmina. No sooner had the Dutch seized upon this a fort than they seriously applied their thoughts to securing themselves upon the coast, and fortifying Nassau. This it was that occasioned the erecting of stone walls and bastions, together with commodious apartments for the governors and factors, and garrisoning it with seventy or eighty soldiers. At a small distance from the fort the company have a fine garden, kept in excellent order, and neatly laid out in parterres, groves, and shades of fruit trees; but it has one fault in common with the gardens of Elmina and Manfro, and that is the vicinity of high mountains, whence torrents of rain rush down, that frequently destroy the roots, herbs, and all the labour of the gardener<sup>m</sup>.

NEXT follows the kingdom of Fantin, bounded by Sabu on the west, the Iron mount half a mile below Mawri being its extremity. This hill is a quarter of a mile long at the base, and hath from its bottom to its summit a charming walk, so thick shaded with trees that the light is obscured at noon day. From the foot of this hill Fantin extends itself about ten miles eastward along the coast, having on the north side Arti, Agua, and Tongva; Akron on the east; and the sea on the south. The English and Dutch have each their separate forts in this country, and the former three small lodges besides. The first English flag that presents itself is at Anican, or Ingenisian, standing upon a little eminence two miles from Mawri. Formerly the Dutch had a settlement here; but finding the trade did not answer, on account of the share which the English and Danes had in it, they resolved to abandon it. Upon this the English took possession. In Bosman's time it was defended by only one white man and two or three negroes; a formidable power, says he, to support the honour of the British flag. Barbot, however, gives a more favourable account, and says, that it was secured by two pieces of cannon, three Englishmen, and several negroes; however, he does not boast much of its commerce. He relates farther, that the Portuguese had likewise a settlement here, defended by a redoubt, and a garrison of six Portuguese and twelve blacks. Their trade consisted in pipes, tobacco, soap, rum, and several American commodities: but Barbot is intirely ignorant what advantage they could propose by such an establishment, and in a place where all the trade had been forestalled.

HALF a mile below this, says Bosman, and two miles, according to Barbot, the English have a small compact fort at Anamaboa, or Jamisia. Phillips represents Anamaboa as a handsome large town; but the inhabitants as the most rascally lying people on the Gold Coast, surprisingly artful in debasing and counterfeiting the precious metal. The town stood under the cannon of the English fort; and the road was constantly filled with ships. This place would afford a considerable gold and slave trade, says Bosman, if the English and Zealand interlopers had not met with so much encouragement, and so firmly established a traffick. Anamaboa may faithfully be reputed the most powerful town upon the whole coast, being able to arm as many able-bodied men as the whole kingdom of Commendo, or Sabu; and yet in proportion not a fifth of Fantin. The town is divided into two parts, the one inhabited by the fishermen of Elmina, the other by those of Fantin, who pay a certain duty to the Brasso for the liberty of pursuing their callings. They treat the English garrison with so much insolence, as often to block them within their walls; and frequently, if they dislike the governor, they send him in a canoe to Cape Coast, with marks of the utmost contempt. Far from being able to oppose them, the English are glad to appease them by presents: in short, the negroes of Fantin are the most turbulent and desperate of any upon the coast; and were it not for their civil divisions they would become unmanageable and dangerous neighbours to all the surrounding states. In 1701, they declared war against the English, and the Dutch were suspected of supplying them with powder. Upon Sunday the 4th of September they assembled in a tumultuous manner before the fort, setting fire to the exterior buildings, and going on with their outrages, till they were dispersed by a discharge of the cannon from the batteries. The night following the English took their revenge, by setting fire to the greater part of the town of Anamaboa and laying it in ashes; and thus, after open hostilities had been carried on for the space of twenty days, the natives offered a truce, leaving the terms to the English governor, and the king of Sabu acting as mediator. No objection was made to the demands of the English, and they agreed to satisfy them for the damage done to the fort; taking their Fetiches solemnly to witness the sincerity of their intentions, and giving several of their children as hostages. However, after the arrival of an English interloper, who promised them ten per cent. extraordinary on the price of slaves, they forgot all their engagements, entered a second time upon hostilities, and carried on the war with such vigour, that, Bloom affirms, the governor and garrison, seized with a panic, fled to Cape Coast. Farther particulars we are not favoured with.

THE English fort at Anamaboa was built upon the foundation of a large old house, which subsisted intire in the year 1679. It is a large edifice, flanked by two towers, and secured to the sea by two bastions, the whole of brick or stone, well cemented with lime. It stands upon a rock, at the distance of thirty paces from the sea. It is mounted with twelve pieces of cannon and twelve patereroes, and defended by a garrison of twelve white and eighteen blacks, under the command of the chief factor. The greatest inconvenience attending the situation arises from the difficulty of landing from the ships, the shore being covered with rocks a small distance into the sea, or rendered equally dangerous by a continual high surf. All ships are forced to come to an anchor without side of the rocks, and goods are landed by means of canoes upon a sandy point, surrounded by a wall, built at the expence of the company, and rendered convenient by lodgings for the negroes under the cannon of the fort. Our author observes, that the soil here is well calculated for making bricks, and the abundance of shells upon the coast sufficiently furnishes them with excellent lime; so that building here is cheap, especially as the country affords great plenty of wood and timber.

An account of the adjacent country.

ROUND Anamaboa the country is mountainous; but the hills are at a sufficient distance from the town. Five in particular are remarkably high, and serve as distinct marks at sea to determine this division of the coast. As they are covered with wood, the multitude and variety of trees form an agreeable prospect. Here the palm wine is made in great perfection, especially that which they call Quacker. Besides that the country is populous, it is exceeding rich in gold, slaves, and all the necessaries of living; but more particularly in corn, which they sell in large quantities to the Europeans. Their opulence has had upon them the usual effects of wealth, rendering them so insolent, arrogant, and haughty, that an European who trades with them must pay the most abject submission, and even stand uncovered in the presence of those barbarians. In the woods of this country are found the most beautiful paroquets in the world, and an infinity of other birds. Fruits, roots, and vegetables of all kinds are plenty, and cultivated with little trouble; and it is really amazing to see countries so contiguous as this and Sabu, so different in the qualities of the soil, the one clothed with a perpetual verdure, rich in all the productions of the earth, while the other in most places looks bare, barren, and naked, affording scarce a scanty subsistence to the indigent inhabitants.

Adja village, a Dutch settlement there.

THE fort at Anamaboa was abandoned in 1733, but the English afterwards resumed the settlement, and continued in it ever since. About half a mile from Anamaboa, stands a village called Adja, or Aga, upon the sea side. Here the Dutch formerly possessed a fort, whence they were driven by the treachery of the English, who, upon some quarrel with the people of Anamaboa, sought protection among the Hollanders, and seized that opportunity of dislodging their hosts, forgetting all the rights of justice and hospitality. At present the Dutch keep but one factor here; and one might retort upon Bosman, the raillery he bestows on the English on another occasion. Barbot says, that the village of Aga is divided into three different districts, each of them containing 25 or 30 houses. It is a situation by no means favourable to commerce, the landing being dangerous and difficult for shipping; yet round it the country produces several valuable commodities, and among others a very fine cotton. In the war between England and Holland, in 1665 and 1666, the English committed great cruelties upon the Dutch of this factory, which usage the Hollanders have since faithfully repaid in numberless instances.

Little Cor-
mantin.

THREE miles from Mawri, and a little below Aga, stands the village of Little Cormantin, in contradistinction to Great Cormantin. Bosman speaks of it as a contemptible place; but Des Marchais, a later writer, assures us, that it is larger and better built than most of the villages of that country. Artus says, that, after having been a place of considerable note, it was ruined in the year 1600, since which time it never recovered its former splendor. This village is situated upon an eminence, easily distinguished by a lofty tree that grows upon the very summit. Hither the French and Portuguese drive a great trade, the Dutch also sharing in it, till it was discovered that the negroes adulterated the gold. This first gave the Dutch a dislike to the trade, and at length drove away almost all the Europeans. Afterwards the trade was resumed by the Dutch, about the year 1682, when they greatly enlarged and strengthened Fort Amsterdam, the chief residence of the English, till they were driven from thence by De Ruyter, in 1665. This is a square stone building, strengthened by four bastions, mounting twenty pieces of cannon. In the center is a tower where the Dutch flag is fixed. The apartments of the officers and soldiers are neat, clean, and commodious, the parapets spacious, and fine views of the country and sea present themselves from the tower. The fort is well supplied with water, by means of large cisterns, that contain an incredible quantity of rain. Here the garrison consists of 25 white men, and a number of blacks, who live happily and at their ease, making fortunes with very little trouble or labour.

Great Cor-
mantin.

ABOUT a cannon-shot from the fort stands Great Cormantin, upon a high hill; a town so large and populous, as justly to merit the name given it of Great. It is situated upon a high a hill, behind and under the cannon of Fort Amsterdam. The number of merchants and fishermen in the town exceed 1200, besides other inhabitants of different occupations. Cormantin and Anamaboa were formerly the great marts of the English and Dutch commerce, as they were frequented by the Akbanese, who came hither with their goods in large caravans. In 1665, Holland and England being at war, the flames spread themselves to the coast of Africa, where they broke out with great fury, each company supporting the interest and honour of their several nations, with the utmost heat and animosity. In consequence, the Dutch were forced to abandon Cormantin and Anamaboa, and retire to Mawri; but the English, less skilful in making the proper advantage in victory than gaining it, used the negroes with such insolence, that out of revenge they recalled the Dutch, and assisted them in building the fort, which the English took the year following. After this the English factors prudently strengthened their interest, by entering upon a subsidizing treaty with the Brassos of Fantin and Akem, and by their means built a strong fort at Anamaboa, of which they keep possession till this time.

BESIDES the above, there are other towns and villages within the district of Fantin, which carry on some trade. Agua, Laguyo, Fantimqueri, and Manpran, are the most considerable, though scarce deserving to be mentioned in history. As to the government of Fantin, it is lodged in a supreme magistrate, called a Brasso; but without the ensigns or dignity of royalty. He is the chief governor, leads their armies into the field, enjoys the greatest power of any person in the nation, but is greatly restrained, and his authority limited by the old men, who form a national council, somewhat resembling an English parliament, their votes and acts being intirely independent of the brasso. Besides the supreme brasso, every town and subdivision of the kingdom has its chief, who frequently throws off his allegiance, assumes independency, and enters upon a war with his sovereign and the council of Elders. The natives of Fantin are, in general, as we have said, a hardy, bold, and intrepid people, who stick at nothing where either their revenge or interest are concerned. They trade freely with interlopers, frequently shut up all the passages to the inland countries, and prevent all trade between the Europeans and the merchants of the interior kingdoms, either in gold or slaves; nay more, they sometimes almost starve the Dutch in their forts, by intercepting all supplies, till their demands are fully complied with. In consideration of their aid in taking Fort Amsterdam, the Dutch entered into a contract with them, that all ships, except slave ships, trading to their coast, should pay a duty of three hundred guilders; but now the negroes make no distinction, and insist upon the same customs for all vessels whatever. They also extort a subsidy from the English, and the remonstrances of either company have hitherto had little effect.

Of the kingdoms of Acron, Agonna, and Aquamboe.

e WE now come to the remaining eastward maritime kingdoms of the Gold Coast; after describing which, we shall proceed to recite the interior countries, in the order in which they lie from east to west; that is, from the river Volta, to Cape Apollonia, the boundaries of this coast. The remainder of the Gold Coast from Fantin to the river Volta, contains three large kingdoms, viz. Acron, Agonna, and Aquamboe, which are divided into an infinity of lesser states. The first extends along the sea east from Fantin, to the mount called Monte del Diabolo, or the Devil's Mount. It is divided into Great and Little Acron; the former, which is the interior country, being under a republican government; the latter, bounded on the south by the sea, having a sovereign, and all the requisites of a pure monarchy. Notwithstanding they are absolutely independent on each other, yet has there always a strict union subsisted, both living under the protection of the Fantins, who, in their turn, are obliged to the fertile and industrious Acron for a principal part of their maintenance. In the year 1697, the Dutch began to build a fort, now fortified by two batteries, at Apam, which they called Leydsamkeyd, or Patience, because they met with abundance of opportunities to exercise that virtue while they were employed in the building. The village of Apam is small, and formerly, as well as at present, only inhabited by fishermen. The fort is mounted with eight pieces of cannon, and contains a garrison of 16 men, whites and blacks; but its chief strength consists in a fine strong tower, built by Bosman's order, when he commanded at Elmina. This is the only European settlement in this kingdom; and indeed its poverty affords no great encouragement to other nations to attempt an establishment.

g BOSMAN relates, that though, by the constitution, the king of Acron is absolute, yet so mild was the disposition of the monarch reigning at that time, that he was influenced by all his subjects, subjects, and perfectly under the controul of a nephew, a pernicious villain, whose savage humour occasioned all the quarrels between the Dutch and the natives. The other chiefs were, according to him, moderate, sensible, and good-natured people, with whom it was no difficult matter to live in friendship and amity. The king he had frequently conversed with; and always found his temper sweet, mild, and engaging. He was then upwards of seventy, the richest prince upon the coast, except the king of Aquamboe, but so plain in his diet and dress, that he might be mistaken for the meanest of his subjects. As the natives of Acron live under the protection of the Fantins, they enjoy perfect ease and tranquility, cultivate their lands in peace, and pursue their employments in security. So well do they husband their time and ground, that every year produces a plentiful harvest, by which they supply the adjacent countries, and their protectors in particular. Harts, hares, partridges, and pheasants, with various other kinds of wild fowl and quadrupeds, are here in great abundance and perfection: yet amidst this plenty, the Dutch fort is poor, and the commerce trifling, although for what reason we are not informed. It is probable, that the Fantins disturb the trade, and repay here the insults they receive from the Dutch at Cormantin; but these suggestions we shall leave to the reader's own reflections.

Gold mines in Agonna.

THE country of Agonna begins at the Devil's Mount, stretching along the sea coast to the village of Anonsa, on the frontiers of Aquamboe or Acra, a space of 16 miles, bounded on the north by Songway, and on the south by the ocean. It abounds in towns and villages along the sea, the chief of which are Dajon, Polder, Mango, Winiba, Simpa, and others. The Devil's Mount properly belongs to Agonna, though it is the frontier between this kingdom and Acron. According to most authors it is rich in mines, the gold of which, it is affirmed, the negroes after heavy rain gather to a considerable quantity in the sand; however, as yet, no attempts have been made to open the mines, or the natives have opposed it for the reasons given by all the other negroes, the apprehension of inducing the Europeans to dispossess them. Bosman relates, that when he resided in Africa, the English company had invested Mr. Baggs, governor of Cape Coast, with more ample powers than any of his predecessors had ever enjoyed; upon his promise of carrying on works upon Devil's Mount, and transmitting gold to England. For this purpose he bought up all the necessary instruments, but suddenly dropt the design, probably apprehending the resentment of the natives.

English fort of Winiba or Simpa.

AGONNA surpasses Acron in extent and number of people, and is equal to it in fertility and beauty. It has the advantage of a fine large fresh water river, well stocked with fish and oysters. The English built a fort about the middle of Agonna, at a village called Simpa or Winiba. The roof is flat, and the building square, with a battery at each angle, mounted with half pounders. In a word, it is such a fortress, as Bosman describes, that requires another fort to defend it. The village of Simpa is populous, and the natives industrious, in fishing, agriculture, and grazing; for they breed great numbers of cattle, which they sell to their neighbours. In Bosman's time, the commerce of the fort and village in gold and slaves was inconsiderable; but he is of opinion, that, as soon as the wars cease with the inland countries, they will both become flourishing. Six miles farther stands Barku, a village once frequented by the French, and remarkable for one circumstance, that the language, which is the same all along the Gold Coast, begins here to change, first into a different dialect, and a little farther into a quite different language. Barbot says, that this is the chief town in the kingdom of Agonna; that the surrounding country is fertile, pleasant, and exceedingly well adapted for the establishment of a factory. Formerly the English had great influence here, being allied to the queen by a formal contract; but the Dutch gained such an advantage over them, that they built a triangular fort at Barku, mounted with twelve cannons. Some years since the English had a fort at Schido, four miles from Barku; but it is since abandoned, and now nothing besides the ruins remain.

Agonna govern'd by a queen.

WHEN Bosman wrote, Agonna was governed by a woman, and had been so for several years before this period. This queen had a mind noble and elevated, with a strength of judgment, and piercing wit, superior to the weakness of her sex. To prevent sharing the power with a husband, she continued single; but that she might not be absolutely a stranger to the softer passion, she usually kept a young handsome small slave, with whom she amused herself in her vacant hours, prohibiting him under pain of death to intrigue with any other woman. As soon as this gallant had lost his charms, or her passions were palled, he was exchanged for another; and some affirm that she kept a number of lovers at a time. One cannot help imagining, that Bosman was drawing the counterpart of our Elizabeth.

kingdom of Aquamboe.

NEXT follows the kingdom of Aquamboe, bounded on the east by the river Volta, and on the west by Agonna. Prevost speaks of the district of Acra as a distinct kingdom; but we

- a cannot discover any sufficient authority for his opinion. That part of Aquamboe which lies on the coast is called Acra; and might formerly have been an independent state; at present it is annexed to the crown, at least tributary to it. Aquamboe is one of the greatest monarchies on the coast of Guiney, his majesty's maritime dominions stretching for the space of twenty miles, and ten times that length into the inland parts. Bosman says, that the coast is divided into a number of petty royalties, but all of them subject to the king of Aquamboe, who indiscriminately exercises an unlimited authority over them and his meanest subjects. His despotic power gave rise to a proverbial saying, "that there are only two ranks of men at Aquamboe, the royal family and the slaves." The natives of this country are haughty, turbulent, and warlike; and their power is formidable to all the neighbouring kingdoms, except Akem, which in general is an overmatch for them. All the tributary nations are miserably tormented with the plundering visits the Aquamboans make them. Whole armies enter the adjacent territories, take whatever they like, and meet with no opposition from the inhabitants, who are sensible, from experience, that the king would not fail to punish any resistance offered to his troops, esteeming that an indignity offered to his crown. In Bosman's days the supreme power was divided between the father and the son, the former retaining to himself the greater share of authority. This had been the usual method of administration till the late reign, when the young king was deposed by his uncle, under pretence of incapacity. This double sovereignty was extremely burthensome to the subjects, who by that means became the slaves of two tyrants instead of one, and were sacrificed to the caprice equally of the father and the son, at the same time that they were oppressed with the expence of supporting two monarchs. "The old king," says Bosman, "was of an abject but wicked disposition, and an inveterate enemy to the Europeans. Although he received from the English, Danes, and us (Dutch) an ounce of gold, in acknowledgement of the liberty granted by his predecessors of building in the Aquamboan territories, yet did he horribly pester us in the most unreasonable manner. If he but fancied that any one of the European nations had injured him, he was sure to make all three pay for it, by shutting up the passage in such a way, that no trade could be carried on till his whim and avarice were fully satisfied." His son was more favourable to the Europeans, more regardful of the delicacy of trade, more intelligent and hospitable, and his accession to the throne was of the utmost advantage to the English and Dutch factories; such was his confidence in the Dutch, that upon a certain illness with which he was seized, he put himself under the care of the surgeons of the company, and resided in the Dutch fort, till a cure was completed.

THE English, Dutch, and Danes, have each of them forts at Acra, which may be looked upon as the best on the whole coast. Steering eastward, the first we meet with is the English settlement, which is a well built square building, with four batteries; its walls high and thick, especially towards the Dutch fort, and the whole mounted with 25 pieces of heavy artillery. This, like all the English forts, is badly garrisoned, as if it were sufficient to build forts, mount cannon, and lay in stores without men. This is the saving scheme of the directors of all our companies, whence repeated misfortunes have ensued to the settlements, and the proprietors in stocks. Smith, who had been at Acra in 1727, affirms, that Fort James is strong and beautiful, standing upon a rugged rock that hangs over the sea, upon which a battery is raised capable of mounting 20 cannons. Near it is a salt pit, which supplies a great part of the coast with that commodity, and brings in a considerable revenue.

WITHIN cannon shot of Fort James stands the Dutch fort Creveceur, on the extremity of a high rock, the beach for landing being under the fire of the artillery and musquetry of the fort. The building is square, and, after the general manner of the coast, flanked with batteries, joined by long curtains, of so irregular a construction, as to be able to withstand but a short attack. Bosman affirms, that it surpasses the English fort in extent and weight of metal; yet he acknowledges that a rupture with that nation would be attended with dangerous consequences to the fort. On the contrary, all the English writers give the preference in strength greatly to the Fort James; asserting that it is able in a few hours to reduce Creveceur to dust (N).

DIRECTLY a cannon-shot farther east stands the Danish fort Christiansburgh, the only one they possess on this coast. It is stronger than either of the above forts, being a square building of one continued battery, as Bosman expresses it; for the roof being flat, the cannon may be pointed in every direction. But all these advantages could not preserve it from a number of misfortunes and revolutions. In 1670 it was governed by John Ollarichs de Gluckstad, a man of merit and personal courage, who was perfidiously murdered by the natives, at the instigation of a Greek he had kept a great number of years in his service. This traitor sold the fort to Julian de Campo Baretto, the old governor of St. Thomas, for the sum of 444 l. sterling. Towards the beginning of the year 1682, Baretto was confined by his own garrison, and the command taken from him. The chief of the Mutineers shut up all entrance into the fort, declaring that he was ready to justify his conduct, adding, that if Baretto desired to return to Europe, he was at liberty to pursue his intentions. Baretto, however, was obstinate in his resolution not to quit his command, but by order of the king of Portugal, charged Barbot with a letter to the court at Lisbon, expecting in consequence a speedy release. In the mean while the garrison was reduced to extreme necessity, being totally destitute of bread and the necessaries of life, and the whole effects in the warehouse not exceeding 60 l. in value, although they had received 200 marks of gold for reparations which they never made. In this state of affairs the Danes solicited a restitution of the fort, and obtained it in 1682, for a large sum. They pursued their commerce with great success till the year 1693, when they suffered it to be surprised by the negroes. The Danes having incurred the displeasure of the king of Acra, that prince seized an opportunity of a sickness that prevailed in the fort to revenge himself. Observing that the Danes reposed great confidence in a negro called Assemi, who had acquired great influence in the kingdom, and had done them considerable services in their commerce, he wanted not address to gain him over to his purposes. Assemi, flattered with the royal promises, persuaded the Danish governor that a body of negro merchants were coming to the fort, to make a purchase of fire arms, and advised him to raise the price. In effect the negroes, to the number of 30, being introduced, and the bargain finished, those perfidious wretches loaded their pieces with powder and ball, under pretence of proving them, and fell upon the garrison unprepared, finding it no difficult matter to conquer them. In a word, the Danes were driven out of the fort, their magazines plundered, and sold to the king of Acra for 7000 l. sterling. The fort was given to the treacherous and artful Assemi, who maintained a profitable commerce with the ships of several European nations. For some time it remained in his hands; but, on the arrival of two Danish ships, he found it necessary to make restitution, and yielded to the mediation of the Dutch; a service, says Bosman, which they soon repaid with ingratitude. They had no sooner regained possession, than they stripped their ships of the necessary hands, which occasioned their falling a prey to some Turkish pirates, before they lost sight of the coast, on their return *.

WHEN we reflect on the courage and martial disposition of those negroes, it appears extraordinary, that they should permit themselves to be bridled by three strong European forts, so contiguous to each other; but what will not gold do, even in the native country of gold? The king of Acra, gained by the presents of the Dutch and Danes, first permitted lodges to be built, which they soon improved into regular forts. Each fort hath its adjacent village, though the general one is Acra, the name of the antient kingdom, before it was conquered by the Aquamboans, and its inhabitants driven to Little Popo, as we have mentioned in the end of the last chapter.

Fertility and wealth of the country.

IT would be no unreasonable conjecture, that the companies trading hither might be fatal, by their contrary interests and rivalry, to the general commerce; but experience proves it otherwise. The abundance of gold and slaves are indeed so great, that neither is in danger of wanting a sufficient proportion, and each is stocked with commodities which the other has not, a circumstance which often tends to promote trade. At Acra alone, more gold is frequently received than on the whole coast besides; and its extensive commerce would be still greatly enlarged, but for the perpetual quarrels between the natives of Aquamboe and Akem, the latter pretending a feudal sovereignty over the former, in consequence of which they demand an annual tribute, which the former refuse paying. The king of Aquamboe, sensible of the superiority of the enemy, and at the same time that any concessions would in time cost him his whole country, has the address to divert the storm, by sowing dissention in their councils, by which means he preserves the tranquility and trade of his realm. This is the general maxim of the sovereigns of Aquamboe, handed down from father to son for several generations<sup>r</sup>. Bosman is of opinion, that the king and his nobility are richer in gold and slaves, and possess greater treasures, than all the kingdoms on the coast of Guiney, at least on the Gold Coast.

the natives.

THE chief business of the people is trade, agriculture, and war, employments almost incompatible in other countries, but here perfectly consistent, where war promotes trade and husbandry, by increasing the number of slaves and prisoners, who are obliged to labour for the Aquamboans while they are maintained by them. This people is therefore by interest and inclination much addicted to arms. Though the soil is fertile, yet provisions generally fall short towards the end of the year, and they are forced to supply themselves from other countries. The Aquamboans take no pleasure in fishing or salt-boiling, though it would be easy to improve both to advantage. Those employments, which they repute beneath their dignity, they

- a leave to the maritime negroes, whom they affect to despise, or to other nations, who remove hither for the purposes of fishing and making salt. The maritime negroes are numerous, and all the fine villages of the sea coast thickly peopled, the inhabitants employing their time not only in fishing and making salt, but in driving a great trade with the European shipping. The number of slaves sold here is at least equal to what is disposed of on the whole coast besides, not excepting Anamaboa. When the Aquamboans are at war with a neighbouring nation, every man fit to bear arms enters the field, till the season requires they should return to their civil employments; then a certain number are detached to cultivate the ground and sell their prisoners, while the rest are employed in opposing the enemy. Those who are of a more turbulent warlike disposition, enter into the service of the neighbouring nations, who are at war with others, if their own country should happen to be at peace, which seldom is the case.
- b Among the fishermen on the coast, there are few warriors; for as they live under the protection of the Europeans, and are defended on the north by their more warlike countrymen, they are seldom attacked, or forced to change the hook and net for the sword and buckler<sup>2</sup>.
- BESIDES the kingdoms we have described, Artus and Barbot speak of the countries of Labadde, Ningo, and Soko, all of which have ports on the sea coast; but as they are only divisions of the great kingdom of Aquamboe, we shall proceed to a short recital of the inland countries, as we imagine the reader's patience will be already tired with a tedious but necessary geographical description of the coast. It is true we are but little acquainted with those countries lying north of the sea; but as their names have frequently occurred in the above description of the coast, A geographical account of the inland countries.
- c it may be proper to enumerate them, and lay down their situations. According to the testimony of the most intelligent negroes, and the few Europeans who have penetrated into the inland countries, the first is the kingdom of Infoko, five days journey from Acra, or the maritime part of Aquamboe, bounded by the river Volta on the east, by Aquamboe on the south, and on the north by the great desert of Nigritia. Its frontiers either way are but inaccurately marked, because the roads in this country are constantly pestered with robbers, which deter strangers from gratifying their curiosity. The natives are extremely expert in weaving beautiful stuffs and cloths, which they sell to great advantage to the neighbouring negroes. The Akanese assert, that the Infokons are intirely ignorant of the difference between gold and ivory, neither of these commodities being otherwise known to them than as curiosities, sometimes presented in small pieces by their neighbours. Happy would it be for more polished nations, were their knowledge less of a metal, that occasions the spilling rivers of human blood!
- d NEXT stands Comanna, bounded on the east by Infoko, on the south by Labadde and Ningo, Comanna. two provinces of Aquamboe, its northern limit being intirely unknown. All we know of this country is, that its natives bring great quantities of gold to the markets of Akkaradi, a kingdom touching it on the west, who afterwards carry it to Aboni, and thence to the negroes of the sea coast. Then follow, in a regular series from east to west, but with undetermined boundaries to the south and north, the kingdoms of Latabi, Equea, Bonu, standing far north; Tafu, Latabi, Equea, &c. particularly the kingdom of Quaka. Many of the negroes assert, that Achem extends itself Achem.
- e all the way to the coast of Barbary, which is what we are unable to comprehend, by the assistance of any charts or maps we have yet seen. It is divided into Great and Little Achem, both being formerly united into one monarchy; now they are split into two republics, and their civil dissensions have made them less formidable to their neighbours than heretofore. Most of the gold exported from this country is brought to the European forts at Acra. The negroes of Great Achem and Achani are of a character extremely insolent and haughty, piquing themselves upon their wonted greatness, and assuming in their conversation the same superiority they once maintained in action over their neighbours. The most universal chanel of their trade turns to those countries bordering upon the Niger, to the northern kingdom of Meezora, and to the great empire of Gago, celebrated for the immense profusion of gold it sends by caravans to
- f Tombuto and Morocco.
- WEST of Achem stands the country of Inta or Affiento, which modern travellers look upon Inta or Affiento. as the same kingdom. It is bordered on the north by the unknown regions, on the east by Achem, and on the south by Akanni, or Little Achem. Affiento is but little known, as its inhabitants maintain little or no correspondence with the maritime negroes. This alone we are assured of, that it is rich in gold, which the Akanese sometimes bring to the coast. Its situation, which is near the source of Rio Sacro de Costa, is extremely advantageous for trade, were the natives more disposed to commerce, and better acquainted with their own interest.
- STILL farther west lies the country of Dinkira, six days journey from Axim, and five from Dinkira. Elmina. It has the country of Affiento, some say the intermediate kingdom of Cabastera, Cabastera.
- g on the east, Adom on the west, and on the north the unknown regions, extending to Barbary. The roads leading to it from Axim and Elmina are bad, rough, and filled with windings, which greatly lengthen the journey and fatigue the traveller; an inconvenience which might be removed a with little trouble or expence, were the negroes disposed to it. Formerly this kingdom was confined within narrow limits, and these but thinly inhabited; but the natural valour of the natives soon rendered them formidable to all their neighbours, except those of Achem and Affiento, who always over-matched them by the great superiority of numbers. When the roads are free and open, the Dinkiriese merchants, and the Achaneſe, frequent the markets of Axim, Elmina, Commendo, and Cape Coast, according to their distance and conveniency. When they are shut up, they turn their commerce to the more distant parts of the coast, and there occasion a great afflux of wealth at the inferior factories. The gold of Dinkira is naturally fine, but artfully mixed with the Fetiche gold, of which we have spoken, and shall have farther opportunities of explaining. As to the Achaneſe, they have been long noted for the large trade they carry b on with the natives, both of the coast and the interior countries. Their reputation for honesty, good sense, and fair dealing, is so well established, that the merchants of Commendo and Simpa, give their gold the name of Akkaney Gbienka, on account of its purity and genuine qualities. The natives are naturally of a fierce, bold, and warlike disposition, which makes them either esteemed or feared by their neighbours, according to the occasions offered of loving or dreading them. Such weight and importance do they carry, that, in travelling through any of the adjacent countries, they are seldom at any expence, every one being desirous of shewing his respect for the nation, by the favours he bestows on the individual. Their arms are darts, scymitars, and bucklers; their language a mixture of those of all the neighbouring countries with whom they correspond; and they retain a great number of Portuguese words, which their c ancestors borrowed during their commerce with that nation. In a word, it is a lingua Franca, a mixture of all languages, without any peculiar principles or idiom of its own.

Quiforo.

Vanqui.

THE next kingdom mentioned by voyagers is Quiforo, the boundaries of which we are unable to ascertain, the natives having hardly any intercourse with the maritime parts. This country is also called Juffer. Next follows Vanqui or Wamqui, bordered on the west by Quiforo, and, according to some geographers, by Incaſſia-Iggina, on the south by Vaſſabs, and on the north by Bonu. The natives have the art of weaving elegant gold stuffs, which they sell to the Arabians along the Niger, or to the surrounding countries. Vaſſabs or Waſſihabs, as we find it in the Dutch charts, is bordered on the east by Vanqui and Quiforo, and on the north by unknown countries. It is famous for its prodigious wealth in gold; but as it has d scarce any rivers, most voyagers are of opinion, that it is imported from more distant countries, although we look upon this as a weak argument. The country is sterile, producing nothing remarkable, and the whole business of the natives consists in the gold trade. One would think that this barrenness of the country was sufficient to convince voyagers that gold is the real produce thereof; how else should a nation, that has nothing to give in exchange, obtain it? It is true, they dispose of it to the maritime kingdoms, and procure by way of barter several European commodities, but still they must have begun upon an original capital.

Monpa.

Adom.

THE Dutch and best charts place Monpa or Manpa, as the next province to the westward; but its boundaries are very imperfectly known. To the west of Manpa lies the famous kingdom e of Adom, bordered by Guaffo on the south, by Vaſſabs on the north, and by Abrambo east-north-east. The Adomeſe trade in general with Axim and Bourtry; but when the roads are infested, or shut up by robbers, then they turn the chanel of commerce towards Little Commendo. The country of Adom extends on a right line along the banks of the river Schama, having a great number of fine islands belonging to it, covered with beautiful and populous villages. Formerly the government was monarchical; at present the supreme authority is lodged in a council of six lords, so powerful, that, according to the proverb, “they are able “to bear the king of Jabi on their horns.” Were the Adomeſe unanimous, and free from civil wars, they would be the terror of all the surrounding nations. We have had occasion to speak of their prowess in reciting the wars with the Anteſe. As the inhabitants of more f northern regions are obliged to pass through Adom before they can trade with the negroes of the coast, the Adomeſe never fail to take advantage of this necessity, obliging them to pay a duty that raises the price upon the Europeans, and brings in a large revenue to the republick. Adom is populous, fertile, and rich; natural advantages, that have increased the pride of the natives, and rendered it difficult to trade with them. Here is great plenty of corn, roots, fruits; wild and tame animals, in a word, all that can make a people happy, were not their felicity destroyed by civil discord and arrogance. Next follow the countries of Jaben, Grand Incaſſen, Equira, and Avina, differing but little from Axim and Adom, to which they are contiguous, either in trade, produce, laws, or customs<sup>a</sup>. Having finished this short view of the interior country, we now proceed to the general manners, laws, religion, and natural history, and other g

Should the preceding geographical description appear unentertaining and barren to the reader, he will please to consider it as absolutely necessary to our design; and that those countries are but very imperfectly known, consequently not very interesting to those who read for amusement, and who regard books useful only, as they serve to fill up a vacant hour.

S E C T. II.

Containing the methods which the negroes search after, and purify the gold; the European methods used for trying this metal; the general manners, laws, religion, and government, &c. of the negroes of the Gold Coast.

- b BEFORE we enter upon the proposed history, we shall beg leave to extract from Bosman <sup>The method the negroes search after gold, and purify it from the earth.</sup> a short account of the method the negroes search for gold, the several kinds of this metal, the manner in which they adulterate it, the different sorts of weights used in the country, and some other particulars relating to the precious metal, which are not generally known, and deserve attention.

THERE are numbers of otherwise intelligent persons in this country, who imagine that the gold mines of Africa are in the power of the Europeans, in the same manner as the Spaniards possess those of America, where they work them by their slaves. The circumstances, however, are widely different; no Europeans have access to the mines of Africa, few have ever seen any, and all the gold is brought them from the interior lands; though we have upon the best authority, that some parts of the coast afford mines, if the negroes would permit them to be opened. The negroes esteem their gold mines sacred, and of consequence cut off the Europeans from all immediate communication; a maxim founded upon true policy and self defence, knowing how short a time they would enjoy them, if once the Europeans got footing.

- THE precious metal is generally found in three different kinds of places; the first and best is in vallies, situated between mountains. Here the negroes, knowing by certain marks where the gold is, dig pits, and separate it from the adhering earth. The second is in, at, and about rivers and falls of water, which rushing down from the mountains, wash away large quantities of earth, and with it the precious metal. The third method of finding gold is on the sea coast, and at the mouth of rivers and rivulets, as at Axim. No sooner a heavy shower of rain falls, than those places are visited by hundreds of negro women naked. Each of them is furnished with a small tray, which they fill with earth, and wash repeatedly till the gold is freed from the earth, and falls by its specific weight to the bottom. Some in a whole day find perhaps not the value of six-pence, while others are so successful as to make pounds. The gold thus dug or found is of two sorts. The one is called gold dust, which is as fine as flour, and most valued both in Africa and Europe. The other kind consists of pieces of different sizes, some weighing not two pence: others perhaps thirty guineas; but these last are scarce. However, the negroes affirm, that, in the inland countries, pieces weighing 200 guineas are found. These solid lumps go by the name of mountain gold, and when melted touch better than the dust, if pure, which it seldom is. The negroes have a variety of methods to sophisticate the precious metal. <sup>Methods of sophisticating gold.</sup> One is the casting it into fetiches, mixed with half or a third part silver and copper (A). These fetiches are cut into small bits by the negroes, to the value of three farthings each, which serves for the current coin of the country. It is a common proverb among them, "that you cannot purchase much gold for a farthing," but even with that value in gold, you may here go to market and furnish yourself with bread, fruits and other necessaries. The negro females know the exact value of each bit at sight; they are seldom mistaken, generally giving you the exact value, with the same accuracy as if it had been weighed; and yet the difference is so small as to escape the eyes of the Europeans. These pieces go by the name of kakeraas, or little worth, which is true in a literal sense, for in Europe it is valued only at forty shillings per ounce; yet it is current all over the coast, and accepted by European garrisons in pay.

(A) These fetiches are a sort of artificial and base gold, strangely shaped in moulds of a black ponderous earth. The negroes have also fetiches of unalloyed mountain gold, which they keep for ornaments, and seldom pass into trade. Nothing can exceed the address of those barbarians, first in counterfeiting the precious metal, and then in passing it off for genuine gold. If the Europeans refuse, they are no less peremptory in denying the cheat, than artful in concealing it. So great is their obstinacy in this particular, that the Europeans are often forced to accept of what they know to be false gold, and strangers are frequently deceived by the warmth and seeming integrity of their professions (1).

(1) Bosman, epist. 6. Barbot, p. 225.

ANOTHER neat manner of adulteration they have, which sometimes deceives very experienced traders, who have not weighed it in water. They cast pieces of gold so artificially, that the external crust about a line thick shall be pure, while the inside consists wholly of copper, perhaps of iron. This is a new invented cheat; but the most common false mountain gold, is a mixture of silver, copper, and a proportion of gold, extremely high coloured, which much facilitates the deceit; for the Europeans being obliged in trade to receive two or three pounds weight at a time, it would be intolerably tedious to touch every piece, so that they frequently trust to appearances and are deceived. A third method which they sometimes practise to deceive the Europeans, is the most barefaced and palpable. This is by a powder of coral or copper filings, tinged so exactly like gold, that only scales can discover the counterfeit.

trying gold.

THE usual method taken by the European factors for the detection of those frauds, is to cut the large pieces through the middle, which immediately discovers whether the mass be pure and homogeneous. The small bits they lay upon a stone, and beat with a hammer. If they are composed of coral, they will crumble and fly off; if metal, they will prove malleable; after which, to know if the metal be gold, it is tried by the knife or by the touch. To try durst, they put the gold in a basin, and winnow it with their blowing it as it descends. The base will fly away, and the genuine by its weight fall to the bottom. Upon repeating this experiment, the false is separated from the true, and only the pure is found in the basin. Strange, that where the trade is of such consequence, and frauds so frequent and important, the methods of trial should be so gross, imperfect, and liable to deception! How easily might the intrinsic value of every parcel be known by the proportional scales! And as for the current coin, that is of little consequence to traders, who leave it all behind.

Of the gold weights used on this coast.

THE gold weights used here are either pounds, marks, ounces, or angels. In Europe 20 angels make an ounce; in Africa, at least on the Gold Coast, only 16 are allowed. They have also pesos and bendos, the former of which contain four angels, and the latter two ounces. Thus four bendos make one mark, and two marks one pound of gold, equal to 660 guilders. This standard however varies, its value depending on the fineness of the gold, and the price it bears in Europe. In general, one pound of good gold is worth a thousand guilders in Africa, and the base judged by their variation from this standard. There is also another kind of weights, as Bosman terms it, or rather currency, used on the Gold Coast; these are white and black beans; red beans according to Barbot. The red beans, spotted with black, are called danbays, twenty-four of them being valued at an angel, and passed in payments for such. Each of these beans is equal to a Dutch stiver. The white beans, with black spots, are called jacoës, and pass often for four stivers, but they are less current than the others. The negroes have tin and copper scales, of the same model with those used in Europe, but divided and adjusted after a different manner. To conclude this article; it is obvious, that a great quantity of gold must be lost with the earth for want of skill in separating them. It is even probable, that large portions of pure gold must be left behind, through the ignorance of the negroes in metallurgy. We are told by some of the intelligent natives, that their manner is to dig at random, without having any idea of pursuing a vein. Were the mines in the possession of the Europeans, it is almost certain, that much greater profits would arise from their superior skill in the arts; how advantageous they might prove in a political sense, we shall leave politicians to debate. In Bosman's time, the exports of gold were as follow.

Yearly exports by Europeans.

	Marks, yearly.
The Dutch West-India company	1500
The English African company	1200
The Zealand interlopers	1500
The English interlopers	1000 often 2000
The Danes , when their trade is good	1000
The Portuguese and French	800

The Portuguese, though they have at present no settlements, yet frequent the coasts, selling Brazil tobacco, brandy, and rum, and carry off the greater share of what is stated to theirs and the French account. Thus, upon the whole, in Bosman's time, the Europeans carried off yearly about 23 tons of gold, or 230,000 l. allowing three marks to 100 l. How much the export of the precious metal may at present vary from this calculation, we cannot take it upon us to determine. The opinion of most people is, that, with regard to this nation, it falls greatly short <sup>a</sup>.

Of the figure, character, dress, manners, and customs, of the negroes of the Gold Coast.

<sup>a</sup> THE natives of the Gold Coast are in general tall, strait, and well proportioned, their faces oval, their eyes sparkling, their teeth regular and white, their eye-brows thick, and their ears small. As to their mouth it is not very large, and their lips are tinged with a better colour, and thinner, than those of the negroes of Angola. But it would be unnecessary to dwell upon their figure; every man who has ever stepped beyond the place of his birth, has seen them <sup>b</sup>. As to the qualities of their mind, they have a quick apprehension and ready memory, together with a surprizing presence of mind upon the most sudden and alarming occasions: but such is their indolence, that only necessity can oblige them to use those talents given them by nature. Neither prosperity nor adversity make any impression upon them; and although they are greedy in amassing wealth, yet are they perfectly indifferent to the loss of it. In general they are crafty, fraudulent, and villainous, seldom to be confided in; and no opportunity is passed over of cheating an European, or indeed of cozening each other. They are dissemblers, flatterers, thieves, gluttons, and drunkards; equally incontinent and covetous, to gratify either of which passions they stumble at nothing. An instance of their insensibility is, that, if they obtain a victory over their enemies, they return home dancing and singing: if they are defeated they do the same, round the graves of their friends and fellow soldiers. The same joy appears on either occasion, and a stranger cannot distinguish a victory from a defeat, but by their shaven pates after the latter. M. Foequenbourg says of them, that they rejoice at funerals; and were they to see their country in flames, they would cry out, "let it burn," not permitting the misfortune for a moment to suspend their riotous mirth and drunkenness. Like the old philosopher, every negro has his maxim, omnia mea mecum porto; their whole care is concentrated in their own persons. In a word, they are perfectly insensible of grief and joy; for those fallies of animal spirits scarcely deserve the name of joy: they sing till they die, and dance into the grave <sup>c</sup>.

THE women are proportionably handsomer than the men, strait, slender, and well limbed; their chests high, their mouths small, and their eyes full of spirit and vivacity. They are quick, cheerful, and loquacious; gay in their disposition, and loose in their principles as to gallantry, but temperate in their diet. Yet after all, both males and females, when necessity summons their natural indolence, are laborious, industrious, and ingenious; applying themselves with great diligence to agriculture and fishing, so far as they are excited either by avarice or poverty. In a word, to sum up their character, they are, like the rest of mankind, a composition of virtues and vices, only that here the latter are greatly predominant, and the former the result of necessity, if in such a case they can be called virtues. The natural talents are good, but their passions are strong, their ignorance great, and they abandon themselves totally to the calls of nature, without dread of shame, that shield of decorum, decency, and human virtue itself. Be the actions of the day what they will, those negroes go to rest at night undisturbed by reflection, free from care, and true disciples of that doctrine, "take no thought for to-morrow." Artus proceeds in their character; they, he says, are of so ready a conception, that they easily apprehend whatever is shewn them; nor are the eyes of the body less piercing than those of the mind; for it has been observed, that they are able to distinguish objects at sea, incomparably farther than Europeans, and even to describe faces, where the very men are invisible to Dutchmen. But it would be tedious to repeat all that author has said of them; a miniature describes the features with as much strength, as a picture as large as the life <sup>d</sup>.

As to their dress, it is various, depending upon fancy and circumstances: some wear long hair curled, plaited, or tied upon the crown of the head in the form of a rose, which they moisten with oil, and tinge with different colours. Others again wear it short for conveniency, or loose, either for ornament or through neglect. In whatever manner the hair is done, it is generally adorned with gold fetiches; a sort of coral, called conte de terra, four times the value of gold; or with a blue coral, which they call accori, esteemed of equal value with the precious metal. They are so fond of hats, that they purchase them at any price, never imagining they can pay too dear for the gratification of so agreeable a vanity. Their arms, legs, and waists are likewise set off with gold, conte de terra, and accori. The usual dress is a

petticoat of velvet, silk, cloth, perpetuana, or some stuff; and some who pretend to a taste <sup>a</sup> superior to the vulgar, make their paans of a mixture of fifty different kinds of cloth. This paan they plait so artfully that it fits neat round the middle, hanging half-way down the leg. Round their necks they wear strings of gold and coral, amounting sometimes to an hundred pounds in value. By these worth is estimated, and those who want them are excluded the company of those who possess them. The manceroes, or youth, are less gorgeous in their dress, and the caboceroes, or chief council, so meanly habited, that one would imagine they chose to pass for the poorest instead of the richest men of the nation. They wear only a coarse paan, a cap made of hart's skin, a string of coral round their temples, and a staff in their hands, the ensign of their authority. The common people, as wine-drawers, fishermen, &c. <sup>b</sup> are very poorly equipped, some with a yard or two of a sorry stuff formed into a petticoat, others with a sort of a girdle only drawn through between their legs, to hide those parts nature dictates to conceal; to which they frequently add a cap made of rushes, or, if they can obtain it by stealth or interest, a sailor's old hat, which they wear in hot as well as cold weather <sup>c</sup>.

The rage of dress chiefly prevalent among the women.

EVEN in savage countries pride seems to have reared his throne chiefly among the females, who in Guiney have more expence, whim, and caprice in their dress than the males. The ladies are loaded with gold, coral, and ivory trinkets, which they dispose with infinitely more genius and variety than the other sex. No part of the body is left unadorned with those jewels; the head, waist, legs, and arms, sweat under the weight of their finery; yet does vanity make them disregard conveniency, and a lady had rather appear amiable than easy, fine than healthy, <sup>c</sup> convenient, and natural. From the waist downwards they wear a paan four times the length of the mens, which they wind round their bodies, and bind it on with a fillet of red cloth, half yard wide, the ends suspended over their paans, and among persons of wealth, vanity, or fashion, it is laced with gold or adorned with fringe. Over the upper part of their bodies they throw a veil of silk or fine stuff, in a manner they believe the most tempting and alluring, in which intention they frequently succeed with the Europeans, beyond what the difference of manners and complexion renders credible. Before the arrival of the Portuguese and Dutch they had no idea of this rage for dress: both males and females went naked to the age of maturity; but, finding this simplicity disgusting to the Europeans, they assisted their charms <sup>d</sup> by all the embellishments of art and the ornaments we have described, passing from one extreme to another; nothing being so natural as too eager a desire of being agreeable. In proof of this we may instance their manner of scarifying their faces and painting the cicatrices with various colours, which they have a notion adds greatly to their beauty. Villault mentions certain necklaces, bracelets, and ear-rings of glass set in gold, which they wear in honour of the Fetiche, after they have been consecrated by some mysterious words spoken over them. Such is the force of superstition, that the more incomprehensible and remote from human understanding is the craft of religion, the more implicit and blind is our obedience <sup>e</sup>.

THERE is in the manners of all negroes, male and female, a neatness peculiar to warm climates, and indeed most necessary there, we mean the practice of washing their bodies twice every day, either in salt or fresh water. This is the reason why they constantly chuse <sup>e</sup> the sea-coast or banks of rivers to build on; and where these are wanting they make tanks, or baths, with infinite pains and trouble, habit rendering cleanliness as essential to them as food. They teach their children to swim very young; whence they become expert divers, continuing incredibly long under water. In a word, they are so fond of this element, that half their time is spent in it, and they may with truth be termed amphibious.

Of the mulattoes.

BESIDES the natural inhabitants of the Gold Coast, there is a great number of mulattoes, a mixed progeny, arising from the commerce of Europeans with the black women. This spurious race forms gangs of thieves and robbers, void of decency, honour, honesty, or principle in their dealings with each other, with the negroes or Europeans. They call themselves Christians, although of all idolaters they are the grossest; and the greater part of their women <sup>f</sup> prostitute their bodies publicly to Europeans, and privately to the negroes. In a word, the mulattoes are a composition of all the vices and bad qualities of whites and blacks, equally deformed in body and mind, and growing in both as years increase. At first their complexion is a tawny yellow, as different from the colour of the Europeans as negroes; but as they grow old, their skin appears spotted with white, yellow, and brown spots, resembling a leopard, and rendering them the most hideous of all mortals. In general, the males are employed in the service of the Dutch, and dress after the same fashion; but the women in a way peculiar to themselves, which we shall not attempt to describe <sup>g</sup>.

a THE towns and villages of this coast consist of a multitude of little huts or cabins, dispersed in groupes, without order or design, and communicating with each other by narrow crooked roads, which terminate in the center of the town, or market-place. The farther you remove from the sea coast, the more civilized do the natives appear, at least so far as relates to their building and living. All the towns and villages on the coast are situated in dry, barren, and sandy lands, or upon rocks and precipices; those in the interior countries, upon the most delicious spots that can be chosen. In the latter the houses are not only better built, and of a more ingenious contrivance, but more neat in the furniture, and better peopled. But what chiefly renders the maritime places inferior to the inland towns is, the loads of filth, and insupportable stench which perpetually attends them; for the negroes leave their ordure round their habitations, which, with the smell of putrid fish, of which they are fond, salutes the nose with an unsavoury welcome at the distance of a league. This it is that makes their kings chuse some inland situation for their residence, their example being followed by every man whose occupation or poverty does not prevent his following his inclinations. Another inconvenience is, that, except the market-places of Elmina and Cape Coast, none of their streets are paved, which makes them absolutely impassable after heavy rains. They are likewise less curious in planting round the villages than their inland neighbours; and Axim alone affords pleasant shades against the sultry heat of the sun. In building their houses they have not the smallest regard to beauty or conveniency of situation, nor the faintest idea of perspective walks, or any kind of police about their villages: every one builds where and in the manner his fancy or rather his laziness dictates; and, in spite of all the remonstrances of the Europeans, and the facility with which they might effect certain reparations, they remain perfectly insensible to their interest, with a stupid indolence which nothing can surpass or conquer <sup>b</sup>.

The method of building peculiar to the negroes.

As to their diet, it is by no means delicate or expensive. Their common food is a pot of millet boiled to the consistence of bread, yamms, and potatoes, over which they pour some palm oil, and garnish the dish with herbs and putrid fish; the whole dinner not exceeding two pence in value. This they esteem an excellent dish for common days; for on holidays they feast upon beef, mutton, and fowls. The better sort of people compose a dish of fish, corn, dough, palm oil, and herbs, which they boil in water, seasoned with salt and pepper, and eat hot or cold. This dish they call mallaguet, pleasant enough to those who are accustomed to it, and perfectly wholesome and innocent. But however temperate the negroes may be in eating, they are not so in drinking. The morning is ushered in with brandy, and the evening concludes with palm wine, mirth, riot, and tobacco, of which they are extravagantly fond. They are temperate in eating, that they may be profuse in drinking; and where their money is insufficient to supply their desires, they have recourse to their natural talent for stealing. This vice the women have in common with the men; and even children are taught it from their cradle, as if it were the first of virtues <sup>c</sup>.

Diet of the negroes.

THEIR marriages differ but little from what we have described under particular kingdoms of Guinea. They are not incumbered with ceremonies, nor have they any notion of previous courtship; and no disputes about marriage-settlements are known. If a negro fixes his regard upon a young woman, nothing more is requisite than to apply to her father, mother, or nearest relation, who never deny their request, provided the aversion of the girl be not insuperable. If she be marriageable, he immediately carries her home with him; but if otherwise she is left with her parents. She brings no other fortune than her youth and beauty; nor does the man require much; 'tis sufficient if he have enough to defray the expence of his nuptial dinner, clothes for the bride, a small present of gold to the father, and a sheep to the other relations. Those expences are proportioned to his ability, and an exact account kept of the last farthing laid out, that the relations may indemnify the bridegroom, should the bride ever after desert him for another. If he repudiates her, the account is cleared, and every pretext for a demand on the relations taken away, unless he can give incontestable proofs of her infidelity, or natural defects; in which case the whole disbursements must be refunded. The wedding-day is not spent in any extraordinary acts of mirth and jollity; it is the following day, when the parties can give a satisfactory account of the choice they have made. Upon this occasion the bride appears with all the pomp of dress, the greater part of which she makes no scruple of borrowing, if the circumstances of the bridegroom be unequal to the gratification of her vanity; and she continues to appear in the same attire for several days after <sup>d</sup>.

Marriages.

A MAN is permitted to marry as many women as his humour directs and his circumstances can maintain, though they seldom exceed twenty, and generally content themselves with any number from two to ten. Those however who would make an appearance of grandeur make up the full complement of twenty. In general the women are the laborious part of the country, though many exceptions occur in different provinces and kingdoms of the coast. They are <sup>e</sup> obliged to cultivate the ground, sow millet, plant yamms, and provide subsistence for the husband, who is idly spending his time in gossiping (the province of the women in Europe), drinking, and smoking. His expences the woman is forced to support by her labour, and her obedience is measured by her industry, and the indolence in which the husband is permitted to live. This however is not the case in many towns and villages on the coast, where the men toil and labour for the weaker sex, and preserve their superiority by the only natural means, the rendering themselves useful and necessary.

Of the muliere grande and bossum, their privileges.

THE rich have two wives, exempted from labour and all servile employments, to whom the management of the house is intrusted, and a sort of authority over all the other women given. The one is called muliere grande, and she is first in rank; the other is called bossum, and is consecrated to the household god, or that deity particularly worshipped by the master of the family. Of this last the husband is particularly jealous, it being highly criminal for her to use the most innocent freedom with another man; and a kiss is deemed capital, though he seldom has the power of inflicting this punishment. As to the rest of his wives he is less regardful of their honour, especially if he can profit by their incontinence. Those bossums are slaves, bought with intention of being consecrated to the Fetiche, and their beauty it is that qualifies them for this elevation. In right of their profession they are intitled to the husband's embraces, every night dedicated to the god, and as this occurs once at least every week, they enjoy one considerable prerogative over the other women, even the muliere grande herself. This is the reason why women are so ambitious of being bossums, and will run all the hazards from the husband's jealousy, provided they are secure of those substantial proofs of his affection. The wives of rich merchants and tradesmen enjoy the greatest happiness of any women, as their husbands, industrious in accumulating wealth, are less observant of those little actions, the usual sources of domestic strife and jealousy. They are likewise handsomely provided for without labour, and their conduct generally left to their own discretion; whence it is remarked, that, for the most part, they are the most dutiful to their husbands, and repay with gratitude and constancy his kindness and confidence<sup>1</sup>.

Many of the negroes support themselves by the prostitution of their wives.

IT is no uncommon expedient among negroes to marry for a livelihood by the dishonour of their wives. These husbands are a set of voluntary cuckolds, who not only permit, but excite their women to spread all their snares for lovers, the husband often executing the office of pimp. It is inconceivable with what address those women counterfeit the genuine passion of love, and persuade the cull that they are only gratifying their own desires while they are fleecing him. The usual way is either to pretend they are not married, or else artfully to insinuate to their gallants their dislike of their husbands, on account of their inhumanity or impotence; and it is remarkable, that this last plea is generally the strongest with the Europeans; as if it were a pleasure to rob another of his property, or an indirect compliment to them that the husband is unworthy. It is frequently so contrived between the husband and his wife, that he should surprize the gallant in the act of love; in which case he recovers about six pounds sterling damages; that being the price at which female honour is rated<sup>m</sup>.

The duties of the husband.

ARTUS relates, that the husband has a right to chuse which of his women should pass the night with him; yet his preference to one over another is shewn with the utmost caution, to prevent jealousy and contention. Bosman says, that the emulation for the conjugal favour is carried to the highest pitch of rancour among the women; and the choice depending on the husband's will, they employ every artifice and display every charm to attract him. In general, to preserve good order and peace, a prudent husband dispenses his favours equally, and takes the women to his bed in their turns, all besides the muliere grande and bossum, who enjoy peculiar privileges which are not contested by the others; but this is no longer than while their beauty remains; for when they grow old, they are dismissed from their authority, and reduced to menials, where but lately they were mistresses.

Of the fertility of the negro women.

As the wealth of the negroes consists chiefly in the number of their family, and as this is the possession that gives them the greatest consideration with strangers, they apply their chief attention to the multiplying their children. In general their women are neither barren nor remarkably fruitful. They pass frequently two or three years after marriage, before they become mothers, probably owing to the pernicious practice of marrying while they are children. Villault indeed ascribes this regularity to their natural constitution; and adds, that few of them ever have more than four or five children. Des Marchais accounts for the small number of births from a practice among them of suckling a child four years, and never under three; a custom highly prejudicial to the natural interest of the propagation of the species, and the health and strength of the mother<sup>n</sup>.

- a In Guiney a pregnant woman is treated with the highest respect and tenderness, as well by strangers as by her husband. No sooner is she delivered of her child than rich offerings are made to the Fetiche, for the recovery of the mother and health of the infant; but the most extraordinary ceremony is before delivery. Immediately before the pains of labour seize her, she is conducted to the sea side or the banks of a river, followed by a number of little children, who throw all manner of ordure and excrement at her in the way, after which she is washed with the utmost care. Without this cleanly ceremony the negroes are fully persuaded, that either the mother, the child, or one of the parents, will die during the period of lying-in. All voyagers agree in asserting, that the negro women are delivered with the greatest ease to themselves, and the least trouble to those about them, of any of their sex in the world. "Here is b "no lying-in, no gossiping or expensive groaning entertainments," says Bosman, "as in Europe; a woman brings forth her child in a quarter of an hour, goes the same day to the sea and washes herself, without ever thinking of confining herself for a month to her bed or chamber." He says, that he has seen women bring forth twins without a shriek or scream, and it is seldom they are ever confined above two or three days. Here is no provision of childbed linen for the new born infant, no swaddling stays and rollers, and yet all its limbs grow strait, vigorous, and well-proportioned °.
- As soon as the child sees the light, it is consecrated by the priest, and, if above the common rank, hath three names bestowed upon it, though always called by one only. The first is that of the day on which it was born; the next, that of the grandfather or grandmother, according to the sex of the infant, and the third, that of its parents. After this the number of his names increases with his years, every remarkable action of his life, as the killing the chief of the enemy, a wild beast, or some such feat of prowess, giving occasion for an additional name. It would be unnecessary to enlarge upon the ridiculous excess to which they carry this practice; the best memory being unable to retain the names of a man who has been much in action. The most respectable and honourable name is that which a man obtains in the social hour, and at a palm wine feast in the market-place: a presumptive argument that the social virtues are here preferred to all others. Some have their names given according to the number of children their mother has born, as the eighth, ninth, or tenth child of such a woman; but this is only when the mother has brought forth at least six or seven children °.
- d In Anta, a woman who has borne ten children is separated from her husband, and banished for a certain time to a solitary hut, remote from all mankind, where she is carefully supplied with every necessary of life; at the expiration of which, and the due performance of all customary ceremonies, she returns to her husband, and lives with him as before. It is pity no writers have informed themselves as to reasons for so peculiar a custom; probable indeed it is, that, like most of their other peculiarities, it is founded upon superstition and ignorance. In all the countries in Guiney, without exception, women are esteemed unclean during their catamenia, and not only deprived of their husband's bed, but banished the house during that term. Artus reports, that they circumcise their children of both sexes at a certain age with great solemnity: but Bosman and Barbot both affirm, that the operation is hardly known in any country on the Gold Coast, besides Acra, where it is done at the time of baptism or consecration. Many Europeans have thought that this custom was borrowed from the Jews, like some other usages among them, such as marrying the wife of a brother, doing honour to the moon at certain seasons °, &c. but a very little reflection would have shewn them, that the rite of circumcision prevailed among almost all original and unmixed nations, and that it now prevails among the savages both in the islands and continent of the Terra Australis, or great Southern Continent.
- We have said, that the penalty of being taken in adultery is about six pounds sterling for a person of ordinary fortune, though the rich generally pay a larger sum, especially if he has debauched the wife of a man of consideration. In this case it requires an hundred pounds or two to atone for the crime; but first the case is elaborately pleaded before a court of judicature. Bosman has sat as judge frequently upon such tryals. The constant plea of the negro, even when he is detected by a number of credible witnesses, is not guilty. The woman, who is frequently the accuser, is then called into court, where she explains the whole process of the intrigue, with all its circumstances of time, place, attitude, and deportment of the accused, in colours so glowing and warm, as would make an European courtesan blush. Both sides adhere to their point with the utmost obstinacy; he in acknowledging that he was upon the point of perpetrating the fact, but asserting, that reflection on the consequences prevented his carrying his intentions into act; she on the other hand, laying open every particular, and giving every possible proof of his having completed the fact, insomuch that the judges are greatly a perplexed what judgment to give. In cases where the proofs are equal, the man purges himself by an oath; if he refuses to swear, it is deemed a proof of guilt, and sentence is accordingly given.

MARRIED persons have no community of goods, when the woman happens to possess a fortune; both have their particular proportions of the expences of the family, which they support out of their present funds, or supply by their industry; but the cloathing of the family is always at the charge of the husband. On the death of either, the respective relations seize upon all the effects, not leaving the survivor or children the smallest part, notwithstanding they are obliged to pay a certain share of the funeral expences.

BESIDES their lawful wives, the negroes often keep concubines, who are frequently preferred b and more tenderly treated than those women to whom they are yoked for life; but their children are reckoned illegitimate, and, if begotten upon a slave, are retained as such by the heir to the father's fortune. The usual method then for fathers who are fond of their bastard children is, to manumit them with the usual ceremonies; upon which they are incontestably free after his death, and enjoy every right of free-born persons.

The laws concerning inheritance.

ALTHOUGH the children by their wives be legitimate, yet do they never inherit their fortune in any kingdom on the Gold Coast, except at Acra. The eldest son, supposing the father to be a king or chieftain, succeeds him in his employment; but, besides his father's shield and sabre, he has no pretensions to any other part of his fortune. Here it is no advantage to be descended from rich parents, unless, what seldom happens, paternal love obliges them to make a settlement on the children before their death, which must be done with the utmost secrecy, otherwise the relations will compel the children to refund the last farthing. Nothing can be more perplexed than the right of inheritance. Bosman says, that from all he could learn or observe, the brothers and sisters are the lawful heirs, in the manner following. They do not jointly inherit, but the eldest son of his mother is heir to his mother's brother, or her son; as the eldest daughter is heiress of her mother's sister, or her daughter. Neither the father, his brothers, sisters, or other relations, have any claim upon the chattels or effects of the defunct; but for what reason, neither the law nor tradition explain. Bosman is of opinion, that the immorality and loose principles of the women first introduced a law seemingly so unnatural: at present it is customary in Eastern countries to educate the children of a sister as one's own, and appoint d them to succeed either to a throne or an estate; for they are assured that a sister's son must be of their own blood, but cannot be so of those called their own children; the truth of which must entirely depend upon a woman's veracity. In defect of these heirs, the brothers or sisters take place; but if the deceased have no near kin, then the relations of the mother succeed. Bosman says, that no European could ever yet attain a clear knowledge of the laws of inheritance, yet are they sufficiently distinct and well known to negroes. It is true, violent disputes and contentions frequently arise on these occasions, but they are never owing to their ignorance who ought, but who shall succeed, when the relations of the deceased are too powerful in men or arms, and thence are encouraged to disturb the course of law.

Masters responsible for the conduct of their slaves.

WE have said, that a negro values his riches by the number of his slaves, though they frequently bring on his ruin; because every master is obliged to repair the injury done by his slave, whether it be theft, robbery, adultery, or murder. Negroes are likewise responsible for their sons, nephews, and other relations; though in this case all the relations assist towards the fine, by a mutual contribution, each giving towards it according to his circumstances. Should they refuse to complete the fine, the delinquent must suffer corporal punishment, and often death, should his crime be of a heinous nature.

Laws concerning adultery in the inland countries.

IN the interior countries the laws in criminal cases are generally more severe, as they are not softened or restrained by the influence of the milder manners of the Europeans. If a man debauches the wife of another man here, is not only ruined himself, but draws destruction f upon all those who are connected with him by blood. If the delinquent be a slave, the punishment is death, and that in the most cruel manner that can be devised; besides, a certain fine is imposed on his master. Here they despise the sordid villainy of selling a woman's virtue to sale, and profiting by her prostitution. If she be caught in adultery, her life is the price of her fault, unless it be purchased by her relations at a great expence; but the woman who indulges her passion for a slave infallibly dies, without possibility of redemption. The slave perishes with her, and her relations are obliged besides to pay a considerable sum of money to the injured husband. Every considerable negro is in this case his own judge; and, if he should be too weak alone to avenge himself, he calls in the g assistance

- a assistance of his friends, who readily offer their aid, being sure to be no losers amidst the plunder that ensues. The inland negroes are more wealthy than the inhabitants of the coast, and therefore persons convicted of adultery pay roundly for their incontinence, the fine sometimes amounting to 5000*l.* sterling. Bosman says, that he has lived in most parts of the coast, but cannot recollect one person whose fortune was equal to so heavy a burthen; yet is it by no means uncommon in the interior countries. Even the maritime kings, except those of Aquambao and Acron, would be hard pressed to raise such a sum by the sale of all they were worth. But the severity of the punishment by no means banishes the crime from society: a woman with strong passions is blind to all consequences; nor is it indeed to be wondered at in countries where polygamy is permitted, and where twenty
- b women are confined to one man, each in her turn to taste the frigid, cold, and languid joys of an enervated husband. Their wits are therefore continually employed on the means of procuring a lover; and because the men, terrified at the punishment, are less forward than the nature of the sex might admit, the women omit no stratagem to allure them. So unbridled are their passions, that if they meet a young fellow alone, they run into the most indecent excesses, and swear they will accuse him to their husbands of an attempt to violate their chastity, unless he gratifies their lust. The woman has no redress, should the husband prove unfaithful; her only remedy is to wean him from his vice by the gentlest, softest, and most engaging arts; for none besides the muliere grande dare presume to chide him. She indeed will check him severely, and even threaten to leave him, if he
- c persists in his irregularity; but this is all the punishment she is able to inflict. Hence it is that every woman is studious of pleasure, and of preserving to herself those marks of favour by her obliging conduct, which she cannot command by her authority *.
- BOSMAN relates, that all over Guiney several of each sex live unmarried, at least for some time, though commonly the number of single women exceeds that of single men; and yet few negroes die unmarried, unless it be at a very early period of life. Barbot confines this celibacy to the interior countries; and affirms, that on the sea-coast all the women marry young; and indeed the disproportion of men to women must be very extraordinary, if, where polygamy is tolerated, and the men restrained to no certain number of wives, the women should be allowed to live single for any time.
- d Nay, it is certain, that many families ally themselves by marriage as soon as their children are born, without any other ceremony than the consent of parents on both sides. The women would indeed frequently chuse to live a single life, because they are then free, and confined to the embraces of no particular man; but the demand for wives being so great, their parents seldom indulge them in their inclinations, and they are hardly ever refused when asked. Such however as have made free with the passion before marriage, are never the less respected for it by their husbands and the world; on the contrary, they are esteemed the better qualified to enter into matrimony, and are accordingly frequently preferred to absolute vestals†.
- IN the countries of Eguira, Axim, Ancobar, Anta, and Adom, are certain women who
- e never marry, but are dedicated by profession to the public use, being initiated in their vocation in the following manner. When the manceroes perceive that a public courtesan is wanting, they petition the caboceroes that they will graciously please to buy one for the common benefit. Upon this the caboceroes either give a beautiful female slave for the purpose mentioned in the petition, or they permit the manceroes to buy one. She is immediately brought to the market-place, accompanied with a woman practised in the art, who instructs the novice in all the mysteries of the profession. As soon as she has gone through her noviciate, she performs a public probationary trial with a boy; by which is insinuated, that from the nature of her profession she must receive all persons indiscriminately who offer themselves to her, not even excepting little boys. A house
- f is built for her, in which she is obliged to confine herself for eight or ten days, denying no man access to her favours; and this term being expired, she obtains the reputable title of abelore, or abelecra, signifying "a common prostitute." She now has a more fashionable dwelling-house appointed her by one of her masters, in a particular part of the town, lives by her profession, and pays a certain proportion out of the profits to those who put her in a way of bread. The price is stated at a penny for each favour she grants; and the wretch is soon reduced to infamy, poverty, disease, and the lowest ebb of misery. While her beauty and health remain she is the idol of the place, and no misfortune is equal to the loss of the abelore: but no sooner is she attacked with disease, the infallible consequence of her calling, than she is despised, abandoned, and suffered to perish, the most loathsome and wretched of all human creatures. Bosman gives it as a proof of the high esteem in which they are held during the reign of beauty, that if the European factors have any dispute with the negro a Mercadores, no method so effectually terminates it, as seizing on the person of the abelore, and confining her till satisfaction is made. The manceroes, or young men, are no sooner acquainted with the fatal tidings, than they hurry with a petition to the caboceroes, or elders, requesting, that they may have her set at liberty at any price, which they will pay by a general contribution. Of this Bosman says he has had frequent experience.

 Once in particular, upon some commercial dispute, he arrested three caboceroes, and as many of those courtezans; for the liberty of the former no interest was made, unless by a few of their relations; but the whole village were upon their knees to him, inter-ceding for the latter, and offering to purchase her freedom by paying the sum in dispute. Bosman enlarges to an indecent length upon this subject: what we have said b we hope is sufficient to gratify the chaste reader, and we have no pleasure in relating manners which disgrace the most barbarous and savage parts of humanity z.

Politeness of the negroes in their salutations

HOWEVER indelicate and unpolished the negroes may be in some particular customs, yet are they by no means wanting in a certain exterior politeness in all their mutual inter-courses. Artus informs us, that when they first meet in a morning, they clasp each other in their arms, and pray, that the day may be prosperous. They begin their compliments by seizing the two first fingers of the right hand and cracking them, after which they pull all the other joints, kiss the forehead, and repeat the word auzi, their mode of salutation. Upon an accidental meeting, after they had before seen each other, the form of compliment among the coast negroes is, pulling off the hat or cap; but the c interior negroes do not esteem uncovering the head as any mark of respect. At Elmina the usual compliment after cracking the fingers is, to repeat the word bere, bere, "peace, peace;" and the first question is, "How did you sleep?" Whence, say Bosman and Barbot, we may infer, that the negroes conceive sound sleep to be the most essential preservative of good health. This is the ceremony of the first visit for the day; but if they have seen each other before, the master of the house expresses his welcome by telling him, "you went out, and are returned;" to which the visitor replies, "I am come again:" words which probably convey some compliment that we cannot readily discover. But their chief politeness is called forth when they are honoured with the visit of a stranger, the native of some other country a. The first d compliments being passed, the wife, or female slaves, bring water, grease or ointment, to wash and anoint him: which office they perform with their own hands.

Of royal visits.

THE visits of kings and persons of superior rank are attended with several peculiar and extraordinary ceremonies. When one king proposes visiting another, before he approaches his palace, he dispatches a person of the first fashion in his train, to give notice of his intention to kiss his majesty's hands, those of all the nobility of the court, and to present his master's compliments. He is presently returned to his own king, attended by some person of distinction about court, to assure his majesty of a sincere and hearty welcome. While he is on his way the general ranges the soldiers in order of battle before the palace, or in the market-place, to do honour to the e royal visitor, and also to shew the power and grandeur of his own master. The visiting king, marches at the head of his armed retinue, with all the solemnity and importance imaginable, and enters the city with his men drawn up to the best advantage, and in such a manner as to lengthen the ceremony and seem to increase their number, while the other is no less politic and artful on his side. When they pass each other, military compliments are made, which consist in skipping, leaping, and howling, in a manner intolerable to European ears, but highly pleasing to theirs. Having at last reached the palace, where the other king is seated at the gate expecting, he does not advance directly towards him, but, turning either to the right or left, all his attendants, throwing down their arms, present their hands, by way of salutation, to the court and guard of the king visited. After this the two f monarchs approach each other, with a solemnity of pace that conveys more of the ridiculous than of the dignity of crowned heads. They are each armed with shields, and set off with their finest ornaments and attire. If the visitant should happen to be of higher rank and power, or that extraordinary honours are intended him, his three first fingers are pulled, then he is embraced and welcomed three several times; but should he be of inferior quality, then only his middle finger is cracked and one salute given. Those mutual compliments paid, they each retire to their several seats placed for them, and the lords of each retinue go through the same ceremonies. For the space of an hour nothing can present a more busy scene; ambassadors continually passing to and fro with mutual congratulations:
 at the end of which the visitant is desired to walk into the palace, where he is presented g a with a collation of whatever the country affords. When they have feasted heartily, they take leave with a repetition of the same ceremonies, and the visit is ended<sup>b</sup>.

Few families upon the coast keep any considerable number of domestic slaves, nor do they make any great parade of them at their festivals or visits. The exclusive right of selling slaves is vested in the rich, not so much by law, as from the necessities of the meaner rank, which render them unequal to their purchase and maintenance. Those who are employed in this capacity in almost all the maritime parts, consist of such as have bartered their freedom to the rich for sustenance, and are marked by them with certain signs that confirm them their property. If after this any attempt should be made to run away, they lose the left ear for the first trespass, the right ear for the next, and the third fault is punished either by death, or selling them as slaves to the Europeans. Hence it appears that the master does not originally enjoy the same authority over them as over born slaves; it is their vices and a repetition of their faults that increase his power. The children indeed are born to that servitude their father entailed upon them by his engagements; but still there is a degree of tenderness shewn, unknown in the inland countries, and as a kind of compensation for misfortunes, the result of their birth, not their crimes. They are employed chiefly in fishing, agriculture, and those arts necessary to the support of their masters and themselves. As to their kings, they have slaves of different degrees, among which they particularly distinguish those who have incurred servitude through inability of paying certain impositions or fines imposed either by the king or courts of judicature. These wear neither cap, hat, or bonnet, their distinction being to have the head always bare. Most of the natives, according to Villault, disavow the appellation of negro, which they allege is proper only to born slaves. This is the assertion of Bosman, who makes no distinction between negroes and Moors; though Villault rather thinks the terms negro and Æthiopian to be equivalent and synonymous<sup>c</sup>.

Among the negroes there are a variety of mechanical arts, in which they have made a proficiency; such as wooden and earthen vessels and plates, chair-mattings, copper ornament-boxes, bracelets, necklaces, rings and ear-rings of gold, silver, or ivory. All sorts of weapons and instruments of war; in the making of which, and all kinds of smith's work, consists their chief excellency. Their tools are so rude and simple that one is amazed to find they can finish with any degree of exactness steel-ware, and materials of gold, brass, and copper. They consist only of a stone for an anvil, a pair of tongs, a pair of bellows, a file, a saw, and a hammer. They also manufacture gold and silver hat-bands, some of which they sell to the Europeans, of so fine a thread and exquisite workmanship, that Bosman greatly doubts whether they can be rivalled in this by the most polished nations<sup>d</sup>.

In building canoes the negroes are also exceedingly ingenious. They have them of various sizes, from thirty to fourteen feet in length, and three or four feet in breadth. By the Europeans they are used in loading and unloading the shipping, and by the natives in trading from port to port, and fishing on the coasts. In proportion to their dimensions they are rowed by three, five, seven, nine, eleven, thirteen, or fifteen rowers, an odd man being necessary to steer, and the rest seated in pairs upon banks or beams laid across. The canoes of the smaller size are pushed forward by a sort of paddle, instead of oars, resembling a spade in shape and length. With this they strike the water by an underhand stroke, as our author calls it, and keep the canoe in a surprizingly rapid course. Their large canoes are seldom used in fishing, except in very stormy boisterous weather; and when they launch out at a distance from the shore, it is the small ones that are commonly used on this occasion, that may be conveniently navigated by one, two, or three men (A). Their fishing materials consist of great and small hooks, harping irons, which they use when they have hooked a large fish, together with casting, sweeping, and fixed nets; the latter remaining all night in the water, are drawn in the morning<sup>e</sup>.

(A) The places most celebrated for canoes, are, as we have said, Axim, Acron, Bourtry, Tokarary, Commen-d, Cormantin, and Wineba, all of which drive a considerable trade with the Europeans, and the neighbouring states. We may form a judgment of the prodigious growth of the trees of this country, from those large canoes, which are formed out of one solid trunk, not of the coco tree, as some writers imagine, but of a tree called capot, which by mistake might be taken for the coco. It is difficult to conceive the toil and trouble the negroes must undergo, to reduce to form those unwieldly logs of wood. When the tree is cut to the length of the intended canoe, they shape it with knives, with prodigious labour, then grate and rasp it on the out-side, to make it smooth and uniform. After this they dig it, making both edges incline inwards, and the middle part the widest. They pay the bottom on the outside with grease, to make the canoe slip easily through the water, and terminate both ends in a sharp point (2).

culture.

WITH regard to the husbandry of the negroes, they sow in the rainy season, the soil being a incredibly hard at other times. At seed time they chuse a spot of ground either in the fields or woods, which they think the most convenient; for here is no landed property; the earth being the gift of nature, it is left in common to all those who have industry to cultivate it. The king, indeed, assumes to himself the right of permitting particular spots to be ploughed, and sometimes extends this jurisdiction all over his dominions; but the request is no more than a matter of form, as it is never denied; and if it should,
the will of the monarch is but little regarded; and in this alone does his sovereignty fall short of absolute despotism. Having turned up the earth with a spade, which they call koldon, they suffer it to remain in this condition for eight or ten days, until all their neighbours are as far advanced in their labours as themselves; after which they assemble b on the first day of the fetiche, or their sabbath, to deliberate on the necessary regulations in sowing the seed. First the king's lands are finished, after which every man returns to his neighbour's ground. The only reward from his majesty consists in a present of goats-flesh and palm-wine, proportioned to the number of labourers; and they conclude their work by dances in honour of the fetiche, and songs, praying that he will bless them with a fruitful harvest. It is incredible with what expedition their labour is recompensed, and the grain sprung out into leaf. Des Marchais affirms, that in three days after it is sown, the whole field is covered with a beautiful verdure, and the crop ready for sharing in less than three months. He adds, that the negroes chuse an elevated ground for sowing their maize in, that grain requiring a dry soil, not subject to inundations; on the contrary, rice c and millet demand low marshy lands, and especially the former, which flourishes only when it is covered with water. Their custom is, when they see the grain beginning to form itself, then to build little huts in the middle of every field, where they lodge their children to keep off the birds, and serve for scare-crows. The natives of the coast find it so easy a matter to dispose of all their grain, that they have established corn markets in every village, where the current coin is gold dust, cowries and bujees f. The price of grain is rated by certain officers of police, appointed by the king; a wise institution, that prevents fraud and extortion by forestalling the markets. To these all the men and women resort early in the morning, some to buy, others to sell, and many to exchange one sort of grain or fruits for another. The women are so indefatigably industrious, that d they frequently travel six miles to market, laden with such burthens as would crush an European female, a child on their backs, and a large hamper of grain or fruit on their heads; nay, there have been instances of negro womens having carried burthens for an hundred miles out of the interior countries, and sold them at the sea-port markets for European commodities, looking-glasses, bracelets, ear-rings, glass beads, and other female trinkets; so passionately fond are they of dress and finery. The markets are exempted from all sorts of duties and imposts; but if the negroes in their way to market meet with any object which they have deified, and raised to the rank of a fetiche, they will make it a present out of their trading stock. At mid-day, the wine-merchants come with their pots of palm-wine to market; then the affairs of the day are finished, and all the negroes e and sailors find themselves equally disposed to rejoice and regale themselves; nor is there any other commodity that has a quicker sale than the palm-wine. Market being ended, whole droves of men and women are to be met on all the roads, singing and dancing with a cheerfulness really to be envied, and not the smallest vestige of the care, the toil and fatigue of the day remaining, their sole aim being now to lay aside all cares.

Of their fairs for European commodities.

BESIDES those frequent markets, they have also great fairs, which they observe twice every year, and regulate in such a manner, that they shall never fall twice upon the same day. Thither the natives are assembled from all parts to purchase European wares, which they send to the inland countries. Here it is, that their passion for dancing is seen in the most conspicuous manner; and so general is it amongst the women in particular, that often f without voice or instrument, after quitting the hardest labour, they will begin dancing.
It is a custom immemorial among them, to assemble in the evening in some appointed part of the town or village, to dance, sing, and make merry for an hour before they go to bed. They appear in their best habits, and the women in particular rival each other, with all the emulation and jealousy of dress conspicuous among European females. The usual hour for this rustic ball is at sun-set; and the music is composed of horns, trumpets, flutes, and other instruments, rather inspiriting than pleasing to the ear. The men and women dispose themselves into couples, face to face, as in our country dances, not leading through in any particular figure, but dancing promiscuously, the pairs still keeping by each other, with a number of ridiculous grimaces and contortions. They advance g and

a and retire, strike the ground with one foot, and, in passing, kiss each other's forehead, pronouncing certain words. Their movements are sometimes quick, sometimes slow, just as the music happens to strike into a shrill treble, or a deep base. In a word, the whole dance is a kind of regular confusion, that, with appearance of the greatest disorder, preserves a certain method and rule adjusted to the music. But it would not be possible to convey an exact idea of it in words <sup>b</sup>.

On their legs the women wear a number of small bells, that jingle as they move in their dance; and the men hold in their hands a kind of fan, made of horse-tail, or the extremity of an elephant's rump, with which they strike each other's shoulders as they pass. All their gambols and absurd gesticulations seem mightily to please themselves; but b they are not fond of performing them before strangers. Their dances alter according to the occasions to be celebrated. Those performed in honour of the fetiché are more grave and solemn, carrying in them an air of religious devotion. At Abramboe are dances in honour of the king, which they keep for eight consecutive days, and call this term the dancing season. Hither resort a prodigious concourse of Negroes of both sexes: both men and women spend several weeks before in making preparations to figure at this annual carnival, and every thing is conducted with great pomp.

ARTUS relates, that they have schools for dancing and music, where the young people of either sex are taught at a small expence. It frequently happens, that, heated with the nature of those diversions, and the power of palm wine, the scholars sally forth armed c into the streets, where they commit abundance of disorders and riot, till they are secured by the public magistrates; for although the Negroes are by no means quarrelsome, yet are they susceptible of great passion and violent rage when once embroiled, seldom parting without effusion of blood <sup>d</sup>.

ALL the diversions among the Negroes consist of those dances, music, and mock combats, which frequently end tragically. In the year 1667, was celebrated, at Cape Coast, <sup>Of their mock-</sup> under the direction of a prince, son-in-law to the king of Fetu, public games, in commemoration of a victory gained over the king of Akari, and lord of Abramboe. Villault was told, by the Danish chief, that the mock-battle performed here cost on both sides no less than five thousand livres. In 1682, Barbot was treated at the same place with a Negro d battle, and a handsome entertainment; which, however, happily ended without blood.
He was greatly amazed at the dexterity and address with which they conducted themselves, both in the field, and at the entertainment, where, says he, there was nothing wanting of European politeness <sup>e</sup>.

THE musical instruments of the Negroes are various, and extremely numerous, but all of them equally barbarous and unpleasing. The principal are the horns we have mentioned, which are made of ivory, and some of them weighing thirty pounds. For ornament they carve upon these the pictures of men and beasts; but in a manner so extraordinary, that they would seem carefully to avoid the breach of the second commandment; for indeed they are the likeness of nothing, in the heavens above, or on the earth below, or e in the waters under the earth. At the great end of the horn is a piece of rope, coloured with hen's or sheep's blood, and at the small end a square hole, through which they blow the instrument. The noise produced is really horrid, but varied and reduced to a sort of tone and measure; sometimes they blow so tolerably, that, as Foekenbroeg has it, one does not require a whole bale of cotton to stop his ears. The trumpet needs no description; it is much of the fashion of that used in Europe, but without the winding and spiral pipe, that gives sweetness and modulation to the sound. Of drums they have ten different sorts, all of them formed of excavated trees, covered with sheep's-skin at one end, in shape resembling a kettle-drum. Some are covered only at one end, the other being open; and those, when played on, are placed on the ground, which serves to confine the sound.
f They beat with sticks shaped like a hammer, sometimes with strait sticks, and often with only their hands. The drums are generally used as an accompaniment to the horns; and to render the concert more full, they join in with trumpets, tabors, and a sound formed by the striking a hollow piece of iron with a bit of wood, after the manner of the salt-box.
Of late years they have invented a sort of small drums, covered on both sides with sheep's-skin, and extended to the shape of an hour-glass. The sound they make is by no means disagreeable: but their best instrument is a kind of harp, with six or eight strings. This is a hollow piece of strait wood, on which the strings are stretched, having for a back another piece of wood joining it at each end, and forming a sort of triangle; upon this they play with their fingers, and not unmusically; the instrument having a soft, grave, g and melodious tone.

An excellent institution
among the Negroes.

To conclude the customs and manners of the Negroes, we shall just mention one of an excellent nature: it is an institution by which there is not a common beggar to be seen on the coast. It is true, they have a number of poor, but not a single beggar by profession. When a Negro finds he cannot subsist by his labour, he binds himself over to a master for a certain sum of money, or his friends do it for him, who is obliged to find him in all the necessaries of life. In return, he engages to defend his master with all his power, to watch his affairs, and, in seed and harvest-time, to labour as a husbandman. Thus every man becomes usefully employed, and the infirm and aged are taken care of by their friends. In other respects, the whole people are beggars; and the king himself is not ashamed to beg of an European a trifle which he might purchase for a penny; but this is rather from a freedom and openness of temper, than from necessity: Bosman, indeed, attributes it to a shameless avarice<sup>1</sup>.

S E C T. III.

Of the diseases, remedies, death, and manner of burying among the Negroes.

Of the fear of death among the Negroes.

Method of treating the sick.

WE shall speak particularly of the diseases peculiar to this country, when we come to treat of the air and climate. In general it is observed, that however unhealthy Guinea may prove to strangers and sailors, who live intemperately, the natives are subject but to two diseases. One writer tells us, that their constitutions are so strong, that whether wounded or sick, they pay very little attention to their recovery, but follow their usual employments, as if nothing had happened to them. Bosman, on the contrary, affirms, that their fear of death is so great, that the slightest accident is treated with the utmost care and fear: they know that to die but once, is for ever to be sunk in oblivion; a thought altogether insupportable to Negroes. Actuated by this principle, they leave no means untried to extend the thread of life. They first apply to medicines and natural remedies; but where the case is dangerous, believing them insufficient to preserve life and restore health, they have recourse to their superstitious religious worship, as the most effectual. What contributes to render this custom more general is, that the spiritual and bodily doctor are united in the same person, the priest always acting in both capacities. He finds it no difficult matter for him to persuade the patient, or his relations, that no hope remains, but from offerings made to please the fetiché; upon which he is desired to consult the god what presents will be the most agreeable to him. We may believe that the priest neglects not his own interest on this occasion; and as the choice depends on himself, he is sure to fix upon what he likes best, as a cock, hen, goat, sheep, hog, gold, cloth, wine, or something else the most useful and convenient. He is careful to proportion them to the ability of the patient, except where the disease is extremely dangerous, and his life valuable to the relations; in which case he raises his demands, and puts a higher price on his own services, under pretence of the great resentment of the fetiché, that must be appeased by liberal offerings<sup>2</sup>. Whatever the priest requires, the patient freely grants, without once inquiring in what manner it is applied, whether to the god, or to his servant. If he recovers, either by virtue of nature's kindly assistance, or the efficacy of the medicines administered, the sacerdotal doctor is sure not to pass unrewarded. Foekenbroeg indeed pretends, that, after their recovery, the sight of the devil and the doctor is equally welcome to them; but Bosman affirms, that in general they are by no means ungrateful to the physician; they celebrate his skill to the skies, recommend him where-ever their influence extends, and liberally reward him themselves. Indeed, where the patient dies after expensive offerings, they attribute it to the ignorance or knavery of the doctor; a way of thinking not peculiar to Negroes. It frequently happens that one physician is discharged after being well paid, and another called, who begins the cure afresh, and knows well how to make his advantage of the credulity of the patient. His first business, like the physicians in Europe, is to condemn the practice of his predecessor, and decry him as an ignorant pretender. Upon this, new offerings are made; for the new doctor, dreading the fate of him whom he succeeded, determines to make hay while the sun shines. Thus they are changed alternately, perhaps twenty times; the expence always rising with the number of the physicians, and the danger of the patient, who probably dies under the hands of the last called, leaving the faculty heirs to his effects. So bigotted and attached to offerings are the Negroes, that where a physician of more conscience than the rest forbids them, they will discharge him, or at least force the presents upon him<sup>3</sup>.

a BOSMAN relates, that the boys and slaves of an European, who has treated them kindly, will, when he is seized with the slightest indisposition, go secretly to the priests to make offerings for his health and recovery. The Europeans have frequently found, in the bed or in the chamber of the principal persons, certain things consecrated and charmed by the priest, laid there by the slaves to defend their master from death and evil spirits. As the Europeans are generally displeased with their superstition, they do it so artfully, and conceal it so well, that it is not easy to discover them before the patient is dead, and they have had no time to remove those charms. The mulattoe women are particularly addicted to this superstition. If one of them is married, or kept by an European who uses her well, she never fails to make rich offerings for his recovery, with a warmer zeal and stronger confidence in their success, than is found among the Negroes themselves; and Bosman alleges, that even the Europeans are not wholly untainted with this absurd and ridiculous credulity; for they have been known not only to make presents to priests upon their illnesses, but to wear certain charms, given them by the Negroes, as preventive medicines<sup>c</sup>.

THE chief medicaments used by the Negroes are lime-juice, malaguet or cardamoms, the roots, branches, leaves, bark, and gums of trees, and about thirty different kinds of green herbs. These constitute the whole of their dispensatory; and the latter in particular have been found, from repeated experience, wonderfully powerful in many cases. Their practice, says Bosman, may to a philosopher appear absurd and irrational; but success is the test of its rectitude. He has seen them, in cholics, administer whole calabashes of lime-juice and cardamoms with surprising success: and affirms, that with green herbs he has known them effect cures, and conquer diseases, that have foiled all the art of the most experienced European surgeons: hence he greatly laments that no botanist has applied himself to this kind of practice, which he thinks more homogeneal to their constitutions in warm climates, than chemical medicines sent from Europe, and robbed of their virtues before they arrive in Africa<sup>d</sup>.

WHEN all the arts of the priest and doctor have proved ineffectual, and the patient dies, his relations are furnished with fresh business; they now are to enquire into his death, and why he should die: for though it is probable and apparent that he died a natural death, or of wounds, yet will not this satisfy them: it must certainly, in their opinion, proceed from some other cause. Immediately the priest and relations inquire, whether ever the deceased forswore himself, or was perjured? If he has, then the difficulty is solved, and the cause of his death discovered, which was no other than a punishment of his perjury. But should he be acquitted of this, then the next inquest is, whether he had any powerful enemies, who might have laid the fetiché under a promise by large offerings? This discovery being made, some of his enemies are immediately attacked, secured, and closely examined, and if they be found guilty, severely punished, either by a fine, or some corporal penalty; the latter being most common when the relations of the deceased are rich, and the former when they are poor, and the delinquent affluent. We cannot omit the following relation given by Bosman. When he resided at Axim, he was advised, in order to promote the company's affairs, to send an envoy to the king of Dinkira. In consequence he dispatched one of his servants with handsome presents to the monarch, who graciously received them. About the same time the Brandenburghers were soliciting his majesty by their president for similar favours. During the stay of both envoys at court the king died, and his relations secured both the German and Hollander, imagining they had been the instruments of his death. They were seized, bound, and closely examined whether the presents they had delivered were not poisoned or charmed; but, after a most scrupulous enquiry, the suspected ambassadors were found innocent, released, and dismissed with presents to their several constituents<sup>e</sup>.

WHEN the patient dies, and no room is found for attributing his death either to poison or incantation, then the wives, children, and slaves are examined, whether he has been attended with due care, and the necessary offerings made. As the priest always presides at those inquests, he has a fair opportunity of punishing those who have been frugal in their donation to him. Should no deficiency appear, either in care, attendance, or offerings, then, as the last resource, they resolve the difficulty by attributing his death to his neglect of religious duties, and the performance of those rites which alone can prolong life. Such are the customs among the Negroes; in many of which we see a rational end, although the means used be ridiculous and absurd<sup>f</sup>.

BEFORE we proceed to the last obsequies, we shall beg leave to relate some few extraordinary ceremonies that precede this solemn duty. After all the above methods have been found ineffectual to solve the cause of the patient's death, the priest goes to the body, and interrogates the defunct concerning the reason of his dying, and causing so much grief to his friends and relations. He returns to them, who are assembled in another apartment, with such an answer as best suits his interest; every syllable of which is believed, and matters adjusted accordingly. Some authors affirm, that the relations directly apply themselves for a solution of doubtful cases to the devil; but Bosman and Barbot assure us, that this is a false conjecture; all being referred to the priest, who is the mediator between their gods and them, and the interpreter of all oracles delivered by the former (A).

Modes of mourning, or ceremonies previous to the funeral.

No sooner the patient breathes his last, than all his relations, male and female, set up a dreadful howling and lamentation; by which it is soon known all over the town or village that some person is dead. They place the body upon a mat, made of the bark of trees, and wrapped in some old cotton cloths; under the head they set a block of wood, and cover the face with a goat's or sheep's-skin. Over the body they strew ashes, made from burnt wood; custom forbidding them to cast their eyes on the body, before it is set out in this manner. The defunct is brought in this situation into the open air, some of the women, of whom in his life-time he was the fondest, being placed at his head; if the deceased be a female, the husband, father, brother, or uncle, performs this office, shedding abundance of tears, and drawing forth dismal groans. All the relations assemble from every part of the country to attend at this last office; a severe punishment being annexed to their neglect. The town's-people and acquaintance of the deceased join their lamentations, each bringing his present of gold, cloth, brandy, wine, or animal food, which they pretend is buried with the corpse; and the larger the present is, the more honour redounds to the donor. The oldest female belonging to the family goes round the company, with a copper basin in her hand, to collect contributions towards the expence of the funeral. Here all the money is thrown in, while presents of another kind are put into baskets prepared for the occasion. A great part of these presents goes to the fetichere or priest, to obtain by his prayers and conjurations repose for the soul of the defunct, and the protection of the fetiches in his passage to the other world. Hence we may perceive the notions the Negroes entertain concerning a future state; but this we shall speak of elsewhere. Villault adds a circumstance which we find supported by no other authority, probably because it is provincial, or confined to some particular district. They place, says he, three household gods, or fetiches, in a corner of a chamber; they dress them with glass, coral, and gold necklaces, collars, and girdles; they present them with large offerings of pease, beans, rice, maize, and palm-wine, besprinkled with the blood of a pullet. After this, the priest pronouncing certain unintelligible words, takes a mouthful of palm-wine, which he spouts into the face of the most ancient of the fetiches. He then takes a quantity of tallow, or grease, which he beats with leaves into a poultice, and dividing the mass into proportions suited to the number of people present, he gives to each a piece, one bit being kept for the use of the deceased, to assist and nourish him in his flight to eternity<sup>a</sup>. This is a ceremony of all others the most solemn, and attended with a greater number of pompous and awful rites<sup>b</sup>.

A continuation of the funeral ceremonies.

DURING all the offices performed by this assembly, there is one that is never omitted; brandy in the morning, and palm-wine in the afternoon, are always remembered. Thus the last obsequies of a rich Negro become very expensive; for besides all that precedes, the body is richly clothed, and put into the coffin with a bag of gold fetiches, the finest corals, conte de terra, and several things of value, which it is supposed will be useful to him in the next world. The number of jewels, and all other expences, are proportioned to the wealth the deceased left to his heirs. After this assembly of relations and friends have continued to drink brandy and palm-wine for two or three days, and all the other requisite ceremonies are finished, then at last the corpse is carried to the grave, preceded by a number of young fellows, who are continually discharging volleys of small-arms, till the deceased is laid in the ground. A multitude of men and women follow, without preserving any order, some dancing, some singing, or crying, or laughing; the grief of those that cry and laugh being pretty equal. After the corpse is covered, and the grave filled, every one departs where he pleases; but the greater number usually adjourn to the house of the deceased, there to prolong their mirth and feasting for several days longer.

WHEN a king, chief governor, or any distinguished personage dies, his body is generally kept a year above-ground; and to preserve it from putrefaction, it is laid over a

(A) The questions are put to the deceased in a variety of different ways. In some cases the relations take the deceased upon their shoulders, in presence of the priest; and then he is interrogated whether he did not die for such a cause? If the answer is to be in the affirmative, the relations, by some secret impulse, bend the body towards the querist; if it be negative, the body stands unmoved; and either of these pacts for definitive decisions of the question (1).

- a gentle fire, upon a wooden utensil, resembling a gridiron, to dry by slow degrees. Others inter their dead privately in their own houses, though they pretend that the body has undergone the above operation, and that in due time they will see the funeral obsequies performed with the necessary pomp. Public notice is given of the day appointed for a king's burial, not only to his own subjects, but to the neighbouring kingdoms, which occasions a concourse of all nations almost incredible. Every one is curious to see the solemnity; he appears in his richest dress, and more pomp and parade passes upon this occasion, than in whole centuries upon any other. Several slaves of the deceased monarch are sacrificed, in order to attend him to the next world, and especially his boffum and favourite woman. But the most abominable rite is, the practice of selling those, who through age and infirmity have been rendered incapable of labour, to become victims in those horrible solemnities. It is a spectacle the most deplorable, to see those puny feeble wretches pierced, hacked, and tormented in the most barbarous manner, from motives of religion and piety. Bosman relates, that it was not without horror he saw eleven persons killed in this manner. Among these was one who, after having endured the most keen and exquisite tortures, was delivered over to a child of six years of age to have his head cut off. Nothing could be more cruel and barbarous than to see this young savage hewing and mangling for an hour the body of the unhappy victim, with as little remorse as a butcher feels over his ordinary employment. These sacrifices are generally used in countries distant from the European forts, and where they have but little influence; though the natives of the coast will often remove at a distance, in order to perform unmolested this horrible ritual, to which they are so warmly attached<sup>i</sup>.
- b
- c

THE Negroes usually build a little hut, or else plant a little garden of rice or maize, upon the grave, into which they throw all the effects of the deceased, of the least value to his heirs; for Bosman denies that they fill it with household furniture, as some authors assert. At Axim they place several earthen images on the grave, which are washed the following year, and the whole funeral ceremony repeated with great expence. We have before mentioned the eager desire which the natives of Benin have to be buried in their own country; nor is this custom peculiar to them, it is the general way of thinking among all the Negroes. If they should happen to die in a distant country, where no opportunity offers of conveying the whole body home, their friends will cut off the head, leg, and arm, and cleanse, boil, and send it to their native country to be buried; and if no conveyance presents itself, they esteem it a duty to neglect their business, and go themselves on the pious errand<sup>k</sup>.

- It sometimes happens that the funeral of a Negro is attended by an orator, who sets forth the virtues of the deceased in an harangue pronounced over the grave. Barbot was told by the governor of Cape Coast, that he was present at the burial of a woman of distinction, where the priest, after enumerating the virtues of the defunct, pathetically exhorted the assembly to imitate them, to live well, to avoid giving offence, to perform religiously their contracts and engagements, with a number of other moral topics. At the end of his discourse, laying hold of the jaw-bones of sheep, several of which were strung upon a cord, he leaped into the grave, saying, "Do as the deceased did; imitate her; she requires not many sacrifices now, having performed them so liberally in her life-time, as these cheek-bones testify." This exhortation produces the desired effect; every one throw in their offerings, and the priest seizes them as his own property.
- e

In some countries they do not bestow the honours of burial on slaves, but their bodies are thrown upon the fields, a prey to beasts and birds; in some other countries they cover them with earth, but without any ceremony. Atkins describes the funeral ceremonies at Cape Coast very concisely and distinctly. When a Negro dies, says he, his relations and friends set up plaints and lamentations that rend the skies, which they continue in the house of the defunct till the day appointed for his burial. Then the body is carried to the grave in a coffin; and on their way the relations are joined by the inhabitants of the village, who likewise join them in their mournings, and discharges of musquetry. As soon as they perceive that their lamentations have no effect, and that they cannot recall to life the deceased, they change their grief into music and festivity; they throw into the grave a part of their pipes, tobacco, and wine; and this practice they continue for several mornings after the burial. Such are the funeral ceremonies observed on the Gold Coast. In different kingdoms they admit of some variation; but as it would be tedious to mention every particular, we have only recited the most general, and those that are confirmed by the joint testimony of all the best authorities. We shall now proceed with all possible brevity to their religious tenets and superstitions.

As to the religion of the Gold Coast, it is divided into a variety of sects, and branched a out into a variety of different opinions, proportioned to the number of nations, we may say families, on the coast; for there is hardly a person that has not his own peculiar mode of thinking on this subject. However, as it would be endless to recite every particular opinion, we shall speak only of those public forms in which all the Negroes agree.

The Negroes believe in the true God, the Creator of the world.

THEY almost all to a man believe in one true God, the creator of the world, and of every thing in it; his omnipotence being the only attribute of the deity of which they have a distinct idea. Artus reports, that if they are desired to explain their religion, their answer is fraught with absurdities and contradictions to the first principles of reason; and when one takes the trouble to refute their inconsistencies, their reply is, that they had their religion from the feticheres, or priests, who had it from the fetiches, and they b of the true God; and his reasons are, that they never make any offerings to him, or invoke him in their distress; which, in his opinion, is a presumptive proof that they had other gods before they acquired an idea of the true God, and that they believe their fetiches more interested in human affairs, as they apply to them in all their difficulties. He offers another reason, of which we must acknowledge we do not perceive the force; this is the variety of opinions maintained concerning the creation; some believing that the world was formed by Anansei, or a great spider; others attributing it, and particularly man's creation, to God<sup>m</sup> (B).

To several questions which Artus proposed to them concerning the deity, they replied c that he was black, but mischievous, taking pleasure in afflicting them with a thousand evils, God is partial, they imagine, to the Europeans, and treats them as his own children. In particular, he is kinder to the Dutch than to them; else why does he give them fine cloaths, silks, ivory, and brandy? Artus told them, that it was plain the deity did not neglect them, by his bestowing on them gold, palm-wine, fruits, cows, goats, fowls, and fish; but he found it impossible to convince them that these were God's gifts. The earth, say they, gives gold, if we take the trouble of digging it; it likewise furnishes corn, wine, and fruits, if we cultivate them. The beasts of the field beget each other without God's assistance; and the sea produces fish; but before we can use any of them, we are forced to toil and labour, without which we might starve; consequently we owe no obligation to God. d However, they acknowledge that rain is sent by God, without which the earth would produce nothing: he is therefore the means, not the cause, of those good things. With all their advantages, they believe themselves very hardly treated, and not upon a footing with the Europeans, who abound in such a variety of merchandize, which, in their opinion, grow up without trouble or labour, as gold does in Africa <sup>n</sup>.

ACCORDING to Des Marchais, they believe not only that God is black; but their priests assure them that they frequently see him at the foot of a fetiche tree, in the shape of a large black dog: such is the ascendant those holy villains have acquired over the understandings of this ignorant, superstitious, and credulous people.

The ideas the Negroes entertain of the Supreme Being.

THERE are a number of Negroes who believe in two supreme deities, the one white, e whom they call bossun, the other black, and by them called jangu man, or the good man. Des Marchais and Labat scruple not to affirm, that the devil has established a real empire in the minds of the Negroes, and that his power is by no means owing either to their credulity or ignorance. "The Negroes," say they, "have not only affirmed that they have been beat in the night by some supernatural being, but they have often been heard to cry out dismally in the dark, and found trembling in their huts, with marks of violence upon them, when not a human vestige or footstep could be traced; insomuch that they have kept their beds for months after." Do we owe this account to the credulity of the historians, or to the imposture or villainy of the negro priests? It is probable, indeed, f that if there be any truth in this relation, this miracle is wrought by those pious rogues, to induce the unhappy sufferer to appease the dæmon by offerings <sup>n</sup>.

(B) Man's creation they assert to have happened in the following manner. In the beginning, black as well as white men were created; nay, if there was any difference in time, the blacks had the priority. To these, two sorts of favours were presented; to the blacks gold, and to the whites, the knowledge of arts and sciences. It was from choice that the blacks had gold for their share; and to punish their avarice, it was decreed they should ever be slaves to the white men; intimating by this, the superiority of genius over fortune. They are fully persuaded that no country but Africa produces gold, and that blacks can never attain the knowledge of letters. Others again affirm, that man originally was of a different shape from what he appears now, the parts serving for the distinction of sexes being placed more in view for the convenience of propagation. If you enquire into the cause of this change, they reply, that God did it from a regard to modesty, as soon as the world became sufficiently populous, to preserve the species by the present shape (2).

(2) Bosman, epist. 19.

- a DAPPER says, that the Negroes sacrifice and make offerings immediately to the devil; but Bosman affirms that all their devotion is paid to the priest, the mediator between them and their divinities. Nothing religious is undertaken without the priest. When they are inclined to make offerings to their idols, they cry "let us make fetiche:" by which they express as much as if they said, let us see or hear what our God saith through the mouth of his servant the fetichere, or priest. If they are injured, the fetichere is employed to procure vengeance, by exorcising certain victuals and drink, which they strew in the way of the enemy, firmly believing, that he who tastes of it shall surely die soon after. If the person for whom the snare is laid is by any means apprised of it, and under the necessity of passing that road, he orders himself to be carried over the food so exorcised, knowing that the charm loses its virtue by avoiding to touch it, and is quite innocent with respect to every other person. If a Negro is robbed, he makes use of similar means for the discovery, and condign punishment of the criminal; and so obstinately bigotted are they in the efficacy of this method, that an hundred instances produced of its impotence, would not alter their sentiments. Yet if any person is taken in the act of laying the charm, he is punished with death, whatever be the nature of the injury he has received. Thus we see a custom universally prevail in a country, though it be contrary to law, by which the civil and ecclesiastical constitution run counter to each other.
- b ALL promises of importance and obligatory oaths, are confirmed by fetiches; for on these occasions they always cry, "let us, in confirmation, make fetiches." When they drink this obligatory draught, it is usually accompanied with an imprecation that the fetiche may destroy them, if they fail in the performance of their promise, or the smallest tittle of their engagements: and every person entering into any obligation must go through the ceremony of swallowing the draught; the spectators judging by the facility with which it passes down, whether he is disposed or able to execute what he has undertaken. When one nation is hired or engaged by treaty to assist another, all the chiefs drink this liquor, which, we are told, is nothing more than the pure element of water, with an imprecation, that the fetiche may abandon them, if they do not assist with their utmost force to extirpate the enemy: but oaths of this nature have been so frequently violated by nations and individuals, that they are fallen into disrepute. Besides, the Negroes have contrived a subterfuge, and method of absolving themselves from the obligation, taking the money or effects of the opposite party, and acting diametrically contrary to their engagements. This they effect by means of the priest, their great instrument of all fraud and imposture: for having entered upon this obligation before him, they doubt not but he has the power of absolution, as well as punishment, in his hands. A bribe gains him over; and thus they make a traffic of honour, honesty, and conscience. To prevent the consequences of those frauds, some Negroes are so politic, that before the party takes his obligation, the priest is first sworn, and obliged to drink the oath draught, with the same imprecations, should he ever give absolution without the unanimous consent of all parties engaged in the contract. By this means, says Bosman, oaths are religiously kept, and punctually performed; yet we are told by Barbot, that the priest is not without his salvo even in this case, though he does not favour us with the mode of his equivocation, which must needs be curious.
- c If a Negro is interrogated about the consequence of falsifying such an oath, his reply is, that the perjured person shall be swelled with liquor till he bursts; or if he should escape that, a no less sure though slower punishment will follow, by means of some chronic, languishing, and wasting disease. The first generally happens to women, who purge themselves by a false oath of an accusation of adultery: the latter to men, in cases of thievery, robbery, and breach of trust; for in all these instances it is used by way of purgation as well as obligation. In a word, the methods of making religion subservient to the worst of purposes are so various and numerous, that a recital of them would equally shock and fatigue the reader: we shall therefore content ourselves with relating the following, affirmed to be the most sacred and solemn of all oaths. Every priest hath his peculiar idol, prepared and adjusted in a manner peculiar to himself, and agreeable to his own fancy; but this form is almost general. A large wooden pipe is filled with hair, blood, feathers, oil, earth, human and brute bones, as well as all kinds of filth, dirt, and excrements. Directly opposite to this pipe the Negro to be sworn is placed, who asks the name of the idol; for each has its appellation. When he is made acquainted with this particular, he recites at large the contents of the obligation he is to take upon him, calling the fetiche by its name, and making it his request that the idol may punish him with death if he does not fulfil his vow, or if he swears falsely. Then going round to the other extremity of the pipe, he repeats the oath; after which he returns to the place where he first stood, and recites it a third time. This done, the priest takes some of the above ingredients out of the pipe, with which he besmears the juror's head, arms, belly, and legs; and holding the remainder over his head, a he gives it three whirls round, taking the utmost care that not a particle shall fall. He then cuts off a bit of the nail of a finger of each hand, and a toe of each foot, together with a lock of hair from the head, all which he puts into the pipe, and closes the ceremony. Nothing could be more ridiculous to an English reader, if he had not seen rites nearly as absurd performed in neighbouring countries: a proof that however civilized human nature may be, it cannot intirely be purged of a mixture of weakness and folly.<sup>s</sup>

consult the Fe-tiche in all cases of importance.

WHEN the Negroes propose entering upon a war, a journey, a bargain, or any business of importance, they first consult their gods, by means of their common mediator the priest, concerning the event of their undertaking. Those oracles are generally wrapt up in great obscurity, and capable, like those of Delpbos, of being interpreted according to the fancy b of the enquirer: but should they ever happen to be clear and explicit, then they never fail of being favourable. In this case the grateful votary can do no less than express his thanks by liberal presents to the priest; sheep, hogs, fowls, dogs, cats, and gold, are offered up to the idol, in trust with his minister the priest; who, like the ministers of earthly sovereigns, is sure of not failing to obey the first principle of nature, self-interest. If the priest be determined to oblige the querent in a particular manner, the questions are put to the idol in his presence, and usually in one of the two following methods. The first way is by a bundle of about twenty small bits of leather, in the middle of which are contained materials of the same nature with those they use in the pipes. Some of these ingredients indicate good, some bad fortune. This bundle the priest shuffles into a variety of forms; c and if the same ingredients occur frequently, then the querent's fate is clear, and he is perfectly assured of his future fortune. Here, however, the priest acts with his usual address; for by habit he acquires such a slight of hand, that he turns up which of the ingredients he has a mind; and if he ever gives a discouraging response, it is only with a view of extorting larger offerings to appease the incensed deity.<sup>s</sup>

THE second method of consulting their deities is by a sort of wild chestnut, which they pretend to take up and let fall again by accident. Hence the priest draws his predictions by the number falling, whether even or odd. In a word, their clergy are the most crafty, sly, and insinuating sect in the world, and their cunning is to be exceeded only by the credulity, simplicity, and ignorance of the laity. Every view of the former is directed to- d wards their own interest, and the gratification of their avarice, ambition, and lust, by the grossest impositions; and of the latter, to a blind obedience and total subversion of every distinguishing principle of humanity. Should the event falsify the prediction, the crafty priest is never at a loss for an excuse to palliate his knavery; either the sacred rites were not duly performed; some part was carelessly hurried over, or wholly omitted; or the god is enraged, and the business crossed and unsuccessful. All this is believed with an astonishing credulity; the people themselves being ingenious in finding sufficient excuses for the priest. He is never accused of falsehood; and if the nation be ruined, his reputation remains secure, untouched, and in the highest credit: but should his prediction be verified by the event, then he is a holy and divine man, his character is raised to the highest pinnacle e of fame, and his veracity so far above the reach of malice, that he may lye his whole life after.<sup>t</sup>

ous ceremonies.

PUBLIC religious exercises of a whole nation are usual upon account of droughts, floods, and barren and unhealthy seasons; on which occasions the governors and chief men repair to their idols with offerings, either for the public good, or their own particular affairs. Those ceremonies are performed in groves, which are held so sacred, that to defile them by any natural office of the body, to cut, pluck, or injure the smallest twig, is highly criminal, and punished with, at least, a malediction, and the censure of the priests, which in its effects is not less severe than a popish anathema. When the chiefs of a town or nation assemble, they consult the priests what measures are the most likely to remove the public calamities; squaring their conduct scrupulously by their counsel, and publishing their decrees f by a crier sent over the place. Whoever presumes to act contrary to this order is punished without mercy; it being even capital on some occasions to disobey the ecclesiastical power. When their fisheries are on the decline, about August and September, the priests injoin offerings to be made to the sea; this being the time when great shoals of fish arrive on the coast: and yet, so absurdly blind is superstition, that the whole is attributed to the pious endeavours of the priest.<sup>u</sup>

Every Negro
has his peculiar fetiche.

EVERY individual in Guiney hath his peculiar fetiche, which they worship in their manner on that day of the week they happened to be born. This day they call their bossom, or, in Portuguese, their sancte day, on which they drink no palm-wine till sun-set. On this day they are dressed in white; and, as an emblem of their purity, besmear their bodies and g

- a cloaths with a kind of white loam or clay. Those of the better fashion, and especially the chiefs of the people, have besides this birth-day another weekly festival, dedicated to their fetiches, on which they kill a cock or a sheep; a sacrifice merely nominal with respect to the gods, for it is consumed by the priests. Bosman says indeed that it is made a public feast, of which the priest enjoys no more than he can eat at that meal. The whole sheep is put down to the fire, and every man eats as he thinks proper, little regard being had to cleanliness or ceremony. The guts in particular, cleansed only by squeezing out the excrements with their fingers, are esteemed a delicious regale, when boiled in water with a little salt and Guiney pepper. This they call ejutjeba, and look upon as the highest luxury in eating, and the most exquisite dainty that can be offered to the palate. The following observation of Bosman's, who was a rigid Calvinist, we shall beg leave to transcribe :
- b " If it were possible to convert the Negroes to the Christian religion, the Roman-catholics would probably succeed much better than we should; because they agree in several particulars, especially in their ridiculous ceremonies. For do the Romanists abstain one or two days weekly from flesh? the Negroes have their days when they refrain from wine; which, considering how great lovers they are of it, is somewhat severe. The Romanists have three allotted times for eating peculiar sorts of food, or perhaps wholly abstaining from it, in which the Negroes outdo them; for each person here is forbidden the eating of one sort of flesh or other. One eats no mutton; another no goat's flesh, pork, wild fowl, cocks with white feathers, &c. This restraint is not laid on them for a limited term, but for their whole lives: and if the Romanists brag of the antiquity of their ecclesiastical commands, so if you ask the Negroes why they do this or that, their answer is, because their forefathers did the same, and it had been handed down from one age to another by tradition. The son never eats what has been prohibited to the father; as the daughter copies after the mother: and this rule is so inviolably observed, that it would be impossible to persuade them to the breach of it *."
- THE word fetiche in a strict sense signifies whatever represents their divinities; but the precise idea of the Negroes concerning their lesser gods, their dii minores, is not well adjusted by authors, or even among the most sensible of themselves. Atkins, speaking of the religion of the country, gives the following account of one Tour, a shrewd Negro, with whom he had made an acquaintance. " Tour," says he, " was always able to satisfy my curiosity about the fetiche: he believed it able to protect from dangers, or recover from sickness; so that in travail, or in any disease, they are never without the fetiche about them, whom they constantly apply to for health and safety. Tour wore his about the leg; and as constantly as he had a dram, a glass of wine, or victuals, he dipped his finger and gave the fetiche a taste. It is the general belief that it both speaks and sees: therefore when they are about to perform any action that ought not to be done, they wrap the fetiche in a rag, to prevent tales. Every man has two, three, or more fetiches, as fancy directs; one worn about him, or in his canoe, the rest at home; bequeathing them, as they prove serviceable, from father to son." They not only believe those material substances endued with intelligence, and the power of doing them good or evil, but also that the priest or fetichere, being of their council, is privy to all that those divinities know, and thence acquainted with the most secret thoughts and hidden actions of men. The household or family fetiche narrowly inspects the conduct of every individual of the house, and rewards or punishes according to their deserts. Their rewards consist in the multiplication of their wives and slaves, and their punishments in the want of these; though the most terrible of all punishments is death. It is this indeed that inflames their zeal in religious rites, and occasions their rigid abstinence from every sort of food prohibited by superstition; believing they should die in the act. Murder, adultery, stealth, and robbery, are comparatively but venial slips; nay, they are in a manner no sins at all, since they can be expiated by money; but the eating a species of food forbidden in the family, is a crime of so black a complexion, as admits of no atonement or compensation <sup>2</sup>.
- f ATKINS relates, that at Cape Coast there is a public guardian fetiche, the highest in power and dignity. This exalted fetiche is a peninsular rock, that projects into the sea from the bottom of the cliff on which the castle is built, making a sort of cover for landing, but unsafe. Some years before the author wrote, a fleet of fishing canoes had been cast away by a strong southerly wind near this point, and the Negroes religiously attributed the calamity to some omission of the fleet to this divinity, called Tabra. The accident happening upon Tuesday, that day has ever since been kept holy, and set apart for idleness, singing, dancing, and riot. To this rock the priest sacrifices yearly a goat and some rum, eating and drinking a part of the sacrifice, and throwing the rest into the sea, with ridiculous gestures and strange invocations, assuring the spectators that he receives verbal answers from Tabra, what times and seasons will be propitious; and for this intelligence every fisherman presents him with an acknowledgment suited to his ability.<sup>a</sup>

fetiches.

BESIDES this superior fetiche, every separate canton or district has its peculiar fetiche, inferior to the Tabra of Cape Coast, but of a higher quality than the Lares, or domestic gods. A mountain, a tree, a large rock, fish, or peculiar fowl, is raised to this high distinction, and the honour of being the national divinity. A Negro, who accidentally kills a fetiche, fowl or fish, is thought sufficiently punished by the horrid act; but an European who should do the same, would be supposed to have done it with design, and thence would be in great danger of his life. Petro de Diagro relates in his Natural History, that he had seen at Fredericksburgh the fetiche bird of that country, a little bird, the size of a wren, with the bill of a linnet, the ground of the plumage of a dark brown, but the external feathers speckled with black and white (C). An European had the misfortune to kill one of these birds, and it was with the utmost difficulty the governor could save his life, or prevent an insurrection of the natives. Should this sacred bird chance to fly round or over any particular house, the omen is deemed auspicious, and every person belonging to the family presses to have a sight of him, and to feed him. Those Negroes who meet with it on a journey believe themselves destined to good fortune; nor can even experience cure them of their superstition. They look upon this favour as a singular mark of the fetiche's protection; and, in expectation of meeting with it, constantly carry about them a little pot of water, a few grains of corn, and blades of grass for its nourishment. Every field and wood presents numberless instances of this respect for their national fetiche; but this is peculiar to the country round Fredericksburgh.<sup>b</sup>

AMONG trees the palm has the pre-eminence, this being always deified, and in particular the species of it called assooanam; because it is the most beautiful and numerous. One shall meet in every place a variety of those trees, which bear the marks of their divinity; for every Negro that passes cuts off a small portion of the bark, which he forms into a bracelet or girdle, as an infallible preservative. They are persuaded, that cutting down an assooanam-tree would be attended with a dearth of fruit for that season, and immediate bad consequences to themselves; and in 1589, ten Dutchmen were massacred for an action of this nature (D). Nothing can be more profound than the adoration which they pay to these fetiches, and the confidence they have in their power: but these modes of worship vary in different cantons, and the fetiche of one province is wholly despised in another (E).<sup>d</sup>

The notions the Negroes have of a future state.

THE ideas the Negroes entertain of a future state are various. Some hold, that immediately upon the death of any one, he is removed into another world, where he assumes the very same character in which he lived in this, and supports himself by the offerings and sacrifices his friends make after his departure. Bosman affirms, that the greater number of Negroes have no idea of future rewards and punishments annexed to the good or evil actions of this life. A few, however, he allows have some gross notions of future judgments, which consist in being waisted away to a famous river, situated in a distant inland country, called Bosmanque. Here their god interrogates them concerning the life they have led, whether they have religiously kept the holy days dedicated to the fetiche, abstained from all meats, and inviolably kept their oaths? If they answer truly in the affirmative, they are conveyed over the river to a land abounding in every felicity, luxury, and human delight. If, on the contrary, the departed hath sinned against any of the above capital pillars of their religion, then the god plunges him into the river, where he is buried in eternal oblivion. Others again believe in a kind of metempsychosis; that they shall be transported to the land of white men, altered to that complexion, and endowed with a soul similar to theirs: but this is the doctrine only of those who think highly of the intellectual faculties of the white men.<sup>e</sup>

(C) Barbot calls this bird the bittern (3), others call it the bull bird, from some resemblance its note bears to the bellowing of a bull (4).

(D) This is a fact different from what we have related to have happened at Commendo; for there the Dutch cut down the trees in contempt, here out of ignorance.

(E) When Villault was at Fredericksburgh, he saw at the door of a Negro cottage a man and woman busied in killing a fowl, and sprinkling the blood upon certain leaves which they had ranged along the ground, crying out, Me cusa, me cusa! "May it prove pro-

"pitious!" Villault did not interrupt them during the ceremony; but as soon as it was finished, he enquired into the occasion of the sacrifice, and was told it was offered to appease their fetiche, who had been beaten. His curiosity leading him to examine the leaves, which seemed to be of the aquatic kind, he was going to touch them, when starting with surprise, the Negro told him, that touching any part of the fowl or leaves would be attended with immediate death; upon which Villault ordered his servant to take up both, to boil them and eat them; notwithstanding which he lived, but did not convince the Negroes (5).

(3) Barbot, p. 309.

(4) Prevost, tom. v. l. ix. c. 7.

(5) Villault, p. 109.

a THE inland Negroes tell the maritime Negroes, that, in a distant interior country, there lives a great fetichere, in a splendid house, a worker of extraordinary miracles, having even the elements at his command, changing the winds and weather as he pleases, living in a house uncovered, yet always sheltered from the rain and night-dews, perfectly acquainted not only with all past occurrences, but foretelling future events with as much certainty as if they were before his eyes, and lastly, curing all manner of diseases. All persons in his vicinity are examined before him after death. Should their conduct appear unsatisfactory, he kills them a second time, with a large club that always lies before his door; but if their lives and conversations have been devout, pious and exemplary, then he furnishes them with a passport to a state of true and perfect felicity. Hence proceeds b the deep veneration in which they hold this priest, esteeming him little inferior to a god. So sily indeed had this arch-impostor insinuated a notion of his power into the minds of those simple wretches, that he lives in the pomp and affluence of royalty, and finds constant resources in the ample faith and blind ignorance of his simple votaries<sup>d</sup>. Thus in Guiney a priest may be a conjurer from his own natural powers, and that portion of extraordinary talent given him by the deity; in Europe miracles are wrought only by a contrivance with the devil; at least this is the opinion of the lower class of people.

HOWEVER, the Negroes are not ignorant of the devil, whom they believe a malicious, Their idea of the devil. ill-natured, deceitful being, resembling a white man. Bosman denies that they pray or sacrifice to him, as most other authors have affirmed. Dapper in particular relates, that c a Negro never drinks nor eats, but a portion of each is spit on the ground, for the use of this invisible being: and Bosman allows the practice; but asserts that the purpose of it is an offering to the fetiche, or some deceased relation. Instead of having any kind of worship paid him, the devil is exorcised out of all their towns at stated festivals, and with abundance of ceremony. Barbot, Bosman, and Villault had seen this ridiculous farce acted at Axim, where it is performed with the greatest ceremony. The procession is preceded by a feast of eight days, accompanied with singing, dancing, mirth, and all manner of festivity; pasquinades, lampoons, and satires, are now permitted; and the actions of their superiors laid open with all freedom and exemption from punishment. They sing their failings, frauds, and villainies with the same liberty, as upon other occasions they do their virtues; but with a higher relish, as if viewing the weaker side of human nature were the more pleasing office: nor have the great any other method of stopping the torrent of abuse, than by plying them heartily with liquor, which has the extraordinary quality of turning instantaneously the blackest vices into the purest virtues, satire into panegyric; the one as disgusting, as the other was odious. On the eighth day, in the morning, the devil is hunted out of the town or village, all running after each other, and the whole body of inhabitants employed in throwing stakes, stones, dirt, and excrements at the fiend. After this they return, and conclude the day with the same festivity with which they began. Hence it appears, that the Negroes believe there are more than one devil, or at least admit of the ubiquity and divisibility of the evil spirit; for he is driven out of some hundreds of places on the same hour and day; and, as a preventative to insure them against his return, d the women scour all the houses, wooden plates, vessels, and other furniture, to purge them of all uncleanness and the devil<sup>e</sup>.

THE Negroes of Ante likewise carry this ceremony to a great length; though they, A gigantic idol worshipped by the Negroes. miserable wretches! are harrassed with a worse fiend, whom they have raised to the dignity of a god. This god is a prodigious giant, having one side of his body sound, the other putrid and rotten, which if any person chance to touch, he immediately falls down dead: an opinion the natives as firmly believe as they do their own existence. To appease him they are continually making him offerings; to which purpose thousands of vessels, filled with the best food the country affords, are daily presented to him, and the fetid god wallows in profusion and luxury, while half his votaries starve, to enable them f to perform their religious rites, and shew their gratitude to the god for doing nothing.

THEY are well assured of the reality of ghosts, spirits, and apparitions; that they walk up Their opinion of ghosts and spirits. and down the earth, and terrify, disturb, and beat people, especially the unbelievers. Thus, when a neighbour dies, the whole village is under the utmost dread and terrible apprehension, proceeding from an opinion that the deceased appears for several nights successively about his late dwelling. Here the priest is likewise of importance; for he is supposed to have the power of appeasing the spirit, by means of certain rites and exorcisms, which, like all the others, conclude in his own emolument. Artus gives the following account of a ceremony peculiar to this occasion, although Barbot speaks of it as a rite in honour of the fetiche. On the day after the decease of any person of distinction, a square table, supported g by pillars seven feet high, is erected near the house of the defunct. Upon this is placed the fetiche of the family, surrounded with the best provisions the heirs can afford, and attended by the priest. As soon as the company have satisfied themselves as to the quality of provisions laid down, they retire for the day, and returning at night, find all the victuals removed, which they attribute to the spirit, who having provided himself with his viaticum, has now taken his flight to the other world. Other writers say, that most of the Negroes believe the fetiche has swept clean the table, doing honour to the feast by an extraordinary appetite which he procures for the occasion<sup>f</sup>. Atkins says, that the Negroes use circumcision, prayers, and ablutions, and seem to have an indistinct idea of futurity. They believe, that good men shall, after death, enjoy happiness, and bad men misery; that the former shall live with fine women upon luxurious diet; and the latter stroll vagrants round the earth, always in motion, always unhappy, never tasting repose or felicity.

Of the distinctions of time among the Negroes.

WE shall conclude this article with some observations from Bosman concerning their equation of time, as they properly belong to the subject of religion. The Negroes in general, though this cannot be applied to particular countries, have no solemn festivals, besides one at the conclusion of their harvest, which they call a fair, and that we have just related of exorcising the devil; nor have they any distinction or division of time, except what they have been taught by Europeans. Months and weeks were entirely unknown to them, their method of reckoning being by the shining of the moon, no matter whether in the change, or in the quarters. Hence they determined their seasons for sowing the different kinds of grain. However, it is probable that the division of time into weeks and days cannot be of very late date, as each have their peculiar names, which are perfectly familiar even to children. Their sabbath falls upon the Tuesday, except at Ante, where it happens on Friday, and differs from other days in nothing but that they abstain from fish; all other kinds of food and employment being permitted without any restraint<sup>g</sup>.

THE Negroes of the interior countries divide time into fortunate and unfortunate days. In some countries the great unfortunate days are nineteen; and the lesser, which differ from the other, seven. Between these intervene seven unfortunate days, which is a sort of vacation from all occupations and bodily labour. At Aquamboe these periods are observed with more superstition than in any other kingdom; for, besides ceasing from labour, they will even refuse to accept of presents made to them on these days, and look upon it as an affront upon them to make any proposition, however advantageous to their interest. They are entirely ignorant of the origin of these customs; but it is probable that, like other superstitions, they arose from observing that some leading persons had been fortunate or unfortunate on such days, whence it came to be established into a rule, for the conduct of his future life, which others, induced by his example, copied. The inhabitants of different countries vary greatly in this particular. In some the lucky days are observed, while the unlucky ones are no less religiously kept in the next neighbouring country; but the maritime negroes disregard all distinctions, and esteem one day the same with another<sup>h</sup>.

THIS we think sufficient on the article of religion, which is so fraught with absurdity, that to relate every particular would swell to an enormous volume.

S E C T. IV.

Of the government, nobility, inferior classes of men, laws of succession, royal feasts, &c. &c. among the Negroes.

AS religion is more interwoven with the peculiar manners of the people than the civil laws of the country, we have given it the first place in our account. In fact, it is the ground of all their manners, there being scarce a particular custom that is not in some measure occasioned, tinged, or connected with some religious ceremony or ridiculous superstition.

Of the government of the Negroes.

As to the government of the Negroes, it is in general loose, licentious, and irregular, which proceeds from the little and confined authority of the caboceroes, and the frequent wars and revolutions among them. Their forms of government are divided into five different kinds, each having something distinct from the rest, and peculiar to itself (A). The first is that of pure monarchy, where the king is despotic; the second, a kind of aristocracy, the chief power being lodged in the hands of the caboceroes, or chiefs; but their office consists in governing the little towns and villages where they reside, suppressing tumults

(A) When we gave the history of Axim, we had occasion to speak of three kinds of government peculiar to that country, whence may be deduced a great part of the constitutional history of the whole coast.

- a and riots, preserving peace and good order, and executing the part rather of magistrates of police than of the supreme legislature; which indeed is wholly unknown to many nations, where no general laws are established, except religious ones, and a few in cases of adultery. The third form of government, or rather class of people, consists of those who have acquired weight and influence from their great wealth; and this body some have represented as the nobility. The fourth is an absolute democracy, where every individual has a share in the government, and all are upon an equality in respect of dignity and power, however they may differ in wealth. And lastly, the fifth consists of the slaves, those who have been sold by their parents, those who were born slaves, or those who have been reduced through poverty to this unhappy condition. What reasons might determine
- b authors to call these different classes of men so many different forms of government, we know not: since it is certain, that in some kingdoms they all subsist together. It is possible that observing in different places sometimes one class, sometimes another prevail, they were led to imagine the supreme authority was lodged in the hands of those who appeared to be the most powerful. The truth is, we know but little of this subject, so contradictory, unconnected and absurd, are the relations of all our voyagers.

In general, through all the monarchies of Guiney, particularly of the Gold Coast, the crown descends from father to son by right of inheritance; and, in default of heirs male, it passes to the nearest of blood; although sometimes a man's wealth in gold and slaves procures him this honour, in prejudice to the lawful heir. The inauguration of kings is in few countries attended with many pompous ceremonies. They are seldom crowned in form, or required to take the coronation-oath usual in other countries; a king is presented to his people, he is seated in the best apartment of the palace, and one day's festivity concludes the whole ceremony. However, when a king is elected who has no claim by birthright, then an oath is administered to him, obliging him to govern according to the custom of their kings, and he receives the homage of all the great men in the realm: as to the lineal descent, it passes on quietly, without din, pomp, or tumult, except when solemn religious offerings are made to the tutelary fetiche.

THE caboceroes, which we will venture to call the second class of the people, are usually composed of a certain number, limited only by custom. When the number is diminished by the death of one of the members, all the rest assemble for the election of a successor out of the elders of the nation; for young men are seldom admitted (B). The candidates make a present to the electors of a cow, or bullock, and a jar of palm-wine, if they have succeeded; otherwise their gratitude is proportioned to their ill fortunes. At Axim in particular, strangers are excluded from this dignity; and it is necessary not only that the candidate shall be a native of the country, but an inhabitant of the particular town for which he is chosen; at least that he have a house in it, where some of his women reside constantly, and himself occasionally. Here the Dutch assume a power of approving or disapproving elections; of which we have already given some account; but it is our business here to speak of general, not particular and local laws.

THE third class of Negroes consists of the rich, those who have acquired fortunes by their industry, or possessed them by inheritance. Those who find themselves elevated to this rank, purchase seven small elephants teeth, which they form into a wind instrument, resembling a trumpet, obliging their children and slaves to learn the common tunes of the country upon these instruments. When they are tolerable proficient in music, the master gives notice to all his friends and relations, that he intends giving a public entertainment, and this message passes for an invitation. Himself, his children, women, and slaves are dressed out with all the magnificence which his fortune will support, or vanity require; and if the latter should exceed the former, they borrow gold and coral ornaments from all their friends to help out the parade. They distribute presents, and the rejoicings continue for several days at a great expence; for which those wise masters believe themselves fully compensated, by the extraordinary privilege of blowing their trumpets whenever they have a mind: a right so exclusive, that Negroes of inferior rank are obliged to ask their permission before they enjoy the supreme felicity of making a disagreeable noise. This is the ceremony of instalment, previous to which he must qualify himself, either by buying the honour, or by the following method. He must make a study of the science of arms, offensive and defensive, and pass a knight armed at all points, remote from all society, as a proof that

* BOSMAN, epist. 11.

(B) Upon this occasion it is that large jars, filled with water, are placed in the council-chamber for the electors; each leaps into his jar, and with his face over the brim, deliberates, chin-deep in water, upon the affairs of their meeting. Villault has falsely ascribed this custom to the natives of Whidab (1).

(1) Vid. L'Esprit, par M. Helvetius, tom. i. p. 72.

he fears no danger, and can support all manner of fatigue. After the instalment he gives a second entertainment, where he exhibits several astonishing proofs of his activity and prowess, amidst the applauses of those who are feasting upon his folly. His women, children, and slaves appear in the same pomp as at the first festival; all his wealth is exposed to public view, and transported into a variety of forms and situations, to excite the greater admiration. One piece of prudence attends this ostentatious exhibition; for here, instead of making presents, the master receives handsome returns for those he had formerly made, each of his friends striving who shall contribute the most towards making him the richest man of his quality. After all those proofs of his ability, he is honoured with the permission of wearing two shields in battle; a glorious and envied privilege, that belongs only to Negroes of the highest rank. In a word, there are different degrees of this set of nobility, distinguished by the different proofs they have given of their valour and address (C). A new-made nobleman is presented to the king by some of the ancient nobility, attended by his friends, and the officers of the king's household: he prostrates himself at the feet of the monarch, remaining in that posture till the king has graciously condescended to bid him rise. After which, his majesty, in a short speech, explains to him the nature of his elevation, and the duties annexed to his rank; he presents him with a drum, an ivory trumpet, and the privilege of trading with white men; a right peculiar to persons of rank and fashion<sup>b</sup>. Hence we see, that, by different forms of government, authors really meant no more than the degrees of subordination in the same government.

AFTER his creation has been approved and confirmed by the king, he is carried all over the town upon the shoulders of his slaves, attended by the music of drums and other instruments. His women go before him singing and dancing, attended by their parents, relations, friends, neighbours, and in short the whole town, who have also their music; the whole so wretchedly loud a concert, as were sufficient to rob the new peer of the sense of hearing, had not nature happily formed his organs not over-delicate. This procession ends at his own house, into which he enters, attended by his family and a few friends, while the mob remain about the doors. A repast is ordered in a shady bower erected for the occasion, where the nobility and gentlemen of the king's household, who assisted at the ceremony, are entertained. The diversions continue for four hours, the people are regaled with palm-wine and beef, and every ceremony of the instalment is finished at an expence of near two hundred marks of gold<sup>c</sup>; or 6,400*l.* sterling (D).

DURING a war, the nobility are always the principal officers in the army, according to their seniority, except where the king's favour has raised any particular person. It is seldom they are without employment; for the Negroes never remain long in peace; their avarice and dispositions find a thousand occasions for quarrelling, and every nation wishes for war, in order to increase their slave trade with the Europeans. All these are modes but little known to nations on the coast; they are almost peculiar to the interior countries. We had almost forgot to mention a kind of escutcheon, or arms, the nobility have granted them upon their creation. It is a painting of a bull's head, done in the slovenly manner of the country, on which are drawn emblems of the different privileges they enjoy, in consequence of their being ennobled. The chief of these are, the right of carrying two bucklers into the field, of selling slaves, and trading with the Europeans. Nothing can equal the pride of one of those upstart peers; he is continually boasting of his rank to strangers, and insulting his inferiors, although it frequently happens, that the expence attending the profuse entertainments which he sacrificed to his vanity, has reduced him to his primitive poverty, and obliged him for sustenance to apply to some servile employment<sup>d</sup>.

THE nobility of the Gold Coast are united into a kind of society, and keep an annual feast, to which every nobleman invites his friend, among which are frequently some of the inland nobility. Here the bull's-head escutcheon is sure not to be forgot, the utmost ostentation of their grandeur is set forth, new fetiches and new ornaments are prepared, and nothing omitted that can recall the remembrance of their promotion, or shew how well they

(C) Villault distinguishes the nobility into four classes; the first consisting of those who are so by birth; the second, of such as are rendered noble by their employments; the third, of those who have purchased the dignity or office to which it is annexed; and the fourth, of those who have risen solely by their merit (6). Bosman indeed says, that on the coast he could never distinguish any other difference than that of master and slave (7).

(D) Artus and some other writers greatly reduce this sum, and indeed with great appearance of truth. According to them the expence amounts to 8 bandas, or a pound of gold; and if the presents they receive are deducted, and discretion observed, it seldom exceeds five pounds sterling (8).

a support their dignity. On this day they paint their bodies red and white, and wear about their necks collars made of leaves, as emblems of their quality, and they conclude the evening at the viceroy's or governor's, who gives them a splendid entertainment.

As to the two remaining classes of the people, nothing characteristical remains to be observed, we have had occasion to mention them so frequently in the preceding sections. However, it must be observed in favour of the Guiney government, that though no country in the world has a greater number of poor, yet hardly a beggar is to be met with from one end of the coast to the other. The old and lame are employed in occupations suited to their powers, in blowing forge bellows, pressing palm-oil, grinding the materials used in painting their mats, and in selling provisions in the markets: as to young vagrants, b they are immediately seized, and enrolled in the military list; an excellent police, well deserving the imitation of Great Britain. Bosman, however, seems to be ignorant of this custom, and assigns a different reason for the small number of beggars: we have, notwithstanding, ventured to relate it on the authority of Villault, Barbot, Artus, and Des Marchais, all of whom concur in asserting it* (E).

To return to their kings. Bosman relates, that the royal government is supported rather by force than authority; the respect of the people being proportioned to the number of the king's slaves, and the greatness of his wealth. Without those two essential appendages of royalty, they find but little submission from their subjects, and are forced to pay them for their smallest services. On the contrary, when their kings are rich and powerful, c no people on earth pay a more servile homage to their governors, whom they elevate above all law and controul. Their wealth they increase by the most rapacious exactions and tyrannical oppressions, while the people quietly submit to every imposition and violence. The smallest crimes, the least offence given to majesty, are punished by an extraordinary fine, and many Negroes of rank have been chastised so severely for venial trespasses, that to the end of their lives they maintained the strongest resentment against their kings†.

THE account Artus gives differs so widely from this, that we imagine the writers must each have borrowed their notions from some particular nation, totally different in their government. He affirms, that affection and duty are the only ties upon king or people, the former measuring his authority, and the latter their obedience, by these. If a young king, d says he, would engage the love and esteem of his subjects, he must begin by a liberal distribution of provisions and palm-wine; for they are passionately enamoured of and inviolably attached to a sovereign whose generosity they have once tasted: but if the monarch prove avaritious, they never fail of seizing the first opportunity to depose him; they abhor and detest him, panting eagerly after an occasion of choosing a successor more agreeable to their inclinations. What can be determined from accounts so contradictory? Artus, indeed, illustrates his assertion by an instance that confirms us in our conjecture that he drew his notions from a particular nation. When he resided upon the coast, the king of Sabu was deposed. This prince, by birth a Fantin, had been elected king of Sabu by the unanimous voice of the people. His avarice was soon discovered, and became e disgusting; for it was not confined to hoarding, but launched out into the most grievous oppression. First, the people limited his authority, and at length a universal disaffection prevailing, they dethroned him, obliging him to retire ignominiously into a private station at Fantin, after they had plundered him of all those riches which had brought on his ruin‡. Liberality is therefore a virtue greatly esteemed in Negro sovereigns, and they generally exercise it with so little moderation, that the first entertainments they give amount to a year's revenue. All the officers, counsellors, and nobility of the kingdom are invited; and the king buys up all the palm-wine, beef, and mutton that the markets can supply, to treat the people. Joy and festivity reign in every village, the whole kingdom is filled with riotous mirth, and the meanest cottage, on this occasion, overflows with f plenty. After this solemnity, the heads of all the sheep and oxen slaughtered for the festival are deposited in a certain apartment of the palace, and drawings are made from them, which are presented to the nobility and gentry, as monuments of the king's wealth and generosity. The sovereigns have likewise an annual festival, which they call the coronation feast, to which they invite not only the great men of their own dominions, but the kings and nobility of neighbouring countries. No expence is regarded; dancing, music, wine, and good cheer, are the amusements of every nation that chuses to partake of the feast. Each of the kings give the entertainment in their turns, taking care that the

(E) It must indeed be observed, that however authentic Bosman's relations may be, they are too general to afford materials for an explicit and full history of this coast. His way is to dwell upon those particulars which fall under the notice of every common observer; while the peculiar customs which mark the character of the people have wholly escaped him.

The simplicity in which the negro kings live.

festival shall not happen upon the same day in any two kingdoms; and upon this occasion a it is that the king sacrifices to the great fetiche<sup>b</sup>. Yet, whatever their state and grandeur may be on these occasions, nothing can equal the simplicity of their private lives. Here no guards are placed at their gates, no women forced into their embraces; if they appear abroad, it is without any other attendants than two or three slaves, one of which carries his sword, and the others his stool or chair, which always follows him. Those who meet them pay them no marks of respect, and the meanest slave would not move a foot out of his way to give the king a free passage. But when their visits are made out of the towns where they reside, and to any person of distinction, then they put on majesty, and appear with the dignity of kings, and all the splendor of crowned heads. They are then attended by a grand retinue and strong body of troops; they carry shields, swords, and all manner b of weapons to defend them from insults, to inspire awe, and strike the people with high notions of their power; but in their own towns they are so meanly clothed, as scarce to be distinguishable from their meanest slaves. Nor is this simplicity surprising, if we consider the expences attending their donations, public exhibitions, and the narrow limits of their dominions. Bread, oil, and a little stinking fish make up the bill of fare of a prince, as well as a peasant. Water is their common drink; but, if the royal cellars afford it, they regale themselves with a dram of aqua vite in the morning, and palm-wine at night<sup>1</sup>.

Their familiarity with their subjects.

WHEN the palm-wine comes in first from the interior countries, all the Negroes, kings, masters, and slaves meet together in the market-place, where they sit down upon the c ground, or on little stools they bring along with them, in the most social and familiar manner. Every man that pleases joins himself to the company, and as they advance in their cups, their good humour increases. They delight in drinking full bumpers, and quaffing at one draught a pint of palm-wine, which they esteem a manly action. Bosman compares the confused noise and tumult that succeeds, to the Jewish synagogue at Amsterdam; all kinds of subjects being debated on at one time, and every mouth in the company open. In general, however, the topics of conversation are not of the most grave or serious nature; obscenity, coarse raillery, and lewd wit, constitute the chief part of the entertainment, even before the women, who are by no means delicate or deficient in their jokes; nor is it even thought unbecoming in a lady of the first fashion to display this talent. "In d "short," says Bosman, "this is a perfect babbling and scolding-school, where each person "freely canvasses the faults of his neighbour, but in a more liberal and generous man- "ner than in Europe, where it is always done in the absence of the parties; whereas here "the accused is present, and can vindicate himself, or retort upon his neighbours<sup>2</sup>." Such is the happy society, intimacy, and familiarity in which the sovereign and the subject live, where majesty falls not into contempt by affability, nor liberty degenerates into undue licentiousness by the toleration and the mildness of government. Some writers, however, allege, that they have seen a prince beat his subjects upon trivial occasions, and a subject grown so potent, as to despise the authority of his sovereign; but those instances are rare; and in general a king may lay aside or assume his dignity just as he pleases, e without in the least diminishing the respect due to him.

The kings hire out their troops.

A NEGRO king is always ready to turn out his troops in the service of a neighbouring king, as the greater part of the subsidy goes into his own pockets. It is true, after the money is paid, he is not very scrupulous about the performance of his engagements; his only care is not to hurt his credit so far as to prevent their entering upon future bargains with him; in which respect he is no less alert than an European minister, his excuses being always ingenious and probable. Nor is a king less desirous of being chosen umpire between two contending powers; for here he receives bribes from both parties, at the same time that he is serving neither; for his business is to keep the breach open, to protract the negotiations, and put money in his coffers. Hence arise their chief finances, the national f revenue being in general small; and Bosman has known a king so poor, that he could not raise the price of a bottle of rum or arrack<sup>1</sup>.

The education of princes.

As to the education of the royal family, it differs but little, according to the above author, from that of the poorest subjects. When a prince arrives at a proper age, he makes choice of some profession for his support, such as husbandry, or fishing, or making wine, nor are they ashamed themselves to carry to market the produce of their labour: yet are they respected as the king's children, and the heirs apparent to the throne. It is common here to see a man taken from the plough-tail to wield a sceptre; and he who yesterday was driving a flock of sheep, shall be to-day at the head of an army. As for the princesses, they are bred to the same employments as the princes; with this difference, that they seldom take to fishing. In general they are bred to husbandry, unless the pride of their g

- a birth makes them desirous of a profession better suited to their rank : and if they are less rich than ladies of the same quality in Europe, they are not less happy, the small number of their wants being a full compensation for the less degree of wealth. They marry without regard to birth or family ; nor is a match between a princess and a slave esteemed at all unnatural or extraordinary. One circumstance that renders those matches of less consequence is, because the children inherit by the mother, and enjoy freedom, though the father be a slave. Artus affirms, that kings dare make no provision for their children, and that for two reasons ; the first is, that having no family to aggrandize, he is the less likely to be covetous ; and the second arises from the policy of the nobles, who find it their interest to oppress the royal children, in order that themselves may approach nearer the throne <sup>m</sup>.
- b Each of them has his designs upon the crown ; and hence proceed their endeavours to render themselves popular. In marrying their daughters, the kings demand no other terms, than that they have a slave or two to attend them, in order to distinguish their being of royal birth : however, as this is the only advantage of which those ladies can boast, they generally fall into contempt when their beauty is faded, unless they have had industry enough to increase their fortunes in their youth. In a word, the only method the king has to provide for his younger children, is by sending them upon embassies, or giving them up as hostages on the conclusion of a war, in hopes that chance may call them to a foreign crown, when their birth is known. At Commendo, indeed, they procure the most lucrative and honourable posts of the realm, such as fatyra, or captain of the guard, which often
- c paves the way for their mounting the throne upon the death of the king <sup>n</sup>.

We shall now proceed to the grand officers of the court, who hold their employments during the king's pleasure ; as the brasso, the ensign or sword-bearer, the tie ti, or the public crier of the court, king's herald, the governor of the king's women, the horn-blower, or drummer and trumpeter. Barbot however observes, that some courts have officers of a higher rank and authority, different from any of these ; such is the di at Fetu, who is the king's lieutenant and assistant when present, and his representative when absent. He has, besides, a grand treasurer, and a fatyra, or captain of the guard. As to the proper employments of each, we do not find them very correctly described by authors : the brasso, they say, is a kind of mareschal, who leads the van of the army, and always begins the d charge. The fatyra, or captain of the guard, is intrusted with the care of the king's person : he accompanies him upon all his expeditions, parties, and excursions ; and being thus constantly in his presence, he acquires a consideration and consequence that often enables him to succeed to his master. The office of sword-bearer is usually divided among four great persons, who not only carry the sword, but all his majesty's armour, to public festivals and warlike expeditions. This is a post by no means contemptible ; and what adds to its importance is, that from this office the king generally chooses his ambassadors. The guardians of the king's women are represented by Bosman as the highest officers of the household. Their proper office is, to watch over the virtue and chastity of the women, to be careful that their affections wander not from his majesty's person. They are also keepers

e of the king's privy purse, and are the only persons who can give an account of his wealth, when the king dies. The tie ti, or herald's office, is to publish all the king's edicts and ordinances, to make proclamation of all things stolen or lost, to defend the king from flies by a kind of flapper, made of an elephant's tail and rushes, and to prevent all tumults and mobs in the roads through which his majesty is to pass. They wear a cap of a black ape's skin, the hair of which is about the length of one's finger ; so that they might be mistaken for the king's jesters, rather than his heralds. Nor is the office of herald less lucrative than honourable, because he constantly attends the king, and receives his commands from his own mouth. The trumpeters are the lowest officers of the court <sup>o</sup>.

- f THE judges, or the supreme officers of the courts of justice, are chosen, both in monarchies and republics, out of the most considerable persons in the nation for wealth and influence ; from the brassos, the caboceroes, the governors of towns and villages, assisted by the priests, who are a kind of substitutes. To these officers of justice belongs the decision of all causes, civil and criminal ; however, their verdict is not unalterable ; but that party who thinks himself aggrieved may appeal to the king, as the derniere resort. Those appeals are not common ; but when they happen, his majesty appoints commissioners for the revival of the suit, who take the appellation of enes, are invested with all the authority the king is able to communicate, make circuits to appease and heal differences, and give final decisions in all causes. In a word, their office greatly resembles the consultation of our twelve judges. Artus relates the process of civil and criminal suits in monarchies.

roy or governor of the town, and submit to his arbitration. If the plaintiff only appears, a the governor summons the defendant by a slave, in order that he may answer the charge: each pleads his own cause; during which the other is not permitted to interrupt him. After the cause has been deliberately debated on both sides, and the governor has thoroughly entered into the merits of the case, he proceeds to pass sentence with great gravity. But if it be an affair læsæ majestatis, or petty treason, then a fine is adjudged, and the offender obliged to pay it before he leaves the court, or otherwise be committed to prison. In difficult cases, and where the animosity of the parties runs high, the governor, not caring to determine upon it, leaves the whole to the decision of a single combat. Each party is attended to the field by a body of friends, who are spectators of the fight, which generally ends in the death of one of the combatants; and then the friends of the deceased unite together to procure revenge. Nothing can exceed the rancour they shew on this occasion; b no submissions, no acknowledgements will be accepted; blood must answer for blood; and the smallest satisfaction they expect is, that the party offending shall go into voluntary banishment or slavery: nay it has been known, when they have persecuted them in foreign countries, and purchased them from masters to whom they have enslaved themselves, only to have the satisfaction of putting them to the most excruciating torments. Those duels but seldom occur; for though the hatred and rancour of the parties be mortal, yet their courage is generally faint; and the friends, who know that they must necessarily be involved in the quarrel, if one of the combatants be killed, take every possible precaution to prevent bloodshed.

SUCH as have violated the king's edicts, must pay a certain fine, or banish themselves out of the kingdom. A Negro who has discovered his neighbour guilty of this crime, often dissembles the fact for intire years, till he has received some injury or affront from him. He then immediately goes to the governor, and makes deposition of the action; in consequence of which, notice is given by the beat of a drum, that an important cause is to be tried. All the inhabitants assemble, the women taking their seats in a part of the court distinct from the men. The governor appears guarded by a body of troops, and takes his seat. If the accused be present, he is immediately arrested, sent to the governor's house, and loaded with chains, if the proofs turn out clear against him; otherwise he is given in charge to a slave, who never loses sight of him till sentence is passed. The governor, after examining all the circumstances, and weighing them duly, assisted by the advice of all the nobles and elders of the town, goes and lays before the prisoner all the proofs. Should his reply be unsatisfactory, he is convicted, and adjudged to pay a fine in court; but if he prove insolvent, he becomes the king's slave, and is immediately sold to make up the fine<sup>p</sup>. We have had so many occasions to mention the subject of crimes and punishments, that the reader will probably excuse brevity on this article, that we may treat of their method of waging war, and military weapons.

Causes of entering upon war.

WAR, we have said, is declared by the Negroes either from views of revenge, ambition, or plunder, or as auxiliaries to some injured neighbouring state, or, what is the most common, for a subsidy; in which the auxiliaries, as well as the principals, declare war in form. Many wars are entered upon for the recovery of private debts; an insolvent having taken refuge in a foreign state, or a foreign merchant refusing to pay a just debt, or at least making payment tedious. In this case, the creditor seizes as many goods, freemen, or slaves, in the country of the debtor, as will amount upon sale to his demand. If the debtor be a man of integrity, he will endeavour to buy the liberty of his countrymen so unjustly seized; otherwise the friends of the sufferers are left to retaliate, which they never fail of doing; and thus a war is brought on from the quarrel of two private individuals; and nations, that but a little before lived in the strictest amity, now engage in the most bitter enmity, which continues till one of them is subdued and destroyed: or if their strength be equal, till peace is brought about by the more moderate leading men of both countries. This frequently happens either in the spring or autumn, when the seed or harvest requires that the warriors should turn their attention to the affairs of husbandry. As the soldiers serve without pay, they soon grow weary of a rupture that produces nothing but glory; and plunder alone it is that can induce them to keep the field for any continuance.

WHEN war is projected in the king's council, a general assembly of the nobility is summoned, and matters debated with great deliberation; a list of the men fit to bear arms is made out, and a scrupulous inquiry into the state of the national treasure. An army is instantly raised, and a sudden incursion made into the enemy's country, where, after some advantage gained, war is proclaimed; for it is a constant maxim with the Negroes, that the first blow is more than half the battle. Their wars, indeed, are carried on g a at a small expence: the most powerful ally may be purchased at the expence of two thousand pounds; and when once he is engaged, he soon acts as a principal, except where a very politic prince sits at the helm.

In their engagements no order or discipline is observed. Each commander is incircled by his troops in a kind of mob, so that they push on one heap of men opposed to another. Sometimes, indeed, they are drawn up in lines; but this order the fury of some, and the cowardice of others, soon disconcerts. They do not stand erect in the field, but load and discharge stooping low, that the enemy's shot may fly over their heads; and indeed, so bad levellers and marksmen are the Negro soldiers, that few of their balls take place. Others again creep close to the enemy, discharge their pieces, and then fly off with incredible velocity, so quick indeed, says Barbot, that a ball or arrow cannot overtake them<sup>a</sup>. And Bosman affirms, that their ridiculous gestures and grimaces, occasioned by resentment and fear, give them more the appearance of a flock of monkeys playing together, than of an army raised for the support and honour of a nation<sup>r</sup>. The booty which the soldiers chiefly aim at, are, the fine cloaths, the coral, and jewels of the slain and prisoners: as for the slaves, they want none; they become the property of their officers. When a maritime state is at war with an inland kingdom, the soldiers plunder is very considerable; for all the officers and soldiers of the latter dress out in their richest attire before they enter the field of battle. Such prisoners as cannot ransom themselves are sold for slaves; and prisoners of quality have generally a high price put on their liberty: but if the person who occasioned the war be taken, no sum whatever will procure his release, lest he should excite fresh commotions; and he is either sold, kept prisoner for life, or put to death, according to the nature of his offence. The Negro of the highest quality and influence is not secure against slavery, if he have the misfortune to be made a captive; for the price of his ransom is frequently raised higher than the value of his estate, or all he can draw from friendship: nay, some are so barbarous, that they revenge their disappointment of a ransom, by murdering the prisoner.

Wars between two despotic sovereigns, who hold their subjects in abject slavery, are generally tedious and bloody. They fight with armies headed by their generals; and as they share none of the danger, so they feel no emotions either of pity or terror; the commanders are obliged to return with victory, cost what it will, or they endanger their heads: plunder and glory, not the happiness of their people, are their aims; but the means of acquiring these never costs them a penny; and upon the ruin of the enemy they build their own greatness, even should their dominions be depopulated<sup>s</sup>.

Barbot gives the following hideous description of some nations when they enter the field of battle. "The figure," says he, "of those warriors is so terrible, that one would think they were determined to devour whatever came in their way. They grind their teeth, distort all their features, and resemble tyrants upon canvas. Their faces are coloured with streaks of red, white, and green, and the rest of their body covered with such figures as they believe will render them frightful and terrible to their enemies; nor do they forget to cover their necks and shoulders with glass ornaments and fetiches innumerable, to protect them in the day of battle. On their head stands a high casque or helmet, made of the skin of a leopard or crocodile; and a sort of short cloak, or rather shield, of the same materials, surrounds the rest of the body. At their waist hangs a poignard; on their left arm a buckler; and in the same hand two or three darts: while the common soldiers have no other weapons than bows and arrows, which they use with great skill and address<sup>t</sup>." Such are the customs of the inland countries; as for the maritime nations, Bosman and Des Marchais describe their weapons in the following manner:

The principal of their arms are musquets or carabins, which the Negroes manage with great dexterity on the parade, and where no danger is to be apprehended. No people on earth pass better at a review; so adroitly do they exercise their arms, discharging them in a variety of postures, sitting, stooping, and standing. Fire-arms are only used by the natives of the coast, who purchase them of the Europeans, yet are they constantly defeated by the armies of the interior countries, their courage and resolution supplying the defects of arms and discipline.

Next to their fuses are a kind of swords shaped like chopping-knives, about three hands broad at the extremity, and one at the hilt, which is of wood, ornamented with round knobs covered with leopard's skin. Amongst persons of condition, the sword-hilt is plated with gold or silver, whilst many of the meaner sort content themselves with a cord-basket-hilt, coloured with blood, and set off with a bunch of horse-hair, to which they suspend, by way of sword-knot, a tyger's head, or a particular sort of red shell, highly prized by them. This weapon is girt on the left hip, if it hangs on a belt; but when they stick it in their paans, then it comes between their legs, in which situation they think it impedes their walking lefs. The coast negro foldiers alfo wear crocodile-skin caps, adorned on each a fide with a red fhell, and at the top with a bunch of horfe-hair, the borders being fet off with an iron chain, that fixes it to the head. Some of the coast Negroes, as the Aquam- boans and natives of Awinee, ufe bows and arrows; in the ufe of which they are fo expert, that they hit a hare at a great diftance in any part of the body they are defired. The latter poison their arrows.

BESIDES the mufquet and gun, the Negroes ufe a kind of dart, which they call affagay, or baffagay, with a ftrong aspirate. Thefe are of two kinds, differing only in fize: the fmalleft is about a Flemifh ell in length; and this they throw with as great dexterity as a dart: the others are about twice as long, pointed and barbed with iron, which they ufe rather to push than to throw. Men of diftinction have armour-bearers, who follow them b with their affagays, and fupply them in battle with as many as they want.

LAST of all comes the fhield, made by the coast Negroes of twigs and ofiers, covered over with leather, and fometimes plated in the infide with copper, to ward off the affagays as well as the blows of the fword. Thefe fhields are about five feet long, and three in breadth, and the Negroes play them fo artfully, that there is no touching their body, but by piercing through the fhield". Some few Negroes have cannon; but their engineers are fo ignorant, and the damage done by the artillery fo fmall, that the fubject is not worth dwelling upon. We fhall conclude this article with relating, from Des Marchais, the formalities ufually obferved in treaties of peace. When both nations are exhausted with war, they begin to think of terms of accommodation; they demand of the aggreffor an c affignation of time and place to negotiate articles of peace. The place chofen is generally a large plain, on the frontiers of both kingdoms, whither both fovereigns march, armed at all points, as if they intended to give battle, and followed by a crowd of fetiches, the emblems and mediators of peace. Here the priefts of both nations fwear mutually to ceafe from hoftilities, to forget injuries, to live in perfect accord and friendship, and to give pledges of their faith; but no mention is made of the prifoners on either fide, or cartel fettled for exchanging them, each looking upon them as his property and the rights of conqueft. As foon as thefe obligations are taken, then a loud peal of warlike mufic publifhes the general tidings; both fides throw down their arms, embrace with all the appearance of a fincere cordiality; the day is fpent in feftivity, commerce revives and flou- d rifhes as if nothing had happened to flop the current of friendship, and both nations are united by the firmeft ties, till fome new frivolous accident arifes, that turns all into frefh confufion. Our author concludes with obferving, that the hoftages are compofed of the king's children, and the chief of the nobility".

Of the air and climate of the Gold Coast.

THE Gold Coast being fituated in the fifth degree of north latitude, one may eafily e judge that the heat of the climate muft be extreme; yet it is more healthy than many of the voyagers have reprefented it. The cuftom with fuch writers is to place every thing in the moft ftriking view, to relate circumftances in extremes, and to judge in this particular rather by their feelings, after coming from a cold climate, than according to truth. Thofe who have lived for fome time in the country acknowledge indeed, that the months of October, November, December, January, February, and March are fcorchingly hot; but the fix fubfequent months tolerable enough: and Bosman has known the weather fo cold, that he could very well fupport a fire, had it been cuftomary in the country; it has even been as cold as in Holland, in September<sup>a</sup>. Befides, the whole year is refreshed with delightful cool evening and morning fea and land breezes, that greatly qualify the f extreme heat of the day. To this perhaps is owing the unwholefomenefs of which ftrangers complain; thofe fudden changes occafioning feveral oppofite effects in the human body, checking perfpiration fuddenly, after the finer parts of the blood have been drawn off, and thence producing ardent fevers, catarrhs, and coughs. But to fuch as have lived years in the country, whofe bodies are feafoned, and pores opened, the effects are lefs fenfible,

a sensible, if any degree of care is taken to guard against the cool night air, and the damp exhalations, especially after rain.

ARTUS relates, that the most natural cause of any peculiar unhealthiness on the Gold Coast which he could assign was, in the number of the high mountains with which every part of it abounds, and the deep valleys that separate them. From these arise a thick, foetid, and sulphureous damp or exhalation, particularly in marshy grounds, and near rivers, that cannot possibly be congenial to the human system, and is in fact perceived to have a bad effect upon foreigners, especially if the stomach be empty. During their winter, that is, from March to October, these fogs occur most frequently, and in the months of July and August, scarce a day passes without them; this, therefore, is the most sickly season of the b year, we mean to strangers only. These natural causes our author imagines are greatly augmented by the beastly nastiness of the Negroes, who exonerate their bodies every-where round the villages; and have a still more pernicious custom, of laying heaps of fish to rot and putrify in the open air, their method of seasoning it for the palate. Hence arise gross and malignant vapours, and a stench perceivable at the distance of several miles, not only disagreeable, but extremely noxious to new-comers. Many have been known to drop down as soon as they came within its influence; and others, who have enjoyed uninterrupted health among more cleanly neighbours, have here lingered and pined away in atrophies and consumptions.

It must be acknowledged, that even in the south of France the climate is so different from this, that Frenchmen, who never knew an hour's illness, have been seized with violent inflammatory disorders immediately after their arrival in Guiney; yet still authors have greatly exaggerated, and frequently attributed to the climate, what proceeded from debauchery and intemperance; to which may be added the ignorance of the practitioners in physic in this country. The picture which Bosman draws of the English soldiers is sufficient to evince this; we have already mentioned it, and shall not here repeat a truth so little to the credit of our nation<sup>b</sup>.

With all the disadvantages of climate and manners, it is observable, that no people on earth enjoy better health, or arrive at a happier old age than the Negroes. They have indeed endemial diseases; but nothing besides their total ignorance of physic ever renders these fatal. The yaws, the Guiney worm, or dracunculus, and some other indigenous diseases, carry off but a small proportion of the people; it is the small-pox, and epidemic fevers that make prodigious ravages among children and strangers. Agues and intermitting disorders are likewise frequent, but seldom fatal. Some writers mention the boulimia, fames canina, or a continually craving appetite, as indigenous to this country; though others assure us, that this disorder arises from a flux of sharp humours upon the coats of the stomach, occasioned by the excessive quaffing of a kind of palm-wine they call crissa<sup>c</sup>. But we shall pass over their diseases, which are but little understood by any voyagers we have met with, to speak of those circumstances of their natural history that are more distinctly related, as they require but little philosophy, and fall within common observation.

THE great Sir Isaac Newton was the first philosopher who applied astronomy successfully to the solution of several natural phenomena, and by the principle of gravity gave a probable and easy account of tides, currents, and the ebbing and flowing of the sea. The sun, moon, earth, and all the celestial bodies, have, according to this exalted philosopher, a gravitation towards their centers, proportioned to the quality of matter they contain. The earth being within the influence of the sun and moon's attractions, the fluid part of this globe, the ocean, feels their activity, and necessarily swells. It would be unnecessary here to enlarge upon this beautiful theory; sufficient it is, that on much the same principles the tides and currents on the coast of Guiney may be accounted for. From the river Gambia to the streights and chanel of Benin, the ebbings and flowings are regular on the shores, with this difference, that in the rivers or chanel where two shores contract the water into a narrow compass, the tides are strong and high, as well as regular; but on the dead coast, as the seamen express it, they are slow, and rise to no height, not above two or three feet, increasing as you approach the bay or chanel of Benin. This is further evident at Cape Coast, Soccondo, and Commendo; and indeed, where-ever the coast projects in points and peninsulas into the sea, the flowing there will be a foot or two higher than on the even coast, though but a few miles distant from each other<sup>d</sup>.

ON the Gold Coast the current sets sometimes at the rate of two miles an hour, frequently against the wind, more commonly with it, when it is rapid; but almost always to leeward, sometimes off, sometimes on, dimpling like a tide; at other times with a smooth glassy surface for days together, and imperceptible at ten leagues distance from the shore. The current sets in on both sides from the bay of Benin; from the southward about and beyond Cape Lopez, and from the westward along the Gold Coast, that is to leeward; for the winds are as commonly bent or deflected along the shore as the currents. Phillips observes, that all ships steering to Angola experience this, if they hold the land on board, as he calls it, or if they endeavour getting westward on the Gold Coast<sup>a</sup>. It is probable that this diversity may arise from the formation of the land, as well as from the weather and winds. Thus the land running in a right line, without gulphs or bays, except the remarkably large one of Benin and Callabar, the flux of the sea, when it is bounded by the shores, has a natural tendency to press in at every inlet, growing stronger as they advance towards it on both sides. Such gulphs therefore, in a contraction of the waters, bear some resemblance to chanel, which, in proportion to their breadth and depth, and the sea into which they open, have more or less current or tide along their shores inward. These are assisted partly by the winds, which are in a similar manner deflected, and tend also on both sides towards the bay; and partly by the weather, the intense hot sunshine exhaling more vapours near shores and in shoal water, which are again expended in mists, fogs, and rains. The last in particular, by being incessant for a month or six weeks together, and in rotation upon different parts of the coast, may probably contribute to some little diversity of the tides; but it would be writing a philosophical essay, to dwell minutely upon explications.

We may likewise assign another reason why the currents tend mostly to the leeward. The flood being propagated from a vast southern ocean, takes its course along the shore; but the ebbs revert easily and equally from all parts to the ocean, and therefore make so small an alteration of the stream, as to be scarce perceivable at a very inconsiderable distance. Mariners who have left Whidah in July, when the currents in the road were strong to leeward, and the winds altogether south-west, could notwithstanding safely have weathered any of the islands; a circumstance altogether impossible, had the same current in the road extended across the whole bay: and indeed the getting so far southward will be a phenomenon difficult to explain, unless we admit that the waters received into the bay by the currents reverberate in the middle space, though insensibly, towards the main ocean. The same may be said of the Streights of Gibraltar<sup>c</sup>.

From these observations of seamen we may venture to conclude, that in all places currents and tides have a near affinity. That it is chiefly the formation of the land that draws them either into the one or the other. If contracted between two shores, so as to form a chanel, the diurnal elevation of the ocean, by the attraction of the moon, will make there a tide rapid in proportion to its breadth, depth, and the sea to which it lies open; but if the coast be open, as happens along the Gold Coast, then those tides become currents. This corollary is perfectly correspondent with all the observations made by the most judicious seamen on the coast of Guiney, and by the French East-India company on the eastern side of the continent and the island of Madagascar; for there the chanel being too deep and broad for the direction of a tide, there are southern and northern currents, as the sea elevated runs round the north or south end of the island; and what is still more to our purpose, they are strongest where the chanel is narrowest, weaker and varying to different points of the compass, as the sea spreads more in the passage across the line<sup>e</sup>. Another corollary for our premises is, that all currents and tides are found only on shores, and indiscernible at ten leagues distance from a coast, or at the mouth of a chanel; they are also variable from the same influence of the moon, and change of weather. This general theory of currents we imagined would be more satisfactory to our philosophical readers, than if we had given a dry recital of inconclusive remarks, which however form a part of the natural history of which we are to give an account.

Of the seasons on the Gold Coast.

BOSMAN divides the seasons on the Gold Coast into summer and winter; the latter admitting of three subdivisions, viz. two rainy, two foggy and hazy, and two windy months; but the variations are so great in different years, that those lesser divisions have no great certainty. The summer frequently begins a month earlier in one year than in another, and the misty weather often takes the place of the rainy, and is itself supplanted by the windy weather. In a word, they are so various, confused, and indeterminate, that no certain calculation can be made. On his first arrival on the coast, the succession of summer and winter were regular; each season appeared at its proper time, and every kind of weather had its peculiar months, when the inhabitants might certainly expect it. The winter was then much more severe than at present, and the rains so violent, that a second deluge might be apprehended, continuing so for several successive days<sup>b</sup>. Now they are both less violent and frequent; a phenomenon that might perhaps be explained from the nutation of the poles, and a variation in the obliquity of the ecliptic<sup>i</sup>. Axim is but twenty

- a miles distant from Elmina; yet it is more subject to rains than any other parts of the Gold Coast. Bosman was extremely surpris'd at its duration, and asked one of the officers how long that kind of weather usually continued? The reply was but little to his satisfaction; for he was told, that at Axim the rains continued for eleven months and twenty-eight days of the year; an account which he afterwards found exaggerated, although he affirms that it rains there at least half the year; for which reason the country is only fertile in rice and trees, the fruits, roots, and other kinds of grain being destroyed by the wet. Atkins affirms, that there is a regular return of vernal and continual rains all over the coast; the former on both sides of the equator are the longest and most incessant. They begin on the north side of the line, at Sierra Leona in May; on the Gold Coast in April, preceded by south-south-east winds; whereas, south of the equator, the vernal rains fall at Cape Lopez in October, and in Angola in November. The efficient causes of those periodical returns it is not our business to examine, though we may venture to conjecture, that the final cause is to imbrue the land, and cover it with verdure and fertility, where the inhabitants have understanding and industry enough to co-operate with the wisdom and goodness of providence. When our author was at Cape Coast in 1721, the rains began about the middle of April, and continued till the end of May without intermission; but generally much heavier at night, accompanied with continued thunder, lightning, and calms. Whenever they felt a breeze, it was southerly, directly upon the land, while the clouds that contained the rain followed in a regular succession from the ocean. If the horizon ever brightened, as it sometimes did for a few minutes, then the sun's heat was felt with redoubled fervour<sup>1</sup> (A).
- The Negroes avoid the rain with extreme anxiety, believing it to be exceedingly pernicious to their health; and indeed the observations of the Dutch, in particular seasons, seem to confirm their conjecture. During those storms, which they call travados, the rain which falls near the line and within the tropics is perfectly red, and of so pernicious a quality, that if the sailors sleep in their wet cloaths, as they frequently do upon other occasions, they are certain not to escape dangerous maladies. Artus asserts, that the cloaths they throw off after these rains rot and mould in an incredibly short time, if they be not perfectly dried. So dreadful is rain to the Negroes, that if they are caught in the smallest shower, they cross their arms over their heads to defend them, run with all their speed to the first retreat, and seem to groan at every drop that falls upon them. For this reason it is, that, when they sleep at night upon their mats, they lie as close as possible to the fire, and anoint their bodies with oil, as a defence against wet, by shutting up their pores, and denying admission to the rain, the remote cause of all their diseases. Those terrible tornadoes, or as the Portuguese call them, travados, usually follow the course of the sun, which would seem to draw them by its influence. They are vortices, or whirlwinds, which are raised in the east-south-east, and sometimes in the north, or some points to the west, accompanied with terrible claps of thunder, dreadful flashes of lightning, showers that seem to fall in one united body of water, and a darkness so total, that day is turned into night. They last for about an hour and a half, sometimes more; but as soon as they are over, the sky immediately returns to its former serenity and brightness, the change being as sudden, as the effects of the storm are violent. When they happen in the good seasons, or the summer, they are less terrible than in the winter; but they are more inconvenient, as they are followed for some days by cold rains, and heavy beyond description. In the winter, the ships in the road are in the utmost danger, and mariners have every thing to dread from the fury and impetuosity of those hurricanes; but nature has wisely provided for their security, by giving notice of their approach, by infallible signs. A thick black cloud is perceived at a distance, and experience has taught the seamen whether they are to expect wind or rain; for if the cloud be marked with white spots, the former is the sure consequence; but if it appear uniformly black, then heavy rains may be expected<sup>2</sup>.
- f Bosman affirms that they are less frequent on the coast of Guiney than he has known them, and always less violent. He relates from the papers of the director Valkenburg, that at Elmina, in the year 1651, there happened so dreadful a tornadoe, as persuaded the inhabitants that all nature was convulsed, and the tremendous day approaching, when the world should be annihilated. Gold and silver were melted in their bags, swords in the

(A) We cannot avoid observing, that Dr. Halley's remark seems to be confirmed by the experience of those persons who have resided in Guiney. He affirms that the exhalations or vapours supplying rains, snow, hail, mists, fogs, and dews, are raised from coasts and shallows more abundantly than from the main ocean. In Guiney, that haziness of the horizon, and those great dews which fall out of the rainy seasons on the coast, are rarely felt two miles from the shore, not even in the roads where the ships anchor. Were it otherwise, those damps would be most felt over a great body of water; yet experience proves, on the contrary, that exhalations of every kind diminish in proportion as we advance into the ocean, and retire from land.

scabbards, ships were driven by the force of the wind out at a great distance from the sea, a large trees torn up by the roots, and houses carried off their foundations; the elements of fire, air, and water all contending which should act with the greatest violence, and produce effects the most astonishing. Bosman has himself known hurricanes very little short of the fury of this; but they gradually declined every year: and now, says he, they are scarcely at all dangerous<sup>1</sup>; a fact which we must beg leave to dispute, as the contrary is but too often experienced by fleets in Asia, Africa, and America.

ALL writers agree in affirming, that no quarter of the globe produces those tornadoes so frequently as the coast of Africa, which probably arises from the great abundance of nitrous and sulphureous exhalations in the atmosphere, the intense heat of the sun, and the continual rains. If the clouds containing these materials be compact, and the heterogeneous contents strong, various, and unequal, then the explosion is proportionably violent, and astonishingly loud, if it be near. It is remarked, that neither thunder nor lightning are ever perceived at a great distance from shore; corruscations of the sky have sometimes been mistaken for lightning; but we have never read that thunder had ever been heard a hundred leagues from land; and from this principle may the whole phenomenon be explained, which however we shall leave to philosophers. Certain it is, that those hurricanes are limited to a very small space; for ships have been shattered to pieces at Cape Coast, when they have had fine serene weather at Anamaboa, not three leagues distant (B).

Of the terreno, or land cloud.

THE Portuguese have given the appellation of terreno to a violent land wind, which the natives call harmattan, blowing from the east about Christmas and Midsummer. These all of a sudden rise with such fury, as immediately to suppress the sea-breezes, the storm continuing for two or three, frequently four or five days, as Bosman has experienced at Bourtry, in the year 1682. Atkins says, that they continue only a few hours; but his short residence on the coast could not furnish so many instances, or such accurate observations, as the preceding author has made. The sun is totally obscured, the sky dark, the air piercing cold, thick, and so sharp, as to affect the eyes during the continuance of the storm. The nakedness of the Negroes renders them extremely sensible of this change; and our author has seen them tremble with cold, as if the shivering paroxysm of an ague had seized them; even the Europeans, who easily endure northern climates, support this sudden change with great difficulty; they are forced to keep themselves close shut up in their apartments, kindle large fires, and drink strong spirits, to defend them against the rigour of the air, which, though intensely cold, is so suffocating and close, that few are able to breathe in it freely. Nor are those harmattans less pernicious to the brute animals; and the Negroes who know the consequence, shut their cattle up in their houses upon those occasions. The goats, which, by way of experiment, the governor of Cape Coast exposed to the open air, were found dead in less than four hours. Boards are warped, paper and parchment shrivelled by this wind, as if they had been exposed to the meridian heat of the sun, or held over a fire; and Barbot relates, that so contracted were the wainscotings of the chambers, and the boards of their chests, drawers, and escritores, that large chinks appeared in all the grooves, which closed up as soon as the harmattans ceased. These are extraordinary and contradictory effects, which we will not pretend to question, as they are attested by so many authentic writers, nor to explain from any of the known principles of nature<sup>m</sup>.

Of the trade-winds.

THE trade-winds blow fresh and equal here, as in other parts of the globe within 30 degrees of the equator. On the Gold Coast, the two trade-winds are westerly, keeping a tract with the shore, where it stretches eastward. Again from the river Gabon, under the line, the land deflects southward, the winds likewise keep nearly in a parallel with it, and veering from south-east to south-by-east; in both the shore seems to deflect the true trade-winds, in the same manner as capes do tides or currents. If at particular seasons, as is remarked in the rainy season, the winds become more southerly, they are weak; and as the sun is at this time north of the equinoctial, the final cause is, probably to restore an equilibrium to that air at land, which is more rarefied by a stronger reflected heat.

Land and sea-breezes.

LASTLY, the natives of this coast enjoy the benefit of the land and sea-breezes, which are gales of no great strength or extent, but extremely refreshing and necessary, where the sun-beams beat with such an insupportable power. The sea-breeze comes on about ten in the morning, fresh, sweet, and enlivening; but the land-breeze which succeeds at night,

(B) Some writers speak of what they call a material thunder-bolt; such a one is said to have fallen on the Turkish mosque at Adrianople in 1693, and such are shewn in the cabinets of the curious, particularly at a is faint, sultry, and foetid, especially when it blows from rivers, where banks are marshy, and covered with rotten mangrove-trees, a thing frequent in this country <sup>a</sup>.

Copenhagen, where a large metallic substance is shewn for a thunderbolt: yet it is probable that this is no more than some mineral melted by the heat of the lightning, or an union of metals.

We have already spoken of the gold and salt of the Gold Coast, in our description of the different kingdoms; it is now time we should proceed to a short account of the quadrupeds, <sup>Of the quadrupeds of the Gold Coast.</sup> fowls, fish, grains, fruits, and roots of the country. Among their tame animals, the first in rank, on account of their utility, are horned cattle, as bulls, cows, sheep, and goats, with which Dinkira, Affiento, Axim, and all the inland countries abound, though only a few black cattle are brought to the coast. At Axim, indeed, Pockeson, Elmina, and Aora, they are pretty numerous, as these countries have an easy means of conveying them from Aquamboe and Lampi. At Axim the pasture is good, the cattle thrive well, breed fast, and b fatten; but at Elmina, and the adjacent countries, they are always lean, dry, furnishing but little milk, and bad beef. Bosman observes, that in this country only, the cows are ever milked, the Negroes being intirely ignorant both of the use and manner of that operation; and here twenty or thirty cows are scarcely sufficient to furnish the director-general's table with milk. The cattle are so light and small, that the largest bull doth not weigh above 250 pounds; however, their size and weight are by no means proportionable; and it is the observation of writers, that all the animals are specifically lighter on the Gold Coast, than in any other part of the globe, which they imagine proceeds from the nature of their aliment, that instead of firm and solid, produces only a spongy, loose, and tough flesh. Hence it is, that all the beef killed for their markets, is of an ungrateful and really nauseous taste: notwithstanding which, a cow sells at so high a price as twelve pounds sterling: c a proof that black cattle are not very plentiful <sup>o</sup>. Artus, after observing the diminutive growth of the cattle, adds, that their scarcity arises from the difficulty of rearing the calves with so small a quantity of milk as is produced by the dam: and hence their veal is still worse than the beef, having a peculiarly offensive taste, as well as a softness extremely disagreeable <sup>p</sup>.

SHEEP are plentiful all over the country, of the shape of our European sheep, but smaller by half, and covered with hair instead of wool: "so that here," says Bosman, "nature is inverted, men wear wool, and sheep hair." Their flesh does not in the least resemble mutton in the taste; it is dry, lean, and hard; so that persons of delicate appetites seldom eat it, and yet it is above the price which the common people can afford. A sheep is d sold at thirty shillings; an extraordinary price for an animal so small, so useless, and so abundant as writers describe them (C).

GOATS are innumerable; every field and hill is covered with them. Their shape differs in nothing from those we every day see, but their size is infinitely smaller; though this is sufficiently compensated by the quality of their flesh, which is sweet, fat, and delicate, especially that of a he-goat which has been castrated when young, and turned out to the mountains; yet are they sold at so small price as seven or eight shillings each. We could wish that authors had given us the reasons why a sheep, whose flesh is contemptible, should bear an extravagant price, while goats, that are eaten by all degrees of men with pleasure, sell at so trifling a sum. The Negroes assign a very ridiculous cause e of the smell peculiar to this animal. They say, that in the early ages of mankind there was a goddess who used to anoint her body with a fragrant ointment, which excited the emulation of the goats, and made them resolve to petition this deity, that she would grant them the receipt for making the ointment. The goddess, incensed at their presumption, thought of a method to revenge herself, at the same time that she obliged them, by seeming to grant their request. Initead of the sweet ointment, she gave them a box of a foetid mixture, with which they bedaubed their bodies, the offensive smell communicating itself to all their posterity. To this day they remain ignorant of the deceit put upon them; they imagine it the true unguent used by the goddess, pride themselves upon it, and are so careful to preserve it, that they industriously avoid the rain, wet, and every thing that can possibly f diminish or wash off the delicious flavour <sup>p</sup>.

THE Gold Coast produces horses of a small size, like those of the north and extremely cold climates. They are scarce in the maritime kingdoms, but plentiful enough in the interior countries. Their shape is bad, the head like that of an ass, and always hanging down; nor is their mettle much higher, it requiring violent blows to put them on a trot, which is their quickest pace. According to Bosman, they are so low, that a tall man mounted on their backs may easily touch the ground with his feet. The country likewise produces a few asses, taller and handsomer than the horses, and generally preferred for riding; for neither are much used in carrying burdens. It is remarked that they

(C) Smith remarks, that the Guiney sheep so little resemble the European, that they can hardly be termed the same genus, but from their shape and bleating; so different is the quality of their flesh and wool. "One "is amazed," says he, "to hear an animal bleat like "a sheep, that is covered with black and white hair

"like a dog (1)."

(1) P. 147.

thrive badly near the sea; and Bosman relates, that three or four asses, which they procure from the interior countries, soon died at Elmina. Hogs are in great plenty; but, like the rest of their quadrupeds, of little value, and their flesh lean and hard. Those, however, which the Europeans fatten are tolerable, though greatly inferior to the pork of Whidah, the best, according to our writers of voyages, in the known world<sup>a</sup>. One may judge of the scarcity of good pork by the price of a fat hog, which is seldom sold for less than three pounds ten shillings sterling.

BUT of all animal food dog's flesh is in the highest repute among the Negroes. Those of the country are a peculiar species, distinct from any known in Europe: they neither bite nor bark; they are of all colours, black, red, white, and yellow; and even the European dogs degenerate surprisingly in a few years; their ears growing long, stiff, and erect, like those of a fox. The Negroes give a great price for a dog; they build kennels for them, breed up the young with great care, and drive them to market like flocks of sheep, where they sell at an exorbitant price. Barbot says, that their tails are long, pointed, and without hair; sometimes, says he, their whole skins are bare and speckled; but this kind of animal is not frequent, nor is it much coveted, being equally offensive to the sight and the touch. The Negroes, borrowing the name from the Portuguese, call dogs cabre de matto, because they love their flesh, and prefer it to beef or mutton.

A CAT is an animal much esteemed by Negroes, especially such of them as are expert in killing rats and mice, creatures with which the whole coast is greatly infested. Some of them eat their flesh; but this is a kind of food in little request, except among the poorest Negroes and slaves, who sometimes steal them from the Europeans for that purpose, and to satisfy the cravings of nature<sup>c</sup>.

WE come now to the wild quadrupeds, among which the elephant claims the first place, on account of his prodigious bulk and great sagacity. This noble animal has been already described, but the writers of voyages observe some peculiar properties in the elephant of the Gold Coast; and indeed a creature of so immense stature, and so extraordinary qualities, will always afford room for new observations. No part of Africa, or perhaps of the known world, has a greater number of elephants than the Ivory Coast; but they are not so numerous on the Gold Coast. The countries of Ancobar and Axim produce indeed a great number; but as these places form the frontiers of both coasts, they are probably the elephants of the Ivory Coast that are met with and every day killed here. A good many are likewise found in the kingdom of Fetu; and it may serve for a general observation, that the less populous a country is, the more it abounds with wild animals of all kinds. All the interior kingdoms have them, from whence they come down to the coasts, within musquet-shot of the European settlements, and commit abundance of mischief, carrying terror and desolation where-ever they go. In the year 1697, an elephant of an uncommon magnitude was killed near the Dutch fort of Acra, his two great teeth or tusks weighing 220 pounds. In 1700, a Negro at Axim, who was accustomed to elephant-hunting, and had killed several, took aim at one that came near his hut; but the musquet missing fire, the elephant gave him chase, overtook him, and broke the gun in pieces, disdaining to hurt the man. The same year an elephant came to Elmina, walking gravely along the shore, when he was first discovered by the Negroes, who boldly surrounded him unfurnished with weapons. The elephant suffered them to encompass him, going gravely along with them to mount St. Jago, where one of the officers of the fort fired at him with a musquet-ball, which hit him above the eye, but did not irritate or seem in the least to offend him. Neither this nor several other shots poured in upon him made him in the smallest degree mend his pace: the only effect they had was to make him now-and-then toss his head in a menacing manner, and prick up his ears, which were of a prodigious size. At last he entered the company's garden, pushing before him the gate, as if no impediment at all were in the way, and breaking down large coco-trees; in doing which, says our author, the force he exerted may aptly be compared to the strength a man applies in beating a child. While he was in the garden above an hundred shot were fired at him, which made him bleed exceedingly, but did not raise his indignation; nor would his fury have at all broke forth, if a Negro had not been hardy enough to lay hold of his tail, and attempt to cut it off; a piece of imprudence of which he had reason to repent. The elephant turned swiftly round, hit him with his proboscis, which overturned him, then trampled and tore him in pieces with his tusks and feet; after which he moved a little aside, and suffered the body to be taken away without offering the least resistance. At length through loss of blood he became faint, and retiring under the shade of a tree, laid himself quietly down and breathed his last: a circumstance that confirms Bosman in the notion the Negroes have, that as soon as an elephant perceives death approaching, he retires out of decency under a tree, or into a thicket, and there expires. He had seen four instances of this, and was told of a number of others from unquestionable authority<sup>d</sup>.

- a THE elephants of this coast are rather of a smaller size than those of the East Indies, but similar in shape and disposition. Bosman is at great pains to refute the assertions of naturalists concerning this animal, which he thinks absurd and impossible. He denies that we know any thing of their manner of ingendering, in which they are extremely shy and modest: he ridicules the common notions of their long pregnancy, extraordinary age, shedding their teeth, and a number of other circumstances related for truth by Pliny, and from him adopted by succeeding naturalists; but the last particular is asserted by Smith, and corroborated with such arguments as one would think sufficient to confirm it. Atkins joins in the same opinion; but then he confines it to the young ones, believing that they change the old for young teeth, like children, and some brute animals. To this may be added the testimony of the Negroes from experience, who never find but a single tooth at a time, and that frequently where no dead elephant or skeleton had ever been found. Barbot assures us, that an elephant swims with the swiftness of a galley with six oars, and will outrun a horse for a short distance; qualities which one would not expect in an animal of so prodigious a bulk. The Negroes distinguish them into three kinds, the river, the mountain, and the wood elephant. The river elephant takes its name from its delighting in marshy grounds and the borders of rivers that overflow their banks. The teeth of this animal have a bluish cast, are spongy, and difficult to draw and work, on account of roots and knobs, which change the course of the grain. The mountain elephant is fierce, outrageous, and difficult to break; the teeth small, but hard and much esteemed. As for the elephant that is found in woods, it is of all the largest and gentlest: the teeth large, white, and in quality the nearest to those of the mountain elephant. Hunting them is a common but dangerous diversion, and several of the Negroes lose their lives every year in this sport. The most common and surest method is to fire at them with iron bullets; for lead is found too soft to penetrate those thick hard scales, that serve to shield his body like a coat of mail. No white elephants are ever met with on the coast, although travellers relate that they are common enough in the interior countries along the Niger in Abissinia, and in the province of Zanzibar. Notwithstanding the monstrous size of this animal, the parts serving for generation are small, and by no means proportioned to the bulk of the body. They are concealed within the reins, as Bosman expresses it; which may perhaps have given rise to the notion of their ingendering backwards. But this is sufficient concerning an animal not peculiar to this country, that has so frequently been described by the most accurate naturalists.

TIGERS are very numerous in almost every part of the coast. The Negroes call them Boben, and they are usually of the size of a calf, large and strong in the fore feet and shoulders, and the skin beautifully spotted with black and yellow. They are more destructive in Guinea than all the other beasts of prey; and a man that enters a wood unarmed, runs the greatest hazard of his life; however, nothing besides hunger will oblige them to attack a man. Bosman has seen young ones so tame, that they might be fondled and played with as familiarly as a cat; but the fierceness of their nature recurs as they grow up. The Negroes distinguish them into five different species, and affix proper names to each; but no author has either ventured to translate those terms, or describe the characteristic marks (D).

In size the buffaloe comes nearest to the elephant of any quadruped found on the Gold Coast; but they are so scarce, as hardly to merit a rank among the animals of that country. The jackall is always found on the Gold Coast, particularly in Aquamboe and Acra. It is a bold and fierce animal, that attacks whatever comes in the way. This is a species of wild dog, of the size of a mastiff, long in the limbs, with large strong claws, their hair short and spotted, their head large and flat, and their teeth surprisingly sharp and pointed. It is probable, from some circumstances which voyagers relate, that he has frequently been mistaken for the wolf; and indeed the description which most writers give of either may very well serve for both. Notwithstanding Bosman and Smith describe the head of the jackall in the preceding manner, we have reason to believe, from good authority, that his head more resembles that of a fox than of a mastiff; a great space between the eyes, the upper part of the face broad, terminating like a wedge at the mouth.

On the Gold Coast is a species of wild boar, but not so fierce as in northern and cold countries. As they are not numerous, and the flesh tender, fat, and delicious, they sell at a great price, and are always preferred to tame hogs. Deer of all kinds and sizes are

(D) Bosman relates the following method the Dutch have of killing the tigers, without either the danger or fatigue of hunting them. "They lay several loaded musquets near the sheepfold, the lock well covered with a box (as a notion prevails, that a tiger dreads

"the sight of fire-arms), to which a piece of mutton is fastened by a cord. The musquet and mutton are so disposed, that he cannot touch the latter without being opposite to the muzzle of the former; and the smallest touch makes it go off like a trap (2).

found in every part of the country, and in such abundance, that they are seen in flocks of an hundred together. Bosman mentions twenty different kinds of deer, some as large as a small cow, and others not exceeding a cat in size. The most beautiful is a small red deer, with short black horns, and legs as slender as a tobacco-pipe. Nothing can exceed this little delicate animal in swiftness and activity, which Bosman says he has seen leap over a wall fourteen feet high with the utmost facility (E). Another kind of deer he describes of a fine orange colour, beautifully speckled and streaked with white, his head, ears, and legs long, and the latter delicately slender. Several Europeans have attempted to import both these animals; but they were of so delicate a nature, that, though they were inclosed in boxes * filled with cotton, they died as soon as they entered a cold climate.

ARTUS relates, that some countries on the Gold Coast abound with incredible numbers of hares, rabbits, does, and foxes; in taking of which, the Negroes have several ingenious contrivances †. Bosman mentions four different sorts of wild cats, among which he reckons the civet-cat, which the Negroes have the art of catching young, and sell to the Europeans for nine or ten shillings each. Great care and trouble are required to rear them: the food is pap, panada of boiled millet, flesh, and fish; the two last to be given with caution. They produce civet even when very young, of which that of the male is the best, the urine of the female spoiling the quality of the civet. According to Barbot, the civet-cat, which the Negroes call kankan, and the Portuguese, gatos de aglalia, resembles a fox in size and shape; but the feet somewhat longer, and the tail exactly like a cat's, if not longer in proportion to the body. The hair is grey, spotted with black. It prefers entrails of animals to millet or any other food; and living upon flesh, it is supposed, increases the quantity of civet ‡. Barbot makes directly the same observation with Bosman concerning the musk of the female; and both relate, that it is customary to torment, tease, and irritate her before the musk is taken from the bag, which it is supposed heightens the flavour: and Bosman recommends a smooth wooden spoon to be used in emptying the sac or bag, for fear of wounding the tender coats §.

HERE likewise are found a few porcupines, which Bosman describes about two feet and a half high, and with teeth so keen, that it will gnaw through the hardest wood. He once put one of them in an oak hoghead, by way of cage, imagining that he had sufficiently guarded against its escape; but in the space of one night it had almost eat through. He is so bold, that he ventures to attack the largest snake, and fierce battles frequently happen between them. The Negroes and some Europeans esteem their flesh very delicious. Bosman speaks also of a kind of hedge-hog; but without the quality of rolling itself as our European hedge-hogs do †. And Artus mentions a number of wild quadrupeds peculiar to the coast; but as no writer has described them all, we must be satisfied with the imperfect accounts they afford ‡.

ON the Gold Coast is found a quadruped which the Negroes call potto, the sluggard; a name probably given from its sluggish and heavy nature, a few yards being a long day's journey. Some writers affirm, that when this animal has made his way up a tree, remembering the fatigue he underwent, he does not remove his quarters till he has intirely consumed the leaves, after which he descends sleek and fat; but is so tedious in his progress to another tree, that he loses all the benefit of his last situation, becoming poor, lean, and feeble before he can fix in a new habitation. It is an animal so hideously ugly, that Bosman believes nature produces nothing equal to it in this particular. Its fore-feet greatly resemble hands; it is cloathed with a coarse red hair, and its head is large beyond all proportion to the size of the body. This is the whole of his description, which he concludes with affirming, that it was not possible to look upon it without horror, its ugliness constituting all that is peculiar to it. Besides this, Bosman slightly mentions three or four other quadrupeds almost peculiar to Guiney. Among these is a little animal to which the Negroes give the name of berbe, and the Europeans of wine-bibber, from its fondness of palm-wine, which it sucks up with greediness. He calls it a species of cat; but with a longer head, and more pointed snout or jaws; spotted like the civet-cat; active and fierce when enraged, but otherwise tame and familiar, after it has been accustomed to be handled. The next animal is about the size of a rat, of a mixed colour of brown and grey hair with white spots; the tail is long, and furnished with a fine smooth brush, with which it covers the whole back, like a squirrel, of which it seems to be a species. The third sort, when full grown, are about twice the bulk of the former; mischievous, fierce, * Epist. 14. † Apud De Bruy, p. 52. ‡ Ubi supra. § P. 209. † Epist. 14. ‡ ARTUS, ibid.

(E) Smith calls this animal a beautiful sort of antelope, about the size of a rabbit; but so swift, that it seems to fly among the bushes: however, the Negroes sometimes catch them, and bring them as presents to the European factors, by whom they are highly valued, both for their beauty and the deliciousness of their flesh (3).

<sup>a</sup> and dangerous in the bite. The Negroes call it kokebo. It is a cruel enemy to the feathered kind, especially fowls, which it catches by speed of foot, and carries off by its strength, though but a small animal. This Bosman has seen it do; though he questions the veracity of many stories related of it by Foquenbourg<sup>d</sup>.

In the woods is found a long slender animal, something resembling a weazel in shape, with a long tail, and large brush at the extremity. His colour is pale, inclining to brown, and his hair long and thin. The Negroes call this animal arampo, or man-eater; because it digs up graves, and prefers human flesh to all other. The Negroes relate, that as soon as it uncovers a body, and perfectly removes the earth from it, it goes round the grave; as if they intimated, say the Negroes, that a bad action cannot be committed without feeling a sensation of repugnance, agreeable to the poet's maxim<sup>e</sup>:

Displicet auctori. Prima est hæc ultio, quod se Judice, nemo nocens absolvitur* -----

But however natural and ingenious this reflection may be, we are inclined to believe, that these rounds are rather taken to examine the ground; the animal dreading, through a natural instinct, the loss of its prey; and the same is remarked of cats and dogs, who seize upon any thing clandestinely, and before leave has been granted by their masters.

But of all the quadrupeds on the Gold Coast, rats and mice are the most numerous and <sup>c</sup> destructive. One species of the former is large and fierce, committing prodigious havock among the grain. The Dutch call it a wild rat, it resembling that animal in shape and nature, though it often exceeds the size of a cat. The flesh of it is eaten with luxury by the Negroes, and thought delicious by such Europeans as could overcome their prejudices, and prevail on themselves to eat a rat. At Axim is seen another kind of rat, which the Negroes call boutre, of much the same size with the former, but more slender. It is inconceivable the damage this little animal does in the magazines of corn, one of them destroying in a night more than a hundred common rats; for after having eat all it can, then it falls to work to spoil all it cannot carry off. Among the mice of the country Bosman speaks of one which he calls the mink-mouse, on account of its strong civet flavour; <sup>d</sup> which he believes proceeds from the skin, and not from any particular sac in which the perfume is contained. Both he and Smith distinguish above fifty different sorts of mice, all of them agreeing in one quality, of being as mischievous as possible. The same they affirm of the monkey, an animal extremely abundant here, and as various in their kinds as they are numerous. The most common sort are those the Dutch call smitten, of a pale mouse-colour, and extraordinary size, some of them above five feet high. Bosman saw one as large as an ordinary man, but less corpulent. An English gentleman related to him, that at Winibaw they are so bold and strong, as to attack a man; and two soldiers belonging to the factory were once in great danger of being cuffed to death by a company of apes, had they not been seasonably rescued. The Negroes are fully convinced that policy <sup>e</sup> only prevents their speaking, which they decline to avoid work, and to live in indolence. He speaks of a beautiful jet-black small monkey, with long hair, and a white beard, which Europeans greatly prize, and purchase for about eighteen shillings sterling. Besides these, they are fond of three other kinds, all of them exceeding small, of a mixed colour, with breasts and faces, and a disposition beyond imagination docile and tractable. But it would be endless to recite all the various kinds of which voyagers speak, especially as they may all be ranged under two general classes, the wild and tame: the former large, bold, and of a fierceness that cannot be subdued; and the other smaller, gentle, and familiar in its nature; but full of sport, tricks, and wantonness<sup>f</sup>. There is one, however, which we cannot help describing from Smith, Atkins, and Barbot, on account of its near <sup>f</sup> resemblance in figure, features, natural and imitative qualities to the human species. It had a regular and well-framed face, exactly resembling a child's, thinly covered with hair; it had no tail, and would eat nothing but milk, and boiled millet or barley. When hungry, it cried so like a child, that it was not possible to distinguish their voices. The arms and hands were perfectly well proportioned, and the animal used them with all the address of a human creature. Barbot observes, that the face is perfectly white, but wrinkled, more strongly resembling a little old woman than a child. The teeth are regular, but yellow, and the palms of the hands and fingers exceeding white and smooth, the rest of the body being cloathed with a natural coat of hair. They are reported to be extremely fond of women; and that the Negro women frequently admit of their beastly embraces. In a word, from their description, this animal, which the Negroes call <sup>g</sup> baggo, appears to be the same we find mentioned by naturalists under the appellation of mandrill. Atkins reports, that he frequently met with that species of ape called ouran outang in the woods of the Gold Coast. In the year 1733, captain Flower brought one to

London, in his return from Angola. It died by the way; but he preserved the body so carefully in spirits, that he perfectly kept his natural appearance, which in every respect resembled the human figure. His face and organs of generation, his hands, legs, and feet, were altogether human: and captain Flower affirmed, that he used to walk erect, sit upon a chair on his buttocks, with his legs hanging down, eat and drink like a man. However, as this animal is mentioned by no other author as a native of Guiney, we will not dwell on the description<sup>a</sup>.

Among the quadrupeds of the Gold Coast the lizard deserves notice; of which there are various kinds. One called quoggeto, is of a monstrous size, approaching rather to that of an allegator than a lizard. Artus, Dapper, and Barbot affirm, that it measures eight feet in length, the tail alone being one-fourth. Its scales are compared to the leaves of an artichoke, but less pointed, and so stiff, that they protect it against the bite of any animal. Its chief enemies are the tyger and the leopard, who pursue it, and with great difficulty overtake it. As soon as the lizard perceives that she can no longer depend upon her swiftness, she wraps herself in her coat of mail, and becomes invulnerable. The Negroes kill it by striking the head: they sell the skin to the Europeans, and eat the flesh, which is white and relishing. It lives upon ants; to catch which it puts out its long tongue, covered with a glutinous saliva. Des Marchais speaks of it as a gentle, inoffensive animal; but Dapper calls it a beast of prey, that greatly resembles the crocodile<sup>b</sup>.

The ceyman, crocodile, or allegator, which is a smaller kind of the same animal, is so plenty in Guiney, that every river on the coast is filled with them, especially about Bourtry, where Bosman has seen fifty of them in a day, each twenty feet long. In hot weather they lie basking themselves in the sun in crowds along the shore, and as soon as they perceive a man approaching, plunge into the river; though they seldom fly from any other animal. The crocodile is so well known, that it would be unnecessary to describe it. Another amphibious animal found on the Gold Coast is the guana, which in particular resembles the crocodile; but is no more than four feet in length. It is scaly, of a black ground, spotted with different colours; the eyes are round, and the flesh tender. Villault assures us, that dragons are found on the Gold Coast: however, as he does not favour us with a description, we may reasonably question the truth of his assertion. Cameleons are found in great abundance; and Bosman asserts, with Le Brun, the truth of their changing colour with whatever comes near them, red only excepted. It is about the length of a lizard, and much like it; but the tongue is as long as the whole body, which it uses in catching flies, the only food it delights in. This, it is probable, has given many naturalists the opinion that it lives upon air. As the gentlemen of the royal academy at Paris have so accurately described this animal, we shall refer the reader to their memoirs, in which he will find a very satisfactory account both of the cameleon and salamander, another animal said to be a native of the Gold Coast. We must only observe, that Smith had seen a salamander basking in the meridian sun, upon a stone so hot, that the hand could not bear it; and yet, when he went to the animal, it felt as cold as ice: however, the French philosophers seem to have justly exploded the notion of its being able to live in the fire<sup>c</sup>.

Of the birds and feathered animals of the Gold Coast.

We proceed now to the feathered kind, of which, besides almost all the birds known to Europe, Guiney, and especially the Gold Coast, affords a great number peculiar to the country. The pheasants of the Gold Coast are the most beautiful in the world, the plumage consisting of a bright white and blue, the mixture forming a sort of charming colour; the neck is encircled with a shining sky-coloured ring, about two fingers broad, and the head adorned with a fine black tuft, soft as an ostrich's feathers. The Whidah pheasant is also found here. The feathers of this bird are grey and white, and much inferior in beauty to the plumage of the former. His head is bald, and covered only with a hard, callous, knotty, uneven skin, like a turkey, and the bill yellow. Artus and Bosman had both seen a particular species of water-fowl, in shape resembling a duck, but incomparably more beautiful in the feathers, which were an elegant lively green, and the feet and bill red as coral. In the year 1700, a Dutchman brought the latter a duck, which he had just shot. His feet and bill were yellow, and the plumage a mixture of grey and green feathers: very beautiful, but inferior to the former. Both are so scarce, that they are seldom seen in an age<sup>d</sup>.

Bosman and Villault mention a great variety of turtle-doves, each of them distinct in colour and some other peculiarities from the others; but this bird is so various in Europe, that it would be tedious to characterize them all. The crown-bird, which we mentioned before, is here found in greater plenty than in any part of Guiney, except Whidah. The legs of this bird are long, like those of a stork: its body is chiefly covered with black feathers, and the wings with large red, white, and black quills. The head is beautified with black shining spots, as large as a six-pence, and the fore part of the head cloathed with a

a. thick black down, soft as velvet, over which rises a beautiful tuft of yellow and speckled feathers, something resembling a crown, in the manner in which they are disposed. Notwithstanding all those beauties, Bosman thinks it greatly inferior to the former, and indeed to many other birds on the coast.

ABOUT Apam there is a bird, which for its beauty surpasses every other, the peacock excepted, that our author ever saw; but he does not favour us with the name; though from his description it would appear to be a kind of parrot, the bill, claws, and size, exactly resembling that animal. The bill is yellow, the breast and belly of a fine green colour, and the back a mixture of grey, red, sky-blue, and a kind of violet plumage. The head, neck, and tail are of an excellent shining green, the feathers rising like a comb on the head. The eyes are large, and beautifully marked near the eye-lids with red rays that cannot be described in words. "To conclude," says he, "this bird is not to be paralleled." Bosman takes notice, that there are hundreds of large and small birds entirely unknown in Europe, even to the best naturalists, for which the Negroes themselves have no names. Among these he reckons a beautiful bird, that frequents the borders of rivers and lakes. It is about the size of a chicken, the upper part of his body black or brown, spotted with white, and the breast and belly a fine yellow or red. On the head stands erect a tuft of speckled smooth feathers, that gives a look of majesty to the bird, some of them falling down on his bill, which is remarkably thick and long in proportion to his body. Föquenbourg affirms that he saw peacocks near the river Bourtry; but as no other writer takes notice of that bird as a native of the Gold Coast, we are inclined to believe it the crown-bird, with the long spangled tail; for of these birds there are various kinds.

ARTUS, Barböt, and Bosman describe a fowl peculiar to this country; to which, however, they give no name. This bird is of the size of a goose, his wings immoderately large and broad, covered with dark feathers, if they may be called so; for they more resemble hair. Under his bill he has a pouch or maw, about nine inches long, naked, and like the skin of the head of a turkey, in which he hoards his food. His neck is long, and his head large beyond all proportion to his body, bold, and uncommonly ugly; but his eyes are large, black, and lively, and his bill thick and long: his usual food is fish, of which he devours a quantity sufficient for four men, swallowing them whole with the greatest facility; as he likewise does rats, of which he is fond.

Bosman kept one at Elmina, which used to run tamely about the fort, and suffered himself to be handled by all sorts of people, whether strangers or others. When he caught a rat, he immediately swallowed it; and, if fondled, would disgorge it, as a present and mark of his gratitude, laying it at the person's feet who had taken the most notice of him. "It was ridiculous enough," says our author, "to see him fight, peck, and flap his wings round the boys in the fort, of whom he always had the better, if fish or rats were to be the reward of victory." Smith affirms, that this is the bird which the Negroes call Pokkoe, and is found in the greatest plenty on the banks of the river Bourtry.

c. THE same authors speak of another owl, about the size of the former; but with a neck so long, that his head is above six feet from the ground. His feathers are black, white, red, sky, and several other colours, intermixed in a very beautiful manner; his eyes large and yellow: and his usual residence on the banks of the river; for he is scarce ever seen any-where else. His name is equally unknown to the Europeans and Negroes; nor have naturalists classed him under any species of fowl. Indeed the account we have from voyagers is much too general to admit it. Another of these anonymous birds is described, with a long black bill, his body chequered with yellow and bright blue feathers, a black semicircle half-way round his neck, a long tail, composed of yellow, blue, and black feathers, and a few erect feathers of various colours on his head. We have no account of his size; nor of that of another fowl of the same species, differing only in the sharpness of his bill, in having the lower part of his body clothed with black feathers, while his back is adorned with a beautiful yellow and smooth plumage. Next follows a bird without a name, of much the same figure as the former; only with this difference, that his legs and toes are remarkably long, and his plumage a mixture of grey and yellow. The next is a small bird, about the size of a thrush, and shaped like a sparrow; his colour renders him very beautiful, his head and breast being black as jet, his wings and feet grey, and his neck and tail of a bright crimson hue. It is of so delicate a nature, that it cannot be kept alive for any time in a cage. But one of the most beautiful birds produced in Guinea is what Bosman describes as a sea-fowl, or rather a river-bird. His wings or the upper part of the body are intirely blue, somewhat inclining to a sky-colour. The plumage of his neck and tuft on his head are of the same dye, and his feet and bill of a fine coral red; but we are left in the dark both as to his name and dimensions.

ALL the writers of voyages to Guiney mention a small bird peculiar to the Gold Coast, of a the granivorous kind; his neck, breast, or lower part of his body of a dark red, the head jet-black, except a beautiful yellow spot on the forehead; his back and wings jet-black, and his tail, which is long, a mixture of black, yellow, and red feathers. Another of the size of the former, resembles him likewise in plumage; only that the breast and neck are of a bright scarlet hue, the head of a beautiful yellow, and all the rest of a fine glossy black. To this may be added a bird of the size of a blackbird, which the Negroes call the parry-bird, from beautiful specks of white, terminating in rays, with which his head or body is covered. His voice, they say, is as loud as the roaring of a bull; but Bosman describes it only as a deep, hollow, and loud sound<sup>p</sup>. Besides these, the Gold Coast abounds with becasigoes, partridges, linnets, larks, parroquets, parrots, canary-birds (which by the way are said to be peculiar to those islands), doves, wood-pigeons, geese, ducks, turkeys, and, in a word, all those birds known to Europe, or almost any other part of the world, excepting peacocks and ostriches, none of which were ever seen on the Gold Coast. b and insects.

HAVING described the birds and quadrupeds in the best manner the authority of voyagers will permit, we now enter upon an account of the reptiles found on the Gold Coast, in which we fear we shall fall as short of an accurate relation, as in the former particulars. Those reptiles to which voyagers have given names, are snakes, toads, frogs, vipers, scorpions, land-crabs, snails, caterpillars, locusts, grasshoppers, hemibottles, worms, and millepedes, &c. of each of which there is such a variety, as it would be impossible to describe. We shall therefore touch only upon those the most curious, and least known, in which number we must reckon those snakes of so monstrous a size, as almost to exceed credit. Bosman has seen snakes of twenty feet in length, and six in circumference, and he believes they are much larger in the inland countries; a supposition that Artus confirms, by assuring us, that he has seen snakes thirty-two feet long, and near ten feet round, containing whole oxen and men in their bowels<sup>q</sup>: an assertion which we must leave to the reader to credit or not, as his judgment directs. Bosman says, that he found in the stomach of a snake a whole deer, and in another the body of a man, and yet neither of these exceeded twenty feet in length. Most of them are poisonous; but the small ones, about a yard long, variegated with white, black, and yellow spots, are venomous to an extreme; and Bosman was in danger once of losing his life by a snake of this kind<sup>r</sup>. c

THE same author relates, that several persons besides himself have seen dead snakes with distinct double heads, each of them having every organ belonging to that part; and Artus describes the dragon, or winged serpent, which he affirms he had seen more than once. This animal, says he, bears a mortal enmity to the elephant, with whom he is at eternal war. His tail is long, his teeth sharp, and his body spotted with blue and green, sometimes streaked; but he forgets to describe the wings. They are commonly ten ells in length, but they have been seen at least an hundred yards long. May not the reader believe the honest Norwegian prelate's account of the Craken, after this! d

BOSMAN, who speaks on his own knowledge, and more within bounds, says, that the woods, the fields, the Negroes huts, the European forts, and even their bed-chambers, are frequently infested with snakes, where he has often killed them. One he describes about fourteen feet in length, with two claws, at the distance of two feet from the extremity of his tail, with which he helps to rear himself when he seizes his prey. His head, says he, resembles a pike, and the jaws are armed with teeth in much the same manner. He describes another snake about five feet long, with a broad flat head, a sharp tooth pointing from his jaw through the nostril, and his skin speckled with a variety of beautiful colours. With this tooth it is that he wounds his prey; and the Negroes have often experienced its sharpness, stumbling upon it when the animal is fast asleep after a hearty repast. This is probably the same animal naturalists call the horned serpent. In the year 1689, the Negroes killed a snake at Axim twenty-two feet long; and Smith, who saw it, affirms, that it contained a complete deer in the stomach<sup>s</sup>. About the same time another was destroyed at Bourtry, in the belly of which was found the greatest part of a Negro it had devoured. They frequently have furious engagements with toads and porcupines, one of which encounters Bosman had once occasion to see, which afforded great diversion. At the Dutch fort at Mawri, the workmen found a large snake under a pile of stones, which they determined to seize. After removing a part of the rubbish, a slave seeing the tail peeping out between two stones, cut it off with his knife: imagining this must certainly destroy him, he proceeded to remove the rest of the stones. As soon as the snake found itself uncovered, it turned round, and spit its venom all over the face of the Negro, which immediately blinded him; however, with proper care, he recovered in a few weeks, and was perfectly restored to his sight<sup>t</sup>. The author observes, from frequent experience among the Negroes, that the bite of a snake is attended with great pain, swelling, and violent inflammations, though seldom mortal: but he imagines that their poison dif-

a fers in quality according to the circumstances of their strength and resentment; since he has known the slightest bite from the same kind of snake, often attended with almost fatal consequences. The Negroes esteem them excellent food, and prefer their flesh to any kind of animal diet, without distinguishing whether they are poisonous or not.

SCORPIONS are found in great numbers on the Gold Coast; one kind very small, the other about the size of a large cray-fish, to which it has a strong likeness: but this difference of bulk makes none in the quality of their poison, which is equally mortal in all. Bosman gives an accurate drawing of one from the life; but he says, that he has seen some as large as a lobster, and the whole body covered over with long hair. The scorpion is indeed one of the most ugly, as well as the most noxious of all animals. Some of them b are provided with a sac full of poison, about half an inch wide, and situated near the tail, which they eject with great fury whenever they strike. The most certain antidote against the malignancy of this poison, according to Barbot, is crushing the scorpion into a poultice, and applying him to the wound<sup>u</sup>. Another specific remedy, according to him and Bosman, is rubbing the wound with the penis of a child; a superstitious notion we imagine they must have borrowed of the Negroes.

EVERY part of Guinea is filled with large black spiders, resembling in figure and size the tarantula. This ugly animal the Negroes call anonse; his body is of an oblong form, his head flat, broader before than behind, and his legs as thick as a man's finger. Bosman took one in his chamber, which he sent over to Europe, as a present to some virtuoso. Barbot and Smith tell us, that at Cape Coast, in the rainy months of June and July, they find a kind of spider larger than a beetle, but flat like that insect, greatly resembling a small crab; nay, Smith affirms, that he once caught one as large as the greatest sized land crab. He could easily perceive that it was a female; for under the belly hung a sac, in which several young were contained: and the vulgar opinion is, that this monstrous insect is venomous<sup>w</sup>.

AMONG the other poisonous animals produced here, the centipedes ought not to be forgot, as they are here found in great numbers. This is a flat insect, about nine inches long, spotted on the body, and the head armed by two long horns, with which it strikes. The sting of this animal is less malignant than the bite of the scorpion: it is, however, attended with great pain, and a considerable inflammation for several hours. Smith describes an animal, which he calls the cockroach, of a brown colour, the shape of a beetle, but two inches long in the body. This insect has an irreconcilable aversion to bugs, and is sure to extirpate those nauseous vermin where-ever they appear. We shall conclude this account of reptiles and insects with Bosman's relation of the ants on the Gold Coast. These vermin raise hills at least ten feet high, in the middle of the fields, and they frequently build large nests in the tops of lofty trees, whence they sometimes come down in myriads to the forts and chambers of the Europeans, and oblige them to abandon their beds in the middle of the night. They are so rapacious, that no animal can withstand them; for what individuals want in bulk, is sufficiently compensated by the number. They have frequently in the night attacked one of Bosman's live sheep, which he has found reduced to a perfect skeleton in the morning, and so artificially dissected, that the nicest anatomist could not exceed it. It is one of their amusements, says our author, to dissect fowls and chickens in this manner; nay, the very rats, with all their speed, cannot escape them. One of them no sooner lays hold of a rat, than that animal, as mischievous as themselves, is surely gone; for in attempting to make his escape, he is seized by a great number of others, who never part with him till a body sufficient to remove the prey to a safe place is assembled. Bosman has placed a worm or a beetle before one of them, who immediately went away, and returned in less than a minute with an army proportioned to the prey to be carried off. If this body proved insufficient, a messenger was detached for more; after which they seized their prey, and carried it away in good order, each of them visibly applying his strength in the proper direction to assist his associates. They are of various sizes, and of all colours. The sting of the red ant inflames to a great degree, and produces violent pain; but it soon wears off with the application of a little oil or honey. These are the least, and not much larger than the ants and pismires of Europe; though the other coloured ones are little short of an inch in length<sup>x</sup>. But we will not indulge ourselves in all the marvellous stories related of these surprising animals, both in Europe and Africa.

THE want of flesh, and good beef, mutton, and pork on the Gold Coast, renders fish the more valuable and necessary, this being the principal support both of Negroes and Europeans. Of the fish The wisdom of Providence hath abundantly supplied the deficiency of the former, by found on the prodigious shoals of the latter, with which all the sea-coasts and rivers of that country the lakes and abound. Both afford fish of various sorts, of the most delicious kinds; and particularly Gold Coast. the sea, which might supply ten times the number of the inhabitants. The first that is mentioned by writers is the Brazil cod, about the size and nearly the shape of a Newfound-land cod. This is a fish in great repute for the delicacy of the flavour, the richness and fatness of the food. The next is a fish called piste pamphier by the Negroes; it is flat, about the size of a flounder, but greatly surpassing it in flavour and delicacy. Bream are caught in great abundance, and they are of three kinds, two of which are very fat and excellent; they go likewise by the name brojead. Among their sea-fish may be reckoned the bonettoe, jaoe, pike, stockfish, and above all, the pilchard, which is caught in the utmost abundance<sup>y</sup>. In a word, no part of the world produces greater plenty, or variety; but as none are found that may not be met with on other coasts, in lakes, and rivers, it would be unnecessary to extend the article.

Of the trees, shrubs, plants,
roots, pulse,
&c. of the Gold Coast.

THE reader cannot expect that, in a general history, on so extensive a plan, we should specify minutely every production of a country; sufficient it is that we point out such as are peculiar to it, and the most useful to the natives, either in trade, or in supplying the necessaries of life. To begin with the dendrology of the Gold Coast; the first tree we shall take notice of is the palm, whence the Negroes draw their wine. It indeed claims the pre-eminence, since, with the addition of a little bread and fish, it is the chief support of the natives. The first production of this tree is its nut, which roasted young, eats deliciously. When it is full-grown and ripe, it is covered with a brown shell, black on the hinder part. In this the oil is contained, obtained by expression, in the same manner as oil of olives. The natural colour of palm-oil is red; but if kept for any space of time, it usually turns white. Most of the Europeans, on their first arrival, think this oil nauseous, and to a great degree unpalatable; but to a Negro it affords the most luxurious sauce, and the former come by habit not to despise it. Bosman affirms, that he prefers it in several dishes to oil of olives, and is convinced by long experience that it is strengthening and wholesome. After the oil is expressed, the pulp is eaten by the natives; but Europeans give it to fatten their hogs; for which purpose it is excellent, rendering their flesh firm, solid, and sweet<sup>z</sup>.

THE next and most valuable part of its produce is the wine, which they draw off by lopping the branches, and reducing the tree to a stump, when it is full-grown. After it has stood a few days in this condition, it is bored in the thickest part of the trunk, and a small pipe or reed introduced into the wound, which begins immediately to bleed, and continues dropping for the space of a month. When the tree is almost drained, a fire is kindled at the bottom, which makes it bleed afresh, till the whole juice is drawn off. They receive it into bottles and pitchers, in which it is kept for the year round; though, unlike other wines, it loses by age. The most agreeable way of drinking it is fresh from the tree, and then it is an exceeding pleasant liquor, but withal so strong, that it soon intoxicates. What the Negroes bring from the interior countries is adulterated, and mixed with water; yet it is greedily sought after by the meaner sort of people, who find means to produce the desired effects by increasing the dose. When the palm-tree is drained of the wine, it is of no farther use, as it never buds after: however, it serves for fuel, plank, and other household necessaries; while its leaves, when green, are used in making ropes, nets, covering houses, and the like<sup>a</sup>.

ANOTHER kind of palm-wine is peculiar to the country of Fantin, and called quacker, from its surprising exhilarating qualities. It exceeds the other greatly in delicacy of flavour, as well as in strength; half the quantity of what is usually taken of the other to enliven conversation, being of this more than the stoutest man is able to carry off. The tree whence it is drawn is a kind of dwarf palm. A third sort of palm-wine is called pardon, pleasant to the taste, but weaker than any of the former. This is drawn from a peculiar species of palm in the countries of Ankobar, Abrokoe, Axim, and Ante. The fourth and last kind is made in the countries of Jabi and Adom. The flavour is entirely different, but not less pleasant; and as to strength, it does not greatly exceed milk, to the taste of which it bears some resemblance. If it be not drank fresh from the tree, it loses all its flavour, the only quality it possesses; and keeping it for ten hours will make it sour as vinegar. This wine is called crissia, never used but for the sake of variety by the Europeans; although the Negroes are fond of it, from a notion that it occasions the parts of generation to grow to an enormous size; a quality in great esteem among them. Bosman is inclined to credit this notion, as he has frequently observed that the Negroes of those countries seem to confirm the truth of the remark, by an extraordinary proportion of this member<sup>b</sup>.

THE trunk of a full-grown palm-tree is about six feet in circumference, and little more in height; but the branches shoot up at least twenty feet. The tree called quacker is about half the size; its branches are called bamboes, and used in covering houses, and several other purposes. On each side the bamboe grow the long slender slips, which are the leaves. The pardon grows after the manner of the coco-nut-tree, though upon an infinitely more slender

a slender stalk; in the same way the crissia-tree likewise shoots up, though with this difference, that it does not exceed a fourth of the height or thickness of the other. From every trunk about five stalks or branches put forth, from each of which wine is drawn.

THE coco-tree claims the next place, as it is indisputably the most beneficial to mankind, except the palm, if the natives of the country knew how to improve the advantage in the manner they do in Asia. Here only the nut is used, merely for food, without any other convenience resulting from it. As this tree has already been described, we shall omit all particulars concerning it, although it is a native of the Gold Coast, and grows there in as great perfection as in any part of the globe.

IN the country of Axim grow great plenty of sweet and sour oranges; the first are excellent, and very little inferior to those in China. It is questioned, however, whether they are natives of the coast, as they only grow in a few places near the European settlements. Lime-trees are found all over the coast, especially at Mouree, where it is usual to prepare for sale above two hundred auns of lime-juice yearly, each aun valued at thirty shillings<sup>c</sup>. This is a kind of liquid-measure, in use among the Negroes.

BOSMAN describes the papay-tree as intirely different from the account of other writers. Most authors that we have seen say, that it is no more than six feet high, bearing neither branches nor leaves; whereas, according to Bosman, some of them shoot up at least thirty feet. At first, indeed, the fruit grows at the top of the trunk, without branches; but as the tree grows older, it puts forth branches towards the top, which resemble so many fresh stocks growing out of the old, like it, bearing fruit at the higher extremity; from whence likewise spring other branches in the manner of reeds, a little crooked, but hollow, and at the extremity of these grow fine broad leaves, not unlike vine-leaves, but larger. The fruit, or what is properly termed the papay, is about half the size of a coco-nut, of an oval figure, green without, and white within; but with age this white declines to red. It contains a great number of sweet kernels, which in fact are the seeds whence the tree is produced; the rest of the fruit greatly resembles in taste the pompion. Multitudes of this kind of trees grow along the coast, and even the ignorant natives have distinguished them into male and female, because the former bears no fruit, but are in continual blossom; nay they have further observed, that the female bears in the greatest abundance when the male stands near; thus admitting the blossom of the female to be the proper nidus for the male seed<sup>d</sup>. This remark may easily be accounted for, upon the system at present received by naturalists.

THE banana-tree grows here in great perfection; but the reader is by this time so well acquainted with its fruit, that we shall pass it over in this place. The gardens of the curious afford pomegranates; but, from all we are able to learn, the Gold Coast is not the natural soil of this tree. At Mouree is a vine, which Bosman calls the Moureesse vine, it growing in no other part of the coast. It produces a double crop of grapes, viz. in August and January, and would doubtless, says our author, yield a prodigious quantity, were it properly pruned and cultivated. It yields a delicious blue grape, but apparently not indigenous, as Bosman says that it is less juicy than their grapes in Holland. It is remarkable that vines will neither grow to any height, or produce fruit in any other part of the coast than Mouree, considering the richness of the soil, and warmth of the climate; but the heat of the sun may perhaps be too vehement for this plant. Barbot, Bosman, Smith, and Artus describe a fruit called the Cormantin-apple, because there it grows in the greatest abundance, which we believe is peculiar to this coast. It is about the size of a walnut, of a reddish colour, inclining to yellow, but the husk green. In the core are contained four large flat black kernels, surrounded by the pulp or fruit, which is red and white, of a pungent sweet taste, rather acid than sweet, like an unripe China orange. This fruit is pleasant, and refreshing to the sick; but especially useful in diarrhæas and fluxes, when boiled with palm-wine and sugar, being then gratefully astringent<sup>e</sup>.

BOSMAN is extremely out of humour with M. Foquenbourg, for declaring, that round Elmina, for several miles, the country produces no trees, grass, plants, or blades of any kind; whereas the whole country is finely adorned with lofty trees and cooling shades, less fruitful indeed than other parts of the coast, but far from barren in any particular. Some of them furnish a shade so thick and cool, that art, says Bosman, may blush to see herself so far outdone by nature; it being impossible for human genius to contrive groves so well suited to the warmth of the climate, and the pleasure of sight. "I remember," says he, "to have read in Olearius, of trees large enough to shelter two thousand men with their spreading boughs, the fruit being so large, that the shell was capable of containing a shepherd and his whole flock; a particular I will not dispute with Olearius, but will affirm with him, that I have seen trees capable of shading not only two but twenty thousand men, were they to stand close; and so tall, that a musquet-shot could hardly reach the top." This is probably the capot-tree, so celebrated by naturalists, on which grows a species of cotton, used here in stuffing beds, instead of feathers, which are too hot for the climate. The wood of the tree is light, porous, and pithy, scarce fit for any other purpose than the making canoes. At Axim there is one, which ten men could not grasp; and in the Ilba del Principe, or Princes Island, another, the trunk of which could not be surrounded by four-and-twenty men, their arms at the full stretch; not that the body itself is so enormous, but the sprouts adhere in such a manner, as seem to form one uniform trunk. In a word, the Gold Coast affords fruit-trees of all sorts, and wood for all purposes. About Ante are trees excellent for all manner of household furniture; and at Rio Gabon, great plenty of red and yellow wood. Bosman imagines, that good masts for shipping might be found in the country, were the natives to turn their attention to navigation and commerce.

Of the grain and culinary vegetables.

As to the grain of the coast, it consists of the great and small mihio, supposed to be the Turkish wheat, which ripens twice every year, affording a crop in August; and another in January. Rice is likewise produced in great abundance and perfection in all the low marshy grounds, and near the banks of lakes and rivers. The other vegetables, as yams, potatoes, pease, beans, &c. it would be tedious to enumerate: we must, however, give a short account of some species of beans peculiar to the country. One is of a large sort, the pod being two feet long, and three or four inches round, containing several large beans, of a bright red colour. Another sort is of directly the same shape and colour, but of the size of what we call a Windsor-bean. The last are reckoned wholesome and nutritive; and both kinds grow in the manner of French-beans, propt up, or creeping along the side of a hedge. A third sort of bean may more properly be called a root, as, like a potatoe, it grows underground, inclosed in a slender husk. It is by the natives called jojooties, and is extremely delicate and sweet, as well as wholesome. Another species of beans grow on a shrub like a gooseberry-bush. They have pods resembling those of green pease; but, as they are not much in request, authors do not describe them so minutely. A fifth sort is called gobbe gobbes, and grow too in a pod underground, shooting out a leaf above the surface of the earth. These are the worst of all beans, having something harsh and unpleasant in their taste; yet are they much valued by the natives. The sixth sort is also a subterraneous bean, known to the Europeans but a few years. These are called Angola-beans, and are supposed to have been transplanted from that kingdom. They are, when well fried, a very pleasant dish. A seventh and last kind grow also under the ground; but these are improperly termed beans, as they grow in no pod, though they bear some resemblance in taste to that species of pulse, but still more to the hazel-nut, when they are eaten raw, which is the most usual and best method. Sometimes they are triturated, soaked in water, and then pressed through a cloth. The liquor is boiled with rice, and in every part of the country is used for milk; and indeed might easily be mistaken for a dish of made milk, when relished with sugar and cinnamon.

HERE also grows the Molaguetta, or Guiney pepper; though not so abundantly as on the Pepper Coast; the piement, or Spanish pepper, cardamoms, and a number of roots, fruits, and grains, common almost to all countries. The piement, which is of two kinds, grows in great plenty upon a shrub, almost of the size of gooseberry-bushes in Holland. Both kinds are at first green; but afterwards change colour, the larger sort to a beautiful red, but the smaller to a red and black. The smaller is about a fourth of the size of the other; but then the plant that produces it is six times as high, but directly of the same species. Tobacco is also a native of the Gold Coast, produced in plenty, and consumed without discretion, no people on earth being so addicted to smoking. The usual pipe among them is a reed, with a stone bowl to contain the tobacco, which, instead of holding in their teeth, or in their hand, they rest upon the ground, and in this manner converse with great solemnity. Many of their pipes are six feet long, and might easily be mistaken for some badge of authority, but from the eternal smoke proceeding from them. So fond of this plant are both the male and female Negroes, that they will suffer extreme hunger rather than want tobacco, which is absolutely necessary to their felicity. This leaf grows here about two feet high, near eight inches long, and three broad; the plant bears a small bell flower, which, when ripe, turns to seed.

WE shall conclude this short and imperfect account of the natural produce of the Gold Coast by mentioning a species of cabbage, which the Dutch call kool, and the natives beefi. This they chew like tobacco or beetel in the mouth, swallow the juice, and spit out the fibrous parts. The taste is harsh and bitter, and its astringency is not inferior to the arum; yet it is diuretic, and as such frequently used by the Europeans. To this may be added the vast quantity of salt made on the Gold Coast; but as this is an artificial production from the sea-water evaporated, we shall omit it, to proceed to the history of the Ivory Coast.
